Subject Tova and Job

History

 This message has been replied to.

Julie;

I had a call from Tova who had a call from Job on what are plans are for the report.

I think it would be a good idea for us to have a brief meeting with them early next week so that both understand what we are doing here.

I told her we had found some interesting things they has assemled...but I think it would be good to "clear the air " with both of them

Thanks

Subject: E-mail to Voter ID peer reviewers

Tom and Julie-

Please take a look at this draft e-mail and let me know if it captures all that it needs to.

Would like to get this out ASAP- appreciate your feedback..

Dear Jonathan Nagler
Dear Jan Leighley
Dear Adam Berinsky

On behalf of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), thank you in advance for agreeing to assist us with the review of research conducted by the Eagleton Institute of Politics on voter identification. By Friday, May 5, 2006, you will receive, in electronic form, the research paper and relevant data analysis which supports the paper's findings. Through this independent review by a small group of experts familiar with elections data and research we are seeking feedback on:

- The research methodology which was used to support the paper's conclusions
- The specific statistical applications which were used to analyze the data and arrive at various conclusions

If there are alternate methodological and statistical approaches to analyzing the data on voter identification, and if there is other data on voter identification that you think should have been included in the analysis, please be certain to note this in your comments.

On May 11, 2006 EAC will conduct a 60-90 minute phone call with key Eagleton Institute staff responsible for the research, members of Eagleton's peer review group and the EAC-identified reviewers who have been asked to consider the research. Through this dialogue EAC hopes to gather varying perspectives and insights on the research strategies and methods that were employed by Eagleton. As a result of this conversation, EAC anticipates that some revisions will be made to the Eagleton research paper. This paper is scheduled to be presented to EAC's Board of Advisors and Standards Boards in late May.

While EAC agency policy does not allow us to provide you with financial compensation for your review of this research we greatly appreciate your willingness to assist us with this important task. We believe that the research findings we will provide on voter identification are important and will most certainly be enhanced by your insights and expertise.

Sincerely,

Karen Lynn-Dyson

Subject Re: My Thoughts –PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION

Gavin:

This looks good to me. I just have a few questions/clarifications, both involving the second paragraph:

1. First sentence - Do you mean "intra-agency", rather than interagency?
2. Second sentence - If we plan to release an EAC report based on the material provided by the consultants, then can we avoid implying that we are ever going to release a report written by the consultants?
3. Sixth sentence - I was present at only one interview, not all of them; but I did facilitate and help schedule the interviews.

THIS MESSAGE IS FOR ITS INTENDED RECIPIENT ONLY. IT IS A PRIVILEGED DOCUMENT AND SHALL NOT BE RELEASED TO A THIRD PARTY WITHOUT THE CONSENT OF THE SENDER.

The document you request on voter fraud is protected from release under FOIA. Specifically, the responsive information is protected by the Deliberative Process Privilege and exempted from release under 5 U.S.C. §552(b)(5). As you may know, the Deliberative Process Privilege protects intra-agency documents that are (1) predecisional in nature and (2) part of the deliberative process. In other words, the documents must be part of a process that recommends or presents opinions on a policy matter before that matter is adopted. Such documents are exempt from release (1) to encourage open and frank discussions on policy matters between agency subordinates and superiors, (2) to protect against premature disclosure of proposed policies and (3) to protect against public confusion that might result from disclosure of rationales that were not in fact the ultimate basis for agency action.

The report you have requested is an interagency document that is not yet complete and has not been reviewed and approved by the Commissioners (the relevant policy makers). The document was created by two contract employees with the support of EAC staff. The contract employees were hired pursuant EAC's authority to hire consultants and experts under 5 U.S.C. §3109 (See 42 U.S.C. §15324(b)). Individuals hired under this authority enter into an employment relationship with the EAC. The contract employees at issue were closely supervised by an EAC program director who participated directly in the project. For example, the supervisor participated in each interview conducted for the project. Further, the contract employees were provided research materials and other support from EAC law clerks and staff. Communications with contract employees are interagency communications for the purposes of FOIA.<sup>1</sup> Work continues to proceed on the draft.

Similarly, the document you have requested constitutes a recommendation on a policy matter. The purpose or subject of the draft report at issue is to make an EAC determination on how voter fraud should be studied by the Agency. This is to be done by (1) accessing the nature and quality of the information that presently exists on the subject matter (2) defining the terms and scope of EAC study as proposed under HAVA, (3) determining what is to be studied and (4) determining how it is to be studied. Clearly, EAC's interpretation of HAVA and its determination of what it will study and how it will use its resources to study it are matters of agency policy. This policy can only be made by the EAC's duly appointed commissioners. This has not yet been done. Thus, any draft created by staff is a proposal or recommendation on a policy matter and clearly both predecisional and deliberative.

For these reasons, the draft document you have requested is exempt from release. The release of an incomplete and unofficial document would serve only to confuse the public. We expect the report to be made final and approved by the Commission in December. It will be made public at that time. Upon its release you may obtain a copy of it on our Website.

DRAFT

The EAC has decided to waive the processing fees for your request. If you interpret any portion of this response as an adverse action, you may appeal it to the Election Assistance Commission. Your appeal must be in writing and sent to the address noted on the above letterhead. Any appeal submitted, must be postmarked no later than 60 calendar days from the date of this letter. Please include your reasons for reconsideration and attach a copy of this letter.

Subject Draft Voter Fraud/Voter Intimidation Report

History

This message has been replied to.

Julie:

I really like the tone, focus, and organization of the paper. I also liked the way you interspersed the lists of Working Group members, interviewees, and reports reviewed with the text (drawing the reader's attention to the info, cutting down on the # of appendices, and giving the eye a break from regular text). Attached is your document with my comments, questions, and suggested changes. I did not do much to it.

Regarding your questions about the appendices:

I really did not prepare my summaries with an eye toward publication, but the consultants' summaries probably include incendiary info (particularly re DOJ interviews). As for the case law, we have multiple, voluminous charts, but no list. We can create a list from the charts, but that will take time. The Commissioners may want to see the consultants' or my summaries and the case law charts, but do we need to publish them?

Do we need to put short bios for Tova and Job in an appendix? --- Peggy

EAC REPORT ON ~~VOTER~~ FRAUD AND VOTER INTIMIDATION STUDY

Comment [M1]: HAVA §241(b)(6) refers to voting (rather than voter) fraud and 241(b)(7) refers to voter intimidation. Do we want to do a global change from voter fraud to voting fraud, or leave it as is?

INTRODUCTION

Voter fraud and intimidation is a phrase familiar to many voting-aged Americans. However, it means different things to different people. Voter fraud and intimidation is a phrase used to refer to crimes, civil rights violations, and at times even the correct application of state or federal laws to the voting process. Past study of this topic has been as varied as its perceived meaning. In an effort to help understand the realities of voter fraud and voter intimidation in our elections, EAC has begun this, phase one, of a comprehensive study on election crimes. In this phase of its examination, EAC has developed a definition of election crimes and adopted some research methodology on how to assess the true existence and enforcement of election crimes in this country.

PURPOSE AND METHODOLOGY OF THE EAC STUDY

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) calls on the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) to research and study various issues related to the administration of elections. During Fiscal Year 2006, EAC began projects to research several of the listed topics. These topics for research were chosen in consultation with the EAC Standards Board and Board of Advisors. Voter fraud and voter intimidation, listed in §§241(b)(6) and (7), were topics ~~was a topic that~~ EAC as well as its advisory boards felt were important to study to help improve the administration of elections for federal office.

EAC began this study with the intention of identifying a common understanding of voter fraud and intimidation and devising a plan for a comprehensive study of these issues. This study was not intended to be a comprehensive review of existing voter fraud and voter intimidation actions, laws, or prosecutions. That type of research is well beyond the basic understanding that had to be established regarding what is commonly referred to as voter fraud and voter intimidation. Once that understanding was reached, a definition had to be crafted to refine and in some cases limit the scope of what reasonably can be researched and studied as evidence of voter fraud and voter intimidation. That definition will serve as the basis for recommending a plan for a comprehensive study of the area.

To accomplish these tasks, EAC employed two consultants, Tova Wang and Job Serebrov, who along with EAC staff and interns conducted the research that forms the basis of this report. The c ~~Consultants~~ were chosen based upon their experience with the topic and ~~– In addition, consultants were chosen to assure a bipartisan representation in this study. The consultants and EAC staff were charged to:~~ (1) ~~to research the current state of information on the topics of voter fraud and voter intimidation;~~ (2) ~~to develop a uniform definition of voter fraud and voter intimidation;~~ and (3) ~~to propose recommended strategies for researching this subject.~~

EAC consultants reviewed existing studies, articles, reports and case law on voter fraud and intimidation. In addition, EAC consultants conducted interviews with selected experts in the field. Last, EAC consultants and staff presented their study to a working group that provided feed back. The working group participants were:

The Honorable Todd Rokita
Indiana Secretary of State
Member, EAC Standards Board and the Executive Board of the Standards Board

Kathy Rogers
Georgia Director of Elections, Office of the Secretary of State
Member, EAC Standards Board

J.R. Perez
Guadalupe County Elections
Administrator, Texas

Barbara Arnwine

Leader of Election Protection Coalition

Benjamin L. Ginsberg
Partner, Patton Boggs LLP
Counsel to national Republican campaign committees and Republican candidates

Robert Bauer
Chair of the Political Law Practice at the law firm of Perkins Coie, District of Columbia
National Counsel for Voter Protection,
Democratic National Committee

Mark (Thor) Hearne II
Partner-Member, Lathrop & Gage, St

U.S. Department of Justice

Technical Advisor:

Craig Donsanto
Director, Election Crimes Branch, U.S.
Department of Justice

Throughout the process, EAC staff assisted the consultants by providing statutes and cases on this subject as well as supervision on the direction, scope and product of this research.

The consultants drafted a report for EAC that included their summaries of existing laws, relevant cases, studies and reports on voter fraud and intimidation as well as summaries of the interviews that they conducted. The draft report also provided a definition of voter fraud and intimidation and made certain recommendations developed by the consultants or by the working group on how to pursue further study of this subject. This document was vetted and edited to produce this final report.

Comment [M2]: The consultants did not really summarize existing law

EXISTING INFORMATION ABOUT FRAUD AND INTIMIDATION

To begin our study of voter fraud and voter intimidation, EAC consultants reviewed the current body of information on voter fraud and intimidation. What the world knows about these issues comes largely from a very limited body of reports, articles and books.

There are volumes of case law and statutes in the various states that also impact our understanding of what actions or inactions are legally considered fraud or intimidation. Last, there is anecdotal information available through media reports and interviews with persons who have administered elections, prosecuted fraud, and studied these problems. All of these resources were used by EAC consultants to provide an introductory look at the available knowledge of voter fraud and voter intimidation.

Reports and Studies of Voter Fraud and Intimidation

Over the years, there have been a number of studies and reports published conducted about ~~the concepts of~~ voter fraud and voter intimidation. EAC consultants reviewed many of these studies and reports to develop a base-line understanding of the information that is currently available about voter fraud and voter intimidation. EAC consultants reviewed the following articles, reports and books, summaries of which are available in Appendix “__”:

During our review of these documents, we learned a great deal about the type of research that has been conducted in the past concerning voter fraud and voter intimidation. None of the studies or reports was based on a comprehensive nationwide study, survey or review of all allegations, prosecutions or convictions of state or federal crimes related to voter fraud or voter intimidation in the U.S. Most reports focused on a limited number of case studies or instances of alleged voter fraud or intimidation. For example, "Shattering the Myth: An Initial Snapshot of Voter Disenfranchisement in the 2004 Elections," a report produced by the People for the American Way, focused exclusively on citizen reports of fraud or intimidation to the Election Protection program during the 2004 presidential election. Similarly, reports produced annually by the Department of Justice, Public Integrity Division, deal exclusively with crimes reported to and prosecuted by the United States Attorneys and/or the Department of Justice through the Public Integrity Section.

It is also apparent from a review of these articles and books that there is no consensus on the pervasiveness of voter fraud and voter intimidation. Some reports, such as "Building Confidence in U.S. Elections," suggest that there is little or no evidence of extensive fraud in U.S. elections or of multiple voting. This conflicts directly with other reports, such as the "Preliminary findings of Joint Task Force Investigating Possible Election Fraud," produced by the Milwaukee Police Department, Milwaukee County District

Attorney's Office, FBI and U.S. Attorney's Office. That report cited evidence of more than 100 individual instances of suspected double-voting, voting in the name of persons who likely did not vote, and/or voting using a name believed to be fake.

Voter intimidation is also a topic of some debate. Generally, speaking there is little agreement on what constitutes actionable voter intimidation. Some studies and reports cover only intimidation that involves physical or financial threats, while others cover non-criminal intimidation and even legal practices that they allege suppress the vote.

One point of agreement is that absentee voting and voter registration by ~~third-party~~ nongovernmental groups has created opportunities for fraud. A number of studies cited circumstances in which voter registration drives have falsified voter registration applications or have destroyed voter registration applications of persons affiliated with voters of a certain political party. Others conclude that paying persons per voter registration application creates the opportunity and perhaps the incentive for fraud.

Comment [M3]: The term "third-party" is often used for minor political parties. As most of the voter registration drive problems have involved major party operatives and advocacy groups, "nongovernmental" seems a better choice.

Interviews with Experts

In addition to reviewing prior studies and reports on voter fraud and intimidation, EAC consultants interviewed a number of persons regarding their experiences and research of voter fraud and voter intimidation. Persons interviewed included

These interviews in large part confirmed the conclusions that were gleaned from the articles, reports and books that were analyzed. For example, the interviewees largely agreed that absentee balloting is subject to the greatest proportion of fraudulent acts, followed by vote buying and voter registration fraud. They similarly pointed to voter registration drives by third-party nongovernmental groups as a source of fraud, particularly when the workers are paid per registration. Many asserted that impersonation of voters is probably the least frequent type of fraud, citing as reasons that it was the most likely type of fraud to be discovered, and that there are stiff penalties associated with this type of fraud, and that it was an inefficient method of influencing an election.

Interviewees differed on what they believe constitutes actionable voter intimidation. Law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies tend to look to the criminal definitions of voter intimidation which generally require some threat of physical or financial harm. On the other hand, voter rights advocates tended to point to activities such as challenger laws, voter identification laws, the location of polling places, and distribution of voting machines as activities that can constitute voter intimidation.

Those interviewed also expressed opinions on the enforcement of voter fraud and voter intimidation laws. States have varying authorities to enforce these laws. In some states, enforcement is left to the county or district attorney, and in others enforcement is managed by the state's attorney general. Regardless, voter fraud and voter intimidation are difficult to prove and require resources and time that local law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies do not have. Federal law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies have more time and resources but have limited jurisdiction. They can only prosecute election crimes related to elections with a federal candidate on the ballot and those committed by a public official under color of law involving federal candidates. Those interviewed differed on the effectiveness of the current system of enforcement. Some including those that allege that prosecutions are not sufficiently aggressive. Others and those that feel that the current laws are sufficient for prosecuting fraud and intimidation.

Case Law and Statutes

Consultants reviewed over 40,000 cases that were identified using a series of search terms related to voter fraud and voter intimidation. The majority of these cases came from appeal courts. This is not a surprising situation, since most cases that are publicly reported come from courts of appeal. Very few cases that are decided at the district court level are reported for public review.

Very few of the identified cases were applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, no apparent thematic pattern emerged. However, it did seem that the greatest number of cases reported on fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying and challenges to felon eligibility.

A listing of the cases reviewed in this study is attached as Appendix “___”.

Media Reports

EAC consultants reviewed thousands of media reports concerning a wide variety of potential voter fraud or voter intimidation, including:

- absentee ballot fraud,
- voter registration fraud,
- voter intimidation and suppression,
- deceased voters,
- multiple voting,
- felons voting,
- non-citizens voting,
- vote buying,
- deceptive practices, and

- fraud by election officials.

While these reports showed that there were a large number of allegations of voter fraud and voter intimidation, they provided much less information as to whether the allegations were ever formalized as complaints to law enforcement, whether charges were filed, whether prosecutions ensued, and whether any convictions were made. The media reports were enlightening as to the pervasiveness of complaints of fraud and intimidation throughout the country, the correlation between fraud allegations and the perception that the state was a “battleground” or “swing” state, and the fact that there were reports of almost all types of voter fraud and voter intimidation. However, these reports do not provide much data for analysis as to the number of complaints, charge and prosecutions of voter fraud and intimidation throughout the country.

DEFINITION OF ELECTION CRIMES

From our study of available information on voter fraud and voter intimidation, we have learned that these terms mean many things to many different people. These terms are used casually to refer to anything from vote buying to refusing to register a voter to falsifying voter registration applications. Upon further inspection, however, it is apparent that there is no common understanding of what is and what is not “voter fraud” and “voter intimidation.” Some think of voter fraud and voter intimidation only as criminal acts, while others include actions that may constitute civil wrongs, civil rights violations, and even legal and appropriate activities. In order to come up with a common definition and list of activities that can be studied, EAC assessed the appropriateness of the terminology that is currently in use and applied certain factors to limit the scope and reach of what can and will be studied by EAC in the future.

New Terminology

The phrase “voter fraud” is really a misnomer for a concept that is much broader. “Fraud” is a concept that connotes an intentional act of deception, which may constitute either a criminal act or civil tort depending upon the willfulness of the act.

Fraud, n. 1. A knowing misrepresentation of the truth or concealment of a material fact to induce another to act to his or her detriment. • Fraud is <sup>usually</sup> a tort, but in some cases (esp. when the conduct is willful) it may be a crime.

Comment [M4]: Sic? Or is this a typo?

Black’s Law Dictionary, Eighth Edition, p. 685.

A “voter” is a person who is eligible to and engages in the act of voting. Black’s Law Dictionary, Eighth Edition, p. 1608. Using these terms to form a definition of “voter fraud,” it means fraudulent or deceptive acts committed by the voter or in which the voter is the victim. Thus, a voter who intentionally provides false information on a voter registration application or intentionally impersonates another registered voter and attempts to vote for that person would be committing “voter fraud.” Similarly, a person who knowingly provides false information to a voter about the location of the voter’s polling place commits fraud on the voter.

The phrase “voter fraud” does not capture a myriad of other criminal acts that are related to elections which are not perpetrated by the voter and/or do not involve an act of deception. For example, “voter fraud” does not capture actions or willful inaction by candidates and election workers. When an election official willfully and knowingly refuses to register to vote an otherwise legally eligible person it is a crime. This is a crime that involves neither the voter nor an act of deception.

To further complicate matters, the phrases “voter fraud” and “voter intimidation” are used to refer to actions or inactions that are criminal as well as those that are potentially civil wrongs and even those that are legal. Obviously, criminal acts and civil wrongs are pursued in a very different manner. Criminal acts are prosecuted by the local, state or federal government. Generally, civil wrongs are prosecuted by the individual who believes that they were harmed. In some cases, when civil rights are involved, the civil division of the Department of Justice may become involved.

The goal of this study was to develop a common definition of what is generically referred to as “voter fraud” and “voter intimidation” that would serve as the basis ~~of~~ for a future, comprehensive study of the existence of these problems. In order to meet that goal, we recognize that the current terminology does not accurately represent the spectrum of activities that we desire to study. Furthermore, we recognize that the resources, both financial and human capital, needed to study allegations and prosecutions of criminal acts, suits involving civil torts, and allegations of potential voter suppression through the use legal election processes are well beyond the resources available to EAC. As such, EAC has defined “election crimes,” a phrase that captures all crimes related to the voter registration and voting processes.

What is an Election Crime for Purposes of this Study

Comment [M5]: So this means that we will not look at civil actions involving Voting Rights Act violations, right?

Election crimes are intentional acts or willful failures to act, prohibited by state or federal law, that are designed to cause ineligible persons to participate in the election process, eligible persons to be excluded from the election process, ineligible votes to be cast in an election, eligible votes not to be cast or counted, or other interference with or invalidation of election results. Election crimes generally fall into one of four categories: acts of deception; acts of coercion; acts of damage or destruction; and failures or refusals to act.

Generally speaking, election crimes can be committed by voters, candidates, election officials, or any other members of the public that desire to criminally impact the result of an election. However, crimes that are based upon knowing or willful failure to act assume that a duty to act exists. Election officials have affirmative duties to act with regard to elections. By and large, other groups and individuals do not have such duties.

The victim of an election crime can be a voter, a group of voters, or the public, in general. Election crimes can occur during any stage of the election process, including but not limited to qualification of candidates; voter registration; campaigning; voting system preparation and programming; voting either early, absentee, or election day; vote tabulation; recounts; and recalls.

The following are examples of activities that may constitute election crimes. This list is not intended to be exhaustive, but is representative of what states and or the federal government consider criminal activity related to elections.

Acts of Deception

- Knowingly causing to be mailed or distributed, or knowingly mailing or distributing, literature that includes false information about the voter's precinct or polling place, regarding the date and time of the election or regarding a candidate;
- Possessing an official ballot outside the voting location, unless the person is an election official or other person authorized by law or local ordinance possess a ballot outside of the polling location;
- Making, or knowingly possessing, a counterfeit of an official election ballot;
- Signing a name other than his/her own to a petition proposing an initiative, referendum, recall, or nomination of a candidate for office;
- Knowingly signing more than once for the proposition, question, or candidate at one election;
- Signing a petition proposing an initiative or referendum when the signer is not a qualified voter.
- Voting or attempting to vote in the name of another person;
- Voting or attempting to vote more than once at the same election;
- Intentionally making a false affidavit, swearing falsely, or falsely affirming under an oath required by a statute regarding their voting status, including when registering to vote, requesting an absentee ballot or presenting to vote in person;
- Registering to vote without being entitled to register;
- Knowingly making a material false statement on an application for voter registration or re-registration; and
- Voting or attempting to vote in an election after being disqualified or when the person knows that he/she is not eligible to vote.

Acts of Coercion

- Using, threatening to use, or causing to be used force, coercion, violence, restraint, or inflicting, threatening to inflict, or causing to be inflicted damage harm, or loss, upon or against another person to induce or compel that person to vote or refrain from voting or to register or refrain from registering to vote;
- Knowingly paying, offering to pay, or causing to be paid money or other valuable thing to a person to vote or refrain from voting for a candidate or for or against an election proposition or question;

- Knowingly soliciting or encouraging a person who is not qualified to vote in an election;
- Knowingly challenging a person's right to vote without probable cause or on fraudulent grounds, or engaging in mass, indiscriminate, and groundless challenging of voters solely for the purpose of preventing voter from voting or delay the process of voting;
- As an employer, attempting by coercion, intimidation, threats to discharge or to lessen the remuneration of an employee, to influence his vote in any election, or who requires or demands an examination or inspection by himself or another of an employee's ballot;
- Soliciting, accepting, or agreeing to accept money or other valuable thing in exchange for signing or refraining from signing a petition proposing an initiative;
- Inducing or attempting to induce an election official to fail in the official's duty by force, threat, intimidation, or offers of reward;
- Directly or through any other person advancing, paying, soliciting, or receiving or causing to be advanced, paid, solicited, or received, any money or other valuable consideration to or for the use of any person in order to induce a person not to become or to withdraw as a candidate for public office; and
- Soliciting, accepting, or agreeing to accept money or other valuable thing in exchange for registering to vote.

Acts of Damage or Destruction

- Destroying completed voter registration applications that are necessary for the applicants to exercise their right to vote;
- Removing or destroying any of the supplies or other conveniences placed in the voting booths or compartments for the purpose of enabling the voter to vote his or her ballot;
- Removing, tearing down, or defacing election materials, instructions or ballots;
- Fraudulently altering or changing the vote of any elector, by which such elector is prevented from voting as he intended;
- Knowingly removing, altering, defacing or covering any political sign of any candidate for public office for a prescribed period prior to and following the election;
- Intentionally changing, attempting to change, or causing to be changed an official election document including ballots, tallies, and returns; and
- Intentionally delaying, attempting to delay, or causing to be delayed the sending of certificate, register, ballots, or other materials whether original or duplicate, required to be sent by jurisdictional law.

Formatted: Bullets and Numbering

Failure or Refusal to Act

- Intentionally failing to perform an election duty, or knowingly committing an unauthorized act with the intent to effect the election;
- Knowingly permitting, making, or attempting to make a false count of election returns;

- o Intentionally concealing, withholding, or destroying election returns or attempts to do so;
- o Marking a ballot by folding or physically altering the ballot so as to recognize the ballot at a later time;
- o Attempting to learn or actually and unlawfully learning how a voter marked a ballot;
- o Distributing or attempting to distribute election material knowing it to be fraudulent;
- o Knowingly refusing to register a person who is entitled to register under the rules of that jurisdiction; and
- o Knowingly refusing to allow an eligible voter to cast his/her ballot.

What is not an Election Crime for Purposes of this Study

There are some actions or inactions that may constitute crimes or civil wrongs that we do not include in our definition of “election crimes.” All criminal es-or civil violations related to campaign finance contribution limitations and prohibitions, as well as reporting either at the state or federal level are not “election crimes” for purposes of this study and any future study conducted by EAC. The federal agency responsible for administering federal campaign finance law and monitoring the status of state campaign finance law is the Federal Election Commission (FEC).

Comment [M6]: Do we want to restrict our study to election crimes that affect federal elections only? HAVA §241(b)(6) specifically refers to “Nationwide statutes and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office.” [Emphasis added]. That would mean we would also stay away from election crimes affecting ballot issues and elections with no federal candidate on the ballot.

Similarly, criminal acts that are unrelated to elections, voting, or voter registration are not “election crimes,” even when those offenses occur in a polling place, voter registration office, or a candidate’s office or appearance. For example, an assault or battery that results from a fight in a polling place or at a candidate’s office is not an election crime. Similarly, violations of ethical provisions such as the Hatch Act are not “election crimes.” Last, actions that do not rise to the level of criminal activity, that is a misdemeanor, relative felony or felony, are not “election crimes.”

RECOMMENDATIONS ON HOW TO STUDY ELECTION CRIMES

As a part of its study, EAC sought recommendations on ways that EAC can study the existence of election crimes. EAC consultants developed recommendations. In addition, the working group and some of the persons interviewed as a part of this study provided recommendations.

Recommendation 1: Conduct More Interviews

Future activity in this area should include conducting additional interviews. In particular, more election officials from all levels of government, parts of the country, and political parties should be interviewed. It would also be especially beneficial to talk to people in law enforcement, specifically federal District Election Officers (“DEOs”) and local district attorneys, as well as civil and criminal defense attorneys.

Recommendation 2: Follow Up on Media Research

The media search conducted for this phase of the research was based on a list of search terms agreed upon by EAC consultants. Thousands of articles were reviewed and hundreds analyzed. Many of the articles contain allegations of fraud or intimidation. Similarly, many of the articles contain information about investigations into such activities or even charges brought. Additional media research should be conducted to determine what, if any, resolutions or further activity there was in each case.

Recommendation 3: Follow Up on Allegations Found in Literature Review

Many of the allegations made in the reports and books that were analyzed and summarized by EAC consultants were not substantiated and were certainly limited by the date of publication of those pieces. Despite this, such reports and books are frequently cited by various interested parties as evidence of fraud or intimidation. Further research should include follow up on the allegations discovered in the literature review.

Recommendation 4: Review Complaints Filed With “MyVote1” Voter Hotline

During the 2004 election and the statewide elections of 2005, the University of Pennsylvania led a consortium of groups and researchers in conducting the MyVote1 Project. This project involved using a 1-800 voter hotline where voters could call for poll location, be transferred to a local hotline, or leave a recorded message with a complaint. In 2004, this resulted in over 200,000 calls received and over 56,000 recorded complaints.

Further research should be conducted using the MyVote1 data with the cooperation of the project leaders. While perhaps not a fully scientific survey given the self-selection of the callers, the information regarding 200,000 complaints may provide a good deal of insight into the problems voters experienced, especially those in the nature of intimidation or suppression.

Recommendation 5: Further Review of Complaints Filed With U.S. Department of Justice

Although according to a recent GAO report the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice has a variety ~~in~~ of ways it tracks complaints of voter intimidation. Attempts should be made to obtain relevant data, including the telephone logs of complaints and information from the Interactive Case Management (ICM) system. Further research should also include a review and analysis of the DOJ/OPM observer and monitor field reports from Election Day.

Recommendation 6: Review Reports Filed By District Election Officers

Further research should include a review of the reports that must be filed by every District Election Officer to the Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice. The DEOs play a central role in receiving reports of voter fraud and investigating and pursuing them. Their reports back to the Department would likely provide tremendous insight into what actually transpired during the last several elections. Where necessary, information could be redacted or made confidential.

Recommendation 7: Attend Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Symposium

Further activity in this area should include attending the next Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Symposium. At this conference, prosecutors serving as District Election Officers in the 94 U.S. Attorneys' Offices obtain annual training on fighting election fraud and voting rights abuses. These conferences are sponsored by the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division and the Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division, and feature presentations by Civil Rights officials and senior prosecutors from the Public Integrity Section and the U.S. Attorneys' Offices. By attending the symposium researchers could learn more about the following how District Election Officers are trained; how information about previous election and voting issues is presented; and how the Voting Rights Act, the criminal laws governing election fraud and intimidation, the National Voter Registration Act, and the Help America Vote Act are described and explained to participants

Recommendation 8: Conduct Statistical Research

EAC should measure voter fraud and intimidation using interviews, focus groups, and a survey and statistical analysis of the results of these efforts. The sample should be based on the following factors:

- o Ten locations that are geographically and demographically diverse where there have historically been many reports of fraud and/or intimidation;
- o Ten locations (geographically and demographically diverse) that have not had many reports of fraud and/or intimidation;

EAC should also conduct a survey of elections officials, district attorneys, and district election officers. The survey sample should be large in order to be able to get the necessary subsets. The sample must include a random set of counties where there have and have not been a large number of allegations

Recommendation 9: Explore Improvements to Federal Law

Future researchers should review federal law to explore ways to make it easier to impose either civil or criminal penalties for acts of intimidation that do not necessarily involve racial animus and/or a physical or economic threat.

Recommendation 10: Use Observers to Collect Data on Election Day

Use observers to collect data regarding fraud and intimidation at the polls in on Election Day. There may be some limitations to the ability to conduct this type of research, including difficulty gaining access to polling places for the purposes of observation, and concerns regarding how the observers themselves may inadvertently or deliberately influence the occurrence of election crimes.

Recommendation 11: Study Absentee Ballot Fraud

Because absentee ballot fraud constitutes a large portion of election crimes, a stand-alone study of absentee ballot fraud should be conducted. Researchers should look at actual cases to see how absentee ballot fraud schemes are conducted in an effort to provide recommendations on more effective measures for preventing them.

Recommendation 12: Use Risk Analysis Methodology to Study Fraud

Conduct an analysis of what types of fraud people are most likely to commit. Researchers can use that risk analysis to rank the types of fraud based on the ease of commission and the impact of the fraud.

Recommendation 13: Conduct Research Using Database Comparisons

Researchers should compare information on databases to determine whether the voter rolls contain deceased persons and felons. In addition, the voter rolls can then be compared with the list of persons who voted to determine whether deceased voters or felons are noted as having actually-voted.

Recommendation 14: Conduct a Study of Deceptive Practices

The working group discussed the increasing use of deceptive practices, such as flyers with false and/or intimidating information, to suppress voter participation. A number of groups, such as the Department of Justice, the EAC, and organizations such as the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights, keep phone logs regarding complaints of such practices. These logs should be reviewed and analyzed to see how such practices are being conducted and what can be done about them.

Recommendation 15: Study Use of HAVA Administrative Complaint Procedure as Vehicle for Measuring Fraud and Intimidation

EAC should study the extent to which states are actually utilizing the administrative complaint procedure mandated by HAVA. In addition, the EAC should study whether data collected through the administrative complaint procedure can be used as another source of information for measuring fraud and intimidation.

Recommendation 16: Examine the Use of Special Election Courts

Given that many state and local judges are elected, it may be worth exploring whether special election courts should be established to handle fraud and intimidation complaints before, during and after Election Day. Pennsylvania employs such a system and could investigate how well that system is working.

Accepted Recommendations

There has never been a comprehensive national study that gathered data regarding all claims, charges and prosecutions of voting crimes. EAC feels that a comprehensive study is the most important research that it can offer the election community and the public. As such, EAC has adopted all or a part of six of the 16 recommendations made by EAC consultants and working group.

While several of the other recommendations could be used to obtain more anecdotal information regarding election crimes, EAC believes that what is needed is a comprehensive survey and study of the information available from investigatory agencies, prosecutorial bodies and courts on the number and types of complaints, charges and prosecutions of election crimes. Additional media reviews, additional interviews and the use of observers to collect information from voters on Election Day will only serve to continue the use of anecdotal data to report on election crimes. Hard data on complaints, charges and prosecutions exists and we should gather and use that data, rather than rely on the perceptions of the media or the members of the public as to what might be fraud or intimidation.

Some of the recommendations are beyond the scope of the current study. While election courts may be a reasonable conclusion to reach after we determine what volume and type of election crimes are being reported, charged or prosecuted, it is premature to embark on an analysis of that solution without more information. Last, some of the recommendations do not support a comprehensive study of election crimes. While a risk analysis might be appropriate in a smaller scale study, EAC desires to conduct a broader survey to avoid the existing problem of anecdotal and limited scope of information.

In order to further its goal of developing a comprehensive data set regarding election crimes and the laws and procedures used to identify and prosecute them, EAC intends to engage in the following research activities in studying the existence and enforcement of election crimes:

Survey Chief Election Officers Regarding Administrative Complaints

Likely sources of complaints concerning voting crimes are the administrative complaint processes that states were required to establish to as a part of complying with HAVA §402. These complaint procedures were required to be in place prior to a state receiving any funds under HAVA. Citizens are permitted to file complaints alleging violations of HAVA Title III provisions under these procedures with the state's chief election official and these complaints must be resolved within 60 days. The procedures also allow for alternative dispute resolution of claims. Some states have expanded this process to include complaints of other violations, such as election crimes.

In order to determine how many of these complaints allege the commission of election crimes, EAC will survey the states' chief election officers regarding complaints that have been filed, investigated and resolved since January 1, 2004. EAC will use the definition of election crimes provided above in this report in its survey so that data regarding a uniform set of offenses can be collected.

Survey State Election Crime Investigation Units Regarding Complaints Filed and Referred

Comment [M7]: Need to include survey of laws and procedures used to ID and prosecute election crime.

Several chief state election officials have developed investigation units focused on receiving, investigating and referring complaints of election crimes. These units were established to bolster the abilities of state and local law enforcement to investigate allegations of election crimes. California, New York and Florida are just three examples of states that have these types of units.

EAC will use a survey instrument to gather information on the numbers and types of complaints that have been received by, investigated and ultimately referred to local or state law enforcement by election crime investigation units since January 1, 2004. This data will help us understand the pervasiveness of perceived fraud, as well as the number of claims that state election officials felt were meritorious of being referred to local and state law enforcement or prosecutorial agencies for further action.

Survey Law Enforcement and Prosecutorial Agencies Regarding Complaints and Charge of Voting Crimes

Comment [M8]: Need to include survey of laws and procedures used to ID and prosecute election crime.

While voters, candidates and citizens may call national hotlines or the news media to report allegations of election crimes, it is those complaints that are made to law enforcement that can be investigated and ultimately prosecuted. Thus, it is critical to the study of election crimes to obtain statistics regarding the number and types of complaints that are made to law enforcement, how many of those complaints result in the perpetrator being charged or indicted, and how many of those charges or indictments result in pleas or convictions.

Thus, EAC will survey law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies at the local, state and federal level to determine the number and types of complaints, charges or indictments, and pleas or convictions of election crimes since January 1, 2004. In addition, EAC will seek to obtain an understanding of why some complaints are not charged or indicted and why some charges or indictments are not prosecuted.

Comment [M9]: Would this include the verification of information about current federal and state laws and procedures that may be used to pursue violations? We would need this information in order to better understand the data we collect.

Once a reliable data set concerning the existence and enforcement of election crimes is assembled, a real analysis of the effectiveness of fraud prevention measures can be conducted. For example, data can be analyzed to determine if criminal activities related to elections are isolated to certain areas or regions of the country. Data collected from the election official surveys can be compared to the data regarding complaints, charges and prosecutions gathered from the respective law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies in each jurisdiction. The effect and/or effectiveness of provisions such as voter identification laws and challenger provisions can be assessed based on hard data from areas where these laws exist. Last, analyses such as the effectiveness of enforcement can be conducted in light of the resources available to the effort.

CONCLUSION

Election crimes are nothing new to our election process. The pervasiveness of these crimes and the fervor with which they have been enforced has created a great deal of debate among academics, election officials, and political pundits. Past studies of these issues have been limited in scope and some have been riddled with bias. These are issues that deserve comprehensive and nonpartisan review. EAC through its clearinghouse role will collect and analyze data on election crimes throughout the country. These data not only will tell us what types of election crimes are committed and where fraud exists, but also inform us of what factors impact the existence, prevention and prosecution of election crimes.

Subject Voter Fraud-Voter Intimidation Draft Report

Attached is a copy of the draft voter fraud-voter intimidation report that combines all of the pieces provided to me by the consultants, except for the voluminous Nexis research and case law charts. Tom wants to get this before the Commissioners ASAP, but I need some other eyes to look it over before we do. Although I've made some formatting changes to provide some consistency in presentation, and corrected a couple of glaring errors, I remain concerned about a number of issues:

- As you know, references to DOJ actions/responses have caused some concern at DOJ. But both consultants are adamantly opposed to EAC making substantive changes to their report. Perhaps using footnotes clearly labeled as EAC footnotes would be a method of addressing this issue?
- There are some recommendations regarding DOJ that we (the consultants and I) were told would not be supported by DOJ, and other references to DOJ, none of which have been reviewed by the department. I think we ought to give Craig Donsanto and John Tanner a chance to provide feedback on each of these sections.
- I am a little concerned about the naming of names, particularly in the section that addresses working group concerns. If we publish it as is, it might end up as fodder for some very negative newspaper articles.
- The report currently uses three different voices: third person, first person singular, first person plural. I think this looks really clumsy. If we are not actually making substantive changes, perhaps we could get away with making the presentation consistent in this regard.
- Because the consultants submitted the report in pieces, they did not include proper sequeways. I don't know if we should leave it as is, or insert them where needed.

Please let me know what you think. If it would help, we can schedule a teleconference. --- Peggy

Introduction

Charge Under HAVA

Under the Help America Vote Act, Pub. L. No. 107-252, 116 Stat. 1666 (2002) (“HAVA”), the United States Election Assistance Commission is charged with developing national statistics on voter fraud and developing methods of deterring and investigating voter fraud. Also, the Commission is charged with developing methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation.

Scope of Project

The Commission employed a bipartisan team of legal consultants, Tova Wang and Job Serebrov to develop a preliminary overview work product to determine the quantity and quality of vote fraud and voter intimidation that is present on a national scale. The consultants’ work is neither comprehensive nor conclusive. This first phase of an envisioned two-phase project was constrained by both time and funding. The consultants’ conclusions and recommendations for phase II will be contained in this report.

The consultants, working without the aid of a support staff, divided most of the work. However, the final work product was mutually checked and approved. They agreed upon the steps that were taken needed and the method employed. For all of the documentary sources, the consultants limited the time period under review from January 1, 2001 to January 1, 2006. The research performed by the consultants included interviews, an extensive Nexis search, a review of existing literature, and case research.

Interviews: The consultants chose the interviewees by first coming up with a list of the categories of types of people they wanted to interview. Then the consultants separately, equally filled those categories with a certain number of people. Due to time and resource constraints, the consultants had to pare down this list substantially – for instance, they had to rule out interviewing prosecutors altogether – but still got a good range of people to talk to. The ultimate categories were academics, advocates, elections officials, lawyers and judges. Although the consultants were able to talk to most of the people they wanted to, some were unavailable and a few were not comfortable speaking to them, particularly judges. The consultants together conducted all of the interviews, either by phone or in person. Then the consultants split up drafting the summaries. All summaries were reviewed and mutually approved. Most of the interviews were extremely informative and the consultants found the interviewees to be extremely knowledgeable and insightful for the most part.

Nexis: Initially, the consultants developed an enormous list of possible Nexis search terms. It soon became obvious that it would be impossible to conduct the research that way. As a result, consultant Wang performed the Nexis search by finding search term combinations that would yield virtually every article on a particular subject from the last five years. Consultant Serebrov approved the search terms. Then Wang created an excel spreadsheet in order to break down the articles in way in which they could be effectively analyzed for patterns. Each type of fraud is broken down in a separate chart according to where it took place, the date, the type of election it occurred in, what the allegation was, the publication it came from. Where there was a follow up article, any information that that suggested there had been some further action taken or some resolution to the allegation was also included. For four very complicated and long drawn out situations – Washington State, Wisconsin, South Dakota in 2004, and the vote buying cases in a couple of particular jurisdictions over the last several years –written summaries with news citations are provided.

Existing Literature: Part of the selections made by the consultants resulted from consultant Wang's long-term familiarity with the material while part was the result of a joint web search for articles and books on vote fraud and voter intimidation and suggestions from those interviewed by the consultants. The consultants reviewed a wide range of materials from government reports and investigations, to academic literature, to reports published by advocacy groups. The consultants believe that they covered the landscape of available sources.

Cases: In order to properly identify all applicable cases, the consultants first developed an extensive word search term list. A WestLaw search was performed and the first one hundred cases under each word search term were then gathered in individual files. This resulted in a total of approximately 44,000 cases. Most of these cases were federal as opposed to state and appellate as opposed to trial. Consultant Serebrov analyzed the cases in each file to determine if they were on point. If he found that the first twenty cases were inapplicable, Serebrov would sample forty to fifty other file cases at random to determine applicability. If the entire file did not yield any cases, the file would be discarded. All discarded word search terms were recorded in a separate file. Likewise, if the file only yielded a few applicable cases, it would also be discarded. However, if a small but significant number of cases were on point, the file was later charted. The results of the case search were stark because relatively few applicable cases were found.

Working Definition of Fraud and Intimidation

Note: The definition provided below is for the purposes of this EAC project. Most of the acts described come within the federal criminal definition of fraud, but some may not.

Election fraud is any intentional action, or intentional failure to act when there is a duty to do so, that corrupts the election process in a manner that can impact on election outcomes. This includes interfering in the process by which persons register to vote; the way in which ballots are obtained, marked, or tabulated; and the process by which election results are canvassed and certified.

Examples include the following:

- falsifying voter registration information pertinent to eligibility to cast a vote, (e.g. residence, criminal status, etc).;
- altering completed voter registration applications by entering false information;
- knowingly destroying completed voter registration applications (other than spoiled applications) before they can be submitted to the proper election authority;
- knowingly removing eligible voters from voter registration lists, in violation of HAVA, NVRA, or state election laws;
- intentional destruction by election officials of voter registration records or balloting records, in violation of records retention laws, to remove evidence of election fraud;
- vote buying;
- voting in the name of another;
- voting more than once;
- coercing a voter's choice on an absentee ballot;
- using a false name and/or signature on an absentee ballot;
- destroying or misappropriating an absentee ballot;
- felons, or in some states ex-felons, who vote when they know they are ineligible to do so;
- misleading an ex-felon about his or her right to vote;
- voting by non-citizens who know they are ineligible to do so;
- intimidating practices aimed at vote suppression or deterrence, including the abuse of challenge laws;
- deceiving voters with false information (e.g.; deliberately directing voters to the wrong polling place or providing false information on polling hours and dates);
- knowingly failing to accept voter registration applications, to provide ballots, or to accept and count voted ballots in accordance with the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act;
- intentional miscounting of ballots by election officials;
- intentional misrepresentation of vote tallies by election officials;
- acting in any other manner with the intention of suppressing voter registration or voting, or interfering with vote counting and the certification of the vote.

Voting fraud does not include mistakes made in the course of voter registration, balloting, or tabulating ballots and certifying results. For purposes of the EAC study, it also does not include violations of campaign finance laws.

Summaries of Research Conducted

Interviews

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.
- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, “dead” voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud, although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.
- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.
- Several people indicate – including representatives from DOJ -- that for various reasons, the Department of Justice is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now and is focusing on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting and felon voting. While the civil rights section continues to focus on systemic patterns of malfeasance, the public integrity section is focusing now on individuals, on isolated instances of fraud.
- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed
- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.
  - With respect to the civil rights section, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one’s definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and the section has not pursued any such cases.
  - Craig Donsanto of the public integrity section says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases the department is investigating and the number of indictments the section is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, the department has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so it can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.
- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud. Of particular note, Sarah Ball Johnson, Executive Director of Elections for Kentucky, emphasized that having had an effective statewide voter registration database for more than thirty years has helped that state avoid most of the fraud problems that have been alleged elsewhere, such as double voting and felon voting.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment

- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama’s “deceptive practices” bill
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected nonpartisanly they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas is a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states’ office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.
- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots “for cause” only if it were politically feasible.
- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the scheme contemplated in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.
- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

Nexis Research

Absentee Ballot Fraud

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters
- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased
- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported on included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places.
- Improper demands for identification
- Poll watchers harassing voters
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters
- Disproportionate police presence
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from “battleground” states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

“Dead Voters and Multiple Voting”

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking of voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person taking criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found 5 such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations in three particular jurisdictions as detailed in the vote buying summary. There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area. All of these cases are concentrated in the Midwest and South.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of voter registration forms. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case charges were filed against ten individuals. In one case a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem has been the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Existing Research

There are many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. There is little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud is the report written by Lori Minnite. The most systematic look at voter intimidation is the report by Laughlin McDonald. Books written about this subject seem to all have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists. It is hoped that this gap will be filled in the “second phase” of this EAC project.

Moreover, reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund’s frequently cited book. Again, this is something that it is hoped will be addressed in the “second phase” of this EAC project by doing follow up research on allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate, but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.
- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Cases

After reviewing over 40,000 cases, the majority of which came from appeals courts, I have found comparatively very few which are applicable to this study. Of those that are applicable, no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it seems that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility. But because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, I suggest that case research for the second phase of this project concentrate on state trial-level decisions.

Methodology

The following is a summary of interviews conducted with a number of political scientists and experts in the field as to how one might undertake a comprehensive examination of voter fraud and intimidation. A list of the individuals interviewed and their ideas are available, and all of the individuals welcome any further questions or explanations of their recommended procedures.

- In analyzing instances of alleged fraud and intimidation, we should look to criminology as a model. In criminology, experts use two sources: the Uniform Crime Reports, which are all reports made to the police, and the Victimization Survey, which asks the general public whether a particular incident has happened to them. After surveying what the most common allegations are, we should conduct a survey of the general public that ask whether they have committed certain acts or been subjected to any incidents of fraud or intimidation. This would require using a very large sample, and we would need to employ the services of an expert in survey data collection. (Stephen Ansolobhere, MIT)
- Several political scientists with expertise in these types of studies recommended a methodology that includes interviews, focus groups, and a limited survey. In determining who to interview and where the focus groups should be drawn from, they recommend the following procedure:
  - Pick a number of places that have historically had many reports of fraud and/or intimidation; from that pool pick 10 that are geographically and demographically diverse, and have had a diversity of problems
  - Pick a number of places that have not had many reports of fraud and/or intimidation; from that pool pick 10 places that match the geographic and demographic make-up of the previous ten above (and, if possible, have comparable elections practices)

- Assess the resulting overall reports and impressions resulting from these interviews and focus groups, and examine comparisons and differences among the states and what may give rise to them.

In conducting a survey of elections officials, district attorneys, district election officers, they recommend that:

- The survey sample be large in order to be able to get the necessary subsets
- The survey must include a random set of counties where there have and have not been a large number of allegations

(Allan Lichtman, American University; Thad Hall, University of Utah; Bernard Grofman, UC – Irvine)

- Another political scientist recommended employing a methodology that relies on qualitative data drawn from in-depth interviews with key critics and experts on all sides of the debate on fraud; quantitative data collected through a survey of state and local elections and law enforcement officials; and case studies. Case studies should focus on the five or ten states, regions or cities where there has been a history of election fraud to examine past and present problems. The survey should be mailed to each state's attorney general and secretary of state, each county district attorney's office and each county board of elections in the 50 states. (Lorraine Minnite, Barnard College)
- The research should be a two-step process. Using LexisNexis and other research tools, a search should be conducted of news media accounts over the past decade. Second, interviews with a systematic sample of election officials nationwide and in selected states should be conducted. (Chandler Davidson, Rice University)
- One expert in the field posits that we can never come up with a number that accurately represents either the incidence of fraud or the incidence of voter intimidation. Therefore, the better approach is to do an assessment of what is most likely to happen, what election violations are most likely to be committed – in other words, a risk analysis. This would include an analysis of what it would actually take to commit various acts, e.g. the cost/benefit of each kind of violation. From there we could rank the likely prevalence of each type of activity and examine what measures are or could be effective in combating them. (Wendy Weiser, Brennan Center of New York University)
- Replicate a study in the United States done abroad by Susan Hyde of the University of California- San Diego examining the impact of impartial poll site observers on the incidence of election fraud. Doing this retrospectively would require the following steps:
  - Find out where there were federal observers
  - Get precinct level voting information for those places

- Analyze whether there was any difference in election outcomes in those places with and without observers, and whether any of these results seem anomalous.

Despite the tremendous differences in the political landscapes of the countries examined by Hyde in previous studies and the U.S., Hyde believes this study could be effectively replicated in this country by sending observers to a random sample of precincts. Rather than compare the incumbent's vote share, such factors such as voter complaints, voter turnout, number of provisional ballots used, composition of the electorate, as well as any anomalous voting results could be compared between sites with and without monitors.

For example, if intimidation is occurring, and if reputable monitors make intimidation less likely or voters more confident, then turnout should be higher on average in monitored precincts than in unmonitored precincts. If polling station officials are intentionally refusing to issue provisional ballots, and the polling station officials are more likely to adhere to regulations while being monitored, the average number of provisional ballots should be higher in monitored precincts than in unmonitored precincts. If monitors cause polling station officials to adhere more closely to regulations, then there should be fewer complaints (in general) about monitored than unmonitored precincts (this could also be reversed if monitors made voters more likely to complain).

Again, random assignment controls for all of the other factors that otherwise influence these variables.

One of the downsides of this approach is it does not get at some forms of fraud, e.g. absentee ballot fraud; those would have to be analyzed separately.

- Another political scientist recommends conducting an analysis of vote fraud claims and purging of registration rolls by list matching. Allegations of illegal voting often are based on matching of names and birth dates. Alleged instances of double voting are based on matching the names and birth dates of persons found on voting records. Allegations of ineligible felon (depending on state law), deceased, and of non-citizen voting are based on matching lists of names, birth dates, and sometimes addresses of such people against a voting records. Anyone with basic relational database skills can perform such matching in a matter of minutes.

However, there are a number of pitfalls for the unwary that can lead to grossly over-estimating the number of fraudulent votes, such as missing or ignored middle names and suffixes or matching on missing birth dates. Furthermore, there is a surprising statistical fact that a group of about three hundred people with the same first and last name are almost assured to share the exact same birth date, including year. In a large state, it is not uncommon for hundreds of Robert Smiths (and other common names) to have voted. Thus, allegations of vote fraud or purging of voter registration rolls by list matching almost assuredly will find a large proportion of false positives: people who voted legally or are registered to vote legally.

Statistics can be rigorously applied to determine how many names would be expected to be matched by chance. A simulation approach is best applied here: randomly assign a birth date to an arbitrary number of people and observe how many match within the list or across lists. The simulation is repeated many times to average out the variation due to chance. The results can then be matched back to actual voting records and purge lists, for example, in the hotly contested states of Ohio or Florida, or in states with Election Day registration where there are concerns that easy access to voting permits double voting. This analysis will rigorously identify the magnitude alleged voter fraud, and may very well find instances of alleged fraud that exceed what might have otherwise happened by chance.

This same political scientist also recommends another way to examine the problem: look at statistics on provisional voting: the number cast might provide indications of intimidation (people being challenged at the polls) and the number of those not counted would be indications of "vote fraud." One could look at those jurisdictions in the Election Day Survey with a disproportionate number of provisional ballots cast and cross-reference it with demographics and number of provisional ballots discarded. (Michael McDonald, George Mason University)

- Spencer Overton, in a forthcoming law review article entitled Voter Identification, suggests a methodology that employs three approaches—investigations of voter fraud, random surveys of voters who purported to vote, and an examination of death rolls provide a better understanding of the frequency of fraud. He says all three approaches have strengths and weaknesses, and thus the best studies would employ all three to assess the extent of voter fraud. An excerpt follows:

1. Investigations and Prosecutions of Voter Fraud

Policymakers should develop databases that record all investigations, allegations, charges, trials, convictions, acquittals, and plea bargains regarding voter fraud. Existing studies are incomplete but provide some insight. For example, a statewide survey of each of Ohio's 88 county boards of elections found only four instances of ineligible persons attempting to vote out of a total of 9,078,728 votes cast in the state's 2002 and 2004 general elections. This is a fraud rate of 0.00000045 percent. The Carter-Baker Commission's Report noted that since October 2002, federal officials had charged 89 individuals with casting multiple votes, providing false information about their felon status, buying votes, submitting false voter registration information, and voting improperly as a non-citizen. Examined in the context of the 196,139,871 ballots cast between October 2002 and

August 2005, this represents a fraud rate of 0.0000005 percent (note also that not all of the activities charged would have been prevented by a photo identification requirement).

A more comprehensive study should distinguish voter fraud that could be prevented by a photo identification requirement from other types of fraud — such as absentee voting and stuffing ballot boxes — and obtain statistics on the factors that led law enforcement to prosecute fraud. The study would demand significant resources because it would require that researchers interview and pour over the records of local district attorneys and election boards.

Hard data on investigations, allegations, charges, pleas, and prosecutions is important because it quantifies the amount of fraud officials detect. Even if prosecutors vigorously pursue voter fraud, however, the number of fraud cases charged probably does not capture the total amount of voter fraud. Information on official investigations, charges, and prosecutions should be supplemented by surveys of voters and a comparison of voting rolls to death rolls.

2. Random Surveys of Voters

Random surveys could give insight about the percentage of votes cast fraudulently. For example, political scientists could contact a statistically representative sampling of 1,000 people who purportedly voted at the polls in the last election, ask them if they actually voted, and confirm the percentage who are valid voters. Researchers should conduct the survey soon after an election to locate as many legitimate voters as possible with fresh memories.

Because many respondents would perceive voting as a social good, some who did not vote might claim that they did, which may underestimate the extent of fraud. A surveyor might mitigate this skew through the framing of the question (“I’ve got a record that you voted. Is that true?”).

Further, some voters will not be located by researchers and others will refuse to talk to researchers. Photo identification proponents might construe these non-respondents as improper registrations that were used to commit voter fraud.

Instead of surveying all voters to determine the amount of fraud, researchers might reduce the margin of error by focusing on a random sampling of voters who signed affidavits in the three states that request photo identification but also allow voters to establish their identity through affidavit—Florida, Louisiana, and South Dakota. In

South Dakota, for example, only two percent of voters signed affidavits to establish their identity. If the survey indicates that 95 percent of those who signed affidavits are legitimate voters (and the other 5 percent were shown to be either fraudulent or were non-responsive), this suggests that voter fraud accounts for, at the maximum, 0.1 percent of ballots cast.

The affidavit study, however, is limited to three states, and it is unclear whether this sample is representative of other states (the difficulty may be magnified in Louisiana in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina's displacement of hundreds of thousands of voters). Further, the affidavit study reveals information about the amount of fraud in a photo identification state with an affidavit exception—more voter fraud may exist in a state that does not request photo identification.

3. Examining Death Rolls

A comparison of death rolls to voting rolls might also provide an estimate of fraud.

Imagine that one million people live in state A, which has no documentary identification requirement. Death records show that 20,000 people passed away in state A in 2003. A cross-referencing of this list to the voter rolls shows that 10,000 of those who died were registered voters, and these names remained on the voter rolls during the November 2004 election. Researchers would look at what percentage of the 10,000 dead-but-registered people who "voted" in the November 2004 election. A researcher should distinguish the votes cast in the name of the dead at the polls from those cast absentee (which a photo identification requirement would not prevent). This number would be extrapolated to the electorate as a whole.

This methodology also has its strengths and weaknesses. If fraudulent voters target the dead, the study might overestimate the fraud that exists among living voters (although a low incidence of fraud among deceased voters might suggest that fraud among all voters is low). The appearance of fraud also might be inflated by false positives produced by a computer match of different people with the same name. Photo identification advocates would likely assert that the rate of voter fraud could be higher among fictitious names registered, and that the death record survey would not capture that type of fraud because fictitious names registered would not show up in the death records. Nevertheless, this study, combined with the other two, would provide important insight into the magnitude of fraud likely to exist in the absence of a photo identification requirement.

Recommendations for Further EAC Activity
on Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation

Consultants' Recommendations

Recommendation 1: Conduct More Interviews

Time and resource constraints prevented the consultants from interviewing the full range of participants in the process. As a result, we recommend that any future activity in this area include conducting further interviews.

In particular, we recommend that more election officials from all levels of government, parts of the country, and parties be interviewed. These individuals have the most direct inside information on how the system works -- and at times does not work. They are often the first people voters go to when something goes wrong and are often responsible for fixing it. They are the ones who must carry out the measures that are designed to both prevent fraud and voter intimidation and suppression. They will most likely know what, therefore, is and is not working.

It would also be especially beneficial to talk to people in law enforcement, specifically federal District Election Officers ("DEOs") and local district attorneys, as well as civil and criminal defense attorneys.

The Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice has all of the 93 U.S. Attorneys appoint Assistant U.S. Attorneys to serve as DEOs for two years. DEOs are required to

- screen and conduct preliminary investigations of complaints, in conjunction with the FBI and PIN, to determine whether they constitute potential election crimes and should become matters for investigation;
- oversee the investigation and prosecution of election fraud and other election crimes in their districts;
- coordinate their district's (investigative and prosecutorial) efforts with DOJ headquarters prosecutors;
- coordinate election matters with state and local election and law enforcement officials and make them aware of their availability to assist with election-related matters;
- issue press releases to the public announcing the names and telephone numbers of DOJ and FBI officials to contact on election day with complaints about voting or election irregularities and answer telephones on election day to receive these complaints; and
- supervise a team of Assistant U.S. Attorneys and FBI special agents who are appointed to handle election-related allegations while the polls are open on election day.<sup>1</sup>

Given the great responsibilities of the DEOs, and the breadth of issues they must deal with, they undoubtedly are great resources for information and insight as to what types of fraud and intimidation/suppression are occurring in their districts.

In many situations, however, it is the local district attorneys who will investigate election fraud and suppression tactics, especially in local elections. They will be able to provide information on what has gone on in their jurisdictions, as well as which matters get pursued and why.

Finally, those who defend people accused of election related crimes would also be useful to speak to. They may have a different perspective on how well the system is working to detect, prevent, and prosecute election fraud.

Recommendation 2: Follow Up on Nexis Research

The Nexis search conducted for this phase of the research was based on a list of search terms agreed upon by both consultants. Thousands of articles were reviewed and hundreds analyzed. Many of the articles contain allegations of fraud or intimidation. Similarly, many of the articles contain information about investigations into such activities or even charges brought. However, without being able to go beyond the agreed search terms, it could not be determined whether there was any later determination regarding the allegations, investigation or charges brought. This leaves a gaping hole: it is impossible to know if the article is just reporting on “talk” or what turns out to be a serious affront to the system.

As a result, we recommend that follow up Nexis research be conducted to determine what, if any, resolutions or further activity there was in each case. This would provide a much more accurate picture of what types of activities are actually taking place.

Recommendation 3: Follow Up on Allegations Found in Literature Review

Similarly, many allegations are made in the reports and books that we analyzed and summarized. Those allegations are often not substantiated in any way and are inherently time limited by the date of the writing. Despite this, such reports and books are frequently cited by various interested parties as evidence of fraud or intimidation.

Therefore, we recommend follow up to the literature review: for those reports and books that make or cite specific instances of fraud or intimidation, a research effort should be made to follow up on those references to see if and how they were resolved.

Recommendation 4: Review Complaints File With MyVote1 Project Voter Hotline

During the 2004 election and the statewide elections of 2005, the University of Pennsylvania led a consortium of groups and researchers in conducting the MyVote1 Project. This project involved using a 1-800 voter hotline where voters could call for poll location, be transferred to a local hotline, or leave a recorded message with a complaint.

In 2004, this resulted in over 200,000 calls received and over 56,000 recorded complaints.<sup>ii</sup> The researchers in charge of this project have done a great deal of work to parse and analyze the data collected through this process, including going through the audio messages and categorizing them by the nature of the complaint. These categories include registration, absentee ballot, poll access, ballot/screen, coercion/intimidation, identification, mechanical, provisional (ballot).

We recommend that further research include making full use of this data with the cooperation of the project leaders. While perhaps not a fully scientific survey given the self-selection of the callers, the information regarding 200,000 complaints should provide a good deal of insight into the problems voters experienced, especially those in the nature of intimidation or suppression.

Recommendation 5: Further Review of Complaints Filed With U.S. Department of Justice

Although according to a recent GAO report the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice has a variety in ways it tracks complaints of voter intimidation,<sup>iii</sup> the Section was extremely reluctant to provide the consultants with useful information. Further attempts should be made to obtain relevant data. This includes the telephone logs of complaints the Section keeps and information from the database – the Interactive Case Management (ICM) system – the Section maintains on complaints received and the corresponding action taken. We also recommend that further research include a review and analysis of the observer and monitor field reports from Election Day that must be filed with the Section.

Recommendation 6: Review Reports Filed By District Election Officers

Similarly, the consultants believe it would be useful for any further research to include a review of the reports that must be filed by every District Election Officer to the Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice. As noted above, the DEOs play a central role in receiving reports of voter fraud and investigating and pursuing them. Their reports back to the Department would likely provide tremendous insight into what actually transpired during the last several elections. Where necessary, information could be redacted or made confidential.

Recommendation 7: Attend Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Symposium

The consultants also believe it would be useful for any further activity in this area to include attendance at the next Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Symposium. According to the Department,<sup>iv</sup>

Prosecutors serving as District Election Officers in the 94 U.S. Attorneys' Offices are required to attend annual training conferences on fighting election fraud and voting rights abuses... These conferences are sponsored by the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division and the Public Integrity

Section of the Criminal Division, and feature presentations by Civil Rights officials and senior prosecutors from the Public Integrity Section and the U.S. Attorneys' Offices. As a result of these conferences, there is a nationwide increase in Department expertise relating to the prosecution of election crimes and the enforcement of voting rights.

By attending the symposium researchers could learn more about the following:

- How District Election Officers are trained, e.g. what they are taught to focus their resources on, how they are instructed to respond to various types of complaints
- How information about previous election and voting issues is presented
- How the Voting Rights Act, the criminal laws governing election fraud and intimidation, the National Voter Registration Act, and the Help America Vote Act are described and explained to participants

Recommendation 8: Employ Academic or Individual to Conduct Statistical Research

Included in this report is a summary of various methodologies political scientists and others suggested to measure voter fraud and intimidation. While we note the skepticism of the Working Group in this regard, we nonetheless recommend that in order to further the mission of providing unbiased data, further activity in this area include an academic institution and/or individual that focuses on sound, statistical methods for political science research.

Recommendation 9: Explore Improvements to Federal Law

Finally, consultant Tova Wang recommends that future researchers review federal law to explore ways to make it easier to impose either civil or criminal penalties for acts of intimidation that do not necessarily involve racial animus and/or a physical or economic threat.

According to Craig Donsanto, long-time Director of the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, Criminal Division of the U.S. Department of Justice:

As with other statutes addressing voter intimidation, in the absence of any jurisprudence to the contrary, it is the Criminal Division's position that section 1973gg-10(1) applies only to intimidation which is accomplished through the use of threats of physical or economic duress. Voter "intimidation" accomplished through less drastic means may present violations of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973i(b), which are enforced by the Civil Rights Division through noncriminal remedies.<sup>v</sup>

Mr. Donsanto reiterated these points to us on several occasions, including at the working group meeting.

As a result, researchers should examine if there is some way in which current law might be revised or new laws passed that would reach voter intimidation that does not threaten the voter physically or financially, but rather threatens the voter's right to vote as a tangible value in itself. Such an amendment or law would reach all forms of voter intimidation, no matter if it is motivated by race, party, ethnicity or any other criteria. The law would then potentially cover, for example, letters and postcards with language meant to deter voters from voting and both pre-election and Election Day challengers that are clearly mounting challenges solely on illegitimate bases.

In the alternative to finding a way to criminalize such behavior, researchers might examine ways to invigorate measures to deter and punish voter intimidation under the civil law. For example, there might be a private right of action created for voters or groups who have been subjected to intimidation tactics in the voting process. Such an action could be brought against individual offenders; any state or local actor where there is a pattern of repeated abuse in the jurisdiction that such officials did not take sufficient action against; and organizations that intentionally engage in intimidating practices. As a penalty upon finding liability, civil damages could be available plus perhaps attorney's fees.

Another, more modest measure would be, as has been suggested by Ana Henderson and Christopher Edley,<sup>vi</sup> to bring parity to fines for violations under the Voting Rights Act. Currently the penalty for fraud is $10,000 while the penalty for acts to deprive the right to vote is $5,000.

Working Group Recommendations

Recommendation 1: Employ Observers To Collect Data in the 2006 and/or 2008 Elections

At the working group meeting, there was much discussion about using observers to collect data regarding fraud and intimidation at the polls in the upcoming elections. Mr. Ginsberg recommended using representatives of both parties for the task. Mr. Bauer and others objected to this, believing that using partisans as observers would be unworkable and would not be credible to the public.

There was even greater concern about the difficulties in getting access to poll sites for the purposes of observation. Most states strictly limit who can be in the polling place. In addition, there are already so many groups doing observation and monitoring at the polls, administrators might object. There was further concern that observers would introduce a variable into the process that would impact the outcome. The very fact that observers were present would influence behavior and skew the results.

Moreover, it was pointed out, many of the problems we see now with respect to fraud and intimidation does not take place at the polling place, e.g. absentee ballot fraud and deceptive practices. Poll site monitoring would not capture this activity. Moreover, with increased use of early voting, poll site monitoring might have to go on for weeks to be effective, which would require tremendous resources.

Mr. Weinberg suggested using observers in the way they are utilized in international elections. Such observers come into a jurisdiction prior to the election, and use standardized forms at the polling sites to collect data.

Recommendation 2: Do a Study on Absentee Ballot Fraud

The working group agreed that since absentee ballot fraud is the main form of fraud occurring, and is a practice that is great expanding throughout the country, it would make sense to do a stand-alone study of absentee ballot fraud. Such a study would be facilitated by the fact that there already is a great deal of information on how, when, where and why such practices are carried out based on cases successfully prosecuted. Researchers could look at actual cases to see how absentee ballot fraud schemes are conducted in an effort to provide recommendations on more effective measures for preventing them.

Working group members were supportive of one of the methodologies recommended for studying this issue, risk analysis. As Mr. Bauer put it, based on the assumption that people act rationally, do an examination of what types of fraud people are most likely to commit, given the relative costs and benefits. In that way, researchers can rank the types of fraud that are the easiest to commit at the least cost with the greatest effect, from most to least likely to occur. This might prove a more practical way of measuring the problems than trying to actually get a number of acts of fraud and/or intimidation occurring. Mr. Greenbaum added that one would want to examine what conditions surrounding an election would be most likely to lead to an increase in fraud. Mr. Rokita objected based on his belief that the passions of partisanship lead people to not act rationally in an election.

Recommendation 4: Conduct Research Using Database Comparisons

Picking up on a suggestion made by Spencer Overton and explained in the suggested methodology section, Mr. Hearne recommended studying the issue using statistical database matching. Researchers should compare the voter roll and the list of people who actually voted to see if there are “dead” and felon voters. Because of the inconsistent quality of the databases, however, a political scientist would need to work in an appropriate margin of error when using such a methodology.

Recommendation 5: Conduct a Study of Deceptive Practices

The working group discussed the increasing use of deceptive practices, such as flyers with false and/or intimidating information, to suppress voter participation. A number of groups, including the Department of Justice, the EAC, and organizations such as the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights, keep phone logs regarding complaints of such practices, which may be available for review and analysis. This is also an area in which there is often tangible evidence, such as copies of the flyers and postcards themselves. All of this information should be reviewed and analyzed to see how such practices are being conducted and what can be done about them.

Recommendation 6: Study Use of HAVA Administrative Complaint Procedure As Vehicle for Measuring Fraud and Intimidation

The EAC should study the extent to which states are actually utilizing the administrative complaint procedure mandated by HAVA. In addition, the EAC should study whether data collected through the administrative complaint procedure can be used as another source of information for measuring fraud and intimidation.

Recommendation 7: Examine the Use of Special Election Courts

Given that many state and local judges are elected, it may be worth exploring whether special election courts that are running before, during and after election day would be an effective means of disposing with complaints and violations in an expeditious manner. Pennsylvania employs such a system, and the EAC should consider investigating how well it is working to deal with fraud and intimidation problems.

Key Working Group Observations and Concerns

Working Group Observations

1. The main problems today are structural barriers to voting and administrative error. Mr. Perez observed that, in accordance with the research, the biggest issues today are structural barriers to voting, not stealing votes. Election administrators share this view. Election fraud is negligible, and to the extent it occurs, it needs to be prosecuted with stronger criminal laws. The biggest problem is properly preparing people, which is the responsibility of election administrators.
2. Most fraud and intimidation is happening outside of the polling place. Mr. Greenbaum observed that with respect to both voter fraud and voter suppression, such as deceptive practices and tearing up voter registration forms, most of that is taking place outside of the polling place.
3. This issue cannot be addressed through one study or one methodology alone. Mr. Weinberg observed that since there is such a variety in types of fraud and intimidation, one solution will not fit all. It will be impossible to obtain data or resolve any of these problems through a single method.
4. The preliminary research conducted for this project is extremely valuable. Several of the working group members complimented the quality of the research done and although it is only preliminary, thought it would be useful and informative in the immediate future.
5. The Department of Justice is exploring expanding its reach over voter suppression activities. In the context of the conversation about defining voter intimidation, Mr. Donsanto pointed out that while voter intimidation was strictly defined by the criminal law, his section is beginning to explore the slightly different concept of vote suppression, and how to pursue it. He mentioned the phone-jamming case in New Hampshire as an initial success in this effort. He noted that he believes that vote suppression in the form of deceptive practices ought to be a crime and the section is exploring ways to go after it within the existing statutory construct. Mr. Bauer raised the example of a party sending people dressed in paramilitary outfits to yell at people as they go to the polls, telling them they have to show identification. Mr. Donsanto said that under the laws he has to work with today, such activity is not considered corrupt. He said that his lawyers are trying to “bend” the current laws to address aggravated cases of vote suppression, and the phone-jamming case is an example of that. Mr. Donsanto said that within the Department, the term vote “suppression” and translating it into a crime is a “work in progress.”

6. Registration fraud does not translate into vote fraud. Ms. Rogers, Mr. Donsanto and others stated that although phony voter registration applications turned in by people being paid by the form was a problem, it has not been found in their experience to lead to fraudulent voters at the polls. Ms. Rogers said such people were motivated by money, not defrauding the election.
7. Handling of voter fraud and intimidation complaints varies widely across states and localities. Ms. Rogers and others observed that every state has its own process for intake and review of complaints of fraud and intimidation, and that procedures often vary within states. The amount of authority secretaries of state have to address such problems also is different in every state. Mr. Weinberg stated he believed that most secretaries of state did not have authority to do anything about these matters. Participants discussed whether secretaries ought to be given greater authority so as to centralize the process, as HAVA has mandated in other areas.

Working Group Concerns

1. Mr. Rokita questioned whether the purpose of the present project ought to be on assessing the level of fraud and where it is, rather than on developing methods for making such measurements. He believed that methodology should be the focus, “rather than opinions of interviewees.” He was concerned that the EAC would be in a position of “adding to the universe of opinions.”
2. Mr. Rokita questioned whether the “opinions” accumulated in the research “is a fair sampling of what’s out there.” Ms. Wang responded that one of the purposes of the research was to explore whether there is a method available to actually quantify in some way how much fraud there is and where it is occurring in the electoral process. Mr. Rokita replied that “Maybe at the end of the day we stop spending taxpayer money or it’s going to be too much to spend to find that kind of data. Otherwise, we will stop it here and recognize there is a huge difference of opinion on that issue of fraud, when it occurs is obtainable, and that would possibly be a conclusion of the EAC.” Ms. Sims responded that she thought it would be possible to get better statistics on fraud and there might be a way of “identifying at this point certain parts in the election process that are more vulnerable, that we should be addressing.”
3. Mr. Rokita stated that, “We’re not sure that fraud at the polling place doesn’t exist. We can’t conclude that.”
4. Mr. Rokita expressed concern about working with a political scientist. He believes that the “EAC needs to be very careful in who they select, because all the time and effort and money that’s been spent up to date and would be spent in the future could be invalidated by a wrong selection in the eyes of some group.”

APPENDIX C

BRENNAN CENTER TASK FORCE ON VOTING SYSTEM SECURITY, LAWRENCE NORDEN, CHAIR

Excerpted from pp. 8-19

METHODOLOGY

The Task Force concluded, and the peer review team at NIST agreed, that the best approach for comprehensively evaluating voting system threats was to: (1) identify and categorize the potential threats against voting systems, (2) prioritize these threats based upon an agreed upon metric (which would tell us how difficult each threat is to accomplish from the attacker's point of view), and (3) determine, utilizing the same metric employed to prioritize threats, how much more difficult each of the catalogued attacks would become after various sets of countermeasures are implemented.

This model allows us to identify the attacks we should be most concerned about (i.e., the most practical and least difficult attacks). Furthermore, it allows us to quantify the potential effectiveness of various sets of countermeasures (i.e., how difficult the least difficult attack is after the countermeasure has been implemented). Other potential models considered, but ultimately rejected by the Task Force, are detailed in Appendix B.

IDENTIFICATION OF THREATS

The first step in creating a threat model for voting systems was to identify as many potential attacks as possible. To that end, the Task Force, together with the participating election officials, spent several months identifying voting system vulnerabilities. Following this work, NIST held a Voting Systems Threat Analysis Workshop on October 7, 2005. Members of the public were invited to write up and post additional potential attacks. Taken together, this work produced over 120 potential attacks on the three voting systems. They are detailed in the catalogs annexed.<sup>20</sup> Many of the attacks are described in more detail at <http://vote.nist.gov/threats/papers.htm>.

The types of threats detailed in the catalogs can be broken down into nine categories: (1) the insertion of corrupt software into machines prior to Election Day; (2) wireless and other remote control attacks on voting machines on Election Day; (3) attacks on tally servers; (4) miscalibration of voting machines; (5) shut off of voting machine features intended to assist voters; (6) denial of service attacks; (7) actions by corrupt poll workers or others at the polling place to affect votes cast; (8) vote buying schemes; (9) attacks on ballots or VVPT. Often, the actual attacks involve some combination of these categories. We provide a discussion of each type of attack in “Categories of Attacks,” infra at pp. 24–27.

PRIORITIZING THREATS: NUMBER OF INFORMED PARTICIPANTS AS METRIC

Without some form of prioritization, a compilation of the threats is of limited value. Only by prioritizing these various threats could we help election officials identify which attacks they should be most concerned about, and what steps could be taken to make such attacks as difficult as possible. As discussed below, we have determined the level of difficulty for each attack where the attacker is attempting to affect the outcome of a close statewide election.

There is no perfect way to determine which attacks are the least difficult, because each attack requires a different mix of resources – well-placed insiders, money, programming skills, security expertise, etc. Different attackers would find certain resources easier to acquire than others. For example, election fraud committed by local election officials would always involve well-placed insiders and a thorough understanding of election procedures; at the same time, there is no reason to expect such officials to have highly skilled hackers or first-rate programmers working with them. By contrast, election fraud carried out by a foreign government would likely start with plenty of money and technically skilled attackers, but probably without many conveniently placed insiders or detailed knowledge of election procedures.

Ultimately, we decided to use the “number of informed participants” as the metric for determining attack difficulty. An attack which uses fewer participants is deemed the easier attack.

We have defined “informed participant” as someone whose participation is needed to make the attack work, and who knows enough about the attack to foil or expose it. This is to be distinguished from a participant who unknowingly assists the attack by performing a task that is integral to the attack’s successful execution without understanding that the task is part of an attack on voting systems.

The reason for using the security metric “number of informed participants” is relatively straightforward: the larger a conspiracy is, the more difficult it would be to keep it secret. Where an attacker can carry out an attack by herself, she need only trust herself. On the other hand, a conspiracy that requires thousands of people to take part (like a vote-buying scheme) also requires thousands of people to keep quiet. The larger the number of people involved, the greater the likelihood that one of them (or one who was approached, but declined to take part) would either inform the public or authorities about the attack, or commit some kind of error that causes the attack to fail or become known.

Moreover, recruiting a large number of people who are willing to undermine the integrity of a statewide election is also presumably difficult. It is not hard to imagine two or three people agreeing to work to change the outcome of an election. It seems far less likely that an attacker could identify and employ hundreds or thousands of similarly corrupt people without being discovered.

We can get an idea of how this metric works by looking at one of the threats listed in our catalogs: the vote-buying threat, where an attacker or attackers pay individuals to vote for a particular candidate. This is Attack Number 26 in the PCOS Attack Catalog<sup>22</sup> (though this attack would not be substantially different against DREs or DREs w/ VVPT).<sup>23</sup> In order to work under our current types of voting systems, this attack requires (1) at least one person to purchase votes, (2) many people to agree to sell their votes, and (3) some way for the purchaser to confirm that the voters she pays actually voted for the candidate she supported. Ultimately, we determined that, while practical in smaller contests, a vote-buying attack would be an exceptionally difficult way to affect the outcome of a statewide election. This is because, even in a typically close statewide election, an attacker would need to involve thousands of voters to ensure that she could affect the outcome of a statewide race.<sup>24</sup>

For a discussion of other metrics we considered, but ultimately rejected, see Appendix C.

DETERMINING NUMBER OF INFORMED PARTICIPANTS

DETERMINING THE STEPS AND VALUES FOR EACH ATTACK

The Task Force members broke down each of the catalogued attacks into its necessary steps. For instance, Attack 12 in the PCOS Attack Catalog is “Stuffing Ballot Box with Additional Marked Ballots.”<sup>25</sup> We determined that, at a minimum, there were three component parts to this attack: (1) stealing or creating the ballots and then marking them, (2) scanning marked ballots through the PCOS scanners, probably before the polls opened, and (3) modifying the poll books in each location to ensure that the total number of votes in the ballot boxes was not greater than the number of voters who signed in at the polling place.

Task Force members then assigned a value representing the minimum number of persons they believed would be necessary to accomplish each goal. For PCOS Attack 12, the following values were assigned:<sup>26</sup>

Minimum number required to steal or create ballots: 5 persons total.<sup>27</sup>

Minimum number required to scan marked ballots: 1 per polling place attacked.

Minimum number required to modify poll books: 1 per polling place attacked.<sup>28</sup>

After these values were assigned, the Brennan Center interviewed several election officials to see whether they agreed with the steps and values assigned to each attack.<sup>29</sup> When necessary, the values and steps were modified. The new catalogs, including attack steps and values, were then reviewed by Task Force members. The purpose of this review was to ensure, among other things, that the steps and values were sound.

These steps and values tell us how difficult it would be to accomplish a single attack in a single polling place. They do not tell us how many people it would take to change the outcome of an election successfully – that depends, of course, on specific facts about the jurisdiction: how many votes are generally recorded in each polling place, how many polling places are there in the jurisdiction, and how close is the race? For this reason, we determined that it was necessary to construct a hypothetical jurisdiction, to which we now turn.

NUMBER OF INFORMED PARTICIPANTS NEEDED TO CHANGE STATEWIDE ELECTION

We have decided to examine the difficulty of each attack in the context of changing the outcome of a reasonably close statewide election. While we are concerned by potential attacks on voting systems in any type of election, we are most troubled by attacks that have the potential to affect large numbers of votes. These are the attacks that could actually change the outcome of a statewide election with just a handful of attack participants.

We are less troubled by attacks on voting systems that can only affect a small number of votes (and might therefore be more useful in local elections). This is because there are many non-system attacks that can also affect a small number of votes (i.e., sending out misleading information about polling places, physically intimidating voters, submitting multiple absentee ballots, etc.). Given the fact that these non-system attacks are likely to be less difficult in terms of number of participants, financial cost, risk of detection, and time commitment, we are uncertain that an attacker would target voting machines to alter a small number of votes.

In order to evaluate how difficult it would be for an attacker to change the outcome of a statewide election, we created a composite jurisdiction. The composite jurisdiction was created to be representative of a relatively close statewide election. We did not want to examine a statewide election where results were so skewed toward one candidate (for instance, the re-election of Senator Edward M. Kennedy in 2000, where he won 73% of the vote<sup>30</sup>), that reversing the election results would be impossible without causing extreme public suspicion. Nor did we want to look at races where changing only a relative handful of votes (for instance, the Governor's race in Washington State in 2004, which was decided by a mere 129 votes<sup>31</sup>) could affect the outcome of an election; under this scenario, many of the potential attacks would involve few people, and therefore look equally difficult.

We have named our composite jurisdiction "the State of Pennasota." The State of Pennasota is a composite of ten states: Colorado, Florida, Iowa, Ohio, New Mexico, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Nevada, Wisconsin and Minnesota. These states were chosen because they were the ten "battleground" states that Zogby International consistently polled in the spring, summer, and fall 2004.<sup>32</sup> These are statewide elections that an attacker would have expected, ahead of time, to be fairly close.

We have also created a composite election, which we label the "Governor's Race" in Pennasota. The results of this election are a composite of the actual results in the same ten states in the 2004 Presidential Election.

We have used these composites as the framework by which to evaluate the difficulty of the various catalogued attacks.<sup>33</sup> For instance, we know a ballot-box stuffing attack would require roughly five people to create and mark fake ballots, as well as one person per polling place to stuff the boxes, and one person per polling place to modify the poll books. But, in order to determine how many informed participants would be needed to affect a statewide race, we need to know how many polling places would need to be attacked.

The composite jurisdiction and composite election provide us with information needed to answer these questions: i.e., how many extra votes our attackers would need to add to their favored candidate's total for him to win, how many ballots our attackers can stuff into a particular polling place's ballot box without arousing suspicion (and related to this, how many votes are generally cast in the average polling place), how many polling places are there in the state, etc. We provide details about both the composite jurisdiction and election in the section entitled "Governor's Race, State of Pennasota, 2007," infra at pp 20–27.

LIMITS OF INFORMED PARTICIPANTS AS METRIC

Of the possible metrics we considered, we believe that measuring the number of people who know they are involved in an attack (and thus could provide evidence of the attack to the authorities and/or the media), is the best single measure of attack difficulty; as already discussed, we have concluded that the more people an attacker is forced to involve in his attack, the more likely it is that one of the participants would reveal the attack's existence and foil the attack, perhaps sending attackers to jail. However, we are aware of a number of places where the methodology could provide us with questionable results.

By deciding to concentrate on size of attack team, we mostly ignore the need for other resources when planning an attack. Thus, a software attack on DREs which makes use of steganography<sup>34</sup> to hide attack instruction files (see "DRE w/ VVPT Attack No. 1a", discussed in greater detail, infra at pp. 62–65) is considered easier than an attack program delivered over a wireless network at the polling place (see discussion of wireless networks, infra at pp. 85–91). However, the former attack probably requires a much more technologically sophisticated attacker.

Another imperfection with this metric is that we do not have an easy way to represent how much choice the attacker has in finding members of his attack team.

Thus, with PCOS voting, we conclude that the cost of subverting a routine audit of ballots is roughly equal to the cost of intercepting ballot boxes in transit and substituting altered ballots (see discussion of PCOS attacks, infra at pp. 77–83). However, subverting the audit team requires getting a specific set of trusted people to cooperate with the attacker. By contrast, the attacker may be able to decide which precincts to tamper with based on which people he has already recruited for his attack.

In an attempt to address this concern, we considered looking at the number of "insiders" necessary to take part in each attack. Under this theory, getting five people to take part in a conspiracy to attack a voting system might not be particularly difficult. But getting five well-placed county election officials to take part in the attack would be (and should be labeled) the more difficult of the two attacks. Because, for the most part, the low-cost attacks we have identified do not necessarily involve well placed insiders (but could, for instance, involve one of many people with access to commercial off the shelf software ("COTS") during development or at the vendor), we do not believe that using this metric would have substantially changed our analysis.<sup>35</sup>

Finally, these attack team sizes do not always capture the logistical complexity of an attack. For example, an attack on VVPT machines involving tampering with the voting machine software and also replacing the paper records in transit requires the attacker to determine what votes were falsely produced by the voting machine and print replacement records in time to substitute them. While this is clearly possible, it raises a lot of operational difficulties – a single failed substitution leaves the possibility that the attack would be detected during the audit of ballots.

We have tried to keep these imperfections in mind when analyzing and discussing our least difficult attacks.

We suspect that much of the disagreement between voting officials and computer security experts in the last several years stems from a difference of opinion in prioritizing the difficulty of attacks. Election officials, with extensive experience in the logistics of handling tons of paper ballots, have little faith in paper and understand the kind of breakdowns in procedures that lead to traditional attacks like ballot box stuffing; in contrast, sophisticated attacks on computer voting systems appear very difficult to many of them. Computer security experts understand sophisticated attacks on computer systems, and recognize the availability of tools and expertise that makes these attacks practical to launch, but have no clear idea how they would manage the logistics of attacking a paper-based system. Looking at attack team size is one way to bridge this difference in perspective.

EFFECTS OF IMPLEMENTING COUNTERMEASURE SETS

The final step of our threat analysis is to measure the effect of certain countermeasures against the catalogued attacks. How much more difficult would the attacks become once the countermeasures are put into effect? How many more informed participants (if any) would be needed to counter or defeat these countermeasures?

Our process for examining the effectiveness of a countermeasure mirrors the process for determining the difficulty of an attack: we first asked whether the countermeasure would allow us to detect an attack with near certainty. If we agreed that the countermeasure would expose the attack, we identified the steps that would be necessary to circumvent or defeat the countermeasure. For each step to defeat the countermeasure, we determined the number of additional informed participants (if any) that an attacker would need to add to his team. As with the process for determining attack difficulty, the Brennan Center interviewed numerous election officials to see whether they agreed with the steps and values assigned. When necessary, the values and steps for defeating the countermeasures were altered to reflect the input of election officials.

COUNTERMEASURES EXAMINED

BASIC SET OF COUNTERMEASURES

The first set of countermeasures we looked at is the “Basic Set” of countermeasures. This Basic Set was derived from security survey responses<sup>36</sup> we received from county election officials around the country, as well as additional interviews with more than a dozen current and former election officials. Within the Basic Set of countermeasures are the following procedures:

Inspection

The jurisdiction is not knowingly using any uncertified software that is subject to inspection by the Independent Testing Authority (often referred to as the “ITA”).<sup>37</sup>

Physical Security for Machines

- Ballot boxes (to the extent they exist) are examined (to ensure they are empty) and locked by poll workers immediately before the polls are opened.
- Before and after being brought to the polls for Election Day, voting systems for each county are locked in a single room in a county warehouse.
- The warehouse has perimeter alarms, secure locks, video surveillance and regular visits by security guards.
- Access to the warehouse is controlled by sign-in, possibly with card keys or similar automatic logging of entry and exit for regular staff.
- Some form of “tamper evident” seals are placed on machines before and after each election.
- The machines are transported to polling locations five to fifteen days before Election Day.

Chain of Custody/Physical Security of Election Day Records

- At close of the polls, vote tallies for each machine are totaled and compared with number of persons that have signed the poll books.
- A copy of totals for each machine is posted at each polling place on Election Night and taken home by poll workers to check against what is posted publicly at election headquarters, on the web, in the papers, or elsewhere.<sup>38</sup>
- All audit information (i.e., Event Logs, VVPT records, paper ballots, machine printouts of totals) that is not electronically transmitted as part of the unofficial upload to the central election office, is delivered in official, sealed and hand-delivered information packets or boxes. All seals are numbered and tamper-evident.
- Transportation of information packets is completed by two election officials representing opposing parties who have been instructed to remain in joint custody of the information packets or boxes from the moment it leaves the precinct to the moment it arrives at the county election center.

- Each polling place sends its information packets or boxes to the county election center separately, rather than having one truck or person pick up this data from multiple polling locations.
- Once the sealed information packets or boxes have reached the county election center, they are logged. Numbers on the seals are checked to ensure that they have not been replaced. Any broken or replaced seals are logged. Intact seals are left intact.
- After the packets and/or boxes have been logged, they are provided with physical security precautions at least as great as those listed for voting machines, above. Specifically, for Pennasota, we have assumed the room in which the packets are stored have perimeter alarms, secure locks, video surveillance and regular visits by security guards and county police officers; and access to the room is controlled by sign-in, possibly with card keys or similar automatic logging of entry and exit for regular staff.

Testing<sup>39</sup>

- An Independent Testing Authority has certified the model of voting machine used in the polling place.
- Acceptance Testing<sup>40</sup> is performed on machines at time, or soon after they are received by County.
- Pre-election Logic and Accuracy<sup>41</sup> testing is performed by the relevant election official.
- Prior to opening the polls, every voting machine and vote tabulation system is checked to see that it is still configured for the correct election, including the correct precinct, ballot style, and other applicable details.

REGIMEN FOR AUTOMATIC ROUTINE AUDIT PLUS BASIC SET OF COUNTERMEASURES.

The second set of countermeasures is the Regimen for an Automatic Routine Audit Plus Basic Set of Countermeasures.

Some form of routine auditing of voter-verified paper records occurs in 12 states, to test the accuracy of electronic voting machines. They generally require between 1 and 10% of all precinct voting machines to be audited after each election. <sup>42</sup>

Jurisdictions can implement this set of countermeasures only if their voting systems produce some sort of voter-verified paper record of each vote. This could be in the form of a paper ballot, in the case of PCOS, or a voter-verified paper trail (“VVPT”), in the case of DREs.

We have assumed that jurisdictions take the following steps when conducting an Automatic Routine Audit (when referring to this set of assumptions “Regimen for an Automatic Routine Audit”):

The Audit

- Leaders of the major parties in each county are responsible for selecting a sufficient number of audit-team members to be used in that county.<sup>43</sup>
- Using a highly transparent random selection mechanism (see point ii, below), the voter-verified paper records for between a small percentage of all voting machines in the State are selected for auditing.
- Using a transparent random selection method, auditors are assigned to the selected machines (two or three people, with representatives of each major political party, would comprise each audit team).
- The selection of voting machines, and the assignment of auditors to machines, occurs immediately before the audits take place. The audits take place as soon after polls close as possible – for example, at 9 a.m. the morning after polls close.
- Using a transparent random selection method, county police officers, security personnel and the video monitor assigned to guard the voter-verified records are chosen from a large pool of on-duty officers and employees on election night.
- The auditors are provided the machine tallies and are able to see that the county tally reflects the sums of the machine tallies before the start of the inspection of the paper.
- The audit would include a tally of spoiled ballots (in the case of VVPT, the number of cancellations recorded), overvotes, and undervotes.

Transparent Random Selection Process

In this report, we have assumed that random auditing procedures are in place for both the Regimen for an Automatic Routine Audit and Regimen for Parallel Testing. We have further assumed procedures to prevent a single, corrupt person from being able to fix the results. This implies a kind of transparent and public random procedure.

For the Regimen for an Automatic Routine Audit there are at least two places where transparent, random selection processes are important: in the selection of precincts to audit, and in the assignment of auditors to the precincts they will be auditing.

Good election security can employ Transparent Random Selection in other places with good effect:

- the selection of parallel testers from a pool of qualified individuals.
- the assignment of police and other security professionals from on-duty lists, to monitor key materials, for example, the VVPT records between the time that they arrive at election central and the time of the completion of the ARA.

If a selection process for auditing is to be trustworthy and trusted, ideally:

- The whole process will be publicly observable or videotaped;<sup>44</sup>
- The random selection will be publicly verifiable, i.e., anyone observing will be able to verify that the sample was chosen randomly (or at least that the number selected is not under the control of any small number of people); and
- The process will be simple and practical within the context of current election practice so as to avoid imposing unnecessary burdens on election officials.

There are a number of ways that election officials can ensure some kind of transparent randomness. One way would be to use a state lottery machine to select precincts or polling places for auditing. We have included two potential examples of transparent random selection processes in Appendix F. These apply to the Regimen for Parallel Testing as well.

REGIMEN FOR PARALLEL TESTING PLUS BASIC SET OF COUNTERMEASURES

The final set of countermeasures we have examined is “Parallel Testing” plus the Basic Set of countermeasures. Parallel Testing, also known as election-day testing, involves selecting voting machines at random and testing them as realistically as possible during the period that votes are being cast.

Parallel Testing

In developing our set of assumptions for Parallel Testing, we relied heavily upon interviews with Jocelyn Whitney, Project Manager for Parallel Testing in the State of California, and conclusions drawn from this Report.<sup>45</sup> In our analysis, we assume that the following procedures would be included in the Parallel Testing regimen (when referring to this regimen “Regimen for Parallel Testing”) that we evaluate:

- At least two of each DRE model (meaning both vendor and model) would be selected for Parallel Testing;
- At least two DREs from each of the three largest counties would be parallel tested;
- Counties to be parallel tested would be chosen by the Secretary of State in a transparent and random manner.
- Counties would be notified as late as possible that machines from one of their precincts would be selected for Parallel Testing;<sup>46</sup>
- Precincts would be selected through a transparent random mechanism;
- A video camera would record testing;
- For each test, there would be one tester and one observer;

- Parallel Testing would occur at the polling place;
- The script for Parallel Testing would be generated in a way that mimics voter behavior and voting patterns for the polling place;
- At the end of the Parallel Testing, the tester and observer would reconcile vote totals in the script with vote totals reported on the machine.

Transparent Random Selection Process

We further assume that the same type of transparent random selection process that would be used for the Regimen for Automatic Routine Audit would also be employed for the Regimen for Parallel Testing to determine which machines would be subjected to testing on Election Day.

APPENDIX C

ALTERNATIVE SECURITY METRICS CONSIDERED

Dollars Spent

The decision to use the number of informed participants as the metric for attack level difficulty came after considering several other potential metrics. One of the first metrics we considered was the dollar cost of attacks. This metric makes sense when looking at attacks that seek financial gain – for instance, misappropriating corporate funds. It is not rational to spend $100,000 on the misappropriation of corporate funds if the total value of those funds is $90,000. Ultimately, we rejected this metric as the basis for our analysis because the dollar cost of the attacks we considered were dwarfed by both (1) current federal and state budgets, and (2) the amounts currently spent legally in state and federal political campaigns.

Time of Attack

The relative security of safes and other safety measures are often rated in terms of “time to defeat.” This was rejected as metric of difficulty because it did not seem relevant to voting systems. Attackers breaking into a house are concerned with the amount of time it might take to complete their robbery because the homeowners or police might show up. With regard to election fraud, many attackers may be willing to start months or years before an election if they believe they can control the outcome. As discussed supra at pp. 35–48, attackers may be confident that they can circumvent the independent testing authorities and other measures meant to identify attacks, so that the amount of time an attack takes becomes less relevant.

6 accused of casting multiple votes

By Keith Ervin
Seattle Times staff reporter

Criminal charges have been filed against six more King County voters for allegedly casting more than one ballot under a variety of circumstances in last November's election, prosecutors said yesterday.

Two defendants, William A. Davis of Federal Way and Grace E. Martin of Enumclaw, were accused of casting absentee ballots in the names of their recently deceased spouses, Sonoko Davis and Lawrence Martin, respectively.

A mother and daughter were also charged with casting a ballot in the name of the mother's dead husband. The mother, Harline H.L. Ng, and her daughter, Winnie W.Y. Ng, both of Seattle, signed their names as witnesses to the "X" marked on the ballot of Jacob Ng, who had died in February 2004.

Jared R. Hoadley of Seattle was accused of casting a ballot in the name of Hans Pitzen, who had lived at the same Seattle address as Hoadley and who died last May.

Dustin S. Collings, identified as a homeless Seattle resident, was charged with casting two ballots, both using the alias of Dustin Ocoilain, a name that was listed twice on the voter-registration rolls.

The defendants are charged with repeat voting, a gross misdemeanor that carries possible jail time of up to one year and a fine of up to $5,000.

Election officials asked prosecutors to investigate the voters after news reporters and a blogger reported that they may have voted twice. The voters will be arraigned July 5 in King County District Court.

Two other voters previously received deferred sentences — and avoided jail time — after they pleaded guilty to charges of repeat voting.

The King County Sheriff's Office is investigating several other cases, prosecutors reported yesterday. The investigations resulted from the intense scrutiny surrounding the governor's election in which Democrat Christine Gregoire defeated Republican Dino Rossi by 129 votes after he narrowly won two earlier vote counts.

After the November election, prosecutors also successfully challenged the voter registrations of 648 felons whose right to vote had not been restored.

Status Report on the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research Project

May 17, 2006

007928

INTRODUCTION

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

In September 2005, the Commission hired two consultants with expertise in this subject matter, Job Serebrov and Tova Wang, to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;
- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

As of the date of this report, the consultants have drafted a definition of election fraud, reviewed relevant literature and reports, interviewed persons from government and private sectors with subject matter expertise, analyzed news reports of alleged election fraud, reviewed case law, and established a project working group.

DEFINITION OF ELECTION FRAUD

The consultants drafted a definition of election fraud that includes numerous aspects of voting fraud (including voter intimidation, which is considered a subset of voting fraud) and voter registration fraud, but excludes campaign finance violations and election administration mistakes. This draft will be discussed and probably refined by the project working group, which is scheduled to convene on May 18, 2006.

LITERATURE REVIEW

The consultants found many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. They found little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud appears to be the report written by Lori Minnite, entitled "Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud". The most systematic look at voter intimidation appears to be the report by Laughlin McDonald, entitled "The New Poll Tax". The consultants found that books written about this subject all seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Moreover, the consultants found that reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund's frequently cited book, "Stealing Elections".

Consultants found that researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate; but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.

- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.
- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Recommendations

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research include a follow up study of allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles. They also suggest that the research should focus on filling the gap between the lack of reports based on methodical studies by social or political scientists and the numerous, but less scientific, reports published by advocacy groups.

INTERVIEWS

The consultants jointly selected experts from the public and private sector for interviews. The consultants' analysis of their discussions with these members of the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities follows.

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.
- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, "dead" voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud, although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.

- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.
- Several people indicate that, for various reasons, DOJ is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. Interviews with DOJ personnel indicate that the Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance in this area. While the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, continues to maintain an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process (including voter suppression), it also has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting.
- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed.
- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.

- With respect to DOJ's Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one's definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and his office has not pursued any such cases.
- Craig Donsanto of DOJ's Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases DOJ is investigating and the number of indictments his office is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, in addition to pursuing systematic election corruption schemes, DOJ has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so that his agency can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.
- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment.
- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama's "deceptive practices" bill.
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected as non partisan officials, they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas are a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states' office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.

- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots "for cause" only if it were politically feasible.
- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the proposal in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.
- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

NEWS ARTICLES

Consultants conducted a Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006. A systematic, numerical analysis of the data collected during this review is currently being prepared. What follows is an overview of these articles provided by the consultants.

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.
- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.
- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms;
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with.

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles, in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;

- Poll watchers harassing voters;
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;
- Disproportionate police presence;
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate; and
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from "battleground" states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

"Dead Voters and Multiple Voting"

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials, and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found five such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia). There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of completed voter registration applications. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case, charges were filed against ten individuals. In another case, a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this Nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem was the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Recommendation

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research should include a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

CASE LAW RESEARCH

After reviewing over 40,000 cases from 2000 to the present, the majority of which came from appeals courts, the consultants found comparatively few applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, the consultants found that no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it appears to them that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

Recommendation

Because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, consultants suggest that subsequent EAC research include a review of state trial-level decisions.

PROJECT WORKING GROUP

Consultants and EAC worked together to select members for the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group that included election officials and representatives of advocacy groups and the legal community who have an interest and expertise in the subject matter. (See Attachment A for a list of members.) The working group is scheduled to convene at EAC offices on May 18, 2006 to consider the results of the preliminary research and to offer ideas for future EAC activities concerning this subject.

FINAL REPORT

After convening the project working group, the consultants will draft a final report summarizing the results of their research and the working group deliberations. This report will include recommendations for future EAC research related to this subject matter. The draft report will be reviewed by EAC and, after obtaining any clarifications or corrections deemed necessary, will be made available to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors for review and comment. Following this, a final report will be prepared.

Commissioners & Tom,

After having received this request, reviewed it and discussed it with the Inspector General and Gavin, I believe that it is ill-advised to continue such a request in light of the pending investigation of this matter by the Inspector General. While I am certain that this was not the intent of this request, the inevitable appearance of this request would suggest that the Commission is seeking to influence an ongoing investigation of the IG. This appearance of inappropriate influence would arise because two employees, who will undoubtedly be contacted by and interviewed as a part of the ongoing IG investigation, are being asked to provide a statement to their supervisors prior to interviews of those persons by the IG. Furthermore, this situation could appear as an attempt by employees and/or the agency to collude on a statement prior to making a formal statement in the investigation of the IG.

This IG's investigation was requested to address issues of public perception. Thus, it is critical that this investigation proceed in a manner that leaves no room for question. As such, I believe that it is inappropriate to proceed with this request.

overview of the work you did on this report.

This would include all of the details of your work on the both the draft report and the final report adopted by the Commissioners, Jeannie has offered to help you in any way.

I will discuss this further with each of you between now and tomorrow.

I have been at the damn conference all day and have not been able to go to a single session or spend time with people.

Memorandum

To: Donetta Davidson
Chair, U.S. Elections Commission

From: Curtis Crider Curtis Crider
Inspector General

Subject: U.S. Election Assistance Commission Activities Pending the Office of Inspector General Investigation of the Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Report

In your letter of April 23, 2007, you requested my comments concerning several activities that the Election Assistance Commission (EAC) was considering to undertake pending our review of the Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Study and on related questions. My responses to your proposed activities and questions follow:

1. The EAC would like to prepare a summary of the differences between the draft report prepared by the consultants and the final report adopted by the EAC.

Answer: We believe that such a summary will be helpful to our investigation. Please provide us with a copy of the summary of differences upon it is completion.

2. Would there be any prohibition against the Director of Communications speaking with EAC employees, consultants or working group members when questions arise from members of the press or under the Freedom of Information Act?

Answer: We are not aware of any prohibition. However, we suggest that EAC not comment or limit its comments on this matter because of the ongoing investigation. Any FOIA requests should be promptly responded to stating that the matter is under investigation. Once the investigation is completed, appropriate information should be made available to the FOIA requester.

3. Would there be any prohibition against EAC briefing members of the EAC Standards Board and the EAC Board of Advisors.

Answer: We are not aware of any prohibition. Our preference, however, would be that EAC allow the investigation to be completed before conducting any briefings.

4. Would there be any prohibition against gathering information related to this project in order to respond to inquiries that have been made by members of Congress?

Answer: We are not aware of any prohibition. As previously stated, our preference is that there are no public comments while the investigation is in process or that comments be limited. However, we appreciate the sensitivity of Congressional requests, EAC must decide how best to proceed in this matter. We ask that you share any proposed responses with us prior to their release and that you provide us with a copy of final responses and any attachments.

5. Would there be any prohibition against responding to an inquiry that the Commission has received from an attorney engaged by one of the consultants?

Answer: It is the EAC's decision whether to respond to the attorney for the consultant. We prefer that the consultants not be released from the confidentiality clause of their contracts until the OIG has completed its investigations.

We understand that EAC will want to respond to criticism of its handling of the Voter Fraud and Intimidation Study, and that management must ultimately decide how best to proceed. Our preference would be that you attempt to defer commenting until we have finished our investigation.

I appreciate you raising these matters to me before acting. Please feel free to contact me if you have any questions about this memorandum.

Subject Re: Review of Voter ID Statement

Karen - To further my earlier email, I want to make clear that only respondents who identified themselves as U.S. citizens were asked whether they were registered to vote for the November 2004 election. And only those who said they were registered to vote were asked whether they voted in the election.

Subject Re: Review of Voter ID Statement

Karen:

The estimate of citizens of voting-age population controls for the percentage of the voting-age population that might have been non-citizens in 2004. We calculated the citizens of voting-age population using the following approach (this is a direct quote from Appendix C to our final Voter Identification report to the EAC):

"In the aggregate data, determining the percentage of the voting-age population that has U.S. citizenship posed a methodological challenge. The Census Bureau gathers information on the citizenship status of adults ages 18 and older only during the decennial census. While the Census Bureau provides annual estimates of the population to account for changes between decennial censuses, the bureau does not offer estimates for the proportion of the adult population who are citizens as part of the annual estimates. To address this issue I estimated the 2004 citizen voting-age population for each county using a method reported in the analysis of the 2004 Election Day Survey conducted for the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (U.S. Election Assistance Commission, 2005). I calculated the percentage of the 2000 voting-age population who were citizens in 2000, and applied that percentage to the July 1, 2004 estimates for voting-age population in each county. In other words, I assumed that the percentage of the voting-age population that had U.S. citizenship in 2004 was similar to the percentage of the voting-age population who were citizens in 2000."

I hope this addresses the issue. If it doesn't, let us know and Tim Vercellotti or I will be happy to elaborate.

Thanks,

John

Quick question related to The Voting Age Population estimates used to estimate/calculate turnout rates
(see footnote 2 in the statement)-

When taking into account noncitizens in the calculation were the noncitizens considered as part of the VAP or as the population as a whole?

Thanks for clarifying this for me.

Subject Draft Voter Fraud and Voter Intimidation Report

DeAnna,

Shortly, I will send the draft voter fraud/voter intimidation report to the Commissioners. I am not going to include the appendixes as they are quite lengthy. However, I am going to let them know that you have access to the appendixes and can give the appendixes to them if they want to read them.

I have created a subfolder in the General Counsel folder, called Voter Fraud and Intimidation Report. There you will find the report and four appendixes. If any of the commissioners ask for the appendixes or another copy of the report, you will have access to them all. You will note that there are two versions of appendixes 2 and 3. That is because we need to make a decision on whether to attach the summaries prepared by the consultants or the summaries prepared by Peggy. You will see clearly the difference -- as they are marked either "consultant" or "Peggy." I will explain this to the Commissioners in the email that I send to them. I will be sure to copy you on the email that I send to the Commissioners.

Let me know if you have any questions. I should have Blackberry service for a while, at least through to Paris.

Dear Mr. Reynolds:

Your letter of October 19, 2006 requests the release of EAC's Voter Fraud and Intimidation Report. I would like to take this opportunity to clarify the purpose and status of this study.

In late 2005, EAC hired two consultants for the purpose of assisting EAC with two things: 1) developing a uniform definition of the phrase voter fraud, and 2) making recommendations on how to further study the existence, prosecution, and means of deterring such voter fraud. In May 2006, a status report on this study was given to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors during their public meetings. During the same week, a working group convened to react to and provide comment on the progress and potential conclusions that could be reached from the work of the two consultants.

The conversation at the working group meeting was lively on the very points that we were trying to accomplish as a part of this study, namely what is voter fraud and how do we pursue studying it. Many of the proposed conclusions that were suggested by the consultants were challenged by the working group members. As such, the consultants were tasked with reviewing the concerns expressed at the working group meeting, conducting additional research as necessary, and providing a draft report to EAC that took into account the working group's concerns and issues.

That draft report is currently being vetted by EAC staff. EAC will release a final report from this study after it has conducted a review of the draft provided by the consultants. However, it is important to remember the purpose of this study – finding a uniform definition of voter fraud and making recommendations on how to study the existence, prosecution and deterrence of voter fraud -- as it will serve as the basis of the EAC report on this study.

Thank you for your letter. You can be assured that as soon as a final report on the fraud and intimidation study is available, a copy will be made available to the public.

Sincerely,

Paul S. DeGregorio
Chairman

Subject Re: Voter Fraud/Voter Intimidation Research Project

As we discussed, we do have concerns that the interviews with Mr. Donsanto and Mr. Tanner were not accurately reflected in the document. I have searched my emails and find no comments having been transmitted by Mr. Tanner. As we also discussed, I did not sit in on the interview with Mr. Tanner, thus, I cannot independently identify the changes that need to be made. If you will forward his comments to me, I will assure that they are incorporated in the final document.

As for the public availability of the document, EAC does not intend to publish or distribute the draft document about which your agency has concerns. However, if we receive a request under FOIA, we will have to examine whether the document is releasable under the parameters set forth in that law. A final document will be produced with EAC review and will be vetted through our standards board and board of advisors, as usual -- including input from the Department of Justice.

Subject Voter Fraud/Voter Intimidation Research Project

Julie - I'd like to officially send something to you to confirm the following from our conversation today, but wanted to give you a chance to react first, to be sure I was accurate in my understanding of our conversation:

(1) the "status report" issued by EAC to the Standards Board and Advisory Board in May was not something that EAC, institutionally, had necessarily intended for official public distribution, and certainly will not be further distributed, such that no additions/corrections to it make sense at this point;

(2) you acknowledge DOJ concerns that the "status report" at a minimum did not accurately reflect the conversations that Ms. Wang and Mr. Serebrov had with DOJ officials on at least two occasions, and that our concerns about the inaccurately reflected conversations are consistent with other information you received suggesting the characterization of the conversations was not entirely accurate;

(3) you are just getting in the draft material on this project from which, at some point, some kind of official document for public distribution is still contemplated, most likely before the end of the fiscal year; and

(4) in light of our concerns about the previous inaccurate characterization of the conversations with DOJ officials in the "status report", you will ensure that at a minimum we have an opportunity to review the draft report and provide feedback about information attributed to DOJ officials prior to any draft report being circulated more publicly.

Will the entire reports of the various research projects be circulated for review among Standards Board and Advisory Board members prior to issuance by the EAC? I had understood, please correct me if I'm wrong, that the VVSG guidelines were so circulated last year, but am not sure what else, if anything, has been circulated/reviewed in the past.

Thanks, Julie, for your help in correcting this!

I need clarification on something in the project before the conference call at 2:00 today between Peggy, Tova, and me. How much of what we are investigating should involve DOJ's jurisdictional matters under such things as the Voting Rights Act?

Also, did you have a chance to talk to Karen about a second project? I need to know because if there will not be one I will have to get a job with a local law firm until the 2006 elections.

Go with what Peggy gave you. I was not in on the initial conversations on how this project would work. I asked Edgardo to put together some information that he distributed to other contractors, as I thought it was appropriate for their contracts. If this is not appropriate for your contract, that's fine. Again, I was not in on those discussions. Go with Peggy's instructions.

Julie:

For our conversation, this information directly contradicts what Peggy and I just discussed. She indicated that an invoice be in this form:

Job Serebrov
Attorney at Law
2110 S. Spring Street
Little Rock, AR 72206

October 25, 2005

INVOICE # 1

$8,333.33-Month One: Providing Consulting Services in the Development of a Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Project.

No expenses-Month One: Providing Consulting Services in the Development of a Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Project.

Total=$8,333.33

Further, when we first started discussions on this project with Karen, Tom and the gang we agreed that time billing was not a valid option for either of us. That is why the invoice is simple. Peggy said were to send a supplemental e-mail to her each month listing our monthly activities, again without time billing.

007971

It seems that the invoice described by Edgardo better fits a different project.

Talk to you soon,

Job

All-

Although Tom Wilkey and I are still working to process each of your contracts on this project, we would like to tentatively schedule an in-person meeting on September 12, here in Washington.

In the meantime, I'd like to propose that we all have a short teleconference call next Wednesday or Thursday at 1:00 PM to begin to talk through the scope of this project and the respective roles and responsibilities each of you might take on.

Could you let me know your availability for a 45 minute call on August 31 or September 1 at 1:00?

Tova & Job,

As you know, because the two of you are no longer under contract with the EAC, EAC is not afforded the same protections as if you were still functioning as EAC employees. As such, releasing the document to you would be the same as releasing it to any other member of the public.

Thus, EAC will not be able to release a copy of the proposed final report to you prior to its consideration and adoption by the Commission. The Commission will take up this report at its meeting on Thursday, Dec. 7. I will have a copy available for you immediately following their consideration - assuming that they do not change the report during their deliberations and voting on Dec. 7. If changes are made, I will have a copy available to you as soon as possible following that meeting.

In the final report, you will see that EAC took the information and work provided by the two of you and developed a report that summarizes that work, provides a definition for use in future study, and adopts parts or all of many of the recommendations made by you and the working group. In addition, you will note that EAC will make the entirety of your interview summaries, case summaries, and book/report summaries available to the public as appendixes to the report.

I know that you are anxious to read the report and that you may have questions that you would like to discuss following the release of the report. Please feel free to contact me with those questions or issues.

Julie,

I understand from Tom Wilkey that you are planning on releasing our report at the public meeting next Thursday, December 7. As we discussed, I respectfully request that Job and I be permitted to review what you are releasing before it is released. I would like us both to be provided with an embargoed copy as soon as possible so we have time to properly review it before Thursday. I can be contacted by email, cell phone at [REDACTED] or office phone 202-741-6263. I hope to hear from you soon. Thanks.

I believe that is correct. What I think you might also be concerned about is the timelines for completion. If you, Job and Peggy need to work out a revised completion schedule, then I would encourage you to do that. We recognize that our delays have impacted the original schedule and that adjustments should be noted accordingly.

I guess for getting paid purposes it doesn't matter, it just matters with respect to the timeline for completion of the project. If that's right, I will sign and send the letter acknowledging receipt as is. Thanks so much.

The invoice that you have submitted at this point is for work conducted in September, September 1 - 30.

The invoice that you will submit shortly, if you have not already is for work performed in October, 1- 31.

I am not sure if we are semantically calling these by different names (i.e., you submitted the Septbmer invoice in October, and October's work in November).

Let me know if this clarifies the point or confuses it.

Just one question on the receipt of contract -- it says that the first invoice was for September, but it actually was for October when we really got started, right? Should this be adjusted to say October 1 to October 31?

Thanks.

Subject Report

Julie:

Well I see you left out the controversial Donsanto remark. I really think the report is well done. It should have served to satisfy both sides---but wait---there is the Tova on the war path factor. Tova is totally disgusted with the report. She especially hates the omission of the summaries of the various sections (interviews, case law, reports, literature, and interviews). She is really upset with the Donsanto omission. I can see her going to some of the members of Congress she knows and trying to get a hearing. I know she will be sending you a letter, asking or demanding that you retract this report and publish the original one we submitted.

I told her that I am satisfied with the report and that I will have nothing to do with her future actions---which I expect will be plentiful like Santa's Christmas gifts or like the bubonic plague. In any case, this is a Tova production.

Now for the I told you so---this would have been far better had we been able to stick to the original plan to have me do this project alone. I told you so!!!

Keep a stiff upper lip,

Job

I need clarification on something in the project before the conference call at 2:00 today between Peggy, Tova, and me. How much of what we are investigating should involve DOJ's jurisdictional matters under such things as the Voting Rights Act?

Also, did you have a chance to talk to Karen about a second project? I need to know because if there will not be one I will have to get a job with a local law firm until the 2006 elections.

Views of Selected Local Election Officials on Managing Voter Registration and Ensuring Eligible Citizens Can Vote

GAO Report

In 2002, the Help America Vote Act (HAVA) was enacted and, among other things, it requires states to implement provisional voting for elections for federal office. HAVA, in general, requires that individuals not listed as registered or whose eligibility is questioned by an election official must be notified about and permitted to cast a provisional ballot that is set aside for review by election officials at a later time so that they can determine whether the person is eligible to vote under state law. HAVA also requires that provisional ballots be provided to first-time voters who had registered to vote by mail on or after January 1, 2003, but were unable to show photo identification or another qualifying identification document when voting in person or by mail in a federal election. In addition, HAVA requires that election officials must provide access to information that permits voters to learn if their provisional ballot was counted, and, if not, why not.

This Report focuses on the efforts of local election officials in 14 jurisdictions within 7 states to manage the registration process, maintain accurate voter registration lists, and ensure that eligible citizens in those jurisdictions had the opportunity to cast ballots during the 2004 election. Specifically, for the 2004 election, the Report concentrates on election officials' characterization of their experiences with regard to (1) managing the voter registration process and any challenges related to receiving voter registration applications; checking them for completeness, accuracy, and duplication; and entering information into voter registration lists; (2) removing voters' names from voter registration lists and ensuring that the names of eligible voters were not inadvertently removed; and (3) implementing HAVA provisional voting and identification requirements and addressing any challenges encountered related to these requirements. The Report also provides information on motor vehicle agency (MVA) officials' characterization of their experiences assisting citizens who apply to register to vote at MVA offices and forwarding voter registration applications to election offices.

The Report analyzed information collected from elections and motor vehicle agency offices in seven states—Arizona, California, Michigan, New York, Texas, Virginia, and Wisconsin. These states take various approaches to administering elections. Within each of the seven states, using population data from the 2000 U.S. Census, two jurisdictions were selected: a local jurisdiction with a large population and a local jurisdiction with a small population. The 14 jurisdictions we selected were Gila and Maricopa Counties, Arizona; Los Angeles and Yolo Counties, California; City of Detroit and Delta Township, Michigan; New York City and Rensselaer County, New York; Bexar and Webb Counties, Texas; Albemarle and Arlington Counties, Virginia; and the cities of Franklin and Madison, Wisconsin.

Information was gathered for the Report in a number of ways. First, relevant laws, state reports, and documents related to the voter registration process in the seven states were reviewed. Second, state and local election officials in the 7 states and 14 jurisdictions were interviewed to obtain information on their registration processes and implementation of the HAVA requirements for provisional voting and voter identification. Third, a survey was sent to election officials in the 14 jurisdictions to gather information about their experiences with the November 2004 election. Finally, a survey was sent to state and local MVA officials in 6 of the 7 states and 12 of the 14 jurisdictions. The survey primarily asked questions about the MVA offices' experiences with (1) assisting citizens with completing voter registration applications, (2) forwarding the applications to election offices, and (3) responding to individuals and state or local election officials who contacted their offices about individuals who declared they had applied to register to vote at MVA offices but their names were not on voter registration lists when they went to vote in the November 2004 election.

Election officials representing all but one of the jurisdictions surveyed following the November 2004 election said they faced some challenges managing the voter registration process, including (1) receiving voter registration applications; (2) checking them for completeness, accuracy, and duplication; and (3) entering information into voter registration lists; when challenges occurred, election officials reported they took various steps to address them. Officials in 7 of the 14 jurisdictions reported that their staff faced challenges checking voter registration applications for completeness, accuracy, or duplicates. According to these officials, these challenges occurred for a variety of reasons, including problems contacting individuals to obtain complete and accurate information and insufficient staffing to check the applications. They reported that, among other things, their staff addressed these challenges by sending letters or calling applicants to obtain correct information. Finally, 6 of the 14 election officials reported that their staff faced challenges entering or scanning voter information into registration lists for reasons such as the volume of applications received close to Election Day and problems with the scanning equipment. To address these challenges, they reported that more staff were hired and staff worked overtime.

All but 1 of the jurisdictions reported removing names from registration lists during 2004 for various reasons, including that voters requested that their names be removed from the voter registration list; information from the U.S. Postal Service (USPS) showing that voters had moved outside the jurisdiction; felony records received from federal, state, or local governments identifying voters as ineligible due to felony convictions; and death records received from state or local vital statistics offices. When removing names from registration lists, election officials reported that they took various steps to ensure that the names of eligible voters were not inadvertently removed from voter registration lists. These steps included sending letters or postcards to registrants to verify that voters wanted their names removed; matching voters' identifying information with USPS data and sending voters identified by USPS as having moved outside the jurisdiction notices of removal; and matching voter registration records with felony records or death records to confirm it was the same person.

All of the jurisdictions reported that they permitted citizens to cast provisional ballots during the November 2004 election. In addition, 12 of the 14 jurisdictions to which this was applicable reported that they offered certain first-time voters who registered by mail the opportunity to cast provisional ballots. Election officials in 13 of the 14 jurisdictions reported that 423,149 provisional ballots were cast, and 70 percent (297,662) were counted. Not all provisional votes were counted because, as election officials reported, not all provisional ballots met states' criteria for determining which ballots should be counted. Reasons that provisional ballots cast during the 2004 election were not counted, as reported by election officials, included, among others, that individuals did not meet the residency eligibility requirements, had not registered or tried to register to vote with the election office, had not submitted the voter registration applications at motor vehicle agency offices, or election officials did not have time to enter information from applicants into their voter registration lists because applications were received at the election offices very close to or after the state registration deadline.

Local election officials in 12 of the 13 jurisdictions 13 we surveyed reported that they set up mechanisms to inform voters—without cost—about the outcome of their provisional votes during the November 2004 election. These mechanisms included toll-free telephone numbers, Web sites, and letters sent to the voters who cast provisional ballots. Election officials also reported that provisional voters in their jurisdictions received written information at their polling places about how to find out the outcome of their provisional ballots, and provisional voters in 8 of the 13 jurisdictions had the opportunity to access information about the outcome of their ballots within 10 days after the election. Finally, election officials representing 8 of the 14 jurisdictions reported facing challenges implementing provisional voting for various reasons, including some poll workers not being familiar with provisional voting or, in one jurisdiction representing a large number of precincts, staff not having sufficient time to process provisional ballots. To address these challenges, the officials reported that they provided additional training to poll workers and hired additional staff to count provisional ballots.

INDIANA ID LITIGATION SUMMARY

MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF DEMOCRATS. MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Although the proponents of SEA 483 asserted that the law was intended to combat voter fraud, no evidence of the existence of such fraud has ever been provided. No voter has been convicted of or even charged with the offense of misrepresenting his identity for purposes of casting a fraudulent ballot in person, King Dep. 95-96; Mahern Aff. ¶¶ 2-3, though there have been documented instances of absentee ballot fraud. King Dep. 120. Indeed, no evidence of in person, on-site voting fraud was presented to the General Assembly during the legislative process leading up to the enactment of the Photo ID Law. Mahern Aff. ¶¶ 2-

The State cannot show any compelling justification for subjecting only voters who vote in person to the new requirements of the Photo ID Law, while exempting absentee voters who vote by mail or persons who live in state-certified residential facilities. On the other hand, absentee ballots are peculiarly vulnerable to coercion and vote tampering since there is no election official or independent election observer available to ensure that there is no illegal coercion by family members, employers, churches, union officials, nursing home administrators, and others.

The Law gives virtually unbridled discretion to partisan precinct workers and challengers to make subjective determinations such as (a) whether a form of photo identification produced by a voter conforms to what is required by the Law, and (b) whether the voter presenting himself or herself at the polls is in fact the voter depicted in the photo. Robertson Dep. 29-34, 45; King Dep. 86, 89. This is significant because any voter who is challenged under this Law will be required to vote by provisional ballot and to make a special trip to the election board's office in order to have his vote counted. Robertson Dep. 37; King Dep. 58.

The Photo ID Law confers substantial discretion, not on law enforcement officials, but on partisan precinct poll workers and challengers appointed by partisan political officials, to determine both whether a voter has presented a form of identification which conforms to that required by the Law and whether the person presenting the identification is the person depicted on it. Conferring this degree of discretion upon partisan precinct officials and members of election boards to enforce the facially neutral requirements of the Law has the potential for becoming a means of suppressing a particular point of view.

The State arguably might be justified in imposing uniform, narrowly-tailored and not overly-burdensome voter identification requirements if the State were able to show that there is an intolerably high incidence of fraud among voters misidentifying themselves at the polls for the purpose of casting a fraudulent ballot. But here, the State has utterly failed to show that this genre of fraud is rampant or even that it has ever occurred in the context of on-site, in-person voting (as opposed to absentee voting by mail) so as to justify these extra burdens, which will fall disproportionately on the poor and elderly.

In evaluating the breadth of the law and whether the State has used the least restrictive means for preventing fraud, the Court must take into account the other mechanisms the State currently employs to serve the statute's purported purposes, as well as other, less restrictive means it could reasonably employ. Krislov, 226 F.3d at 863. The State of Indiana has made it a felony for a voter to misrepresent his or her identity for purposes of casting a fraudulent ballot.

And where the State has already provided a mechanism for matching signatures, has made it a crime to misrepresent one's identity for purposes of voting, and requires the swearing out of an affidavit if the voter's identity is challenged, it already has provisions more than adequate to prevent or minimize fraud in the context of in-person voting, particularly in the absence of any evidence that the problem the Law seeks to address is anything more than the product of hypothesis, speculation and fantasy.

MEMORANDUM OF THE STATE OF INDIANA, THE INDIANA SECRETARY OF STATE, AND THE CO-DIRECTORS OF THE INDIANA ELECTION DIVISION IN SUPPORT OF THEIR JOINT MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT AND IN OPPOSITION TO THE MOTIONS FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT FILED BY BOTH SETS OF PLAINTIFFS

In-person voter-identity fraud is notoriously difficult to detect and investigate. In his book Stealing Elections, John Fund observes that actual in-person voter fraud is nearly undetectable without a voter photo-identification requirement because anybody who provides a name that is on the rolls may vote and then walk away with no record of the person's actual identity. See generally John Fund, Stealing Elections (2004). The problem is only exacerbated by the increasingly transient nature of society. Documentation of in-person voter fraud often occurs only when a legitimate voter at the polls hears a fraudulent voter trying to use her name, as happened to a woman in California in 1994. See Larry J. Sabato & Glenn R. Simpson, DirtyLittle Secrets 292 (1996).

Regardless of the lack of extensive evidence of in-person voter fraud, the Commission on Federal Election Reform (known as the Baker-Carter Commission) recently concluded that "there is no doubt that it occurs." State Ex. 1, p. 18.1 Legal cases as well as newspaper and other reports confirm that in-person voter-identity fraud, including voter impersonation, double votes, dead votes, and fake addresses, plague federal and state elections. [The memorandum details several specific cases of various types of alleged voting fraud from the past several years]

Though they are largely unable to study verifiable data concerning in-person voter fraud, scholars are well aware of the conditions that foster fraudulent voting. See Fund, supra; Sabato & Simpson, supra, 321. In particular, fraud has become ever more likely as "it has become more difficult to keep the voting rolls clean of 'deadwood' voters who have moved or died" because such an environment makes "fraudulent voting easier and therefore more tempting for those so inclined." Sabato & Simpson, supra, 321. "In general, experts believe that one in five names on the rolls in Indiana do not belong there.” State Ex. 25.

For this case, Clark Benson, a nationally recognized expert in the collection and analysis of voter-registration and population data, conducted his own examination of Indiana’s voter registration lists and concluded that they are among the most highly inflated in the nation.

The Crawford Plaintiffs cite the concessions by Indiana Election Division Co-Director King and the Intervenor-State that they are unaware of any historical in-person incidence of voter fraud occurring at the polling place (Crawford Brief, p. 23) as conclusive evidence that in-person voter fraud does not exist in Indiana. They also seek to support this conclusion with the testimony of two “veteran poll watchers,” Plaintiff Crawford and former president of the Plaintiff NAACP, Indianapolis Chapter, Roderick E. Bohannon, who testified that they had never seen any instances of in-person voter fraud. (Id.)

At best, the evidence on this issue is in equipoise. While common sense, the experiences of many other states, and the findings of the Baker-Carter Commission all lead to the reasonable inferences that (a) in-person polling place fraud likely exists, but (b) is nearly impossible to detect without requiring photo identification, the State can cite to no confirmed instances of such fraud. On the other hand, the Plaintiffs have no proof that it does not occur.

At the level of logic, moreover, it is just reasonable to conclude that the lack of confirmed incidents of in-person voting fraud in Indiana is the result of an ineffective identification security system as it is to conclude there is no in-person voting fraud in Indiana. So while it is undisputed that the state has no proof that in-person polling place fraud has occurred in Indiana, there does in fact remain a dispute over the existence vel non of in-person polling place fraud.

It is also important to understand that the nature of in-person election fraud is such that it is nearly impossible to detect or investigate. Unless a voter stumbles across someone else trying to use her identity, see Sabato & Simpson, supra, 292, or unless the over-taxed poll worker happens to notice that the voter’s signature is different from her registration signature State Ext. 37, ¶ 9, the chances of detecting such in-person voter fraud are extremely small. Yet, inflated voter-registration rolls provide ample opportunity for those who wish to commit in-person voter fraud. See Fund, supra, 24, 65, 69, 138; Sabato & Simpson, supra, 321. And there is concrete evidence that the names of dead people have been used to cast fraudulent ballots. See Fund, supra, 64. Particularly in light of Indiana’s highly inflated voter rolls State Ex. 27, p. 9, Plaintiffs’ repeated claims that there has never been any in-person voter fraud in Indiana can hardly be plausible, even if the state is unable to prove that such fraud has in fact occurred.

Summary of the U.S Department of Justice Section 5 Recommendation Memorandum:
August 25, 2005 regarding HB 244 – parts that pertain to the issue of voter fraud.

Overview: Five career attorneys with the civil rights department investigated and analyzed Georgia's election reform law. Four of those attorneys recommended objecting to Section 59, the voter identification requirement. The provision required all voters to present government issued photo identification in order to vote. The objection was based on the attorneys' findings that there was little to no evidence of polling place fraud, the only kind of fraud an ID requirement would address, and that the measure would disenfranchise many voters, predominantly minority voters, in violation of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act.

Factual Analysis: The sponsor of the measure in the state legislature said she was motivated by the fact that she is aware of vote buying in certain districts; she read John Fund's book; and that "if there are fewer black voters because of this bill, it will only be because there is less opportunity for fraud. She said that when black voters in her black precincts are not paid to vote, they do not go to the polls."

A member of the Fulton County Board of Registrations and Elections said that prior to November 2004, Fulton County received 8,112 applications containing "missing or irregular" information. Only 55 of those registrants responded to BOE letters. The member concluded that the rest must be "bogus" as a result. He also stated that 15,237 of 105,553 precinct cards came back as undeliverable, as did 3,071 cards sent to 45,907 new voters. Of these 3,071, 921 voted.

Secretary of State Cathy Cox submitted a letter testifying to the absence of any complaints of voter fraud via impersonation during her tenure.

In the legal analysis, the attorneys state that if they determine that Georgia could have fulfilled its stated purpose of election fraud, while preventing or ameliorating the retrogression, an objection is appropriate. /They conclude that the state could have avoided retrogression by retaining various forms of currently accepted voter ID for which no substantiated security concerns were raised. Another non-retrogressive alternative would have been to maintain the affidavit alternative for those without ID, since "There is no evidence that penalty of law is an insufficient deterrent to falsely signing an affidavit of identity."

The attorneys point out that the state's recitation of a case upholding voter fraud in Dodge County does not support the purpose of the Act because that case involved vote buying and selling, not impersonation or voting under a false identity.

Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud, by Lorraine Minnite

Professor Lori Minnite conducted a comprehensive survey and analysis of vote fraud in the United States. The methodology included doing nexis searches for all 50 states and surveying existing research and reports. In addition, Minnite did a more in-depth study of 12 diverse states by doing nexis searches, studying statutory and case law, and conducting interviews with election officials and attorneys general. Finally, the study includes an analysis of a few of the most high profile cases of alleged fraud in the last 10 years, including the Miami mayoral election (1997), Orange County congressional race (1996), and the general election in Missouri (2000). In these cases, Minnite shows that many allegations of fraud do not end up being meritorious.

Minnite finds that available evidence suggests that the incidence of election fraud is minimal and rarely affects election outcomes. Election officials generally do a very good job of protecting against fraud. Conditions that give rise to election fraud have steadily declined over the last century as a result of weakened political parties, strengthened election administration, and improved voting technology. There is little available evidence that election reforms such as the National Voter Registration Act, election day registration, and mail-in voting have resulted in increases in election fraud.

Election fraud appears also to be very rare in the 12 states examined more in-depth. Legal and news records turned up little evidence of significant fraud in these states or any indication that fraud is more than a minor problem. Interviews with state officials further confirmed this impression.

Minnite found that, overall, the absentee mail-in ballot process is the feature most vulnerable to voter fraud. There is not a lot of evidence of absentee ballot fraud but the potential for fraud is greatest in this area because of a lack of uniformly strong security measures in place in all states to prevent fraud.

Minnite suggest several reforms to prevent what voter fraud does take place. These include effective use of new statewide voter registration databases; identification requirements for first time voters who register by mail should be modified to expand the list of acceptable identifying documents; fill important election administration positions with nonpartisan professionals; strengthen enforcement through adequate funding and authority for offices responsible for detecting and prosecuting fraud; and establish Election Day Registration because it usually requires voter identification and authorization in person before a trained election worker, which reduces the opportunity for registration error or fraud.

Shattering the Myth: An Initial Snapshot of Voter Disenfranchisement in the 2004 Elections, People for the American Way, NAACP, Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights

Shattering the Myth is a description and analysis of the complaints and allegations of voting irregularities gathered by the Election Protection program during the 2004 presidential election. Election Protection was an effort involving hundreds of organizations and thousands of citizens to protect the voting rights of Americans across the country. The project included sending thousands of monitors to the polls and hosting a national toll free voters' rights hotline. EP mounted extensive field efforts in 17 states.

Election Protection received more than a thousand complaints of voter suppression or intimidation. Complaints ranged from intimidating experiences at polling places to coordinated suppression tactics. For example:

- Police stationed outside a Cook County, Illinois, polling place were requesting photo ID and telling voters if they had been convicted of a felony that they could not vote.
- In Pima, Arizona, voters at multiple polls were confronted by an individual, wearing a black tee shirt with "US Constitution Enforcer" and a military-style belt that gave the appearance he was armed. He asked voters if they were citizens, accompanied by a cameraman who filmed the encounters.
- There were numerous incidents of intimidation by partisan challengers at predominately low income and minority precincts
- Voters repeatedly complained about misinformation campaigns via flyers or phone calls encouraging them to vote on a day other than November 2, 2004 or of false information regarding their right to vote. In Polk County, Florida, for example, a voter received a call telling her to vote on November 3. Similar complaints were also reported in other counties throughout Florida. In Wisconsin and elsewhere voters received flyers that said:
  - "If you already voted in any election this year, you can't vote in the Presidential Election."
  - "If anybody in your family has ever been found guilty of anything you can't vote in the Presidential Election."
  - "If you violate any of these laws, you can get 10 years in prison and your children will be taken away from you."

There were also numerous reports of poll workers refusing to give voters provisional ballots.

The following is a summary of the types of acts of suppression and intimidation included in the report and a list of the states in which they took place. All instances of irregularities that were more administrative in nature have been omitted:

1. Improper implementation of voter identification rules, especially asking only African Americans for proof of identity: Florida, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana

2. Individuals at the polls posing as some sort of law enforcement authority and intimidating and harassing voters: Arizona, Missouri
3. Intimidating and harassing challengers at the polls: Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Missouri, Minnesota
4. Deceptive practices and disinformation campaigns, such as the use of flyers with intentional misinformation about voting rights or voting procedures, often directed at minority communities; the use of phone calls giving people misinformation about polling sites and other procedures; and providing verbal misinformation at the polls in a way that appears to have been intentionally misleading: Florida, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, North Carolina, Arkansas, Texas
5. Refusal to provide provisional ballots to certain voters: Ohio, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan, Colorado, Missouri, Texas, Georgia, Louisiana
6. Registration applications submitted through third parties that were not processed: Arizona, Michigan, Nevada (registration forms destroyed by Sproul Associates)
7. Improper removal from the voter registration list: Arizona
8. Individuals questioning voters' citizenship: Arizona
9. Police officers at the polls intimidating voters: Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Missouri, North Carolina

The report does not provide corroborating evidence for the allegations it describes. However, especially in the absence of a log of complaints received by the Department of Justice, this report provides a very useful overview of the types of experiences some voters more than likely endured on Election Day in 2004.

2002

In fall 2002, one of South Dakota's Senators, Democrat Tim Johnson, was up for re-election, and was engaged in a very close race with his Republican challenger, John Thune. Both parties were engaged in a massive voter registration effort, and registered over 24,000 new voters in the five months between the June primary and the November election, increasing the number of registered voters in the state from around 452,000 to 476,000.<sup>1</sup>

A month before the election, several counties reported irregularities in some of the voter registration documents they'd received. In response to these reports, South Dakota Attorney General, Mark Barnett, with the state US Attorney and the FBI, launched an investigation.<sup>2</sup> Because of the importance of the race in determining the partisan balance of power in the Senate, the voter registration discrepancies got a good deal of national press, including a number of editorials accusing American Indians of stuffing ballot boxes.<sup>3</sup> The following allegations were also picked up by out-of-state newssources, including Fox News and the Wall Street Journal:

- Supporters of Thune, who lost the election by 524 votes, collected 47 affidavits from poll watchers claiming voting irregularities.
- Allegations were made that three individuals were offered money by Johnson supporters to vote.

Barnett, who was alerted to the affidavits when he read an early media report that referred to them, stated that these allegations were either false or didn't warrant concern. "Most of the stuff that's in those other 47 affidavits are the kind of problems that we see in every election. People parking too close to the polling place with a sign in their window, people shooting their mouths off at the polling place. The kind of things that local election officials generally do a pretty good job of policing."<sup>4</sup> The allegations of voter bribery were false.

Though most of the allegations of fraud that were filed turned out to be false, Attorney General Barnett's investigation did uncover two cases of voter registration fraud:

- The most high-profile case was that of Becky Red Earth-Villeda. Ms. Red Earth-Villeda was hired by the state Democratic party to register voters on the American Indian reservations. She was charged with 19 counts of forgery. No fraudulent voting was associated with Ms. Red Earth-Villeda, nor was there any evidence that fraudulent voting occurred in the state.<sup>5</sup> All charges were dropped in January 2004, when, in court, it was determined by the state handwriting specialist that Ms. Red Earth-Villeda had not forged the signatures.<sup>6</sup>

- Lyle Nichols. Mr. Nichols was arrested for submitting five forged voter registration cards to his county office. He was working for an organization called the Native American Voter Registration Project, and was paid $3 for each registration. The five charges were dropped after Mr. Nichols pleaded guilty to possession of a forgery, and was sentenced with 54 days in jail, which is how much time he'd already spent there because of the charges.<sup>7</sup>

2004

In October 2004, just before the general election, eight people working for a campus GOP Get-out-the-Vote organization resigned their positions after they were accused of submitting absentee ballot requests that had not been notarized properly. Because many of these ballot requests had already been processed and the ballots themselves had been cast, county auditors decided not to pursue the issue.<sup>8</sup>

Besides this incident, there were no reports of voter registration or voting irregularities in the run-up to the November 2004 election, as there were in 2002.<sup>9</sup> However, as with the primary and special elections in June 2004, there were complaints about voter intimidation from American Indians attempting to vote, as well as difficulties with the adoption of the state's new photo identification regulations (after the 2002 election, the state legislature passed more stringent requirements about the kind of identification voters would need to provide at the polls.)

Incidents:

Voter Intimidation: The Four Directions Committee, an organization dedicated to helping American Indians register to vote and get to the polls, got a temporary restraining order on several Republican supporters who, they alleged, had been setting up video equipment outside of polling places on American Indian reservations and following around American Indians who voted early and recording their license plates.<sup>10</sup>

Vote Buying: A Republican election monitor from Virginia, Paul Brenner, claimed that Senator Tom Daschle's campaign was paying people to vote. Local county auditors

Steal this Vote-Dirty Elections and the Rotten History of Democracy in America by Andrew Gumbel

The bulk of the book comprises stories from United States electoral history outside the scope of this project. However, these tales are instructive in showing how far back irregular and illegal voting practices go. Cases include the 1868 New York City elections; the Tilden-Hayes election; the impact of the introduction of the secret ballot; the 1981 consent decree; the 1990 Helms campaign; the 1960 presidential election controversy in Chicago; the rise of the voting machine business, including the introduction of punch card machines; and allegations by Republicans regarding NVRA.

Steal this Vote is heavily slanted in favor of Democrats focuses almost entirely on alleged transgressions by Republican, although at times it does include complaints about Democratic tactics. Gumbel's accusations, if credible, especially in the Bush-Gore election, would have indicated that there were a number of problems in key states in such areas as intimidation, vote counting, and absentee ballots. However, the most glaring problem with the accuracy and veracity of the text is due to its possible biases, lack of specific footnoting, and insufficient and corresponding lack of identification of primary source material, caution is strongly urged with respect to utilizing this book for assessing the amount and types of voter fraud and voter intimidation occurring. ~~Gumbel is either guilty of generally listing sources or interviews without identifying pages or making the interviews public. Because of this, Steal this Vote cannot be used as a credible research tool.~~

The Long Shadow of Jim Crow, People for the American Way and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

This report describes the pervasive and repeated practices of voter intimidation and vote suppression that have taken place in very recent years and during contemporary American history. The most recent cases included in the report are the incident in which Florida law enforcement questioned elderly African American voters in Orlando regarding the 2003 mayoral race, which had already been resolved, shortly before the 2004 election; the 2004 Florida felon purge list; the case of South Dakota in 2004 in which Native Americans were improperly and illegally required to show photo identification at the polls or denied the right to vote, and similar improper demands for ID from minorities in other parts of the country; the use of challengers in minority districts in many locations; the challenge to the right of African American students to vote in Texas in 2004; the presence of men looking like law enforcement challenging African American voters at the polls in Philadelphia in 2003; the distribution of flyers in Louisiana and elsewhere in a number of elections over the last few years in minority areas telling them to vote on the wrong day; and the FBI investigation into thousands of Native American voters in South Dakota in 2002, which resulted in no showing of wrongdoing.

The report also points out that, “Over the past two decades, the Republican Party has launched a series of ‘ballot security’ and ‘voter integrity’ initiatives which have targeted minority communities. At least three times, these initiatives were successfully challenged in federal courts as illegal attempts to suppress voter participation based on race.

It goes on to describe the numerous instances of voter intimidation and suppression during the 2000 election, the 1990s, the 1980s and back through the civil rights movement of the 1960s, putting current efforts in historical perspective. Describing the chronology of events in this way demonstrates the developing patterns and strategic underpinnings of the tactics used over the last forty years.

The New Poll Tax: Republican-Sponsored Ballot-Security Measures are Being Used to Keep Minorities from Voting

By Laughlin McDonald

McDonald argues that “the discriminatory use of so-called ‘ballot security’ programs” has been a reoccurring scandal since the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. These programs are deceptively presented as preventing voter fraud and thereby furthering good government. However, McDonald states “but far too often they [the ballot security programs] are actually designed to suppress minority voting -- and for nakedly partisan purposes.”

McDonald blames the federal government as well as the states for use of suspect ballot security programs. He cites the implementation of the U.S. Department of Justice’s in “Voting Integrity Initiative” in South Dakota as the worst example of a joint federal-state effort to prevent voter fraud. Alleged voter fraud only in counties with significant Native American populations was targeted. South Dakota Attorney General Mark Barnett “working with the FBI, announced plans to send state and federal agents to question almost 2,000 new Native-American registrants, many of whom were participating in the political process for the first time.” However, statistics show that these efforts only served to increase Native American voter participation. Native Americans “were targeted based on fraud allegations that proved to be grossly exaggerated; at the end of the investigation, only one Native American was even charged with a voting-rules violation.”

McDonald cites several other ballot security efforts that were really disguised attempts at minority voter suppression:

In Pine Bluff, Ark., Democrats accused Republican poll watchers of driving away voters in predominantly black precincts by taking photos of them and demanding identification during pre-election day balloting. Democrats in Michigan charged that a plan by Republicans to station hundreds of “spotters” at heavily Democratic precincts was an effort to intimidate black voters and suppress Democratic turnout. In South Carolina, a lawsuit filed the day before the election alleged that officials in Beaufort County had adopted a new and unauthorized policy allowing them to challenge voters who gave rural route or box numbers for their registration address. According to the complaint, a disproportionate number of those affected by the new rule would be African-American voters who lived in the rural areas of the county.

McDonald is also critical of the Help America Vote Act (HAVA). He states that HAVA “contains other provisions that may enhance the opportunities for harassment and intimidation of minorities through ballot-security programs.” McDonald specifically attacks the photo ID requirement for anyone who registered by mail but has not previously voted. McDonald argues that the ID requirement will suppress minority voting because minorities are less likely than non-minorities to have a photo ID, a photo ID is expensive to obtain and all the alternatives to photo ID present similar obstacles to minority voters. He also argues that there is no evidence that photo ID will combat voter fraud but it only really provides “another opportunity for aggressive poll officials to single out minority voters and interrogate them.”

McDonald lists some classic past ballot security efforts by the Republicans that have been abused: the 1981 gubernatorial election anti-fraud initiative leading to the well known consent decree prohibiting the Republicans from repeating this, a similar Republican effort in Louisiana in 1986 in Senator John Breaux’s race which again resulted in prohibition by a state court judge, and a similar effort by Republicans in Senator Jesse Helms 1990 reelection. This time the Department of Justice sued the Republican Party and Helm’s reelection committee, resulting in another consent decree prohibiting future ballot security programs without court approval.

McDonald indicates that the crux of the problem is lax enforcement of federal voters rights laws. He states, “there is no record of the purveyors of any ballot-security program being criminally prosecuted by federal authorities for interfering with the right to vote.” The only positive case law McDonald cited was a decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit that affirmed “an award of damages ranging from $500 to $2,000, payable by individual poll officials to each of seven black voters who had been unlawfully challenged, harassed, denied assistance in voting or purged from the rolls in the town of Crawfordsville [Arkansas].”

McDonald concludes by stating that Congress and the states should adopt “nondiscriminatory, evenly applied measures to ensure the integrity of the ballot.”

Summary of Election Irregularities in Washington State 2004

The 2004 Washington state gubernatorial election was decided by one of the narrowest margins in American electoral history; 261 votes – less than a millionth of the 2.8 million votes cast statewide - separated the leading candidate, Republican Dino Rossi, from his competitor, Democrat Christine Gregoire. The state law-mandated recount that followed brought the margin down to 42 votes, and the subsequent hand recount ordered by the state Democratic Party gave Gregoire the lead, with 129 more votes than Rossi.

The race was so close that the parties decided to go to court to dispute the tally – the Republicans wanted the election results set aside and to have a revote; the Democrats sought a court-legitimated win. Each side set out into the field to find a way to swing the election in their favor. The trial and accompanying investigation, which lasted through the spring of 2005, revealed a litany of problems with the state's election system:

- The process by which absentee ballots are matched to the voters who requested them led to discrepancies between the number of absentee ballots received and the number of votes counted.<sup>1</sup>
- After the final certification of the election results, King County discovered 96 uncounted absentee ballots, Pierce county found 64, and Spokane County found eight; all had been misplaced following the election, but there was no mechanism for reconciling the number of absentee ballots received with the number counted.<sup>2</sup>
- Hundreds of felons who were ineligible to vote were able to cast ballots because they were not aware that they needed to apply to have their voting rights re-instated.<sup>3</sup>
- The system for verifying the eligibility of voters who had cast provisional ballots was found to be questionable.<sup>4</sup>
- Due to poll worker error, about 100 provisional ballots were improperly cast, and a hundred more were counted, though they were not verified as having been cast by eligible voters.<sup>5</sup>

The trial also revealed that most of these problems were the result of understaffing and human error.<sup>6</sup> In total, 1,678 ballots were proven to have been cast illegally, but none of these votes was subtracted from the candidates' totals because no evidence was produced in court as to how each individual voted.<sup>7</sup> Further, despite the scrutiny that the election

An Evaluation: Voter Registration Elections Board: Wisconsin Audit Report 05-12:
September 2005

The Joint Legislative Audit Committee of the Wisconsin Legislature required the Wisconsin Audit Report. The Report obviously does not include the 2006 statistics for statewide voter registration as required by HAVA. Wisconsin voter registration is required by statute in only 172 municipalities---those with populations of 5,000 or more. Another 167 smaller municipalities opted to maintain voter registration lists. Currently, 28.9 % of the voting-age population is not required to register before voting.

According to the Report, great variation was found in the implementation of existing voter registration laws. For example, 46 % of municipalities that responded to the survey did not send address verification cards to individuals who registered by mail or at the polls on Election Day in November 2004.

Further, only 85.3 % of survey respondents reported updating their voter registration lists to remove inactive voters, as required by law.

Current voter registration practices were determined to be insufficient to ensure the accuracy of voter registration lists used by poll workers or to prevent ineligible persons from registering to vote. The Report identified 105 instances of voting irregularities in six municipalities, including 98 ineligible felons who may have voted. The names of these individuals were forwarded to appropriate district attorneys for investigation.

Due to concerns about ineligible voting, stemming from the 2004 election, the Joint Legislative Audit Committee requested that voter registration procedures be evaluated. The following was investigated for this Report:

- * voter registration requirements and the methods by which voters register, including requirements in other states;
- * the address verification process, including the use of address verification cards to confirm the residency of those who register by mail or at the polls;
- * procedures and practices for updating voter registration lists; and,
- * the role of the Elections Board.

Wisconsin allows qualified electors to register in person, by mail, or with a special registration deputy before Election Day, and at the polls on Election Day. In municipalities where registration is required by statute, 20.3 % of Wisconsin voters registered at the polls on Election Day in November 2004. Municipal clerks rely on registrants to affirm their eligibility, including citizenship and age. However, requirements for providing identification or proof of residence vary depending on when an individual registers and by which method.

Address verification cards are the primary tool available to municipal clerks for verifying the residency of registered voters and detecting improper registrations by mail or at the polls. Statutes require that clerks send cards to everyone who registers by mail or on Election Day. However, only 42.7 % of the 150 municipalities surveyed sent cards to both groups, and 46 % did not send any address verification cards.

Statutes also require clerks to provide the local district attorney with the names of any Election Day registrants whose cards are undeliverable at the address provided. However, only 24.3 % of the clerks who sent cards also forwarded names from undeliverable cards to district attorneys. District attorneys surveyed indicated that they require more information than is typically provided to conduct effective investigations.

To ensure that voter registration lists contain only the names of qualified electors, municipal clerks are required by statute to remove or inactivate the names of individuals who have not voted in four years, to update registration information for individuals who move or change their names, and to remove or inactivate the names of deceased individuals. They are also required to notify registered voters before removing their names from registration lists. These statutory requirements are not consistently followed:

- * 85.3 % of municipalities removed the names of inactive voters from their voter registration lists;
- * 71.4 % sometimes or always notified registered voters before removing their names; and
- * 54.0 % reported removing the names of ineligible felons.

Because of such inconsistencies, registration lists contain duplicate records and the names of ineligible individuals. For example, more than 348,000 electronic voter registration records from eight municipalities were reviewed, identifying 3,116 records that appear to show individuals who are registered more than once in the same municipality.

In six municipalities where sufficient information was available, there was 105 instances of potentially improper or fraudulent voting in the 2004 elections. These included: 98 ineligible felons who may have voted; 2 individuals who may have voted twice; 1 voter who may have been underage; and 4 absentee ballots that should not have been counted because the voters who cast them died before Election Day.

Recommendations:

- * adjusting the early registration deadline to provide clerks more time to prepare registration lists;
- * establishing more stringent requirements for special registration deputies, including prohibiting compensation based on the number of individuals registered;

- * establishing uniform requirements for demonstrating proof of residence for all registrants;
- * providing municipal clerks with more flexibility in the use of address verification cards;
- * Authorizing civil penalties for local election officials and municipalities that fail to comply with election laws; and,
- * implementing mandatory elections training requirements for municipal clerks.

The Report also recognized that the new HAVA registration procedures would help with existing registration problems.

Summary of Wisconsin Voting Irregularities November 2004

Instances of Illegal Voting, Milwaukee:

A probe led by U.S. Attorney Steve Biskupic and Milwaukee County District Attorney Michael McCann found about 200 cases of illegal felon voting and at least 100 cases of other forms of illegal voting in the city of Milwaukee. Of these, 14 were prosecuted:

10 were instances of felons voting while on probation or parole:

5 are awaiting trial. (one of them is DeShawn Brooks)<sup>1</sup>

1 has been acquitted<sup>2</sup>

1 has been found guilty in trial (Kimberly Prude)<sup>2</sup>

3 have reached plea agreements (Milo Ocasio<sup>3</sup>)

4 were instances of double voting:

1 produced a hung jury (Enrique Sanders)<sup>2</sup>

1 was found incompetent to stand trial and his case was dismissed

1 initially pleaded guilty but now wants a trial.<sup>5</sup>

1 is awaiting trial.

Two of those accused of double voting were driven to multiple polling places in a van, but the identity of the driver of the vehicle is not known, and the DA does not suspect conspiracy.<sup>6</sup>

In addition to these, four people were charged with felonies in the Milwaukee County Circuit Court; two cases were filed against people accused of sending in false registration cards under the auspices of the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now; the other two were felons who voted illegally.<sup>7</sup>

Instances of Illegal Voting, Statewide:

The Legislative Audit Bureau, a nonpartisan research agency, released its analysis of state-wide 2004 election results in September 2005. The agency reviewed the names, addresses, and birthdates of over 348,000 individuals credited with having voted in November 2004, from the electronic voter registration records of 6 cooperating municipalities, and compared them to lists from the Department of Corrections of felons serving sentences on election day, and to lists from the municipalities (to check up on double-voting) and to lists from the US Social Security Administration. LAB's search revealed 105 "questionable" votes:

- 98 ballots cast by ineligible felons, 57 of which were in Madison, 2 in Waukesha, 15 in Eau Claire, 16 in Appleton, 1 in the Village of Ashwaubenon
- 2 instances of double-voting (one in Madison, one in Waukesha).
- 4 votes counted despite the voter's having died two weeks or less before the election.
- 1 case in which a 17-year-old voted in Madison.<sup>8</sup>

The LAB referred the names of these people to the appropriate District Attorney for prosecution, and several cases are awaiting trial.

It should be noted that this study is not a complete survey of election returns state-wide in Wisconsin; the LAB's analysis is based on the voting records of the six municipalities that provided the LAB with sufficient information to conduct this study.

It should also be noted that the LAB discovered significant error in the data provided them by these municipalities, including:

- 91 records in which the individual's birthdate was incorrectly recorded as later than November 2, 1986
- 97 cases in which a person was mistakenly recorded as having voted twice
- More than 15,000 records were missing birthdates, making it more difficult to determine voter eligibility by comparing these records to lists of felons and deceased persons.<sup>9</sup>

General Findings

Both reports (the Legislative Audit Bureau's and the report of the Joint Task Force on Election Reform convened in Milwaukee) that did in-depth studies of the Wisconsin election returns in 2004 found that there was no evidence of systematic, wide-spread fraud.<sup>10</sup> As the above statistics indicate, there are very few cases in which an individual intentionally voted illegally, and the majority of the discovered instances of fraudulent voting involved felons who were unaware that they were committing a crime. Certainly the number of fraudulent votes, intentional and unintentional, is dwarfed by the amount of administrative error – and the amount of potential there was for fraud.

Duplicate Registrations: In the data from the six participating municipalities, LAB found 3116 records for individuals who appear to be registered more than once in the same municipality (0.9% of the records they reviewed). These duplications were primarily the result of name changes, in which the registrar neglected to remove the old name from the registration list, previous addresses that were not deleted, and misspellings and other typographical errors.

Deceased Voters: the LAB study found 783 persons who were deceased, but whose records had not been eliminated from the registration lists. Most of the municipalities participating in the survey rely on obituaries and notifications from family members to purge their voter registration lists of deceased voters.

Felons: Comparing a list of felons from the Department of Corrections to their voter registration data lists, LAB found 453 felons who were registered to vote. This is largely because, although municipal clerks are informed of federal felony convictions, they have no way of obtaining records on state felony convictions.<sup>11</sup>

Preliminary Findings of Joint Task Force Investigating Possible Election Fraud: May 10, 2005

On January 26, 2005, the Milwaukee Police Department, Milwaukee County District Attorney's Office, Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the United States Attorney's Office formed a task force to investigate alleged voting irregularities during the November 2004 elections. The purpose of the task force was to determine whether evidence of criminal fraud existed in the irregularities and, if evidence of fraud was found, to pursue criminal prosecutions.

The task force has made the following specific determinations based on evidence examined to date:

- * evidence of more than 100 individual instances of suspected double-voting, voting in names of persons who likely did not vote, and/or voting in names believed to be fake. Those investigations continue;
- * more than 200 felons voted when they were not eligible to do so. In order to establish criminal cases, the government must establish willful violations in individual instances;
- * persons who had been paid to register voters as "deputy registrars" falsely listed approximately 65 names in order to receive compensation for the registrations. The evidence does not indicate that these particular false registrations were later used to cast votes; and,
- * the number of votes counted from the City of Milwaukee exceeds the number of persons recorded as voting by more than 4,500.

The investigation concentrated on the 70,000+ same-day registrations. It found that a large majority of the reported errors were the result of data entry errors, such as street address numbers being transposed. However, the investigation also found more than 100 instances where votes were cast in a manner suggesting fraud. These include:

- * persons with the same name and date of birth recorded as voting more than once;
- * persons who live outside Milwaukee, but who used non-existent City addresses to register and vote in the City;
- * persons who registered and voted with identities and addresses that cannot in any way be linked to a real person;
- * persons listed as voting under a name and identity of a person known to be deceased; and
- * persons whose identities were used to vote, but who in subsequent interviews told task force investigators that they did not, in fact, vote in the City of Milwaukee.

The investigation found persons who were paid money to obtain registrations allegedly falsified approximately 65 names on registration forms, allegedly to obtain more money for each name submitted. There is no evidence gathered to date that votes were cast under these specific false names. Also found were more than 200 felons who were not eligible to vote in the 2004 election, but who are recorded as having done so.

An additional finding of the task force was that the number of votes cast far exceeds the total number of recorded voters. The day after the 2004 election, the City of Milwaukee reported the total number of votes as 277,344. In late November an additional 191 previously uncounted absentee ballots were added, for a total of 277,535 votes cast. Still later, an additional 30 ballots were added, bringing the total number of counted votes to 277,565. City records, however, have been unable to match this total to a similar number of names of voters who cast ballots – either at the polls (under a prior registration or same day registration) or cast absentee ballots. At present, the records show a total of 272,956 voter names – for a discrepancy of 4,609. This part of the investigation was hampered by widespread record keeping errors with respect to recording the number of voters.

In the 2004 election, same-day registrations were accepted in which the card had incomplete information that would help establish identity. For example: 48 original cards for persons listed as voting had no name; 548 had no address; 28 did not have signatures; and another 23 cards had illegible information. These were part of approximately 1,300 same-day registrations for which votes were cast, but which election officials could not authenticate as proper voters within the City. Included in this 1,300 were 141 same-day registrants from addresses outside the City of Milwaukee, but who voted within the City of Milwaukee. In several instances, the voter explicitly listed municipality names other than Milwaukee on the registration cards.

Another record keeping procedure hampering the investigation appears to be the post-election misfiling or loss of original green registration cards that were considered duplicates, but that in fact corresponded to additional votes. These cards were used to record votes, but approximately 100 cards of interest to investigators can no longer be located. In addition, other original green registration cards continue to be found.

A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the White House by David E. Johnson & Jonny R. Johnson

A Funny Thing Happened adds almost nothing to the present study. It contains no footnotes and no references to primary source material, save what may be able to be gleaned from the bibliography. The Johnsons take a historical look at United States Presidential elections from Andrew Jackson to George Bush by providing interesting stories and other historical information. Unfortunately, there are only three pages out of the entire book that touches on vote fraud in the first Bush election.

The authors assert that the exit polls in Florida were probably correct. The problem was the pollsters had no way of knowing that thousands of votes would be invalidated. But the authors do not believe that fraud was the cause of the tabulation inaccuracy. The major cause was undervotes and overvotes which, if all counted, would have altered the result, compounded by the use of the butterfly ballot in some strategic counties. Additionally, Ralph Nader's votes were primarily a bleed off of needed Gore votes. The authors accused Katherine Harris, then Florida Secretary of State and co-chair of the Bush campaign in Florida for prematurely certifying the state vote. The authors also ridiculed United States Secretary of State James A. Baker III, for using the courts to block attempts to hand count votes. Finally, the authors indicated that a mob of Republican partisans descended on the vote counters in Dade County and effectively stopped the count.

Vote Fraud, Intimidation & Suppression In The 2004 Presidential Election

American Center for Voting Rights Report

According to its website," the American Center For Voting Rights Legislative Fund was founded in February 2005 on the belief that public confidence in our electoral system is the cornerstone of our democracy... ACVR Legislative Fund supports election reform that protects the right of all citizens to participate in the election process free of intimidation, discrimination or harassment and which will make it easy to vote but tough to cheat.

Using court records, police reports and news articles, ACVR Legislative Fund presented this Report documenting hundreds of reported incidents and allegations from around the country. ACVR Legislative Fund found that thousands of Americans were disenfranchised by illegal votes cast on Election Day 2004. For every illegal vote cast and counted on Election Day, a legitimate voter is disenfranchised. This report alleges a coordinated effort by members of some organizations to rig the election system through voter registration fraud, the first step in any vote fraud scheme that corrupts the election process by burying local officials in fraudulent and suspicious registration forms. ACVR Legislative Fund further found that, despite their heated rhetoric, paid Democrat operatives were far more involved in voter intimidation and suppression activities than were their Republican counterparts during the 2004 presidential election.

In addition to recommended changes and a zero-tolerance commitment by the political parties, ACVR Legislative Fund has identified five cities as "hot spots" which require additional immediate attention. These cities were identified based on the findings of this report and the cities' documented history of fraud and intimidation. These cities are: Philadelphia, PA, Milwaukee, WI, Seattle, WA, St. Louis/East St. Louis, MO/IL, and Cleveland, OH.

Without going into great detail in this review, this Report: refutes charges of voter intimidation and suppression made against Republican supporters, discusses similar charges against Democrats, details incidents vote fraud and illegal voting and finally discusses problems with vote fraud, voter registration fraud and election irregularities around the country. The majority of this Report is an attempt to redeem Republicans and vilify Democrats.

In terms of sheer numbers, the report most often alleges voter intimidation and voter registration fraud, and to a lesser degree absentee ballot fraud and vote buying.

The Report presented the following recommendations for future action:

* Both national political parties should formally adopt a zero-tolerance fraud and intimidation policy that commits the party to pursuing and fully prosecuting individuals and allied organizations who commit vote fraud or who seek to deter any eligible voter from participating in the election through fraud or intimidation. No amount of legislative reform can effectively deter those who commit acts of fraud if there is no punishment for the crime and these acts continue to be tolerated.

* States should adopt legislation requiring government-issued photo ID at the polls and for any voter seeking to vote by mail or by absentee ballot. Government-issued photo identification should be readily available to all citizens without cost and provisions made to assure availability of government-issued identification to disabled and low-income citizens.

* States should adopt legislation requiring that all polling places be fully accessible and accommodating to all voters regardless of race, disability or political persuasion and that polling locations are free of intimidation or harassment.

* States should create and maintain current and accurate statewide voter registration databases as mandated by the federal Help America Vote Act (“HAVA”) and establish procedures to assure that the statewide voter roll is current and accurate and that the names of eligible voters on the roll are consistent with the voter roll used by local election authorities in conducting the election.

* States should adopt legislation establishing a 30-day voter registration cutoff to assure that all voter rolls are accurate and that all registrants can cast a regular ballot on Election Day and the election officials have opportunity to establish a current and accurate voter roll without duplicate or fictional names and assure that all eligible voters (including all recently registered voters) are included on the voter roll at their proper precinct.

* States should adopt legislation requiring voter registration applications to be delivered to the elections office within one week of being completed so that they are processed in a timely manner and to assure the individuals registered by third party organizations are properly included on the voter roll.

* States should adopt legislation and penalties for groups violating voter registration laws, and provide the list of violations and penalties to all registration solicitors. Legislation should require those organizations obtaining a voter’s registration to deliver that registration to election officials in a timely manner and should impose appropriate penalties upon any individual or organization that obtains an eligible voter’s registration and fails to deliver it to election authorities.

America's Modern Poll Tax: How Structural Disenfranchisement Erodes Democracy

Advancement Project

The thesis of the Report, America's Modern Poll Tax, written after the 2000 election, is that structural disenfranchisement—the effect of breakdowns in the electoral system, is the new poll tax. Structural disenfranchisement includes “bureaucratic blunders, governmental indifference, and flagrant disregard for voting rights.” The blame for structural disenfranchisement is laid squarely at the feet of states and localities that “shirk their responsibilities or otherwise manipulate election systems,” resulting in voters “either turned away from the polls or their votes are thrown out.”

The interlocking practices and mechanics that comprise structural disenfranchisement are referred to a “ballot blockers” in the report. Most ballot blockers involve the structural elements of electoral administration: “ill-trained poll workers, failures to process registration cards on time or at all, inaccurate registration rolls, overbroad purges of voter rolls, unreasonably long lines, inaccurate ballot translations and a shortage of translators to assist voters who have limited English language skills.” The Report argues that a culture of indifference overlays these issues that both tolerates and excuses widespread disenfranchisement. This culture of indifference is exemplified by legislatures that do not properly fund election systems, officials that send antiquated equipment into poor and minority areas, poorly translated ballots and polling places that are not wheelchair accessible.

The data and conclusions in the Report are taken from eight sample case studies of states and cities across the country and a survey of state election directors that reinforces the findings of the case studies. Examples of state and city problems were: New York City—in six polling places Chinese translations inverted the Democrats with the Republicans; Georgia—the state computer crashed two weeks before the election, dropping thousands of voters from the rolls; Virginia—registration problems kept an untold number from voting; Chicago—in inner-city precincts with predominately minority populations, almost four out of every ten votes cast for President (in 2000) were discarded; St. Louis—thousands of qualified voters were placed on inactive lists due to an overbroad purge; Florida—a voting list purge of voters whose name and birth date closely resembled those of people convicted of felonies; and, Texas—significant Jim Crow like barriers to minority voting.

The survey of state election directors found: election directors lack the resources to effectively do their jobs and some lack the “ability or will to force local election officials to fix serious problems”; election officials are highly under funded and legislatures refuse to grant their requests for more money; due to a lack of funds, election officials must use old and inferior equipment and can't improve training or meet structural needs; election officials are generally unaware of racial disparities in voting; only three of the 50 state election administrators are non-white.

The Report “concludes that affected communities and democracy advocates should mobilize to force change.” A number of recommendations are made to protect the electoral franchise including: Federal policies that set nationwide and uniform election policies; federal guarantee of access to provisional ballots; enforcement of voter disability laws; automatic restoration of voting rights to those convicted of a crime after they have completed their sentence; a centralized data base of voters administered by non-partisan individuals; federal standards limiting precinct discarded vote rates to .25 %; federal requirements that jurisdiction provide voter education, including how to protect their right to vote; and laws that strengthen the ability of individuals to bring actions to enforce voting rights and anti-discrimination laws.

Analysis of the September 15, 2005 Voter Fraud Report Submitted to the New Jersey Attorney General

By The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law and Dr. Michael McDonald of George Mason University

General

A September 15, 2005 Report submitted to the New Jersey Attorney General included lists of purportedly illegitimate votes in New Jersey in the 2004 general election, including lists of 10,969 individuals who purportedly voted twice and lists of 4,756 voters who were purportedly dead or incarcerated in November 2004. For the present Analysis of the Report, the lists of voters submitted to the New Jersey Attorney General, as well as a copy of the New Jersey county voter registration files were obtained, and an initial investigation of the report's claims was conducted. The analysis shows that the lists submitted are substantially flawed.

The Analysis is based on methodology only: its authors did not gain access to original documents related to registration or original pollbook records; only recently were copies of the counties' original registration data files acquired and compiled, which contain some notable gaps; and the lists submitted to the Attorney General contain significant errors and little documentation, which complicated the analysis. Nonetheless, the analysts say that information collected is sufficient for generally assessing the quality of evidence presented to support the September 15 report. Analysis of the suspect lists reveals that the evidence submitted does not show what it purports to show: cause for concern that there is serious risk of widespread fraud given the state of the New Jersey voter registration rolls.

These suspect lists were compiled by attempting to match the first name, last name, and birth date of persons on county voter registration files. Entries that supposedly "matched" other entries were apparently deemed to represent the same individual, voting twice. This methodology was similar to the method used in compiling the notoriously inaccurate Florida "purge lists" of suspected ineligible felons in 2000 and 2004. As Florida's experience shows, matching names and birth dates in the voter registration context can easily lead to false conclusions – as was almost certainly the case here.

This Analysis reveals several serious problems with the methodology used to compile the suspect lists that compromise the lists' practical value. For example, the data used in the Report from one county appears to be particularly suspect and anomalous, and may have substantially skewed the overall results. In addition, middle initials were ignored throughout all counties, so that "J _____ A. Smith" was presumed to be the same person as "J _____ G. Smith." Suffixes were also ignored, so that fathers and sons – like "B _____ Johnson" and "B _____ Johnson, Jr." – were said to be the same person.

Underlying many of the entries on these lists, and similar lists compiled in Florida and elsewhere, is a presumption that two records with the same name and date of birth must represent the same person. As explained in this analysis, this presumption is not consistent with basic statistical principles. Even when votes appear to have been cast in two different cities under the same name and birth date, statistics show that voter fraud is not necessarily to blame. With 3.6 million persons who voted in the 2004 election in New Jersey, the chance that some have the same name and birth date is not far-fetched.

Analysis of the Claim of Double Voting by 4,497 Individuals

Attempts to match data on one list to data on another list will often yield “false positives:” two records that at first appear to be a match but do not actually represent the same person. The natural incidence of “false positives” for a matching exercise of this scale – especially when, as here, conducted with relatively little attention to detail – readily explains the ostensible number of double votes.

1,803 of these 4,397 records of ostensibly illegal votes seem to be the product of a glitch in the compilation of the registration files. These records reflect two registration entries by the same person from the same address, with a notation next to each that the individual has voted. For example, 55-year-old W_____ A. Connors, living at 253 B_____ Ave. in a New York commuter suburb, is listed on the data files with an (erroneous) first registration date in 1901 and a second registration date in 1993; Mr. Connors is thus represented twice on the data files submitted. Each of these entries also indicates that W_____ A. Connors at 253 B_____ Ave voted in 2004. There is no credible indication, however, that Mr. Connors actually voted twice; indeed, given the clearly erroneous registration date on the files, it is far more likely that data error is to blame for the doubly logged vote as well.

More plausibly, the bulk of these 1,803 records may be traced to irregularities in the data processing and compilation process for one single county: the Middlesex County registration file accounts for only 10% of registered voters in the state but 78% of these alleged double votes. The suspect lists themselves contain an acknowledgment that the problem in Middlesex is probably not fraud: 99% of these Middlesex voters are labeled on the lists submitted to the Attorney General with a notation that the record is “less likely” to indicate an illegal double vote.

Another 1,257 entries of the 4,397 records probably represent similar data errors – also largely driven by a likely glitch in the Middlesex County file, which is also vastly over represented in this category. These records show ever-so-slight variations in records listed with the same date of birth at the same address: for example, the same first and last names, but different middle initials or suffixes (e.g., J_____ T. Kearns, Sr., and J_____ T. Kearns, Jr., both born the same day and living at the same address; or J_____ E. Allen and J_____ P. Allen, born the same day and living at the same address).

Approximately 800 of the entries on the list likely represent different people, with different addresses and different middle initials or suffixes. For example, W_____ S. Smith, living in a northern New Jersey town, and W_____ C. Smith, living in another town two hours away, share the same date of birth but are not the same person. Nor are

T_____ Brown, living in a New York commuter suburb, and T_____ H. Brown, Jr., living in a small town over an hour west, despite the fact that they also share the same birth date. About three-quarters of the entries in this category reveal data that affirmatively conflict – for example, a middle initial (“W_____ S.”) in one case, and a different middle initial (“W_____ C.”) in another, listed at different addresses. There is absolutely no good reason to conclude that these individuals are in fact the same, when the available evidence indicates the contrary.

For approximately 200 of the entries in this category, however, less information is available. These entries show a middle initial (“J_____ W. Davis”) in one case, and no middle initial (“J_____ Davis”) in another – again, at different addresses. The lack of the middle initial is ambiguous: it could mean that one of the J_____ Davis in question has no middle name, or it could mean that the middle initial was simply omitted in a particular registration entry. Although these entries involve less conclusive affirmative evidence of a false match than the entries noted above, there is still no good reason to believe that “J_____ W. Davis” and “J_____ Davis,” at different addresses, represent the same person.

Of the individuals remaining, there are serious concerns with the accuracy of the dates of birth. Seven voters were apparently born in January 1, 1880 – which is most likely a system default for registrations lacking date-of-birth information. For 227 voters, only the month and year of birth are listed: this means only that two voters with the same name were born in the same month and year, an unsurprising coincidence in a state of several million people.

That leaves approximately 289 votes cast under the same name and birth date – like votes cast by “P_____ S. Rosen,” born in the middle of the baby boom – but from two different addresses. It may appear strange, but there may be two P_____ S. Rosens, born on the same date in 1948 – and such coincidences are surprisingly common. For any one person, the odds of someone else having the same name and birth date is small. But because there are so many voters in New Jersey, a sizable number will have the same name and birth date simply by chance. In a group of just 23 people, it is more likely than not that two will share the same birthday. For 40 people, the probability is 90%. Many, if not most, of the 289 alleged double votes of persons registered at different addresses most likely reflect two separate individuals sharing a first name, last name, middle initial, and birth date.

The September 15 Report makes much of the raw potential for foul play based on the unsurprising fact that there are voters who appear on the New Jersey registration rolls more than once. As noted above, many of the names identified reflect two different individuals and not simply duplicate entries. But there is no doubt that there are duplicate entries on New Jersey’s registration rolls. It is well known that voter registration rolls contain “deadwood” – registration entries for individuals no longer living at a given address or deceased. There is no evidence, however, that these extra registrations are used for widespread illegal voting. Moreover, the problem of deadwood will soon be largely resolved: both the National Voter Registration Act of 1993 and the Help America

Vote Act of 2002 require states to implement several systems and procedures as of January 1, 2006, that will clean the voter rolls of duplicate or invalid entries while protecting eligible voters from unintended disfranchisement.

Building Confidence in U.S. Election, National Commission on Federal Election Reform
("Carter/Baker Commission")

The impetus for the Carter-Baker Commission and its report was the sense of the members that not enough had been done to reform the system since the 2000 election and that Americans had lost confidence in elections. The report makes several observations about the current system and makes 87 recommendations. Several of those recommendations are meant to be implemented in conjunction with one another in order to be effective, so the report is really a push for a comprehensive overhaul of the system as it works today.

Among the observations made that are relevant to the EAC study of fraud and intimidation are the following:

- The November 2004 elections showed that irregularities and fraud still occur.
- Failure to provide voters with such basic information as their registration status and their polling site location raises a barrier to voting as significant as inconsistent procedures on provisional ballots or voter ID requirements.
- There is no evidence of extensive fraud in U.S. elections or of multiple voting, but both occur, and it could affect the outcome of a close election.
- The Commission is concerned that the different approaches to identification cards might prove to be a serious impediment to voting.
- Voter registration lists are often inflated by the inclusion of citizens who have moved out of state but remain on the lists. Moreover, under the National Voter Registration Act, names are often added to the list, but counties and municipalities often do not delete the names of those who moved. Inflated voter lists are also caused by phony registrations and efforts to register individuals who are ineligible. At the same time, inaccurate purges of voter lists have removed citizens who are eligible and are properly registered.
- Political party and nonpartisan voter registration drives generally contribute to the electoral process by generating interest in upcoming elections and expanding participation. However, they are occasionally abused. There were reports in 2004 that some party activists failed to deliver voter registration forms of citizens who expressed a preference for the opposing party.
- Vote by mail raises concerns about privacy, as citizens voting at home may come under pressure to vote for certain candidates, and it increases the risk of fraud.
- While election fraud is difficult to measure, it occurs. The U.S. Department of Justice has launched more than 180 investigations into election fraud since October 2002. These investigations have resulted in charges for multiple voting, providing false information on their felon status, and other offenses against 89 individuals and in convictions of 52 individuals. The convictions related to a variety of election fraud offenses, from vote buying to submitting false voter registration information and voting-related offenses by non-citizens. In addition to the federal investigations, state attorneys general and local prosecutors handle cases of election fraud. Other cases are never pursued because of the difficulty in obtaining sufficient evidence for prosecution or because of the low priority given to election fraud cases.

- Absentee ballots remain the largest source of potential voter fraud
- Non-citizens have registered to vote in several recent elections
- The growth of "third-party" (unofficial) voter registration drives in recent elections has led to a rise in reports of voter registration fraud.
- Many states allow the representatives of candidates or political parties to challenge a person's eligibility to register or vote or to challenge an inaccurate name on a voter roll. This practice of challenges may contribute to ballot integrity, but it can have the effect of intimidating eligible voters, preventing them from casting their ballot, or otherwise disrupting the voting process.

Its pertinent recommendations for reform are as follows:

- Interoperable state voter databases are needed to facilitate updates in the registration of voters who move to another state and to eliminate duplicate registrations, which are a source of potential fraud.
- Voters should be informed of their right to cast a provisional ballot if their name does not appear on the voter roll, or if an election official asserts that the individual is not eligible to vote, but States should take additional and effective steps to inform voters as to the location of their precinct
- The Commission recommends that states use "REAL ID" cards for voting purposes.
- To verify the identity of voters who cast absentee ballots, the voter's signature on the absentee ballot can be matched with a digitized version of the signature that the election administrator maintains. While such signature matches are usually done, they should be done consistently in all cases, so that election officials can verify the identity of every new registrant who casts an absentee ballot.
- Each state needs to audit its voter registration files to determine the extent to which they are accurate (with correct and current information on individuals), complete (including all eligible voters), valid (excluding ineligible voters), and secure (with protections against unauthorized use). This can be done by matching voter files with records in other state agency databases in a regular and timely manner, contacting individuals when the matches are inconclusive, and conducting survey research to estimate the number of voters who believe they are registered but who are not in fact listed in the voter files.
- Each state should oversee political party and nonpartisan voter registration drives to ensure that they operate effectively, that registration forms are delivered promptly to election officials, that all completed registration forms are delivered to the election officials, and that none are "culled" and omitted according to the registrant's partisan affiliation. Measures should also be adopted to track and hold accountable those who are engaged in submitting fraudulent voter registrations. Such oversight might consist of training activists who conduct voter registration drives and tracking voter registration forms to make sure they are all accounted for. In addition, states should apply a criminal penalty to any activist who deliberately fails to deliver a completed voter registration form.

- Investigation and prosecution of election fraud should include those acts committed by individuals, including election officials, poll workers, volunteers, challengers or other nonvoters associated with the administration of elections, and not just fraud by voters.
- In July of even-numbered years, the U.S. Department of Justice should issue a public report on its investigations of election fraud. This report should specify the numbers of allegations made, matters investigated, cases prosecuted, and individuals convicted for various crimes. Each state's attorney general and each local prosecutor should issue a similar report.
- The U.S. Department of Justice's Office of Public Integrity should increase its staff to investigate and prosecute election-related fraud.
- In addition to the penalties set by the Voting Rights Act, it should be a federal felony for any individual, group of individuals, or organization to engage in any act of violence, property destruction (of more than $500 value), or threatened act of violence that is intended to deny any individual his or her lawful right to vote or to participate in a federal election.
- To deter systemic efforts to deceive or intimidate voters, the Commission recommends federal legislation to prohibit any individual or group from deliberately providing the public with incorrect information about election procedures for the purpose of preventing voters from going to the polls.
- States should define clear procedures for challenges, which should mainly be raised and resolved before the deadline for voter registration. After that, challengers will need to defend their late actions. On Election Day, they should direct their concerns to poll workers, not to voters directly, and should in no way interfere with the smooth operation of the polling station.
- State and local jurisdictions should prohibit a person from handling absentee ballots other than the voter, an acknowledged family member, the U.S. Postal Service or other legitimate shipper, or election officials. The practice in some states of allowing candidates or party workers to pick up and deliver absentee ballots should be eliminated.
- All states should consider passing legislation that attempts to minimize the fraud that has resulted from "payment by the piece" to anyone in exchange for their efforts in voter registration, absentee ballot, or signature collection.
- Nonpartisan structures of election administration are very important, and election administrators should be neutral, professional, and impartial.
- No matter what institutions are responsible for conducting elections, conflict-of-interest standards should be introduced for all federal, state, and local election officials. Election officials should be prohibited by federal and/or state laws from serving on any political campaign committee, making any public comments in support of a candidate, taking a public position on any ballot measure, soliciting campaign funds, or otherwise campaigning for or against a candidate for public office. A decision by a secretary of state to serve as co-chair of his or her party's presidential election committee would clearly violate these standards.

Republican Ballot Security Programs: Vote Protection or Minority Vote Suppression – Or Both?

By Chandler Davidson

As the author describes it, this Report focuses on vote suppression through “ballot security programs:”

These are programs that, in the name of protecting against vote fraud, almost exclusively target heavily black, Latino, or Indian voting precincts and have the intent or effect of discouraging or preventing voters in those precincts from casting a ballot. In some cases, these programs have been found by courts to be illegal. Still, they continue to exist in spite of strong criticism by leaders of minority communities, their allies, and voting rights lawyers.

There are several noteworthy characteristics of these programs. They focus on minority precincts almost exclusively. There is often only the flimsiest evidence that vote fraud is likely to be perpetrated in such precincts. In addition to encouraging the presence of sometimes intimidating Republican poll watchers or challengers who may slow down voting lines and embarrass potential voters by asking them humiliating questions, these programs have sometimes posted people in official-looking uniforms with badges and side arms who question voters about their citizenship or their registration. In addition, warning signs may be posted near the polls, or radio ads may be targeted to minority listeners containing dire threats of prison terms for people who are not properly registered—messages that seem designed to put minority voters on the defensive. Sometimes false information about voting qualifications is sent to minority voters through the mail.”

He further states that a most common theme of the programs over the last 50 years is that of sending white challengers to minority precincts. He says that the tactic of doing mailings, collecting returned materials, and using that as a basis for creating challenger lists and challenging voters at the polls, started in the 1950s and continues to today. The problem with this practice is that reasons for a mailing to be returned include a wrong address, out of date or inaccurate addresses, poor mail delivery in minority areas, and matching mistakes. Davidson also sets out to demonstrate through documentary evidence that the practices have been and are approved of or winked at by high ups in the party.

Davidson goes on to provide numerous examples from the last 50 years to demonstrate his thesis, going through the historical development of Republican ballot security programs from the 1950s through to the present. The author cites and quotes internal Republican letters and memoranda, primary sources and original documents, media reports, scholarly works, as well as the words of judges' rulings in some of the cases that ended up in litigation to prove his argument.

In addition to describing how the schemes really were brought to the fore in the 1964 election, he describes more recent incidents such as 1981 in New Jersey, 1982 Dallas, Louisiana 1986, Houston 1986, Hidalgo 1988 Orange County 1988, North Carolina 1990, South Carolina 1980-1990, and South Dakota 2002. (Summaries of these examples are available)

Davidson concludes with an outline of some of the features of vote suppression efforts put forth by Republicans under the guise of ballot security programs, as described in the Report, from the 1950s to the present day:

1. An organized, often widely publicized effort to field poll watchers in what Republicans call "heavily Democratic," but what are usually minority, precincts;
2. Stated concerns about vote fraud in these precincts, which are occasionally justified but often are not;
3. Misinformation and fear campaigns directed at these same precincts, spread by radio, posted signs in the neighborhoods, newspapers, fliers, and phone calls, which are often anonymously perpetrated;
4. Posting "official-looking" personnel at polling places, including but not limited to off-duty police—sometimes in uniform, sometimes armed;
5. Aggressive face-to-face challenging techniques at the polls that can confuse, humiliate, and intimidate—as well as slow the voting process—in these same minority precincts;
6. Challenging voters using inaccurate, unofficial lists of registrants derived from "do-not-forward" letters sent to low-income and minority neighborhoods;
7. Photographing, tape recording, or videotaping voters; and
8. Employing language and metaphors that trade on stereotypes of minority voters as venal and credulous.

The report ends with some observations on the state of research on the incidence of fraud, which the author finds lacking. He suggests that vote suppression of qualified minority voters by officials and partisan poll-watchers, challengers, and uniformed guards should also be considered as included in any definition of election fraud. Davidson also offers a few recommendations for reform, noting that Democrats should not protest all programs aimed at ballot integrity, but rather work with Republicans to find solutions to problems that confront both parties and the system as a whole.

A 'Crazy-Quilt' of Tiny Pieces: State and Local Administration of American Criminal Disenfranchisement Law

By Alec Ewald

"A Crazy-Quilt of Tiny Pieces" presents results from the first nationwide study to document the implementation of American felony disenfranchisement law. Data came from two main sources: a 33-state survey of state elections officials and telephone interviews with almost one hundred city, county, town, and parish officials drawn from 10 selected states. In the spring of 2004, a two-page survey consisting of questions regarding disqualification and restoration procedures was sent to the offices of the statewide elections director in each of the fifty states. Responses were collected through the summer and early fall of 2004. Thirty-three states responded. No state currently administers and enforces its criminal disqualification and restoration laws in an efficient, universally-understood and equitable way. Some do not appear to notify local elections officials of convictions, or do not do so in a clear and timely way; others risk "false positives" in disqualification, particularly with suspended sentences or offenses not subject to disenfranchisement; many ask local officials to handle disqualification and restoration with little or no guidance or supervision from the state; none have clear policies regarding new arrivals from other states with old convictions.

The report reaches seven major conclusions:

1. Broad variation and misunderstanding in interpretation and enforcement of voting laws:
  - More than one-third (37%) of local officials interviewed in ten states either described their state's fundamental eligibility law incorrectly, or stated that they did not know a central aspect of that law.
  - Local registrars differ in their knowledge of basic eligibility law, often within the same state. Differences also emerge in how they are notified of criminal convictions, what process they use to suspend, cancel, or "purge" voters from the rolls, whether particular documents are required to restore a voter to eligibility, and whether they have information about the criminal background of new arrivals to the state.
2. Misdemeanants disenfranchised in at least five states:
  - The commonly-used term "felon disenfranchisement" is not entirely accurate, since at least five states – Colorado, Illinois, Michigan, South Carolina, and Maryland -- also formally bar some or all people convicted of misdemeanors from voting.
  - It is likely that misdemeanants in other states who do retain the formal right to vote could have difficulty exercising that right, given ignorance of their eligibility and the lack of clear rules and procedures for absentee voting by people in jail who have not been convicted of a felony.
  - Maryland excludes persons convicted of many misdemeanors, such as "Unlawful operation of vending machines," "Misrepresentation of tobacco leaf weight," and "Racing horse under false name."
3. Significant ambiguities in voting laws:
  - Disenfranchisement in Tennessee is dependent on which of five different time periods a felony conviction occurred between 1973 and the present.
  - In Oregon, disenfranchisement is determined not by conviction or imprisonment for a felony, but for being placed under Department of Corrections supervision. Since 1997, some persons convicted of a felony and sentenced to less than 12 months' custody have been sent to county jails and hence, are eligible to vote.

4. Disenfranchisement results in contradictory policies within states:

- The "crazy-quilt" pattern of disenfranchisement laws exists even within states. Alabama and Mississippi have both the most and least restrictive laws in the country, a result which is brought about by the fact that certain felonies result in the loss of voting rights for life, while others at least theoretically permit people in prison to vote.
- Most felonies in Alabama result in permanent disenfranchisement, but drug and DUI offenses have been determined to not involve the "moral turpitude" that triggers the loss of voting rights.
- In Mississippi, ten felonies result in disenfranchisement, but do not include such common offenses as burglary and drug crimes.

5. Confusing policies lead to the exclusion of legal voters and the inclusion of illegal voters:

- The complexity of state disenfranchisement policies results in frequent misidentification of voter eligibility, largely because officials differ in their knowledge and application of disqualification and restoration law and procedures.

6. Significant variation and uncertainty in how states respond to persons with a felony conviction from other states:

- No state has a systematic mechanism in place to address the immigration of persons with a felony conviction, and there is no consensus among indefinite-disenfranchisement states on whether the disqualification is properly confined to the state of conviction, or should be considered in the new state of residence.
- Interpretation and enforcement of this part of disenfranchisement law varies not only across state lines, but also from one county to another within states. Local officials have no way of knowing about convictions in other states, and many are unsure what they would do if a would-be voter acknowledged an old conviction. Because there is no prospect of a national voter roll, this situation will continue even after full HAVA implementation.

7. Disenfranchisement is a time-consuming, expensive practice:

- Enforcement requires elections officials to gather records from different agencies and bureaucracies, including state and federal courts, Departments of Corrections, Probation and Parole, the state Board of Elections, the state police, and other counties' elections offices.

Policy Implications

1. Policies disenfranchising people living in the community on probation or parole, or who have completed a sentence are particularly difficult to enforce:

- States which disenfranchise only persons who are currently incarcerated appear able to enforce their laws more consistently than those barring non-incarcerated citizens from voting.

2. Given large-scale misunderstanding of disenfranchisement law, many eligible persons incorrectly believe they cannot vote, or have been misinformed by election officials:

- More than one-third of election officials interviewed incorrectly described their state's law on voting eligibility.
- More than 85% of the officials who misidentified their state's law either did not know the eligibility standard or specified that the law was more restrictive than was actually the case.

3. Occasional violation of disenfranchisement law by non-incarcerated voters not surprising:

- Given the complexity of state laws and the number of state officials who lack an understanding of restoration and disqualification procedures, it should come as no surprise that many voters are ignorant of their voting status, a fact that is likely to have resulted in hundreds of persons with a felony conviction registering and voting illegally in recent years.

4. Taken together, these findings undermine the most prominent rationale for disenfranchisement: that the policy reflects a strong, clear consensus that persons with a felony conviction are unfit to vote and constitute a threat to the polity:

- First, when significant numbers of the people who administer elections do not know important aspects of disenfranchisement law, it is hard to conclude that the restriction is necessary to protect social order and the “purity” of the ballot box.

- Second, because they are all but invisible in the sentencing process, “collateral” sanctions like disenfranchisement simply cannot accomplish the denunciatory, expressive purposes their supporters claim. We now know that disenfranchisement is not entirely “visible” even to the people running American elections.

- Third, deep uncertainty regarding the voting rights of people with felony convictions who move from one state to another indicates that we do not even know what purpose disenfranchisement is supposed to serve – whether it is meant to be a punishment, or simply a non-penal regulation of the franchise.

Recommendations

1. Clarify Policies Regarding Out-of-State Convictions:

- State officials should clarify their policies and incorporate into training programs the means by which a felony conviction in another state affects an applicant’s voting eligibility. For example, sentence-only disenfranchisement states should clarify that newcomers with old felony convictions from indefinite disenfranchisement states are eligible to vote. And those states which bar some people from voting even after their sentences are completed must clarify whether new arrivals with old felony convictions from sentence-only disenfranchisement states are automatically eligible, and must explain what procedures, if any, should be followed for restoration.

2. Train Election Officials:

- Clarify disenfranchisement policies and procedures for all state and local election officials through development of materials and training programs in each state. At a minimum, this should include distribution of posters, brochures and FAQ sheets to local and state elections offices.

3. Train Criminal Justice Officials:

- Provide training on disqualification and restoration policies for all correctional and criminal justice officials, particularly probation and parole staff. Correctional and criminal justice officials should also be actively engaged in describing these policies to persons under criminal justice supervision.

4. Review Voting Restrictions on Non-Incarcerated People:

- Given the serious practical difficulty of enforcing laws disqualifying people who are not incarcerated from voting – problems which clearly include both excluding eligible people from voting and allowing those who should be ineligible to vote -- state policymakers should review such policies to determine if they serve a useful public purpose.

Deliver the Vote: A History of Election Fraud, An American Political Tradition---1742-2004

by Tracy Campbell.

In Deliver the Vote, Campbell traces the historical persistence of voter fraud from colonial times through the 2004 Bush-Kerry election. From the textual information, it quickly becomes obvious that voter fraud was not limited to certain types of people or to certain political parties. Major American political figures fail to emerge unscathed. For instance, before independence, George Washington plied potential voters with drink as payment for their vote. This type of early vote buying succeeded in electing Washington to the Virginia Assembly over a heavily favored candidate. Both the Democrat and Republican Parties also participated in vote fraud. Finally, there were several regions of the country know for fraudulent voting problems such as Chicago, St. Louis, Texas, and Kentucky, especially Louisville.

Germane to the voter fraud project, Campbell indicates that in the Bush-Gore election, both camps committed major errors. Campbell contends that the central problem in that election was the 175,000 invalidated votes. It is evident that Florida was procedurally unprepared to deal with the voluminous questions that arose in determining valid from invalid votes. Campbell glosses over the Bush-Kerry election but does note from one who opposed Kerry, that there was something amiss with the Ohio final vote tally. This book is well researched and provided numerous citations to source material.

Democracy At Risk: The November 2004 Election in Ohio
Democratic National Committee

In December 2004, the DNC announced a comprehensive investigative study and analysis of election administration issues arising from the conduct of the 2004 general election in Ohio. The DNC decided to undertake this study because of the many reports, made to the Democratic Party, appearing in the press and made to advocacy groups, immediately after the election, of problems in the administration of the election in that state—problems that prevented many Ohio citizens who showed up at the polls to be able to vote and to have their vote counted. This study was intended to address the legitimate questions and concerns that have been raised and to develop factual information that would be important and useful in crafting further necessary election reforms.

Most Pertinent Findings

- Overall, 28 percent of Ohio voters reported problems with their voting experience, including ballot problems, locating their proper polling place and/or intimidation.
- Twice as many African American voters as white voters reported experiencing problems at the polls (52 percent vs. 25 percent).
- Scarcity of voting machines caused long lines that deterred many people from voting. Three percent of voters who went to the polls left their polling places and did not return due to the long lines.
- Statewide, African American voters reported waiting an average of 52 minutes before voting while white voters reported waiting an average of 18 minutes.
- Overall, 20 percent of white Ohio voters reported waiting more than twenty minutes, while 44 percent of African American voters reported doing so.
- Of provisional voters in Cuyahoga County, 35 percent were African American, compared to 25 percent of non-provisional voters, matched by geography. African American voters were 1.2 times more likely than white voters to be required to vote provisionally.
- Under Ohio law, the only voters who should have been asked for identification were those voting in their first Federal election who had registered by mail but did not provide identification in their registration application. Although only 7 percent of all Ohio voters were newly registered (and only a small percentage of those voters registered by mail and failed to provide identification in their registration application), more than one third (37 percent) reported being asked to provide identification.—meaning large numbers of voters were illegally required to produce identification.
- African American voters statewide were 47 percent more likely to be required to show identification than white voters. Indeed, 61 percent of African American men reported being asked to provide identification at the polls.

- 6 percent of all voters reported feelings of intimidation.
- Statewide, 16 percent of African Americans reported experiencing intimidation versus only 5 percent of white voters.

The report also includes a useful summary and description of the reports that came through Ohio Election Protection on Election Day, which included a wide variety of problems, including voter intimidation and discrimination.

Most Pertinent Recommendations

- States should be encouraged to codify into law all required election practices, including requirements for the adequate training of official poll workers.
- States should adopt uniform and clear published standards for the distribution of voting equipment and the assignment of official pollworkers among precincts, to ensure adequate and nondiscriminatory access. These standards should be based on set ratios of numbers of machines and pollworkers per number of voters expected to turn out, and should be made available for public comment before being adopting.
- States should adopt legislation to make clear and uniform the rules on voter registration.
- States should be urged to implement statewide voter lists in accordance with the Help America Vote Act (“HAVA”), the election reform law enacted by Congress in 2002 following the Florida debacle.
- State and local jurisdictions should adopt clear and uniform rules on the use of, and the counting of, provisional ballots, and distribute them for public comment well in advance of each election day.
- States should not adopt requirements that voters show identification at the polls, beyond those already required by federal law (requiring that identification be shown only by first time voters who did not show identification when registering.)
- State Attorneys General and local authorities should vigorously enforce, to the full extent permitted by state law, a voter’s right to vote without showing identification.
- States should make voter suppression a criminal offense at the state level, in all states.
- States should improve the training of pollworkers.
- States should expend significantly more resources in educating voters on where, when and how to vote.
- Partisan officials who volunteer to work for a candidate should not oversee or administer any elections.

DOJ Public Integrity Reports 2002, 2003, and 2004

General Background

The Public Integrity Reports are submitted to Congress pursuant to the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, which requires the Attorney General to report annually to Congress on the operations and activities of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section. The Report describes the activities of the Public Integrity Section. It also provides statistics on the nationwide federal effort against public corruption. The Public Integrity Section was created in 1976 in order to consolidate in one unit of the Criminal Division the Department's oversight responsibilities for the prosecution of criminal abuses of the public trust by government officials. Section attorneys prosecute selected cases involving federal, state, or local officials, and also provide advice and assistance to prosecutors and agents in the field regarding the handling of public corruption cases. In addition, the Section serves as the Justice Department's center for handling various issues that arise regarding public corruption statutes and cases. An Election Crimes Branch was created within the Section in 1980 to supervise the Department's nationwide response to election crimes, such as ballot fraud and campaign financing offenses. The Branch reviews all major election crime investigations throughout the country and all proposed criminal charges relating to election crime.

One of the Section's law enforcement priorities is its supervision of the Justice Department's nationwide response to election crimes. The purpose of Headquarters' oversight of election crime matters is to ensure that the Department's nationwide response to election crime is uniform, impartial, and effective. An Election Crimes Branch, headed by a Director and staffed by Section attorneys on a case-by-case basis, was created within the Section in 1980 to handle this supervisory responsibility.

The Election Crimes Branch oversees the Department's handling of all election crime allegations other than those involving civil rights violations, which are supervised by the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division. Specifically, the Branch supervises four types of corruption cases: crimes that involve the voting process, crimes involving the financing of federal election campaigns, crimes relating to political shakedowns and other patronage abuses, and illegal lobbying with appropriated funds. Vote frauds and campaign-financing offenses are the most significant and also the most common types of election crimes.

Divisions of the Election Crimes Branch

As affecting the present EAC study, the appropriate divisions of the Election Crimes Branch are:

Vote frauds-During 2002 the Branch assisted United States Attorneys' Offices in Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Nevada, North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, West Virginia, and

Wisconsin in handling vote fraud matters that occurred in their respective districts. This assistance included providing expertise in the evaluation of allegations to determine whether investigation would produce prosecutable federal criminal cases, helping to structure investigations, providing legal assistance with respect to the formulation of charges, and assisting in establishing task force teams of federal and state law enforcement officials to investigate vote fraud matters.

During 2003 the Branch assisted United States Attorneys' Offices in Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, New Jersey, Nevada, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Virgin Islands, West Virginia, and Wisconsin in handling vote fraud matters that occurred in their respective districts. This assistance included providing expertise in the evaluation of allegations to determine whether investigation would produce prosecutable federal criminal cases, helping to structure investigations, providing legal assistance with respect to the formulation of charges, and assisting in establishing task force teams of federal and state law enforcement officials to investigate vote fraud matters.

During 2004 the Branch assisted United States Attorneys' Offices in the following states in the handling of vote fraud matters that occurred in their respective districts: Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Nevada, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Puerto Rico, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Virginia, West Virginia, Washington, and Wisconsin. This assistance included evaluating vote fraud allegations to determine whether investigation would produce a prosecutable federal criminal case, helping to structure investigations, providing legal advice concerning the formulation of charges, and assisting in establishing several task force teams of federal and state law enforcement officials to investigate vote fraud matters.

Litigation-The Branch Director or Section attorneys also prosecute selected election crimes, either by assuming total operational responsibility for the case or by handling the case jointly with a United States Attorney's Office. The Section also may be asked to supervise the handling of a case in the event of a partial recusal of the local office. For example, in 2002 the Branch continued to supervise the prosecution of a sheriff and his election attorney for using data from the National Crime Information Center regarding voters' criminal histories to wage an election contest.

District Election Officer Program-The Branch also assists in implementing the Department's long-standing District Election Officer (DEO) Program. This Program is designed to ensure that each of the 93 United States Attorneys' Offices has a trained prosecutor available to oversee the handling of election crime matters within the district and to coordinate district responses with Headquarters regarding these matters. The DEO Program involves the appointment of an Assistant United States Attorney in each federal district to serve a two-year term as a District Election Officer; the training of these prosecutors in the investigation and prosecution of election crimes; and the coordination of election-related initiatives and other law enforcement activities between Headquarters and the field. In addition, the DEO Program is a crucial feature of the Department's nationwide Election Day Program, which occurs in connection with the federal general elections held in November of even-numbered years. The Election Day Program ensures that federal prosecutors and investigators are available both at the Department's Headquarters in Washington and in each district to receive and handle complaints of election irregularities from the public while the polls are open and that the public is aware of how these individuals can be contacted on election day. In 2002 the Department enhanced the DEO Program by establishing a Ballot Integrity Initiative.

Ballot Integrity Initiative-Beginning in September of 2002, the Public Integrity Section, acting at the request of the Attorney General, assisted in the implementation of a Ballot Integrity Initiative for the 2002 general election and subsequent elections. This initiative included increasing the law enforcement priority the Department gives to election crimes; holding a special day-long training event in Washington, DC for representatives of the 93 United States Attorneys' Offices; publicizing the identities and telephone numbers of the DEOs through press releases issued shortly before the November elections; and requiring the 93 U.S. Attorneys to communicate the enhanced federal prioritization of election crime matters to state and local election and law enforcement authorities. As part of Ballot Integrity Initiative, on October 8, 2002, the Public Integrity Section and the Voting Rights Section of the Department's Civil Rights Division co-sponsored a Voting Integrity Symposium for District Election Officers representing each of the 93 federal judicial districts. Topics discussed included the types of conduct that are prosecutable as federal election crimes and the federal statutes used to prosecute such cases. Attorney General John Ashcroft delivered the keynote address on the importance of election crime and ballot integrity enforcement. Assistant Attorney General of the Civil Rights Division Ralph Boyd and Assistant Attorney General of the Criminal Division Michael Chertoff also spoke to attendees on the protection of voting rights and the prosecution of election cases.

As part of Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative, on September 23 and 24, 2003, the Public Integrity Section and the Voting Rights Section of the Department's Civil Rights Division co-sponsored a two-day Symposium for DEOs representing each of the 93 federal judicial districts. Topics discussed included the types of conduct that are prosecutable as federal election crimes and the federal statutes used to prosecute such cases. Assistant Attorney General of the Civil Rights Division Alexander Acosta and Assistant Attorney General of the Criminal Division Christopher A. Wray delivered the keynote addresses on the importance of protecting voting rights and the prosecution of election cases.

On July 20 and 21, 2004, the Public Integrity Section and the Voting Section of the Department's Civil Rights Division co-sponsored a two-day symposium for DEOs representing each of the 93 federal judicial districts. Topics discussed included the types of conduct that are prosecutable as federal election crimes and the federal statutes available to prosecute such cases, and the handling of civil rights matters involving voting. Attorney General John Ashcroft delivered the keynote address on the importance of protecting voting rights and the prosecution of election fraud. In addition, Assistant Attorney General Christopher A. Wray of the Criminal Division and Assistant Attorney General R. Alexander Acosta of the Civil Rights Division addressed conference attendees on voting rights and election fraud enforcement issues respectively.

Federal Election Crimes

During 2002 the Public Integrity Section continued its nationwide oversight role regarding the handling of election crime allegations. As part of a general Department effort to increase its effectiveness in this important area, the Section assisted in the planning and execution of the Department's 2002 Ballot Integrity Initiative. The purpose of this ongoing Initiative is to increase the Department's ability to deter, detect, and prosecute election crimes and voting abuses by prioritizing election crime cases. As a result of the Initiative, during 2002 the number of election crime matters opened by federal prosecutors throughout the country increased significantly, as did the Section's active involvement in election crime matters stemming from the Initiative. At the end of 2002, the Section was supervising and providing advice on approximately 43 election crime matters nationwide. In addition, as of December 31, 2002, 11 matters involving possible election crimes were pending in the Section.

During 2002 the Section closed two election crime matters and continued its operational supervision of the following election crime case: United States v. Woodward and Jordan, Northern District of Alabama. Jimmy Woodward, the former Sheriff of Jefferson County, Alabama, and Albert Jordan, an attorney from Birmingham, were indicted in 2000 for conspiring to obtain criminal history records from the National Crime Information Center (NCIC) for use in an election contest, for converting NCIC records, and for accessing government computers without authority. The indictment charged that Woodward and Jordan conspired to use Sheriff's office personnel to access NCIC computers to run criminal history checks on hundreds of voters in Jefferson County who had voted by absentee ballot in the 1998 general election, in the hopes they would find criminal histories they could use to challenge the qualifications of voters who cast votes for Woodward's opponent. The charges were dismissed in 2000 on procedural grounds. The Department appealed the dismissal of the charges. In 2001 the case was argued before the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals by the Appellate Section of the Criminal Division. The Court of Appeals subsequently reversed the trial court's dismissal of the charges and remanded the case for retrial. The former United States Attorney for the Northern District of Alabama was recused from the case. The case is being prosecuted by an Assistant United States Attorney under the supervision of the Public Integrity Section.

The following cases are the result of an extensive federal investigation into vote-buying in the May 1998 primary election in Knott County, Kentucky, an Appalachian county in the Eastern District of Kentucky. The primary was contested by two slates of candidates. The ballot included the race for the position of Knott County Judge Executive, which controls local government hiring, contracting, and services. The ballot also included a primary contest for the office of United States Senator, conferring federal jurisdiction over vote buying in the election even though the electoral corruption was directed at local races.

The following cases are being handled jointly by the Section and the United States Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of Kentucky:

United States v. Calhoun. On March 28, 2003, a federal grand jury indicted Jimmy Calhoun on two counts of vote-buying. On August 19, 2003, Calhoun pled guilty to two counts of vote-buying on behalf of a slate of candidates headed by Donnie Newsome, the successful candidate for County Judge Executive in the May 1998 Knott County, Kentucky primary election. Calhoun paid two persons to vote by absentee ballot. On April 7, 2004, Calhoun was sentenced to six months in prison and two years of supervised release. Calhoun pled guilty to two counts of vote-buying on behalf of a slate of candidates headed by Donnie Newsome, the successful candidate for County Judge Executive in the May 1998 Knott County, Kentucky primary election. Calhoun paid two persons to vote by absentee ballot.

United States v. Conley. On March 28, 2003, a federal grand jury indicted Jimmy Lee Conley on five counts of vote-buying and one count of making a false statement in a matter within federal jurisdiction. Conley was charged with paying five persons to vote by absentee ballot for a slate of candidates headed by Donnie Newsome, the successful candidate for County Judge Executive. During the investigation, Conley allegedly made false statements to an agent of the FBI. A jury acquitted Conley on June 19, 2003.

United States v. Johnson. On April 24, 2003, a federal grand jury indicted Newton Johnson on four counts of vote-buying, one count of making a false statement in a matter within federal jurisdiction, and two counts of obstructing justice. On June 2, 2003, Johnson pled guilty pursuant to a plea agreement to one count of vote-buying, and one count of obstructing justice. Johnson paid four persons to vote by absentee ballot in the May 1998 Knott County, Kentucky primary election. Johnson paid the voters to vote for a slate of candidates headed by Donnie Newsome, the successful candidate for County Judge Executive. During the investigation of this vote-buying, Johnson made a false statement to an agent of the FBI, and pressured grand jury witnesses to falsely deny that he bought their votes. Pursuant to his plea agreement, Johnson pled guilty to paying one of the voters for her vote, and to endeavoring to obstruct the grand jury investigation by urging her to lie under oath. Johnson agreed to cooperate with the government. On October 6, 2003, Johnson was sentenced to three years of probation. Johnson had previously testified at the trial of Donnie Newsome to the nature and extent of the broader conspiracy to approach and pay numerous impoverished, handicapped, illiterate, or otherwise impaired persons to vote for the slate of candidates headed by Newsome. Newsome offered Johnson a road improvement and a county job in exchange for participation in the conspiracy. Johnson, who is impoverished, illiterate, and unable to leave his remote mountain hollow without the road improvement, agreed and purchased the votes of four persons. A jury convicted Newsome on all counts.

United States v. Madden. On March 28, 2003, a federal grand jury indicted Patrick Wayne Madden on three counts of vote-buying and one count of making a false statement in a matter within federal jurisdiction. On October 6, 2003, Madden pled guilty to one count of vote-buying. Madden paid three persons to vote by absentee ballot for a slate of candidates headed by Donnie Newsome, the successful candidate for County Judge Executive in the May 1998 Knott County, Kentucky primary election. During the investigation of this vote-buying, Madden made a false statement to an agent of the FBI. On February 2, 2004, Madden was sentenced to 20 months in prison and two years of supervised release. Madden pled guilty to one count of vote-buying. Madden paid three persons to vote by absentee ballot for a slate of candidates headed by Newsome.

United States v. Newsome, Pigman, and Smith. On April 24, 2003, a federal grand jury indicted sitting County Judge Executive Donnie Newsome and two of his supporters, Willard Smith and Keith Pigman, on one count of conspiracy to commit vote-buying. The grand jury further charged five substantive counts of vote-buying, one count charging Newsome, two counts charging Smith, one count charging Smith and Pigman, and one count charging all three defendants. Newsome, Pigman, and Smith, working together and with other conspirators, approached and paid numerous impoverished, handicapped, illiterate, or otherwise impaired persons to vote for Newsome by absentee ballot, resulting in a large increase in the rate of absentee voting, and long lines at the County Clerk's Office. Newsome won the election to remain the County Judge Executive.

On July 8, 2003, Pigman pled guilty pursuant to a plea agreement to conspiracy to commit vote-buying, and one count of vote-buying. Pigman cooperated with the government following his plea, and provided substantial assistance by testifying against Newsome and Smith. Pigman explained the nature and extent of the broader conspiracy to approach and pay numerous impoverished, handicapped, illiterate, or otherwise impaired persons to vote for the slate of candidates headed by Newsome. Pigman further explained that such voters were purposefully chosen because they would present severe credibility problems for the government in any investigation and prosecution of their conspiracy. Newsome offered and ultimately gave Pigman a county job in exchange for Pigman's participation in the conspiracy. On October 30, 2003, Pigman was sentenced to four months of imprisonment, four months of community confinement, and two years of supervised release. On October 1, 2003, a jury convicted both Newsome and Smith on all counts. Newsome, while in office as a Kentucky State Representative, became a candidate for County Judge Executive. Newsome, Pigman, and Smith, working together and with other conspirators, approached and paid numerous persons to vote for Newsome and certain other candidates by absentee ballot, resulting in a large increase in the rate of absentee voting, and long lines at the County Clerk's Office. Newsome, who won the primary election and subsequent elections, was ordered detained pending sentencing, together with Smith, in light of threats to government witnesses during the trial.

On March 16, 2004, Newsome, the former County Judge Executive for Knott County, Kentucky, was sentenced to 26 months of in prison, a $20,000 fine, and three years of supervised release. Smith was sentenced to 24 months in prison, a $5,000 fine, and three years of supervised release. A jury previously convicted Newsome and Smith on all counts of an indictment that charged them with conspiracy to buy votes and five counts of vote-buying. Pigman, previously pled guilty to the conspiracy charge, and was sentenced to four months in prison, four months of community service, and two years of supervised release.

United States v. Ronnie Slone and Brady Slone. On March 28, 2003, a federal grand jury indicted Ronnie Neal Slone and Brady Warren Slone (who are brothers) on three counts of vote-buying, and on one count each of making a false statement in a matter within federal jurisdiction. The Slones allegedly paid three persons to vote by absentee ballot for a slate of candidates headed by Donnie Newsome. During the investigation of this vote-buying, each of the Slones allegedly made a false statement to an agent of the FBI. On August 15, 2003, a jury acquitted both defendants.

United States v. Phillip Slone. On March 28, 2003, a federal grand jury indicted Phillip Slone (who is not directly related to Ronnie and Brady Slone) on seven counts of vote-buying and one count of making a false statement in a matter within federal jurisdiction. On June 4, 2003, Slone pled guilty pursuant to a plea agreement to one count of vote-buying. Slone paid seven persons to vote for a slate of candidates headed by Homer Sawyer, the unsuccessful incumbent candidate for County Judge Executive in the May 1998 Knott County, Kentucky primary election. During the investigation of this vote-buying, Slone made a false statement to an agent of the FBI. On October 15, 2003, Slone was sentenced to ten months in prison and two years supervised release. Slone appealed his sentence and the district court's jurisdiction, and that appeal is pending.

Prosecution Of Electoral Fraud Under United States Federal Law

By Craig Donsanto

In Prosecution of Electoral Fraud, Donsanto discusses what sort of conduct is currently considered to be actionable as vote fraud, the historical background for the role of the criminal prosecutor in this area, and the various federal laws and juridical precedents governing the prosecution of vote fraud. It is a very useful document for understanding the current Department of Justice's view of its mission in this area, its interpretation of the federal laws governing its work, and how the Department has and has not been able to utilize applicable provisions.

Donsanto stresses that because electoral administration is primarily a state rather than a federal matter, the federal government usually only has authority over electoral issues where: federal candidates are standing for election; a corrupt act occurs; a federal instrumentality is employed in the fraud; the fraud involves the participation of public officials "acting under color of law" in such a manner that the constitutional right to Due Process and/or Equal Protection is violated; and/or the fraud is motivated by an intent to deprive a class of voters who's rights have been specifically guaranteed by the United States Constitution.

Donsanto defines election fraud as "a substantive irregularity relating to the voting act--- such as bribery, intimidation, or forgery---which has the potential to taint the election itself." Specifically, this includes:

- * Preventing voters from participating in elections where a federal candidate is on the ballot, or when done "under color of law" in any election—18 U.S.C. sections 241 & 242.
- * Vote buying, 42 U.S.C. section 1973i(c).
- * Voting more than once, 42 U.S.C. section 1973i(e).
- * Fraudulent voting, 42 U.S.C. sections 1973i(c), 1973i(e) & 1973gg-10.
- * Intimidating voters through physical duress in any election, 18 U.S.C. section 245(b)(1)(A), or through physical or economic threats in connection with their registering to vote or their voting in federal elections, 42 U.S.C. section 1973gg-10, or to vote for a federal candidate, 18 U.S.C. section 594.
- * Malfeasance by election officials acting "under color of law" for actions such as ballot-box stuffing, falsely tabulating votes, or preventing valid voter registrations or votes from being given effect in any election, 18 U.S.C. sections 241 & 242, as well as in elections where federal candidates are on the ballot, 42 U.S.C. sections 1973i(c), 1973i(e) & 1973gg-10.

* Knowingly procuring eligibility to vote for federal office by persons who are not entitled to vote under applicable state law, 42 U.S.C. sections 1973i(c) & 1973gg-10 (criminal voting—prohibited in approximately 40 states) and 42 U.S.C. sections 1973i(c), 1972gg-10, 18 U.S.C. 1015(f) & 611 (non-citizen voting).

* Knowingly making a false claim of United States citizenship to register to vote in any election, 18 U.S.C. section 1015(f), or falsely claiming United States citizenship for registering or voting in any election, 18 U.S.C. section 911.

* Providing false information concerning a person's name, address or period of residence in a district in order to establish that person's eligibility to register or to vote in a federal election, 42 U.S.C. sections 1973i(c) & 1973gg-10.

* Causing the production of voter registrations that qualify alleged voters to vote for federal candidates, or the production of ballots in federal elections, that the actor knows are materially defective under applicable state law, 42 U.S.C. section 1973gg-10.

* Using the United States mails, or interstate wire facilities, to obtain the salary and emoluments of an elected official through any of the activities mentioned above, 18 U.S.C. sections 1341 & 1343.

* Ordering, keeping or having under one's authority or control any troops or armed men at any polling place in any election. The actor must be an active civilian or military officer or an employee of the United States government, 18 U.S.C. section 592.

* Intimidating or coercing a federal employee to induce or discourage "any political activity" by that employee, 18 U.S.C. section 610.

Other Points of Interest

- Most election fraud is aimed at corrupting elections for local offices, which control or influence patronage positions. Election fraud occurs most frequently where there are fairly equal political factions, and where the stakes involved in who controls public offices are weighty -- as is often the case where patronage jobs are a major source of employment, or where illicit activities are being protected from law enforcement scrutiny
- Vote buying offenses have represented a sizable segment of the federal election crime docket in modern times.
- Voter intimidation requires proof of a difficult element: the existence of physical or economic intimidation that is intended by the defendant and felt by the victim. The crime of voter "intimidation" normally requires evidence of threats, duress, economic coercion, or some other aggravating factor which tends to improperly induce conduct on the part of the victim. If such evidence is lacking, an alternative prosecutive theory may apply to the facts, such as multiple voting in violation of 42 U.S.C. ' 1973i(e). As with other statutes addressing voter intimidation, in the absence of any jurisprudence to the contrary, it is the Criminal Division's position that section 1973gg-10(1) applies only to intimidation that is accomplished through the use of threats of physical or economic duress. Voter "intimidation" accomplished through less drastic means may present violations of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973i(b), which are enforced by the Civil Rights Division through noncriminal remedies.

- Section 1973gg-10(2) is a specific intent offense. This means that the offender must have been aware that citizenship is a requirement for voting and that the registrant did not possess United States citizenship. In most instances, proof of the first element is relatively easy because the citizenship requirement is stated on the voter registration form, and the form requires that the voter check a box indicating that he or she is a citizen. Proof of the second element, however, may be more problematic, since the technicalities of acquiring United States citizenship may not have existed in the culture of the registrant's country of birth, or otherwise been evident to him, and because the registrant may have received bad advice concerning the citizenship requirement. These issues can also usually be overcome by the fact that all voter registration forms now require a registrant to certify that he or she is a citizen. Section 611 is a relatively new statute that creates an additional crime for voting by persons who are not United States Citizens .It applies to voting by non-citizens in an election where a federal candidate is on the ballot, except when: (1) non-citizens are authorized to vote by state or local law on non-federal candidates or issues, and (2) the ballot is formatted in a way that the non-citizen has the opportunity to vote solely for the non-federal candidate or issues on which he is entitled to vote under state law. Unlike section 1015(f), section 611 is directed at the act of voting, rather than the act of lying. But unlike section 1015(f), Section 611 is a strict liability offense in the sense that the prosecution must only prove that the defendant was not a citizen when he registered or voted. Section 611 does not require proof that the offender be aware that citizenship is a prerequisite to voting.

Election Protection 2004

By the Election Protection Coalition

Election Protection – the Program

Election Protection 2004 was the nation's most far-reaching effort to protect voter rights before and on Election Day. The historic nonpartisan program included:

- A toll-free number, 1-866-OUR-VOTE, with free, immediate and multi-lingual assistance to help voters with questions about registration and voting, and assist voters who encounter barriers to the ballot box.
- Distribution of more than five million "Voters' Bills of Rights" with state-specific information
- 25,000 volunteers, including 6,000 lawyers and law students, who watched for problems and assisted voters on the spot at more than 3,500 predominantly African-American and Latino precincts with a history of disenfranchisement in at least 17 states.
- Civil rights lawyers and advocates represented voters in lawsuits, preserved access to the polls, exposed and prevented voter intimidation, worked with election officials to identify and solve problems with new voting machines, technology and ballot forms, and protected voter rights in advance and on Election Day.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression Stories (Abridged)

- An Associated Press story noted Election Protection's exposure of reported voter suppression tactics in Colorado: Officials with the Election Protection Coalition, a voter-rights group, also said some voters in a predominantly black neighborhood north of Denver found papers on their doorsteps giving them the wrong address for their precinct
- Election Protection received a report from Florissant County, Missouri from a voter who lives in predominantly white neighborhood. While waiting in line to vote, a Republican challenger challenged the black voters by requesting more proof of identification, residence, and signature match, while asking nothing from white voters. Also, the same voter reportedly asked a few questions about voting but an election officials refused to provide any meaningful answer, insisting that "it's very simple", but provided white voters with information when requested. There was one other black voter in line who was also singled out for same treatment while white voters were not.
- Election Protection received a report from Boulder County, Colorado that a poll worker made racist comments to Asian American voter and then told her she was not on the list and turned her away. The voter saw others filling out provisional ballots and asked for one but was denied. Another Asian American woman behind her in line was also given trouble by the same poll worker (he questioned her nationality and also turned her away).

- The Election Protection hotline received reports from Pinellas County, Florida that individuals purporting to be from the Kerry campaign are going door-to-door handing out absentee ballots, and asking voters to fill them out, and then taking the ballots from them, saying "Vote here for Kerry. Don't bother going to the polls."
- The Election Protection Coalition received a report from a woman whose sister lives in Milwaukee and is on government assistance. Her sister was reportedly told by her "case manager" that if she voted for Kerry, she would stop receiving her checks.
- An illiterate, older and disabled voter in Miami-Dade asked for assistance reading the ballot and reported that a poll worker yelled at him and refused to assist him and also refused to allow him to bring a friend into the booth in order to read the ballot to him.
- The Election Protection Coalition have gathered reports that flyers are circulating in a black community in Lexington, South Carolina claiming they those who are behind on child support payments will be arrested as the polls.
- Minority voters from Palm Beach County, Florida reported to the hotline that they received middle-of-the-night, live harassing phone calls warning them away from the polls.
- A volunteer for Rock the Vote reported that two illiterate voters in Michigan requested assistance with their ballots but were refused and reportedly mocked by poll workers.
- The hotline received a call from a radio DJ in Hillsborough County, Florida, who stated that he has received many calls (most of which were from African-Americans) claiming that poll workers were turning voters away and not "letting" them vote.
- The hotline received a call from Pima County, Arizona, indicating that Democratic voters received calls throughout Monday evening, providing incorrect information about the precinct location. Voters have had to be transported en masse in order to correct the problem.
- A caller from Alabama claims that he was told at his polling place that he could vote there for everything but the President and that he would have to go elsewhere in order to vote for a presidential candidate.

- Poll monitors in Philadelphia reports groups of lawyers, traveling in threes, who pull voters out of line and challenge them to provide ID, but when challenged themselves, they hop into waiting cars or vans and leave. Similar activity by Republican lawyers in Philadelphia was reported in the 2002 election.
- In Cuyahuga, Ohio, a caller reported that all black voters are being asked to show ID, while white voters are not. Caller report that he is black and had to show ID while his girlfriend is white and did not have to show ID.
- Two months ago, suspicious phone calls to newly registered Democrats —telling them they weren't, in fact, registered to vote — were traced to the Republican headquarters in the Eastern Panhandle. On Monday, Democrats there said the calls have started again, even after the Berkeley County Clerk — a Republican — sent the party a cease-and-desist letter. The Berkeley prosecutor, who also is county Democratic chairman, has called on the U.S. attorney to investigate.
- In Tuscon, Arizona a misleading call informing voters that they should vote on November 3 has been traced back to the state GOP headquarters. The FBI is investigating.
- A man driving around in a big van covered in American flags and a big picture of a policeman was reportedly parked in front of a polling place; he then got out and moved within the 75 ft limit, until he was asked to leave; he then was found inside the polling place and was again asked to leave. Election Protection volunteers contacted officials and the man was eventually removed.
- The Election Protection hotline has received a report from individuals who claim to have received recorded telephone message coming from Bill Clinton and ACT and reminding them to vote on Nov. 3rd.
- In Massachusetts, the EP Hotline has received a report that a radio station (WILD) is broadcasting that voters will be arrested on the spot if they have outstanding parking tickets.
- In Richland, South Carolina Election Protection has received a report of a poll manager turning away individuals who do not have photo ID issued to the county or a driver's license; an EP lawyer spoke with the Poll Manager at 8:20 am and told her that people with other forms of ID should be allowed to vote by provisional ballot.
- In Greenville, a caller reported that a white poll worker was asking Blacks for multiple form of I.D. Fortunately, the voter who reported the problem did have a second I.D. but reported that some others were turned away. Election Protection attorneys have alerted election officials.

- In Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, an official looking flyer advises Democratic voters to "create a peaceful voting environment" by voting on Wednesday, November 3
- The week before the election, flyers were circulated in Milwaukee under the heading "Milwaukee Black Voters League" with some "warnings for election time." The flyer listed false reasons for which you would be barred from voting (such as a traffic ticket) and then warned that "If you violate any of these laws you can get ten years in prison and your children will get taken away from you."
- There is a Jefferson County flyer which tells voters "See you at the Poles![sic]"... on November 4.

Fooled Again, Mark Crispin Miller

Fooled Again sets out to show that the 2004 election was won by Bush through nefarious means, and indicts the news media for not taking anomalies, irregularities, and alleged malfeasance in the process seriously enough.

Miller identifies a number of statistical anomalies based on polling and turnout results that he alleges puts the validity of the 2004 election in doubt. He accuses Republicans of committing crimes and improprieties throughout the country. These include deliberate disparities in voting machine distribution and long lines in Democratic jurisdictions; misinterpretation of voting laws by elections officials to the detriment of Democratic voters; dirty tricks and deceptive practices to mislead Democratic and minority voters about voting times, places and conditions; machine irregularities in Democratic jurisdictions; relocating polling sites in Democratic and minority areas; suspicious mishandling of absentee ballots; refusing to dispense voter registration forms to certain voter registration groups; intimidation of students; suspicious ballot spoilage rates in certain jurisdictions; "strategic distribution of provisional ballots," and trashing of provisional ballots; harassment of Native American voters; a Republican backed organization engaging in voter registration efforts throughout the country that allegedly destroyed the voter registration forms of Democrats; illegitimate challenges at the polls by Republican poll watchers; improper demands for identification in certain areas; Republican challenges to the voter registration status of thousands of voters before the election, and the creation of lists of voters to challenge at the polls; wrongful purging of eligible voters from voting rolls; partisan harassment; the selective placement of early voting sites; and the failure to send out absentee ballots in time for people to vote.

Miller details what he says was the inappropriate use of the Federal Voter Assistance Program that made voting for the military easy while throwing up obstacles for civilians overseas in their efforts to vote by absentee ballot, leading many of them to be disenfranchised. Miller says that most of the military voters would be Republicans and most of the overseas civilians Kerry voters.

In this book, Miller clearly tries to prove the Republican Party won the 2004 through illegitimate means. This must be kept strongly in mind in making any use of this work. However, the book is well sourced, and individual instances of alleged malfeasance discussed may be worth looking at.

Summary and Relevant Excerpts From Georgia Voter ID Litigation

Complaint For Declaratory And Injunctive Relief

The Secretary of State, as the Chief Election Officer in Georgia, informed the General Assembly before the passage of Act 53 in a letter (attached hereto as Exhibit A), and also informed the Governor in a letter (attached hereto as Exhibit B) before he signed the bill into law, that there had been no documented cases of fraudulent voting by persons who obtained ballots unlawfully by misrepresenting their identities as registered voters to poll workers reported to her office during her nine years as Secretary of State .

Although the Secretary of State had informed the members of the General Assembly and the Governor prior to the enactment of Act 53, that her office had received many complaints of voter fraud involving absentee ballots and no documented complaints of fraud that involve ballots that were cast in person at the polls, the General Assembly ignored this information and arbitrarily chose instead to require only those registered voters who vote in person to present a Photo ID as a condition of voting, but deliberately refused to impose the same requirement on absentee voters

The Stated Purpose Of The Photo ID Requirement Fraud Is A Pretext

According to a press release prepared by the Communications Office of the Georgia House of Representatives, the purpose of Act 53 is:

... to address the issue of voter fraud by placing tighter restrictions on voter identification procedures. Those casting ballots will now be required to bring a photo ID with them before they will be allowed to vote.

Al Marks, Vice Chairman for Public Affairs and Communication of the Hall County GOP told the Gainesville Times:

I don't think we need it for voting, because I don't think there's a voter fraud problem. Gainesville Times, "States Voters Must Present Picture IDs" (September 15, 2005) (www.gainesvilletimes.com).

There is no evidence that the existing provisions of Georgia law have not been effective in deterring and preventing imposters from fraudulently obtaining and casting ballots at the polls by misrepresenting their true identities to election officials and passing themselves off as registered voters whose names appear on the official voter registration list.

The pretextual nature of the purported justification for the burden which the Photo ID requirement imposes on the right to vote is shown by the following facts:

(a) Fraudulent voting was already prohibited by existing Georgia law without unduly burdening the right of a citizen to vote.

(i) Fraudulent voting was already prohibited as a crime under O.C .G.A. §§ 21-2-561, 21-2-562, 21-2-566, 21-2-571, 21-2-572 and 21-2-600, punishable by a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment for up to ten years, or both.

(ii) Voter registration records are updated periodically by the Secretary of State and local election officials to eliminate people who have died, have moved, or are no longer eligible to vote in Georgia for some other reason.

(iii) Existing Georgia law also required election officials in each precinct to maintain a list of names and addresses of registered voters residing in that precinct, and to check off the names of each person from that official list as they cast their ballots.

(iv) Registered voters were also required by existing Georgia law to present at least one of the seventeen forms of documentary identification to election officials who were required, before issuing the voter a ballot, to match the name and address shown on the document to the name and address on the official roll of registered voters residing in the particular precinct. O .C .G.A. § 21-2-417 .

(b) There is no evidence that the existing Georgia law has not been effective in deterring or preventing fraudulent in-person voting by impersonators - the only kind of fraudulent voting that might be prevented by the Photo ID requirement. To the contrary, the Secretary of State, who, as the Superintendent of Elections, is the highest election official in Georgia, informed both the General Assembly (Exhibit A) and the Governor (Exhibit B) in writing that there had been no documented cases of fraudulent in person voting by imposters reported to her during her nine years in office .

(c) If the true intention of the General Assembly had been to prevent fraudulent voting by imposters, the General Assembly would have imposed the same restrictions on the casting of absentee ballots - particularly after the Secretary of State had called to their attention the fact that there had been many documented instances of fraudulent casting of absentee ballots reported to her office.

(d) Fraudulent in-person voting is unlikely, would be easily detected if it had occurred in significant numbers, and would not be likely to have a substantial impact on the outcome of an election:

(i) Many people vote at a local neighborhood polling place where they are likely to be known to and recognized by neighbors or poll workers.

(ii) Voters were required by existing Georgia law (O .C.G.A. § 21-2-417), to provide one of the seventeen means of identification to election officials.

(iii) Election officials are required, before issuing the ballot to the voter, to check off the name of either voter from an up-to-date list of the names and addresses of every registered voter residing in the precinct. If an imposter arrived at a poll and was successful in fraudulently obtaining a ballot before the registered voter arrived at the poll, a registered voter, who having taken the time to go to the polls to vote, would undoubtedly complain to elections officials if he or she were refused a ballot and not allowed to vote because his or her name had already been checked off the list of registered voters as having voted. Likewise, if an imposter arrived at the polls after the registered voter had voted and attempted to pass himself off as someone he was not, the election official would instantly know of the attempted fraud, would not issue the imposter a ballot or allow him to vote, and presumably would have the imposter arrested or at least investigate the attempted fraud and report the attempt to the Secretary of State as Superintendent of Elections.

EXHIBIT B

Letter from Secretary of State Cathy Cox to Governor Sonny Purdue, April 8, 2005

One of the primary justifications given by the Legislature for the passage of the photo identification provisions of House Bill 244 - the elimination of voter ID fraud at the polls is an unfounded justification I cannot recall one documented case of voter fraud during my tenure as Secretary of State or Assistant Secretary of State that specifically related to the impersonation of a registered voter at voting polls. Our state currently has several practices and procedures in existence to ensure that such cases of voter fraud would have been detected if they in fact occurred, and at the very least, we would have complaints of voters who were unable to vote because someone had previously represented himself or herself as such person on that respective Election Day. As a practical matter, there is no possibility that vote fraud of this type would have gone undetected if it had in fact occurred because there is a list of registered voters at each polling place that is checked off as each person votes. If the impersonates voted first and the legitimate voter came to the polling place later in the day and tried to vote, he or she would be told that they had already voted and would not be allowed to vote a second time in the same day . It is reasonable to suspect that a voter who cared enough to show up at the polls to cast a ballot would almost certainly have complained - but there have been no such complaints. If the opposite occurred, and the legitimate person came to the polls first and cast his ballot, the impersonator who showed up later would not be allowed to vote for the same reason and the attempted fraud would have been prevented.

In addition, this slate has adopted severe criminal sanctions for the type of vote impersonation that is purportedly of concern and it is evident t hat such penalties have been a sufficient deterrent. In essence, there is no voter fraud problem currently in existence that House Bill 244 addresses.

In contrast to the lack of voter fraud relating to impersonation of voters at polls during my tenure the State Election Board has reviewed numerous cases of voter fraud relating to the use of absentee ballots.

State Defendants' Initial Brief In Opposition To Plaintiffs' Motion For Preliminary Injunction

There are 159 counties and an even larger number of municipalities in Georgia that conduct elections. Neither the Secretary of State nor her staff can be physically present at the polling places for those elections and therefore could not possibly be aware of all in-person voter fraud that might occur. (Cox Decl. ¶ 6.)

Under the prior law before enactment of HB 244, it is beyond argument that in person voter fraud could have taken place. (Id. ¶ 5.) The Secretary of State's view of the scenario in which voter fraud would occur is when an imposter votes at the polling place and the actual voter shows up later and is unable to cast a ballot. (Id. ¶ 5.) However, the Secretary of State agrees that the scenario she describes is only one instance of potential voter fraud, and both her scenario and others were possible under the law as it existed prior to the enactment of HB 244. (Id.) As stated by the Director of Elections for the Forsyth County Board of Elections, the typical case of in-person voter fraud would be committed by identifying persons who do not typically vote and then having other individuals vote as those persons. (Smith Decl. ¶ 4.)

The Executive Director of the Richmond County Board of Elections has been aware of such complaints, but has been unable to gather evidence to prove the violations because the nature of the conduct makes such evidence hard to develop. (Bailey Decl. ¶ 9.) Indeed, past incidents of fraudulent registrations in Forsyth County and Fulton County were reported to the District Attorneys' offices in those respective counties. (Smith Decl. ¶ 6; MacDougald Decl. ¶ 4.) In Fulton County, the fraudulent registrations were also reported to the United States Attorney for the Northern District of Georgia, and he has opened an investigation of the fraudulent registrations. (MacDougald Decl. ¶ 4.)

Order for a Preliminary Injunction

As part of the order, Judge Murphy describes the testimony of Harry MacDougald, a member of the Fulton County Board of Registration and Election. Mr. MacDougald had stated he had observed voter registration fraud, which he referred to the U.S. Attorney and the District Attorney. In addition, since some precinct cards the Board sent out in 2004 were returned as undeliverable, MacDougald believes they were not eligible voters, yet they were allowed to vote.

Although the Secretary of State said she knew of no incidents of impersonation at the polls, she and her staff are not physically present in every polling site. Secretary Cox stated local officials are in the best position to know of such incidents. The State Election Board has received a number of complaints of irregularities with respect to absentee ballots. Cox is also aware of a case of vote buying of absentee ballots. She is also aware of efforts to submit fraudulent registrations.

According to Secretary of State Cox, Georgia has procedures and practices in place to detect voter fraud. Those procedures include verifying the voter's correct address, as well as the voter's name, during the check-in process for in-person voters. Georgia also imposes criminal penalties for voter impersonation. Most violations of Georgia election laws are punishable as felonies. No evidence indicates that the criminal penalties do not sufficiently deter in-person voter fraud.

The integrity of the voter list also is extremely important in preventing voter fraud. The Atlanta Journal Constitution published an article indicating that Georgia had experienced 5,412 instances of voter fraud during a twenty-year period. Secretary of State Cox's office undertook an investigation in response to that article. The investigation revealed that the specific instance of voter fraud outlined in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, involving a report that Alan J. Mandel had voted after his death, actually did not occur. Instead, an individual with a similar name, Alan J. Mandle, had voted at the polls, and the poll worker had marked Alan J. Mandel's name rather than marking Alan J. Mandle, the name of the individual who actually voted. Secretary of State Cox's office compared the signature on the voter certificate to the voter registration card of the living individual, and concluded that the living individual, Alan J. Mandle, rather than the deceased Alan J. Mandel, had voted.

The Secretary of State's Office subsequently attempted to ensure that voter records were maintained and up to date. The Secretary of State's Office sends information concerning dead voters to local elections officials on a monthly basis, and now has the authority to remove the names of deceased voters from the voter rolls if the local elections officials fail to do so in a timely manner. Secretary of State Cox is not aware of any reports of dead individuals voting since her office received authority to remove the names of deceased individuals from the voter rolls.

There seems to be little doubt that the Photo ID requirement fails the strict scrutiny test: accepting that preventing voter fraud is a legitimate and important State concern, the statute is not narrowly drawn to prevent voter fraud. Indeed, Secretary of State Cox pointed out that, to her knowledge, the State had not experienced one complaint of in-person fraudulent voting during her tenure. In contrast, Secretary of State Cox indicated that the State Election Board had received numerous complaints of voter fraud in the area of absentee voting. Furthermore, the Secretary of State's Office removes deceased voters from the voting rolls monthly, eliminating the potential for voter fraud noted by the Atlanta Journal-Constitution article alleging that more than 5,000 deceased people voted during a twenty—year period.

Further, although Defendants have presented evidence from elections officials of fraud in the area of voting, all of that evidence addresses fraud in the area of voter registration, rather than in-person voting. The Photo ID requirement does not apply to voter registration, and any Georgia citizen of appropriate age may register to vote without showing a Photo ID. Indeed, individuals may register to vote by producing copies of bank statements or utility bills, or without even producing identification at all. The Photo ID law thus does nothing to address the voter fraud issues that conceivably exist in Georgia.

Hey Julie, go home---you just got out of bed from being sick! The other project mentioned was the creation of an RFP for some large organization to develop a solution to the problem. My feeling is that we can do that without the need to farm out an RFP.

Julie:

I just read my contract and it is fine except for the termination clause. I have two issues with it. First, I am concerned with a short-term contract for personal services like this that can be terminated without cause. That really makes this no contract at all. Second, I am just as concerned with the two week notice provision. We are paid every thirty days. Termination should require thirty days. Of course, the second point is moot if termination is for cause only.

Please let me know what you think.

Here is my working group list. I still have not heard from two people but due to the size limitations I am sending what I have now:

- Cleta Mitchell (DC)
- Patrick Rogers (NM)
- Mark (Thor) Hearne II (MO)
- Mark Braden (DC)
- David Norcross (DC)
- Ben Ginsberg (DC)
- Todd Roketa, Sec of State, Indiana (IN)

I recommend that since we are limited to three Republicans and three Democrats that we pick Roketa, Rogers, and Hearne. We can use the rest for interviews.

Also, got an e-mail from Peggy but no info on what is needed for invoices. I assume our contracts will be signed in time to get us paid for this month.

Benjamin L. Ginsberg represents numerous political parties, political campaigns, candidates, members of Congress and state legislatures, Governors, corporations, trade associations, vendors, donors and individuals participating in the political process.

In both the 2004 and 2000 election cycles, Mr. Ginsberg served as national counsel to the Bush-Cheney presidential campaign; he played a central role in the 2000 Florida recount. He also represents the campaigns and leadership PACs of numerous members of the Senate and House, as well as the Republican National Committee, National Republican Senatorial Committee and National Republican Congressional Committee. He serves as counsel to the Republican Governors Association and has wide experience on the state legislative level from directing Republican redistricting efforts nationwide following the 1990 Census and being actively engaged in the 2001—2002 round of redistricting.

In addition to advising on election law issues, particularly those involving federal and state campaign finance laws, ethics rules, redistricting, communications law, and election recounts and contests, Mr. Ginsberg represents clients before Congress and state legislatures.

Before entering law school, he spent five years as a newspaper reporter on The Boston Globe, Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, The Berkshire (Mass.) Eagle, and The Riverside (Calif.) Press-Enterprise. He has been adjunct professor of law at the Georgetown University Law Center lecturing on law and the political process.

Summary:

E. Mark Braden concentrates his work principally on election law and governmental affairs. This field includes work with Congress, the Federal Election Commission, state campaign finance agencies, public integrity issues, political broadcast regulation, contests, recounts, the Voting Rights Act, initiatives, referendums and redistricting. Each is an area in which he has substantial knowledge and unusual experience.

Mr. Braden spent ten years as Chief Counsel to the Republican National Committee prior to joining Baker & Hostetler. He has worked intimately with many elected officials, the major national political consultants and pollsters providing successful, and often highly innovative, legal guidance. For example, in campaign finance, he can rightly claim to be the father of "soft money" as now used in national political campaigns. In redistricting, he has argued successfully at the U.S. Supreme Court and has been involved in litigation across the nation. In addition to his experience in the area of federal election law, Mr. Braden is widely recognized as an authority on state election laws, having served as Chief Counsel to the Ohio Elections Commission and Election Counsel for the Secretary of State in Ohio. He has been a principal lawyer in many of the largest recounts in our political history.

Mr. Braden was a key negotiator for the site city agreements and many of the other contracts for four Republican National Conventions and has been special counsel to the House Administration Committee. He has also worked with many nonprofit organizations on government affairs issues.

Mr. Braden has testified before congressional committees and the Federal Election Commission on numerous occasions. His experience in these areas has been recognized by numerous invitations to be a guest lecturer at universities and institutes across the nation.

Mr. Braden is a member of the adjunct faculty of George Washington University and a former Captain of the United States Army Reserve.

SECRETARY OF STATE STATE OF INDIANA

TODD ROKITA
SECRETARY OF STATE

Indiana Secretary of State Todd Rokita Biographical Information

At the age of 35, Secretary Rokita is the second youngest Secretary of State in the country. First elected to the third highest office in state government in 2002, Secretary Rokita served for a year as the youngest Secretary of State in the nation.

As Indiana's chief election official, Secretary Rokita continues to work on reforming Indiana's election practices to ensure Indiana's elections are as fair, accurate and accessible as possible. By embracing technology and accountability, Secretary Rokita is leading the effort to make Indiana a 21st century election administration model. Rokita serves on the nine-member Executive Board of the Election Assistance Commission Standards Board, charged by federal law to address election reform issues. Secretary Rokita has testified about Indiana's voting reform efforts before the United States Congress.

Secretary Rokita also serves as Indiana's chief securities fraud investigator. Secretary Rokita's office has uncovered investor fraud scams and helped secure numerous felony convictions and thousands of dollars in restitution.

In his role as the head of Indiana's Business Services Division, Secretary Rokita has continued making Indiana a pioneer in e-government initiatives.

As Secretary of State, Rokita visits each of Indiana's 92 counties at least once each year. Rokita continues to serve as a precinct committeeman during each election, and was recently named as one of the "40 under 40" by the Indianapolis Business Journal.

A native of Munster, he holds a law degree from Indiana University School of Law-Indianapolis and a Bachelor of Arts degree from Wabash College. At Wabash, Rokita earned distinction as an Eli Lilly Fellow. After law school, Secretary Rokita worked as a practicing attorney.

Rokita began serving in the Secretary of State's office in 1997. As the Deputy Secretary of State and in other positions, Rokita helped implement user-friendly e-government services, provided tougher securities enforcement, and championed significant election reforms.

Secretary Rokita is active in the National Association of Secretaries of State, having served in 2004 as the Chair of the Voter Participation Committee and serving in 2005 as the Vice Chair of the organization's Securities Committee.

Secretary Rokita is a member of the Director's Circle of the Indiana Council for Economic Education, the state and local bar Associations, the Knights of Columbus, and the National Rifle Association. A commercial-rated pilot, Secretary Rokita volunteers his time by flying people in need of non-emergency medical care to hospitals and clinics throughout the Midwest for treatment.

Secretary Rokita lives in Indianapolis with his wife, Kathy and they are members of St. Thomas More Parish.

Julie:

I just got an e-mail from Tova. She does expect me to add Republicans to the interview list. Tova and I are going to talk tomorrow. I think that making the final interview list will take some time as we need to see who is vetted off or removed from the working group list due to funding issues or other issues.

I do not intend to mention anything we discussed in my conversation with Tova. Please let me know how the Commissioner's discussion with the complaining party went.

Subject Meeting

Julie:

As we just discussed, at this time and in light of the recent inquiry, I think it prudent to postpone our meeting in DC until the first or second week of November in order to:

1. Finalize the Working Group list (I am still waiting to hear from Kay James and Governor Barbour);
2. Finalize the Interview list;
3. Finish the search on existing voter fraud research;
4. Assure participation from the Department of Justice; and,
5. Get everyone on the same page and assure all outside parties that this will not be a radical venture

What do you think and can we get agreement on this with Peggy?

Regards,

Job

I think we should use the content of those articles or some summary of them as a background of what we know about VF and VI. I just didn't want to have to read all of those articles to be able to make some generalized statements about their contents.

All of the summaries received are in the shared drawer under T:\RESEARCH IN PROGRESS\VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION\Research Summaries. There are too many of them to append to this message, or I would do it. The researchers did not propose to include these summaries in the report. Are you considering adding them?

If you want, I can cross reference each of these with the list of articles and ID any missing summaries. I could do that over the weekend. --- Peggy

Dear Tom and Julie,

Happy New Year. I hope you both enjoyed the holidays.

As you know, I am well aware that the research Job and I produced belongs to the EAC. Nonetheless, I was wondering whether there might be some way I can use just the Nexis material solely for my own further research purposes. Anything I might publish using that underlying data as enhanced by my further research would be in my name and my name only, not that of the EAC. I put a tremendous amount of work into collecting and organizing that data and I would like the opportunity to continue this research on an ongoing basis. It would be a shame if it was not put to some further use.

Is there something we might arrange in this regard? Thanks so much.

Tova & Job,

As you know, because the two of you are no longer under contract with the EAC, EAC is not afforded the same protections as if you were still functioning as EAC employees. As such, releasing the document to you would be the same as releasing it to any other member of the public.

Thus, EAC will not be able to release a copy of the proposed final report to you prior to its consideration and adoption by the Commission. The Commission will take up this report at its meeting on Thursday, Dec. 7. I will have a copy available for you immediately following their consideration - assuming that they do not change the report during their deliberations and voting on Dec. 7. If changes are made, I will have a copy available to you as soon as possible following that meeting.

In the final report, you will see that EAC took the information and work provided by the two of you and developed a report that summarizes that work, provides a definition for use in future study, and adopts parts or all of many of the recommendations made by you and the working group. In addition, you will note that EAC will make the entirety of your interview summaries, case summaries, and book/report summaries available to the public as appendixes to the report.

I know that you are anxious to read the report and that you may have questions that you would like to discuss following the release of the report. Please feel free to contact me with those questions or issues.

Subject work plan

Hi Karen and Tom,

As we discussed yesterday, attached is a preliminary work plan/division of labor for your review. Please let us know if this is sufficient for the present and if you have any comments or questions.

In terms of hours dedicated to the project, Job and Tova are able to commit to 15-20 hours per week assuming that includes reimbursed periodic travel. Steve can do approximately 2 hours per week. We have tentatively scheduled to meet at your offices in DC, if that is convenient for you, on September 20. We will be able to confirm that within the next day or so.

All of us are very eager to get started on this important work as soon as possible. However, because we also have other work related responsibilities, we are a bit reluctant to do so before having an opportunity to review our contracts. We look forward to receiving them so we can get going right away.

Thanks so much. Speak to you soon.

Tova, Job and Steve

All-

In anticipation of our 45-minute conference call scheduled for Tuesday, September 6 at 4:00 PM, I would ask the three consultants ( Steve, Job and Tova) to come prepared to talk about the following:

The major topics and issues which you see as needing immediate attention, definition,delineation,etc.

Rough timelines and timeframes for addressing these major issues and topics

Your major roles and responsibilities and the timelines you envision for meeting your major deliverables

We all realize that this conversation is just a start; I look forward to this beginning and to framing the tasks that lie ahead of us between now and September 30.

Have a wonderful holiday!!

Re: Preliminary Work Plan
Date: September 7, 2005

The following is a preliminary work plan and division of labor for the project on voter fraud and voter intimidation:

MONTH ONE (beginning the date contracts are finalized):

- I. Defining Fraud/Intimidation
  - a. In person meeting and discussion among consultants to:
    - i. Determine what we believe the parameters of the terms fraud and intimidation should be for our research purposes. (All)
    - ii. Create a list of state and local officials, third party representatives, attorneys, scholars, etc. to interview and/or survey to assist in this process of definition (All)
  - b. Interviews of individuals identified as having expertise (Job and Tova)
  - c. Analysis of existing research (Job and Tova)
- II. Obtaining research assistance (e.g. interns, law clerks) (All)

MONTH TWO:

- III. Examining the Feasibility of Quantifying the Level of Incidence of Different Types of Fraud
  - a. Looking at how we can develop a statistically sound research instrument
    - i. Discussion with political and social scientists, legal scholars in the field (Tova and Steve)

The EAC paper is ridiculous. I have a call in to Julie. Here are some notes

Tova Wang.wpd

008123

Tova Wang/EAC

p 5. 2d bullet ..DOJ is bringing fewer intimidation and suppression cases now...

This clearly is a myth. The Department has brought two 11(b) cases, one of the two in this Administration. The focus of DOJ activity has shifted, in fact, to voter suppression as there are fewer cases over voter dilution (challenges to at-large election systems, etc.) being brought by anyone as the number of jurisdictions with at-large election systems has shrunk dramatically. This Administration has, in fact, brought far more voter-suppression cases in this Administration than ever in the past, including a majority of all cases under Sections 203 and 208 of the Act, and such key recent Section 2 cases as US v. City of Boston and US v. Long County, Georgia.

The Voting Section brings cases involving “systemic” discrimination because federal voting statutes focus on discriminatory action by local governments. It is criminal statutes that involve malfeasance by individuals. The difference is fundamental and key to understanding law enforcement

3d bullet.

The Voting Section of DOJ has taken action to address badly kept voter lists with recent lawsuits in Missouri and Indiana.

4th bullet

The Voting Section of DOJ has, by a large margin, included mandatory training of poll workers in avoiding discriminatory practices in more cases in this Administration than in its entire previous history.

This is not true. Ms. Wang repeatedly declined to define intimidation, so that her questions were vague and unhelpful in defining or identifying problems. The facts:

The Voting Section is bringing more cases involving discrimination and violation of minority voters rights at the polls on election day than ever in its history - than in its entire history combined. That is indisputable.

The credibility of allegations depends on their specificity and corroboration. Questions as to intimidation and vote suppression are meaningless in the absence of a definition of discrimination.

Prior enforcement has indeed changed the landscape, especially in the Southeast; however, the fact that we are bringing record numbers of cases clearly shows that discrimination is not rare.

Challenges based on race and unequal implementation of ID rules are indeed actionable and we have brought lawsuits, such as in Boston and Long County; we have not identified instances of such discrimination in which we have not taken action.

Julie,

I am ok with the edits Commissioner made to the letter; however, I do think that because of the tone of 008126

Tova's letter, which is likely to be supplied to others (as was their report to us). that we need a paragraph in the letter that makes it clear that the process used in producing this final report was consistent with the process we have used in all the reports and studies we have issued to date. What she needs to know (in writing) is that while we review the work of our researchers and consultants on a topic closely to draw various conclusions, our staff and the commissioners themselves have input into the final product that becomes the public report issued by a majority vote of the EAC. Since I've been on the EAC, we have consistently questioned statistics, statements and conclusions drawn by those doing work for the EAC. We have also drawn upon our collect resources and wisdom to produce the best report possible. I think that was true in this case as it has been with all the other reports we have issued. In the end, it is the EAC--and the commissioners in particular--who are held accountable for what we adopt and release; not our paid consultants or organizations we contract with to do studies.

Julie and Jeannie:

Thank you for the quick turn around on drafting a response to Tova Wang.

I have made substantial edits because I think the first draft offered too much information, which is not germane to Tova's complaint. Additionally, too much verbiage masks the strength of our good report and seemed to obscure the main points in our response.

I hope you will find the attached helpful.

BTW, who will sign the letter ?

Dear Ms. Wang:

We are writing in response to your December 7, 2006 memorandum. As you know, the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) issued its first report on election crimes last week, based in large part on the work that was done for EAC by Job and you. The report contains the full and complete summaries of every interview conducted as well as every book, article, report or case that was reviewed. Rather than provide the synopsis of these interviews, EAC provided the individual summaries so readers could reach their own conclusions about the substance of the interviews.

As the agency responsible for these final reports, it is incumbent upon EAC to assure that the information contained in the reports is accurate and fairly presented. With each of the reports, best practices documents, quick start guides, and other documents that EAC publishes, EAC makes changes as needed to make certain that our constituents are receiving the best and most complete information. This due diligence process is observed regardless of whether the document was created in-house or was created by consultants or contractors.

Upon reviewing initial information about the Department of Justice interviews contained in the status report that was provided to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors and the information provided at the working group meeting in May 2006, those persons interviewed at the Department of Justice did not agree with certain characterizations of their statements contained in these materials. Therefore, EAC exercised its responsibility to make clarifying edits. The Department of Justice is an important prosecutorial agency engaged in enforcing Federal anti-fraud and anti-intimidation laws. Thus, it was important to EAC to assure that the summary of their comments did not lend confusion to an already complex and hotly-debated topic.

The report on voting fraud and voter intimidation will stand as adopted on December 7, 2006. Again, we thank you for the contributions you made to the EAC's initial research of these important issues.

Sincerely,

Paul DeGregorio
Chairman

Subject VF-VI Another DOJ Objection

Julie:

I just remembered that there was one other DOJ objection. It was about the way the consultants described the Election Crimes Branch focus on cases. In the interview with Donsanto (the only interview I attended), he made reference to the fact that the Election Crimes Branch used to only go after conspiracies, not individuals. Now, however, they had begun prosecuting individuals for noncitizen and felon voting. The consultants heard an unexpressed "instead", which would mean that DOJ had dropped pursuing conspiracies in favor of going after individuals. Based on my previous experience, I heard and unexpressed "in addition", meaning that DOJ was not just prosecuting conspiracies, the department also had begun to prosecute individuals.

I had lengthy discussions with the consultants over this issue as well. Donsanto confirmed that he meant "in addition", and the lists of cases he provided indicates that the department continues to pursue conspiracies. (It doesn't make sense any other way, unless you believe that the government is out to get the little guy.) — Peggy

Sorry this is later than expected. I was missing the notes of one interview and had several computer crashes when I tried to retrieve archived email to determine if I had failed to file it after one of the consultants sent it. I finally gave up looking for it in favor of summarizing what I had.

Attached is a summary of points raised in the interviews. I found it more difficult to extract lessons learned from the interview notes, so I used a summary format. (The interview notes make it appear that the focus of the interviews differed from one person to another, perhaps because consultants were seeking different information from interviewees). I've also attached a list of interviewees with pertinent interview notes. (Some of the interview notes dealt with irregularities other than voting fraud and voter intimidation.) ---

PRELIMINARY VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION STUDY

---

Deliberative Process
Privilege

Voter Suppression & Intimidation:

- Voter suppression efforts are sometimes racially based, and sometimes based on partisan considerations
- Hard to know how much vote suppression and intimidation is taking place because it depends on one's definition of the terms – they are used very loosely by some people. Many instances of what some people refer to as voter intimidation are more unclear now (e.g.; photographing voters at the polls has been called intimidating, but now everyone is at the polls with a camera). It is hard to know when something is intimidation and it is difficult to show that it was an act of intimidation
- The fact that both parties are engaging in these tactics now makes it more complicated. It makes it difficult to point the finger at any one side.
- Some advocates assert that, given the additional resources and latitude given to the DOJ enforcement of acts such as double voting and noncitizen voting, there should be an equal commitment to enforcement of acts of intimidation and suppression cases.
- Examples:
  - spreading of false information, such as phone calls, flyers, and radio ads that intentionally mislead as to voting procedures, such as claiming that if you do not have identification, you cannot vote, and providing false dates for the election
  - Observers with cameras, which people associate with potential political retribution or even violence
  - Intimidating police presence at the polls
  - open hostility by poll workers toward minorities (racial and language), or poll workers asking intimidating questions;
  - groups of officious-looking poll watchers at the poll sites who seem to be some sort of authority looking for wrongdoing;
  - challenges
    - There are cases where challenger laws have been beneficial and where they have been abused (Brennan is currently working on developing a model challenger law)
    - No way to determine whether a challenge is in good or bad faith, and there is little penalty for making a bad faith challenge. The fact that there are no checks on the challenges at the precinct level, or even a requirement of concurrence from an opposing party challenger leads to the concern that challenge process will be abused. The voter on the other hand, will need to get majority approval of county election board members to defeat the challenge.
    - Especially in jurisdictions that authorize challenges, the use of challenge lists and challengers goes beyond partisanship to racial suppression and intimidation
  - instances where civic groups and church groups intimidate members to vote in a specific manner, not for reward, but under threat of being ostracized or even telling them they will go to hell.(AR, KY)
  - moving poll sites
  - having Indians vote at polling places staffed by non-Indians often results in incidents of disrespect towards Native voters, judges aren't familiar with Indian last names and are more dismissive of solving discrepancies with native voters
  - intimidation at the poll sites in court houses. Many voters are afraid of the county judges or county employees and therefore will not vote. They justifiably believe their ballots will be opened by these employees to see who they voted for, and if they voted against the county people, retribution might ensue. (AR)

Fraud in Voting:

NOTE: Many interviewees appear to have made claims regarding the quantity and type of voting fraud based on incomplete data, their personal experience, or their impressions (e.g.; voting fraud has been confined to absentee ballots; there is no in person assumption of others' voter identities to vote).

- The most commonly cited example of voting fraud mentioned was absentee ballot fraud (e.g.; vote selling involving absentee ballots, the filling out of absentee ballots en masse, people at nursing homes filling out the ballots of residents, and union leaders getting members to vote a certain way by absentee ballot).
- Many assert that impersonation, or polling place fraud, is probably the least frequent type because:
  - impersonation fraud is more likely to be caught and is therefore not worth the risk
  - unlike in an absentee situation, actual poll workers are present to disrupt impersonation fraud, for instance, by catching the same individual voting twice
  - if one votes in the name of another voter, and that voter shows up at the polls, the fraud will be discovered
  - one half to one quarter of the time the person will be caught (there is a chance the pollworker will have personal knowledge of the person, Georgia Secretary of State Cathy Cox has mentioned that there are many opportunities for discovery of in person fraud as well).
  - deterrent is that it's a felony, and that one person voting twice is not an effective way to influence an election. One would need to get a lot of people involved for it to work
- Vote buying still occurs and, in some cases, it is hard to distinguish between intimidation and vote buying.
- Tampering with ballots in transit between poll and election office is a concern (AR)

Voter Registration:

- Some assert that registration fraud is the major issue (esp unsupervised voter registration drives by political parties and advocacy groups that pay workers to register voters)
- Some assert that various groups abuse the existence of list deadwood to make claims about fraudulent voting.
- Some assert that when compiling such lists and doing comparisons, which are used as the basis for challenges, sound statistical methods must be utilized, and often are not. Matching protocols without faulty assumptions will have a 4 percent to 35 percent error rate—that's simply the nature of database work. Private industry has been working on improving this for years. . .
- If someone is on a voter list twice, that does not mean that voter has voted twice.
- Many problems will be addressed by the statewide database required under HAVA

Enforcement:

- States vary in their authority to intervene in and track voter intimidation-voter suppression and voting fraud cases (e.g.; in AR, enforcement is the responsibility of counties, in IN it is responsibility of State AG).
- Voter fraud and intimidation is difficult to prove. It is very hard to collect the necessary factual evidence to make a case, and doing so is very labor-intensive
- Some believe that voter suppression matters are not pursued formally because often they involve activities that current law does not reach.
- Only two interviewees assert that current state and federal codes seem sufficient for prosecuting fraud, and are not under-enforced (no need for additional laws).
- Some advocacy groups assert that the government does not engage in a sustained investigation of voter suppression matters or pursue any kind of resolution to them. There is a perception that the Department of Justice has never been very aggressive in pursuing cases of vote suppression, intimidation and fraud, and that choices DOJ has made with respect to where they have brought claims do not seem to be based on any systematic analysis of where the biggest problems are.
- Some advocates point out that, once the election is over, civil litigation becomes moot.

---

- The development of a pre-election challenge list targeted at minorities (some claim this has never been pursued, yet Mr. Tanner said the DOJ was able to informally intervene in challenger situations in Florida, Atkinson County, Georgia and in Alabama), long lines due to unequal distribution of voting machines based on race, list purges based on race, unequal application of voter ID rules, and refusal to offer a provisional ballot on the basis of race would be VRA violations.
- DOJ asserts there is a big gap between complaints and what can be substantiated
- DOJ Voting Rights Section - Federal Voting Rights Act only applies to state action, so the section only sues State and local governments – it does not have any enforcement power over individuals. Most often, the section enters into consent agreements with governments that focus on poll worker training, takes steps to restructure how polls are run, and deals with problems on Election Day on the spot. When deciding what to do with the complaint, the section errs on the side of referring it criminally because they do not want civil litigation to complicate a possible criminal case
- DOJ Election Crimes Branch – DOJ is permitted to prosecute whenever there is a candidate for federal office, but can't prosecute everything. Deceptive practices that are committed by individuals and would be a matter for the Public Integrity Section; local government would have to be involved for the voting section to become involved. The problem is asserting federal jurisdiction in non-federal elections. (In U.S. v. McNally, the court ruled that the mail fraud statute does not apply to election fraud. It was through the mail fraud statute that the department had routinely gotten federal jurisdiction over election fraud cases. 18 USC 1346, the congressional effort to "fix" McNally, did not include voter fraud.)
- It is preferable for the federal government to pursue these cases for the following reasons:
  - federal districts draw from a bigger and more diverse jury pool;
  - the DOJ is politically detached; local district attorneys are hamstrung by the need to be re-elected;
  - DOJ has more resources – local prosecutors need to focus on personal and property crimes—fraud cases are too big and too complex for them;
  - DOJ can use the grand jury process as a discovery technique and to test the strength of the case.
- Some assert that election crimes are not high on the priority list of either district attorneys or grand juries; therefore, complaints of election crime very rarely are prosecuted or are indicted by the grand jury.
- Political parties have devoted extraordinary resources into 'smoking out' fraudulent voters

Recommendations Re Laws & Procedures:

- It is important to keep clear who the perpetrators of the fraud are and where the fraud occurs because that effects what the remedy should be.
- Support Senator Barak Obama's bill for combating voter harassment and deceptive practices. (Many jurisdictions do not currently have laws prohibiting voter harassment and deceptive practices.)
- Support a new law that allows the DOJ to bring civil actions for suppression that are not race based, for example, deceptive practices or wholesale challenges to voters in jurisdictions that tend to vote heavily for one party.
- Support a new federal law that allows federal prosecution whenever a federal instrumentality is used, e.g. the mail, federal funding, interstate commerce (DOJ has drafted such legislation, which was introduced but not passed in the early 1990s.)
- Put stronger teeth in the voter fraud laws; step up enforcement against fraud and provide stiffer penalties as current penalties make the risk of committing fraud relatively low
- There should be increased resources dedicated to expanded DOJ monitoring efforts. This might be the best use of resources since monitors and observers act as a deterrent to fraud and intimidation.
- Some advocate that all election fraud and intimidation complaints should be referred to the State Attorney General's Office to circumvent the problem of local political prosecutions. The

---

Attorney General should take more responsibility for complaints of fraud because at the local level, politics interferes

- Some advocate greater resources for district attorneys. In addition, during election time, there should be an attorney in the DA's office who is designated to handle election prosecution
- Would be useful to have recommendations for prosecutors investigating fraudulent activity
- Better trained poll workers
- Polling places should be open longer, run more professionally but there needs to be fewer of them so that they are staffed by only the best, most professional people (Voting Centers).
- Move elections to weekends. This would involve more people acting as poll workers who would be much more careful about what was going on.
- A day should be given off of work without counting as a vacation day so that better poll workers are available.
- Early voting at the clerk's office is good because the people there know what they are doing. People would be unlikely to commit fraud at the clerk's office. This should be expanded to other polling places in addition to that of the county clerk.
- Many assert that the best defense against fraud will be better voter lists.
  - States should be urged to implement statewide voter lists in accordance with the Help America Vote Act ("HAVA"), the election reform law enacted by Congress in 2002 following the Florida debacle
  - Linking voter registration databases across states may be a way to see if people who are registered twice are in fact voting twice
  - New legislation or regulations are needed to provide clear guidance and standards for generating voter lists and purging voters, otherwise states could wrongfully disenfranchise eligible voters; purging must be done in a manner that uses the best databases, and looks at only the most relevant information
  - The process for preventing ineligible ex-felons from casting ballots needs to be improved
  - statewide registration databases should be linked to social service agency databases
- Challenge laws need to be reformed, especially ones that allow for pre-election mass challenges with no real basis. There is no one size fits all model for challenger legislation, but some bad models involving hurdles for voters lead to abuse and should be reformed. There should be room for poll workers to challenge fraudulent voters, but not for abuse. (KY has list of defined reasons for which they can challenge a voter, such as residency, and the challengers must also fill out paperwork to conduct a challenge) Last minute challenges should not be permitted
- False information campaigns should be combated with greater voter education, the media could do more to provide information about what is legal and what is illegal
- Improve the protective zone around polling places: the further vote suppressers can keep people away from the polls, the better.
- States should be encouraged to:
  - codify into law uniform and clear published standards for voter registration, challenges, voter ID, poll worker training, use and counting of provisional votes, the distribution of voting equipment and the assignment of official pollworkers among precincts, to ensure adequate and nondiscriminatory access
  - standardize forms
  - modify forms and procedures based on feedback from prosecutors
- Ensure good security procedures for the tabulation process and more transparency in the vote counting process
- Conduct post-election audits
- Many advocate eliminating "no excuse" absentee voting.
- Some recommend reducing partisanship in election administration, but others are skeptical of the feasibility of this

- Some strongly recommend requiring voter ID, while others strongly oppose it as a voter suppression tactic, asserting that states should not adopt requirements that voters show identification at the polls, beyond those already required by federal law (requiring that identification be shown only by first time voters who did not show identification when registering.) and that states could use signature comparisons.
- Political parties should monitor the processing of voter registrations and purging of registered by local election authorities on an ongoing basis to ensure the timely processing of registrations and changes, including both newly registered voters and voters who move within a jurisdiction or the state, and the Party should ask state Attorneys General to take action where necessary to force the timely updating of voter lists or to challenge, unlawful purges and other improper list maintenance practices.

Future Study Recommendations:

- Just because there was no prosecution, does not mean there was no vote fraud; very hard to come up with a measure of voter fraud short of prosecution
- EAC should conduct a survey of the general public that asks whether they have committed certain acts or been subjected to any incidents of fraud or intimidation. This would require using a very large sample, and we would need to employ the services of an expert in survey data
- EAC should work with the Census Bureau to have them ask different, additional questions in their Voter Population Surveys
- EAC should talk to private election lawyers

EAC SUMMARY OF EXPERT INTERVIEWS FOR
VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

Wade Henderson, Executive Director, Leadership Conference for Civil Rights

Data Collection

Mr. Henderson had several recommendations as to how to better gather additional information and data on election fraud and intimidation in recent years. He suggested interviewing the following individuals who have been actively involved in Election Protection and other similar efforts:

- Jon Greenbaum, Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights
- Tanya Clay, People for the American Way
- Melanie, Campbell, National Coalition for Black Political Participation
- Larry Gonzalez, National Association of Latino Election Officers
- Jacqueline Johnson, National Congress of American Indians
- Chellie Pingree, Common Cause
- Jim Dickson, disability rights advocate
- Mary Berry, former Chair of the US Commission on Civil Rights, currently at the University of Pennsylvania
- Judith Browne and Eddie Hailes, Advancement Project (former counsel to the US Commission on Civil Rights)
- Robert Rubin, Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights – San Francisco Office
- Former Senator Tom Daschle (currently a fellow at The Center for American Progress)

He also recommended we review the following documents and reports:

- The 2004 litigation brought by the Advancement Project and SEIU under the 1981 New Jersey Consent Decree
- Forthcoming LCCR state-by-state report on violations of the Voting Rights Act
- Forthcoming Lawyers Committee report on violations of the Voting Rights Act (February 21)

Types of Fraud and Intimidation Occurring

Mr. Henderson said he believed that the kinds of voter intimidation and suppression tactics employed over the last five years are ones that have evolved over many years. They are sometimes racially based, sometimes based on partisan motives. He believes the following types of activity have actually occurred, and are not just a matter of anecdote and innuendo, and rise to the level of either voter intimidation or vote suppression:

- Flyers with intentional misinformation, such as ones claiming that if you do not have identification, you cannot vote, and providing false dates for the election
- Observers with cameras, which people associate with potential political retribution or even violence
- Intimidating police presence at the polls
- Especially in jurisdictions that authorize challenges, the use of challenge lists and challengers goes beyond partisanship to racial suppression and intimidation
- Unequal deployment of voting equipment, such as occurred in Ohio. Also, he has seen situations in which historically Black colleges will have one voting machine while other schools will have more.

Mr. Henderson believes that these matters are not pursued formally because often they involve activities that current law does not reach. For example, there is no law prohibiting a Secretary of State from being the head of a political campaign, and then deploying voting machines in an uneven manner. There is no way to pursue that. Also, once the election is over, civil litigation becomes moot. Finally, sometimes upon reflection after the campaign, some of the activities are not as sinister as believed at the time.

Mr. Henderson believes government does not engage in a sustained investigation of these matters or pursue any kind of resolution to them. LCCR has filed a FOIA request with both the Civil Rights Division and the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice to examine this issue.

Election Protection activities will be intensified for the 2006 elections, although the focus may shift somewhat given the implementation of new HAVA requirements.

Recommendations for Reform

There was tremendous concern after the 2004 election about conflicts of interest – the “Blackwell problem” – whereby a campaign chair is also in charge of the voting system. We need to get away from that.

He also supports Senator Barak Obama’s bill regarding deceptive practices, and is opposed to the voter identification laws passing many state legislatures.

- States should adopt election-day registration, in order to boost turnout as well as to allow eligible voters to immediately rectify erroneous or improperly purged registration records
- Expansion of early voting & no-excuse absentee voting, to boost turnout and reduce the strain on election-day resources.
- Provisional ballot reforms:
  - Should be counted statewide – if cast in the wrong polling place, votes should still be counted in races for which the voter was eligible to vote (governor, etc.)
  - Provisional ballots should also function as voter registration applications, to increase the likelihood that voters will be properly registered in future elections
- Voter ID requirements: states should allow voters to use signature attestation to establish their identity
- The Department of Justice should increase enforcement of Americans with Disabilities Act and the accessibility requirements of the Help America Vote Act
- Statewide registration databases should be linked to social service agency databases
- Prohibit chief state election officials from simultaneously participating in partisan electoral campaigns within their states
- Create and enforce strong penalties for deceptive or misleading voting practices

Wendy Weiser, Deputy Director, Democracy Program, The Brennan Center

Brennan Center findings on fraud

The Brennan Center’s primary work on fraud is their report for the Carter Baker Commission with commissioner Spencer Overton, written in response to the Commission’s ID recommendations. Brennan reviewed all existing reports and election contests related to voter fraud. They believe the contests serve as an especially good record of whether or not fraud exists, as the parties involved in contested elections have a large incentive to root out fraudulent voters. Yet despite this, the incidence of voter impersonation fraud discovered is extremely low—something on the order 1/10000th of a percentage of voters. See also the brief Brennan filed on 11th circuit in Georgia photo ID case which cites sources in Carter Baker report and argues the incidence of voter fraud too low to justify countermeasures.

Among types of fraud, they found impersonation, or polling place fraud, is probably the least frequent type, although other types, such as absentee ballot fraud are also very infrequent. Weiser believes this is because impersonation fraud is more likely to be caught and is therefore not worth the risk. Unlike in an absentee situation, actual poll workers are present to disrupt impersonation fraud, for instance, by catching the same individual voting twice. She believes perhaps one half to one quarter of the time the person will be caught. Also, there is a chance the pollworker will have personal knowledge of the person. Georgia Secretary of State Cathy Cox has mentioned that there are many opportunities for discovery of in person fraud as well. For example, if one votes in the name of another voter, and that voter shows up at the polls, the fraud will be discovered.

EAC SUMMARY OF EXPERT INTERVIEWS FOR

Weiser believes court proceedings in election contests are especially useful. Some are very extensive, with hundreds of voters brought up by each side and litigated. In both pre-election challenges and post-election contests, parties have devoted extraordinary resources into 'smoking out' fraudulent voters. Justin Leavitt at Brennan scoured such proceedings for the Carter Baker report, which includes these citations. Contact him for answers to particular questions.

Countermeasures/statewide databases

Brennan has also considered what states are doing to combat impersonation fraud besides photo ID laws, although again, it seems to be the rarest kind of fraud, beyond statistically insignificant. In the brief Brennan filed in the Georgia case, the Center detailed what states are already doing to effectively address fraud. In another on the web site includes measures that can be taken that no states have adopted yet. Weiser adds that an effort to look at strategies states have to prevent fraud, state variations, effectiveness, ease of enforcement would be very useful.

Weiser believes the best defense against fraud will be better voter lists—she argues the fraud debate is actually premature because states have yet to fully implement the HAVA database requirement. This should eliminate a great deal of 'deadwood' on voter rolls and undermine the common argument that fraud is made possible by this deadwood. This was the experience for Michigan, which was able to remove 600,000 names initially, and later removed almost 1 million names from their rolls. It is fairly easy to cull deadwood from lists due to consolidation at the state level—most deadwood is due to individuals moving within the state and poor communication between jurisdictions. (Also discuss with Chris Thomas, who masterminded the Michigan database for more information and a historical perspective.)

Regarding the question of whether the effect of this maintenance on fraud in Michigan can be quantified, Weiser would caution against drawing direct lines between list problems and fraud. Brennan has found various groups abusing the existence of list deadwood to make claims about fraudulent voting. This is analyzed in greater detail in the Brennan Center's critique of a purge list produced by the NJ Republican party, and was illustrated by the purge list produced by the state of Florida. When compiling such lists and doing comparisons, sound statistical methods must be utilized, and often are not.

The NJ GOP created a list and asked NJ election officials to purge names of ineligible voters on it. Their list assumed that people appearing on the list twice had voted twice. Brennan found their assumptions shoddy and based on incorrect statistical practices, such as treating individuals with the same name and birthdays as duplicates, although this is highly unlikely according to proper statistical methods. Simply running algorithms on voter lists creates a number of false positives, does not provide an accurate basis for purging, and should not be taken as an indicator of fraud.

Regarding the Florida purge list, faulty assumptions caused the list to systematically exclude Hispanics while overestimating African Americans. Matching protocols required that race fields match exactly, despite inconsistent fields across databases.

The kinds of list comparisons that are frequently done to allege fraud are unreliable. Moreover, even if someone is on a voter list twice, that does not mean that voter has voted twice. That, in fact, is almost never the case.

Ultimately, even matching protocols without faulty assumptions will have a 4 percent to 35 percent error rate —that's simply the nature of database work. Private industry has been working on improving this for years. Now that HAVA has introduced a matching requirement, even greater skepticism is called for in judging the accuracy of list maintenance.

Intimidation and Suppression

Brennan does not have a specific focus here, although they do come across it and have provided assistance on bills to prevent suppression and intimidation. They happen to have an extensive paper file of intimidating fliers and related stories from before the 2004 election. (They can supply copies after this week).

Challengers

Brennan has analyzed cases where challenger laws have been beneficial and where they have been abused. See the decision and record from the 1982 NJ vs. RNC case for some of the history of these laws. Brennan is currently working on developing a model challenger law. Weiser believes challenge laws with no requirement that the challenger have any specific basis for the challenge or showing of ineligibility are an invitation to blanket harassing challenges and have a range of pitfalls. State laws are vague and broad and often involve arcane processes such as where voters are required to meet a challenge within 5 days. There are incentives for political abuse, potential for delaying votes and disrupting the polls, and they are not necessarily directed toward the best result. Furthermore, when a voter receives a mailer alleging vote fraud with no basis, even the mere fact of a challenge can be chilling. A voter does not want to have to go through a quasi-court proceeding in order to vote.

EAC SUMMARY OF EXPERT INTERVIEWS FOR

Brennan recommends challenge processes that get results before election, minimize the burden for voters, and are restricted at polling place to challenges by poll workers and election officials, not voters. They believe limitless challenges can lead to pandemonium—that once the floodgates are open they won't stop.

Recommendations

- Intimidation— Weiser believes Sen. Barak Obama's bill is a good one for combating voter harassment and deceptive practices. Many jurisdictions do not currently have laws prohibiting voter harassment and deceptive practices.
- Fraud— Current state and federal codes seem sufficient for prosecuting fraud. Weiser doesn't consider them under-enforced, and sees no need for additional laws.
- Voter lists— New legislation or regulations are needed to provide clear guidance and standards for generating voter lists and purging voters, otherwise states could wrongfully disenfranchise eligible voters.
- Challengers—Challenge laws need to be reformed, especially ones that allow for pre-election mass challenges with no real basis. There is no one size fits all model for challenger legislation, but some bad models involving hurdles for voters lead to abuse and should be reformed. There should be room for poll workers to challenge fraudulent voters, but not for abuse.

Also useful would be recommendations for prosecutors investigating fraudulent activity, How should they approach these cases? How should they approach cases of large scale fraud/intimidation? While there is sufficient legislative cover to get at any election fraud activity, questions remain about what proper approaches and enforcement strategies should be.

William Groth, attorney for the plaintiffs in the Indiana voter identification litigation

Fraud in Indiana

Indiana has never charged or prosecuted anyone for polling place fraud. Nor has any empirical evidence of voter impersonation fraud or dead voter fraud been presented. In addition, there is no record of any credible complaint about voter impersonation fraud in Indiana. State legislators signed an affidavit that said there had never been impostor voting in Indiana. At the same time, the Indiana Supreme Court has not necessarily required evidence of voter fraud before approving legislative attempts to address fraud.

The state attorney general has conceded that there is no concrete fraud in Indiana, but has instead referred to instances of fraud in other states. Groth filed a detailed motion to strike evidence such as John Fund's book relating to other states, arguing that none of that evidence was presented to the legislature and that it should have been in the form of sworn affidavits, so that it would have some indicia of verifiability.

By imposing restrictive ID measures, Groth contends you will discourage 1,000 times more legitimate voters than illegitimate voters you might protect against. He feels the implementation of a REAL ID requirement is an inadequate justification for the law, as it will not affect the upcoming 2006 election where thousands of registered voters will be left without proper ID. In addition, he questions whether REAL ID will be implemented as planned in 2008 considering the backlash against the law so far. He also feels ID laws are unconstitutional because of inconsistent application.

008141

EAC SUMMARY OF EXPERT INTERVIEWS FOR
VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

Statewide database as remedy

Groth believes many problems will be addressed by the statewide database required under HAVA. To the extent that the rolls in Indiana are bloated, it is because state officials have not complied with NVRA list maintenance requirements. Thus, it is somewhat disingenuous for them to use bloated voter rolls as a reason for imposing additional measures such as the photo ID law. Furthermore, the state has ceded to the counties the obligation to do maintenance programs, which results in a hit or miss process (see discussion in reply brief, p 26 through p. 28).

Absentee fraud

To the extent that there has been an incidence of fraud, these have all been confined to absentee balloting. Most notably the East Chicago mayoral election case where courts found absentee voting fraud had occurred. See: Pabey vs. Pastrick 816 NE 2nd 1138 Decision by the Indiana Supreme Court in 2004.

Intimidation and vote suppression

Groth is only aware of anecdotal evidence supporting intimidation and suppression activities. While he considers the sources of this evidence credible, it is still decidedly anecdotal. Instances he is aware of include police cars parked in front of African American polling places. However, most incidents of suppression which are discussed occurred well in the past. Trevor Davidson claims a fairly large scale intimidation program in Louisville.

Challengers

There was widespread information that the state Republican Party had planned a large scale challenger operation in Democratic precincts for 2004, but abandoned the plan at the last minute.

Last year the legislature made a crucial change to election laws which will allow partisan challengers to be physically inside the polling area next to members of the precinct board. Previously, challengers at the polling place have been restricted to the 'chute,' which provides a buffer zone between voting and people engaging in political activity. That change will make it much easier to challenge voters. As there is no recorded legislative history in Indiana, it is difficult to determine the justification behind this change. As both chambers and the governorship are under single-party control, the challenger statute was passed under the radar screen.

Observers are especially concerned about how this change will work in conjunction with the photo ID provision. Under the law, there are at least two reasons why a member of the precinct board or a challenger can raise object to an ID: whether a presented ID conforms to ID standards, and whether the photo on an ID is actually a picture of the voter presenting it. The law does not require bipartisan agreement that a challenge is valid. All it takes is one challenge to raise a challenge to that voter, and that will lead to the voter voting by provisional ballot.

Provisional ballot voting means that voter must make a second trip to the election board (located at the county seat) within 13 days to produce the conforming ID or to swear out an affidavit that they are who they claim to be. This may pose a considerable burden to voters. For example, Indianapolis and Marion County are coterminous—anyone challenged under the law will be required to make second trip to seat of government in downtown Indianapolis. If the voter in question did not have a driver's license in the first place, they will likely need to arrange transportation. Furthermore, in most cases the election result will already be known.

The law is vague about acceptable cause for challenging a voter's ID. Some requirements for valid photo ID include being issued by state or fed gov't, w/ expiration date, and the names must conform exactly. The League of Women Voters is concerned about voters with hyphenated names, as the Indiana DMV fails to put hyphens on driver's licenses potentially leading to a basis for challenge. Misspelling of names would also be a problem. The other primary mode of challenge is saying the photo doesn't look like the voter, which could be happen in a range of instances. Essentially, the law gives unbridled discretion to challengers to decide what conforms and what does not.

EAC SUMMARY OF EXPERT INTERVIEWS FOR

Furthermore, there is no way to determine whether a challenge is in good or bad faith, and there is little penalty for making a bad faith challenge. The fact that there are no checks on the challenges at the precinct level, or even a requirement of concurrence from an opposing party challenger leads to the concern that challenge process will be abused. The voter on the other hand, will need to get majority approval of county election board members to defeat the challenge.

Groth suggests the political situation in Indianapolis also presents a temptation to abuse this process, as electoral margins are growing increasingly close due to shifting political calculus.

Other cases

Groth's other election law work has included a redistricting dispute, a dispute over ballot format, NVRA issues, and a case related to improper list purging, but nothing else related to fraud or intimidation. The purging case involved the election board attempting to refine its voter list by sending registration postcards to everyone on the list. When postcards didn't come back they wanted to purge those voters. Groth blames this error more on incompetence, than malevolence, however, as the county board is bipartisan. (The Indiana Election Commission and the Indiana election division are both bipartisan, but the 92 county election boards which will be administering photo id are controlled by one political party or the other—they are always an odd number, with the partisan majority determined by who controls the clerk of circuit court office.)

Recommendations

- Supports nonpartisan administration of elections.
- Indiana specific recommendations including a longer voting day, time off for workers to vote, and an extended registration period.
- He views the central problem of the Indiana photo ID law is that the list of acceptable forms of ID is too narrow and provides no fallback to voters without ID. At the least, he believes the state needs to expand the list so that most people will have at least one. If not, they should be allowed to swear an affidavit regarding their identity, under penalty of perjury/felony prosecution. This would provide sufficient deterrence for anyone considering impersonation fraud. He believes absentee ballot fraud should be addressed by requiring those voters to produce ID as well, as under HAVA.
- His personal preference would be signature comparison. Indiana has never encountered an instance of someone trying to forge a name in the poll book, and while this leaves open the prospect of dead voters, that danger will be substantially diminished by the statewide database. But if we are going to have some form of ID, he believes we should apply it to everyone and avoid disenfranchisement, provided they swear an affidavit.

Lori Minnite, Barnard College, Columbia University

Securing the Vote

In Securing the Vote, Ms. Minnite found very little evidence of voter fraud because the historical conditions giving rise to fraud have weakened over the past twenty years. She stated that for fraud to take root a conspiracy was needed with a strong local political party and a complicit voter administration system. Since parties have weakened and there has been much improvement in the administration of elections and voting technology, the conditions no longer exist for large scale incidents of polling place fraud. Ms. Minnite concentrates on fraud committed by voters not fraud committed by voting officials. She has looked at this issue on the national level and also concentrated on analyzing certain specific states. Ms. Minnite stressed that it is important to keep clear who the perpetrators of the fraud are and where the fraud occurs because that effects what the remedy should be. Often, voters are punished for fraud committed by voting officials.

Other Fraud Issues

Ms. Minnite found no evidence that NVRA was leading to more voter fraud. She supports non-partisan election administration. Ms.

Minnite has found evidence that there is absentee ballot fraud. She can't establish that there is a certain amount of absentee ballot fraud or that it is the major kind of voter fraud.

Recommendations

- Assure there are accurate voter records and centralize voter databases
- Reduce partisanship in electoral administration.

Neil Bradley, ACLU Voting Rights Project

Voter Impersonation Cases (issue the Georgia ID litigation revolves around)

Mr. Bradley asserted that Georgia Secretary of State Cox stated in the case at issue: that she clearly would know if there had been any instances of voter impersonation at the polls; that she works very closely with the county and local officials and she would have heard about voter impersonation from them if she did not learn about it directly; and that she said that she had not heard of "any incident"---which includes acts that did not rise to the level of an official investigation or charges.

Mr. Bradley said that it is also possible to establish if someone has impersonated another voter at the polls. Officials must check off the type of voter identification the voter used. Voters without ID may vote by affidavit ballot. One could conduct a survey of those voters to see if they in fact voted or not.

The type of voter fraud that involves impersonating someone else is very unlikely to occur. If someone wants to steal an election, it is much more effective to do so using absentee ballots. In order to change an election outcome, one must steal many votes. Therefore, one would have to have lots of people involved in the enterprise, meaning there would be many people who know you committed a felony. It's simply not an efficient way to steal an election.

Mr. Bradley is not aware of any instance of voter impersonation anywhere in the country except in local races. He does not believe it occurs in statewide elections.

Voter fraud and intimidation in Georgia

Georgia's process for preventing ineligible ex-felons from casting ballots has been improved since the Secretary of State now has the power to create the felon purge list. When this was the responsibility of the counties, there were many difficulties in purging felons because local officials did not want to have to call someone and ask if he or she was a criminal.

The State Board of Elections has a docket of irregularity complaints. The most common involve an ineligible person mailing in absentee ballots on behalf of another voter.

In general, Mr. Bradley does not think voter fraud and intimidation is a huge problem in Georgia and that people have confidence in the vote. The biggest problems are the new ID law; misinformation put out by elections officials; and advertisements that remind people that vote fraud is a felony, which are really meant to be intimidating. Most fraud that does occur involves an insider, and that's where you find the most prosecutions. Any large scale fraud involves someone who knows the system or is in the courthouse.

Prosecution of Fraud and Intimidation

Mr. Bradley stated that fraud and intimidation are hard to prosecute. However, Mr. Bradley made contradictory statements. When asked whether the decision to prosecute on the county level was politically motivated, he first said "no." Later, Mr. Bradley reversed himself stating the opposite.

Mr. Bradley also stated that with respect to US Attorneys, the message to them from the top is that this is not a priority. The Georgia ACLU has turned over information about violations of the Voting Rights Act that were felonies, and the US Attorney has done nothing with the information. The Department of Justice has never been very aggressive in pursuing cases of vote suppression, intimidation and fraud. But, the Georgia ACLU has not contacted Craig Donsanto in DC with information of voter fraud. Mr. Bradley believes that voter fraud and intimidation is difficult to prove. It is very hard to collect the necessary factual evidence to make a case, and doing so is very labor-intensive.

Recommendations

In Georgia, the Secretary of State puts a lot of work into training local officials and poll workers, and much of her budget is put into that work. Increased and improved training of poll workers, including training on how to respectfully treat voters, is the most important reform that could be made. Mr. Bradley also suggested that increased election monitoring would be helpful.

Nina Perales, Counsel, Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund

Ms. Perales did not seem to have a sense of the overall electoral issues in her working region (the southwest) effecting Hispanic voters and did not seem to want to offer her individual experiences and work activities as necessarily a perfect reflection of the challenges Hispanic voters face.

Largest Election Problems Since 2000

- Santa Anna County, New Mexico-2004-intimidated voters by video taping them.
- San Antonio-One African American voter subjected to a racial slur.
- San Antonio-Relocated polling places at the last minute without Section 5 pre-clearance.
- San Antonio-Closed polls while voters were still in line.
- San Antonio-2003-only left open early voting polls in predominantly white districts.
- San Antonio-2005-racially contested mayoral run-off election switched from touch screen voting to paper ballots.

Voter Fraud and Intimidation

In Texas, the counties are refusing to open their records with respect to Section 203 compliance (bilingual voting assistance), and those that did respond to MALDEF's request submitted incomplete information. Ms. Perales believes this in itself is a form of voter intimidation.

Ms. Perales said it is hard to say if the obstacles minorities confront in voting are a result of intentional acts or not because the county commission is totally incompetent. There have continuously been problems with too few ballots, causing long lines, especially in places that had historically lower turnout. There is no formula in Texas for allocating ballots – each county makes these determinations.

When there is not enough language assistance at the polls, forcing a non-English speaker to rely on a family member to vote, that can suppress voter turnout.

Ms. Perales is not aware of deceptive practices or dirty tricks targeted at the Latino community.

There have been no allegations of illegal noncitizen voting in Texas. Indeed, the sponsor of a bill that would require proof of citizenship to vote could not provide any documentation of noncitizen voting in support of the bill. The bill was defeated in part because of the racist comments of the sponsor. In Arizona, such a measure was passed. Ms. Perales was only aware of one case of noncitizen voting in Arizona, involving a man of limited mental capacity who said he was told he was allowed to register and vote. Ms. Perales believes proof of citizenship requirements discriminate against Latinos.

Recommendations

Ms. Perales feels the laws are adequate, but that her organization does not have enough staff to do the monitoring necessary. This could be done by the federal government. However, even though the Department of Justice is focusing on Section 203 cases now, they have not even begun to scratch the surface. Moreover, the choices DOJ has made with respect to where they have brought claims do not seem to be based on any systematic analysis of where the biggest problems are. This may be because the administration is so ideological and partisan.

VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

Ms. Perales does not believe making election administration nonpartisan would have a big impact. In Texas, administrators are appointed in a nonpartisan manner, but they still do not always have a nonpartisan approach. Each administrator tends to promote his or her personal view regardless of party.

Pat Rogers, attorney, New Mexico

Major issues in NM w/ regard to vote fraud

Registration fraud seems to be the major issue, and while the legislature has taken some steps, Rogers is skeptical of the effect they will have, considering the history of unequal application of election laws. He also believes there are holes in the 3rd party registration requirement deadlines.

Rogers views a national law requiring ID as the best solution to registration problems. Rather than imposing a burden he contends it will enhance public confidence in the simplest way possible.

Registration Fraud in 2004 election

It came to light that ACORN had registered a 13 year old. The father was an APD officer and received the confirmation, but it was sent to the next door address, a vacant house. They traced this to an ACORN employee and it was established that this employee had been registering others under 18.

Two weeks later, in a crack cocaine bust of Cuban nationals, one of those raided said his job was registering voters for ACORN, and the police found signatures in his possession for fictitious persons.

In a suspicious break-in at an entity that advertised itself as nonpartisan, only GOP registrations were stolen.

In another instance, a college student was allegedly fired for registering too many Republicans.

Rogers said he believed these workers were paid by the registration rather than hourly.

There have been no prosecution or convictions related to these incidents. In fact, there have been no prosecutions for election fraud in New Mexico in recent history. However, Rogers is skeptical that much action can be expected considering the positions of Attorney General, Governor, and Secretary of State are all held by Democrats. Nor has there been any interest from the U.S. attorney—Rogers heard that U.S. attorneys were given instruction to hold off until after the election in 2004 because it would seem too political.

As part of the case against the Secretary of State regarding the identification requirement, the parties also sued ACORN. At a hearing, the head of ACORN, and others aligned with the Democratic Party called as witnesses, took the 5th on the stand as to their registration practices.

Other incidents

Very recently, there have been reports of vote buying in the town of Espanola. Originally reported by the Rio Grande Sun, a resident of a low-income housing project is quoted as saying it has been going on for 10-12 years. The Albuquerque Journal is now reporting this as well. So far the investigation has been extremely limited.

In 1996, there were some prosecutions in Espanola, where a state district judge found registration fraud.

In 1991, the chair of Democratic Party of Bertolino County was convicted on fraud. Yet she was pardoned by Clinton on same day as Marc Rich.

Intimidation/Suppression

Rogers believes the most notable example of intimidation in the 2004 election was the discovery of a DNC Handbook from Colorado advising Democratic operatives to widely report intimidation regardless of confirmation in order to gain media attention.

In-person polling place fraud

There have only been isolated instances of people reporting that someone had voted in their name, and Rogers doesn't believe there is any large scale conspiracy. Yet he contends that perspective misses the larger point of voter confidence. Although there has been a large public outcry for voter ID in New Mexico, it has been deflected and avoided by Democrats.

In 2004, there were more Democratic lawyers at the polls than there are lawyers in New Mexico. Rogers believes these lawyers had a positive impact because they deterred people from committing bad acts.

Counting Procedures

The Secretary of State has also taken the position that canvassing of the vote should be done in private. In NM, they have a 'county canvas' where they review and certify, after which all materials—machine tapes, etc.—are centralized with the Secretary of State who does a final canvass for final certification. Conducting this in private is a serious issue, especially considering the margin in the 2000 presidential vote in New Mexico was only 366 votes. They wouldn't be changing machine numbers, but paper numbers are vulnerable.

On a related note, NM has adopted state procedures that will ensure their reports are slower and very late, considering the 2000 late discovery of ballots. In a close race, potential for fraud and mischief goes up astronomically in the period between poll closing and reporting. Rogers believes these changes are going to cause national embarrassment in the future.

Rogers attributes other harmful effects to what he terms the Secretary of State's incompetence and inability to discern a nonpartisan application of the law. In the 2004 election, no standards were issued for counting provisional ballots. Furthermore, the Secretary of State spent over $1 million of HAVA money for 'voter education' in blatant self-promotional ads.

Recommendations

- Rogers believes it would be unfeasible to have nonpartisan election administration and favors transparency instead. To make sure people have confidence in the election, there must be transparency in the whole process. Then you don't have the 1960 vote coming down to Illinois, or the Espanola ballot or Dona Anna County (ballots found there in the 2000 election). HAVA funds should also be restricted when you have an incompetent, partisan Secretary of State.
- There should be national standards for reporting voting results so there is less opportunity for fraud in a close race. Although he is not generally an advocate of national laws, he does agree there should be more national uniformity into how votes are counted and recorded.

Rebecca Vigil-Giron, Secretary of State, New Mexico

Complaints of election fraud and intimidation are filed with the SOS office. She then decides whether to refer it to the local district attorney or the attorney general. Because the complaints are few and far between, the office does not keep a log of complaints; however, they do have all of the written complaints on file in the office.

Incidents of Fraud and Intimidation

During the 2004 election, there were a couple of complaints of polling place observers telling people outside the polling place who had just voted, and then the people outside were following the voters to their cars and videotaping them. This happened in areas that are mostly second and third generation Latinos. The Secretary sent out the sheriff in one instance of this. The perpetrators moved to a different polling place. This was the only incident of fraud or intimidation Vigil-Giron was aware of in New Mexico.

There have not been many problems on Native reservations because, unlike in many other states, in New Mexico the polling place is on the reservation and is run by local Native Americans. Vigil-Giron said that it does not make sense to have non-Natives running those polls because it is necessary to have people there who can translate. Because most of the languages are unwritten, the HAVA requirement of accessibility through an audio device will be very helpful in this regard. Vigil-Giron said she was surprised to learn while testifying at the Voting Rights Act commission hearings of the lack of sensitivity to these issues and the common failure to provide assistance in language minority areas.

In 2004 the U.S. Attorney, a Republican, suddenly announced he was launching an investigation into voter fraud without consulting the Secretary of State's office. After all of that, there was maybe one prosecution. Even the allegations involving third party groups and voter registration are often misleading. People doing voter registration drives encourage voters to register if they are unsure if they are already registered, and the voter does not even realize that his or her name will then appear on the voter list twice. The bigger problem is where registrations do not get forwarded to election administrators and the voter does not end up on the voting list on Election Day. This is voter intimidation in itself, Vigil-Giron believes. It is very discouraging for that voter and she wonders whether he or she will try again.

Under the bill passed in 2004, third parties are required to turn around voter registration forms very quickly between the time they get them and when they must be returned. If they fail to return them within 48 hours of getting them, they are penalized. This, Vigil-Giron believes, is unfair. She has tried to get the Legislature to look at this issue again.

Regarding allegations of vote buying in Espanola, Vigil-Giron said that the Attorney General is investigating. The problem in that area of New Mexico is that they are still using rural routes, so they have not been able to properly district. There has, as a result, been manipulation of where people vote. Now they seem to have pushed the envelope too far on this. The investigation is not just about vote buying, however. There have also been allegations of voters being denied translators as well as assistance at the polls.

Vigil-Giron believes there was voter suppression in Ohio in 2004. County officials knew thirty days out how many people had registered to vote, they knew how many voters there would be. Administrators are supposed to use a formula for allocation of voting machines based on registered voters. Administrators in Ohio ignored this. As a result, people were turned away at the polls or left because of the huge lines. This, she believes, was a case of intentional vote suppression.

A few years ago, Vigil-Giron heard that there may have been people voting in New Mexico and a bordering town in Colorado. She exchanged information with Colorado administrators and it turned out that there were no cases of double voting.

Recommendations

- Vigil-Giron believes that linking voter registration databases across states may be a way to see if people who are registered twice are in fact voting twice.
- The key to improving the process is better trained poll workers, who are certified, and know what to look for on Election Day. These poll workers should then work with law enforcement to ensure there are no transgressions.
- There should be stronger teeth in the voter fraud laws. For example, it should be more than a fourth degree felony, as is currently the case.

Sarah Ball Johnson, Executive Director of the State Board of Elections, Kentucky

Procedures for Handling Fraud

Fraud complaints are directed first to the state Board of Elections. Unlike boards in other states, Kentucky's has no investigative powers. Instead, they work closely with both the Attorney General and the U.S. Attorney. Especially since the current administration took office, they have found the U.S. Attorney an excellent partner in pursuing fraud cases, and have seen many prosecutions in the last six years. She believes that there has been no increase in the incidence of fraud, but rather the increase in prosecutions is related to increased scrutiny and more resources.

Major Types of Fraud and Intimidation

Johnson says that vote buying and voter intimidation go hand in hand in Kentucky. While historically fraud activity focused on election day, in the last 20 years it has moved into absentee voting. In part, this is because new voting machines aren't easy to manipulate in the way that paper ballots were open to manipulation in the past, especially in distant rural counties. For this reason, she is troubled by the proliferation of states with early voting, but notes that there is a difference between absentee ballot and early voting on machines, which is far more difficult to manipulate.

Among the cases of absentee ballot fraud they have seen, common practice involves a group of candidates conspiring together to elect their specific slate. Nursing homes are an especially frequent target. Elderly residents request absentee ballots, and then workers show up and 'help' them vote their ballots. Though there have been some cases in the Eastern district of election day fraud, most have been absentee.

Johnson argues that it is hard to distinguish between intimidation and vote buying. They have also seen instances where civic groups and church groups intimidate members to vote in a specific manner, not for reward, but under threat of being ostracized or even telling them they will go to hell.

While she is aware of allegations of intimidation by the parties regarding minority precincts in Louisville, the board hasn't received calls about it and there haven't been any prosecutions.

Challengers

Challengers are permitted at the polls in Kentucky. Each party is allowed two per location, and they must file proper paperwork. There is a set list of defined reasons for which they can challenge a voter, such as residency, and the challengers must also fill out paperwork to conduct a challenge.

As for allegations of challengers engaging in intimidation in minority districts, Johnson notes that challengers did indeed register in Jefferson County, and filed the proper paperwork, although they ultimately did not show up on election day.

She finds that relatively few challengers end up being officially registered, and that the practice has grown less common in recent years. This is due more to a change of fashion than anything. And after all, those wishing to affect election outcomes have little need for challengers in the precinct when they can target absentee voting instead.

In the event that intimidation is taking place, Kentucky has provisions to remove disruptive challengers, but this hasn't been used to her knowledge.

Prosecutions

Election fraud prosecutions in Kentucky have only involved vote buying. This may be because that it is easier to investigate, by virtue of a cash and paper trail which investigators can follow. It is difficult to quantify any average numbers about the practice from this, due in part to the five year statute of limitations on vote buying charges. However, she does not believe that vote-buying is pervasive across the state, but rather confined to certain pockets.

Vote-hauling Legislation

Vote hauling is a common form of vote buying by another name. Individuals are legally paid to drive others to the polls, and then divide that cash in order to purchase votes. Prosecutions have confirmed that vote hauling is used for this purpose. While the Secretary of State has been committed to legislation which would ban the practice, it has failed to pass in the past two sessions.

Paying Voter Registration Workers Legislation

A law forbidding people to pay workers by the voter registration card or for obtaining cards with registrations for a specific party was passed this session. Individuals working as part of a registration campaign may still be paid by hour. Kentucky's experience in the last presidential election illustrates the problems arising from paying individuals by the card. That contest included a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage on the ballot, which naturally attracted the attention of many national groups. One group paying people by the card resulted in the registrar being inundated with cards, including many duplicates in the same bundle, variants on names, and variants on addresses. As this practice threatens to overwhelm the voter registration process, Kentucky views it as constituting malicious fraud.

Deceptive practices

EAC SUMMARY OF EXPERT INTERVIEWS FOR
VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

Other than general reports in the news, Johnson hasn't received any separate confirmation or reports of deceptive practices, i.e., false and misleading information being distributed to confuse voters.

Effect of Kentucky's Database

Johnson believes Kentucky's widely praised voter registration database is a key reason why the state doesn't have as much fraud as it might, especially the types alleged elsewhere like double and felon voting. While no database is going to be perfect, the connections with other state databases such as the DMV and vital statistics have been invaluable in allowing them to aggressively purge dead weight and create a cleaner list. When parties use their database list they are notably more successful. Johnson wonders how other states are able to conduct elections without a similar system.

Some factors have made especially important to their success.

- When the database was instituted in 1973, they were able to make everyone in the state re-register and thus start with a clean database. However, it is unlikely any state could get away with this today.
- She is also a big supporter of a full Social Security number standard, as practiced in Kentucky. The full Social Security, which is compared to date of birth and letters in the first and last name, automatically makes matching far more accurate. The huge benefits Kentucky has reaped make Johnson skeptical of privacy concerns arguing for an abbreviated Social Security number. Individuals are willing to submit their Social Security number for many lesser purposes, so why not voting? And in any event, they don't require a Social Security number to register (unlike others such as Georgia). Less than a percent of voters in Kentucky are registered under unique identifiers, which the Board of Elections then works to fill in the number through cross referencing with the DMV.

Recommendations

- Johnson believes the backbone of effective elections administration must be standardized procedures, strong record keeping, and detailed statutes. In Kentucky, all counties use the same database and the same pre election day forms. Rather than seeing that as oppressive, county officials report that the uniformity makes their jobs easier.
- This philosophy extends to the provisional ballot question. While they did not have a standard in place like HAVA's at the time of enactment, they worked quickly to put a uniform standard in place.
- They have also modified forms and procedures based on feedback from prosecutors. Johnson believes a key to enforcing voting laws is working with investigators and prosecutors and ensuring that they have the information they need to mount cases.
- She also believes public education is important, and that the media could do more to provide information about what is legal and what is illegal. Kentucky tries to fulfill this role by information in polling places, press releases, and high profile press conferences before elections. She notes that they deliberately use language focusing on fraud and intimidation.
- Johnson is somewhat pessimistic about reducing absentee ballot fraud. Absentee ballots do have a useful function for the military and others who cannot get to the polling place, and motivated individuals will always find a way to abuse the system if possible. At a minimum, however, she recommends that absentee ballots should require an excuse. She believes this has helped reduce abuse in Kentucky, and is wary of no-excuse practices in other states.

Chandler Davidson, Rice University

Methodology suggestions

In analyzing instances of alleged fraud and intimidation, we should look to criminology as a model. In criminology, experts use two sources:

008150

the Uniform Crime Reports, which are all reports made to the police, and the Victimization Survey, which asks the general public whether a particular incident has happened to them. After surveying what the most common allegations are, we should conduct a survey of the general public that asks whether they have committed certain acts or been subjected to any incidents of fraud or intimidation. This would require using a very large sample, and we would need to employ the services of an expert in survey data collection. Mr. Ansolobehere recommended Jonathan Krosnick, Doug Rivers, and Paul Sniderman at Stanford; Donald Kinder and Arthur Lupia at Michigan; Edward Carmines at Indiana; and Phil Tetlock at Berkeley. In the alternative, Mr. Ansolobehere suggested that the EAC might work with the Census Bureau to have them ask different, additional questions in their Voter Population Surveys.

Mr. Chandler further suggested it is important to talk to private election lawyers, such as Randall Wood, who represented Ciro Rodriguez in his congressional election in Texas. Mr. Ansolobehere also recommended looking at experiments conducted by the British Election Commission.

Incidents of Fraud and Intimidation

Mr. Davidson's study for the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights on the Voting Rights Act documented evidence of widespread difficulty in the voting process. However, he did not attempt to quantify whether this was due to intentional, malevolent acts. In his 2005 report on ballot security programs, he found that there were many allegations of fraud made, but not very many prosecutions or convictions. He saw many cases that did go to trial and the prosecutors lost on the merits.

In terms of voter intimidation and vote suppression, Mr. Davidson said he believes the following types of activities do occur:

- videotaping of voters' license plates;
- poll workers asking intimidating questions;
- groups of officious-looking poll watchers at the poll sites who seem to be some sort of authority looking for wrongdoing;
- spreading of false information, such as phone calls, flyers, and radio ads that intentionally mislead as to voting procedures.

Mr. Ansolobehere believes the biggest problem is absentee ballot fraud. However, many of these cases involve people who do not realize what they are doing is illegal, for example, telling someone else how to vote. Sometimes there is real illegality occurring however.

For example:

- vote selling involving absentee ballots,
- the filling out of absentee ballots en masse,
- people at nursing homes filling out the ballots of residents, and
- there are stories about union leaders getting members to vote a certain way by absentee ballot.

This problem will only get bigger as more states liberalize their absentee ballot rules. Mr. Chandler agreed that absentee ballot fraud was a major problem.

Recommendations

- Go back to "for cause" absentee ballot rules, because it is truly impossible to ever ensure the security of a mail ballot. Even in Oregon, there was a study showing fraud in their vote by mail system.
- False information campaigns should be combated with greater voter education. Los Angeles County's voter education program should be used as a model.

Tracey Campbell, author, Deliver the Vote

While less blatant than in previous eras, fraud certainly still occurs, and he mentions some examples in his book. The major trend of the past 60-70 years has been that these tactics have grown more subtle.

VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

While he hasn't conducted any scientific study of the current state of fraud, his sense as a historian is that it seems naive, after generations of watching the same patterns and practices influence elections, to view suspect election results today as merely attributable to simple error.

Vote-buying and absentee fraud

Campbell sees fraud by absentee ballot and vote buying as the greatest threats to fair elections today. He says vote fraud is like real estate: location, location, location—the closer you can keep the ballots to the courthouse the better. Absentee ballots create a much easier target for vote brokers who can manage voting away from the polling place, or even mark a ballot directly, in exchange for, say, $50—or even more if an individual can bring their entire family. He has noted some small counties where absentee ballots outnumber in-person ballots.

However, few people engaged in this activity would call it 'purchasing' a vote. Instead, it is candidate Jones' way of 'thanking' you for a vote you would have cast in any event. The issue is what happens if candidate Smith offers you more. Likewise, the politicians who engage in vote fraud don't see it as a threat to the republic but rather as a game they have to play in order to get elected.

Regional patterns

Campbell suggests such practices are more prevalent in the South than the Northern states, and even more so compared to the West. The South has long been characterized as particularly dangerous in intimidation and suppression practices—throughout history, one can find routine stories of deaths at the polls each year. While he maintains that fraud seems less likely in the Western states, he sees the explosion of mail in and absentee ballots there as asking for trouble.

Poll site closings as a means to suppress votes

Campbell points to a long historical record of moving poll sites in order to suppress votes. Polling places in the 1800s were frequently set-up on rail cars and moved further down the line to suppress black votes. He would include door-to-door canvassing practices here, as well as voting in homes, which was in use in Kentucky until only a few years ago. All of these practices have been justified as making polling places 'more accessible' while their real purpose has been to suppress votes.

Purge lists

Purge lists are, of course, needed in theory, yet Campbell believes the authority to mark names off the voter rolls presents extensive opportunity for abuse. For this reason, purging must be done in a manner that uses the best databases, and looks at only the most relevant information. When voters discover their names aren't on the list when they go to vote, for example, because they are "dead," it has a considerable demoralizing effect. Wrongful purging takes place both because of incompetence and as a tool to intentionally disenfranchise.

Campbell believes transparency is the real issue here. An hour after the polls close, we tend to just throw up our hands and look the other way, denying voters the chance to see that discrepancies are being rectified. He believes the cost in not immediately knowing election outcomes is a small price to pay for getting results right and showing the public a transparent process.

Deceptive practices

Today's deceptive practices have are solidly rooted in Reconstruction-era practices—i.e. phony ballots, the Texas 'elimination' ballot. The ability to confuse voters is a powerful tool for those looking to sway elections.

Language minorities

Campbell argues there is a fine line between offering help to non-English speakers and using that help against them. A related issue, particularly in the South, is taking advantage of the illiterate.

Current intimidation

Another tactic Campbell considers an issue today is polling place layout: the further vote suppressers can keep people away from the polls, the better. Practices such as photographing people leaving a polling place may also tie into vote-buying, where photos are used to intimidate and validate purchased votes. A good way to combat such practices is by keeping electioneering as far from the polls as possible.

Recommendations

- Specific voting administration recommendations Campbell advocates would include reducing the use of absentee ballots and improving the protective zone around polling places.
- Campbell would also like to see enforcement against fraud stepped up and stiffer penalties enacted, as current penalties make the risk of committing fraud relatively low. He compares the risk in election fraud similar to steroid use in professional sports—the potential value of the outcome is far higher than the risk of being caught or penalized for the infraction, so it is hard to prevent people from doing it. People need to believe they will pay a price for engaging in fraud or intimidation. Moreover, we need to have the will to kick people out of office if necessary.
- He is skeptical of the feasibility of nonpartisan election administration, as he believes it would be difficult to find people who care about politics yet won't lean one way or the other—such an attempt would be unlikely to get very far before accusations of partisanship emerged. He considers the judiciary the only legitimate check on election fraud.

Douglas Webber, Assistant Attorney General, Indiana, (defendant in the Indiana voter identification litigation)

Litigation

Status of litigation in Indiana: On January 12 the briefing was completed. The parties are waiting for a decision from the U.S. district judge. The judge understood that one of the parties would seek a stay from the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals. The parties anticipate a decision in late March or early April. Mr. Webber did the discovery and depositions for the litigation. Mr. Webber feared the plaintiffs were going to state in their reply brief that HAVA's statewide database requirement would resolve the problems alleged by the state. However, the plaintiffs failed to do so, relying on a Motor Voter Act argument instead. Mr. Webber believes that the voter ID at issue will make the system much more user-friendly for the poll workers. The Legislature passed the ID legislation, and the state is defending it, on the basis of the problem of the perception of fraud.

Incidents of fraud and intimidation

Mr. Webber thinks that no one can put his or her thumb on whether there has been voter fraud in Indiana. For instance, if someone votes in place of another, no one knows about it. There have been no prosecuted cases of polling place fraud in Indiana. There is no recorded history of documented cases, but it does happen. In the litigation, he used articles from around the country about instances of voter fraud, but even in those examples there were ultimately no prosecutions, for example the case of Milwaukee. He also stated in the litigation that there are all kinds of examples of dead people voting---totaling in the hundreds of thousands of votes across the country.

One interesting example of actual fraud in Indiana occurred when a poll worker, in a poll using punch cards, glued the chads back and then punched out other chads for his candidate. But this would not be something that would be addressed by an ID requirement.

He also believes that the perception that the polls are loose can be addressed by the legislature. The legislature does not need to wait to see if the statewide database solves the problems and therefore affect the determination of whether an ID requirement is necessary. When he took the deposition of the Republican Co-Director, he said he thought Indiana was getting ahead of the curve. That is, there have been problems around the country, and confidence in elections is low. Therefore Indiana is now in front of getting that confidence back.

Mr. Webber stated that the largest vote problem in Indiana is absentee ballots. Absentee ballot fraud and vote buying are the most documented cases. It used to be the law that applications for absentee ballots could be sent anywhere. In one case absentee votes were exchanged for “a job on election day”---meaning one vote for a certain price. The election was contested and the trial judge found that although there was vote fraud, the incidents of such were less than the margin of victory and so he refused to overturn the election. Mr. Webber appealed the case for the state and argued the judge used the wrong statute. The Indiana Supreme Court agreed and reversed. Several people were prosecuted as a result – those cases are still pending.

VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

Process

In Indiana, voter complaints first come to the attorney for the county election board who can recommend that a hearing be held. If criminal activity was found, the case could be referred to the county prosecutor or in certain instances to the Indiana Attorney General’s Office. In practice, the Attorney General almost never handles such cases.

Mr. Webber has had experience training county of election boards in preserving the integrity and security of the polling place from political or party officials. Mr. Webber stated that the Indiana voter rolls need to be culled. He also stated that in Southern Indiana a large problem was vote buying while in Northern Indiana a large problem was based on government workers feeling compelled to vote for the party that gave them their jobs.

Recommendations

- Mr. Webber believes that all election fraud and intimidation complaints should be referred to the Attorney General’s Office to circumvent the problem of local political prosecutions. The Attorney General should take more responsibility for complaints of fraud because at the local level, politics interferes. At the local level, everyone knows each other, making it harder prosecute.
- Indiana currently votes 6 am to 6 pm on a weekday. Government workers and retirees are the only people who are available to work the polls. Mr. Webber suggested that the biggest change should be to move elections to weekends. This would involve more people acting as poll workers who would be much more careful about what was going on.
- Early voting at the clerk’s office is good because the people there know what they are doing. People would be unlikely to commit fraud at the clerk’s office. This should be expanded to other polling places in addition to that of the county clerk.
- Finally, Mr. Webber believes polling places should be open longer, run more professionally but that there needs to be fewer of them so that they are staffed by only the best, most professional people.

Heather Dawn Thompson, Director of Government Relations, National Congress of American Indians

Recent trends

Native election protection operations have intensified recently for several reasons. While election protection efforts in Native areas have been ongoing, leaders realized that they were failing to develop internal infrastructure or cultivate locally any of the knowledge and expertise which would arrive and leave with external protection groups.

Moreover, in recent years partisan groups have become more aware of the power of the native vote, and have become more active in native communities. This has partly resulted in an extreme increase in voter intimidation tactics. As native communities are easy to identify, easy to target, and generally dominated by a single party, they are especially vulnerable to such tactics.

Initially, reports of intimidation were only passed along by word of mouth. But it became such a problem in the past 5 to 6 years that tribal leaders decided to raise the issue to the national level. Thompson points to the Cantwell election in 2000 and the Johnson election in South Dakota in 2002 as tipping points where many began to realize the Indian vote could matter in Senate and national elections.

Thompson stressed that Native Vote places a great deal of importance on being nonpartisan. While a majority of native communities vote Democratic, there are notable exceptions, including communities in Oklahoma and Alaska, and they have both parties engaging in aggressive tactics. However, she believes the most recent increase in suppression and intimidation tactics have come from Republican Party organizations.

Nature of Suppression/Intimidation of Native Voters

VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

Thompson categorizes suppression into judge related and poll-watcher related incidents, both of which may be purposeful or inadvertent, as well as longstanding legal-structural constraints.

Structural problems

One example of inadvertent suppression built into the system stems from the fact that many Indian communities also include significant numbers of non-Indians due to allotment. Non-Indians tend to be most active in the state and local government while Indians tend to be more involved in the tribal government. Thus, the individuals running elections end up being non-Indian. Having Indians vote at polling places staffed by non-Indians often results in incidents of disrespect towards Native voters (Thompson emphasized the considerable racism which persists against Indians in these areas). Also, judges aren't familiar with Indian last names and are more dismissive of solving discrepancies with native voters.

Structural problems also arise from laws which mandate that the tribal government cannot run state or local elections. In places like South Dakota, political leaders used to make it intentionally difficult for Native Americans to participate in elections. For example, state, local and federal elections could not be held in the same location as tribal elections, leading to confusion when tribal and other elections are held in different locations. Also, it is common to have native communities with few suitable sites, meaning that a state election held in a secondary location can suddenly impose transportation obstacles.

Thompson believes both state level and HAVA photo ID requirements have a considerable negative impact. For a number of reasons, many Indian voters don't have photo ID. Poor health care and poverty on reservations means that many children are born at home, leading to a lack of birth certificates necessary to obtain ID. Also, election workers and others may assume they are Hispanic, causing additional skepticism due to citizenship questions. There is a cultural issue as well—historically, whenever Indians register with the federal government it has been associated with a taking of land or removal of children. Thus many Indians avoid registering for anything with the government, even for tribal ID.

Thompson also offered examples of how the impact of ID requirements had been worsened by certain rules and the discriminatory way they have been carried out. In the South Dakota special election of 2003, poll workers told Native American voters that if they did not have ID with them and they lived within sixty miles of the precinct, the voter had to come back with ID. The poll workers did not tell the voters that they could vote by affidavit ballot and not need to return, as required by law. This was exacerbated by the fact that the poll workers didn't know the voters—as would be the case with non-Indian poll workers and Indian voters. Many left the poll site without voting and did not return.

In Minnesota, the state tried to prohibit the use of tribal ID's for voting outside of a reservation, even though Minnesota has a large urban Native population. Thompson believes this move was very purposeful, and despite any reasonable arguments from the Secretary of State, they had to file a lawsuit to stop the rule. They were very surprised to find national party representatives in the courtroom when they went to deal with lawsuit, representatives who could only have been alerted through a discussion with the Secretary of State.

Partisan Poll-Monitoring

Thompson believes the most purposeful suppression has been perpetrated by the party structures on an individual basis, of which South Dakota is a great example.

Some negative instances of poll monitoring are not purposeful. Both parties send in non-Indian, non-Western lawyers, largely from the East Coast, which can lead to uncomfortable cultural clashes. These efforts display a keen lack of understanding of these communities and the best way to negotiate within in them. But while it may be intimidating, it is not purposeful.

Yet there are also many instances of purposeful abuse of poll monitoring. While there were indeed problems during the 2002 Johnson election, it was small compared to the Janklow special election. Thompson says Republican workers shunned cultural understanding outreach, and had an extensive pamphlet of what to say at polls and were very aggressive about it. In one tactic, every time a voter would come up with no ID, poll monitors would repeat "You can't vote" over and over again, causing many voters to leave. This same tactic appeared across reservations, and eventually they looked to the Secretary of State to intervene.

In another example, the head of poll watchers drove from poll to poll and told voters without IDs to go home, to the point where the chief of police was going to evict him from the reservation. In Minnesota, on the Red Lake reservation, police actually did evict an aggressive poll watcher—the fact that the same strategies are employed several hundred miles apart points to standardized instructions.

None of these incidents ever went to court. Thompson argues this is due to few avenues for legal recourse. In addition, it is inherently difficult to settle these things, as they are he said-she said incidents and take place amidst the confusion of Election Day. Furthermore, poll watchers know what the outline of the law is, and they are careful to work within those parameters, leaving little room for legal action.

Other seeming instances of intimidation may be purely inadvertent, such as when, in 2002, the U.S. Attorney chose Election Day to give out subpoenas, and native voters stayed in their homes. In all fairness, she believes this was a misunderstanding.

The effect of intimidation on small communities is especially strong and is impossible to ultimately measure, as the ripple effect of rumors in insular communities can't be traced. In some communities, they try to combat this by using the Native radio to encourage people to vote and dispel myths.

She has suggestions for people who can describe incidents at a greater level of detail if interested.

Vote Buying and Fraud

They haven't found a great deal of evidence on vote-buying and fraud. When cash is offered to register voters, individuals may abuse this, although Thompson believes this is not necessarily unique to the Native community, but a reflection of high rates of poverty. This doesn't amount to a concerted effort at conspiracy, but instead represents isolated incidents of people not observing the rules. While Thompson believes looking into such incidents is a completely fair inquiry, she also believes it has been exploited for political purposes and to intimidate. For example, large law enforcement contingents were sent to investigate these incidents. As Native voters tend not to draw distinctions between law enforcement and other officials, this made them unlikely to help with elections.

Remedies

- As far as voter suppression is concerned, Native Vote has been asking the Department of Justice to look into what might be done, and to place more emphasis on law enforcement and combating intimidation. They have been urging the Department to focus on this at least much as it is focusing on enforcement of Section 203. Native groups have complained to DOJ repeatedly and DOJ has the entire log of handwritten incident reports they have collected. Therefore, Thompson recommends more DOJ enforcement of voting rights laws with respect to intimidation. People who would seek to abuse the process need to believe a penalty will be paid for doing so. Right now, there is no recourse and DOJ does not care, so both parties do it because they can.
- Certain states should rescind bars on nonpartisan poll watchers on Election Day; Thompson believes this is contrary to the nonpartisan, pro-Indian presence which would best facilitate voting in Native communities.
- As discussed above, Thompson believes ID requirements are a huge impediment to native voters. At a minimum, Thompson believes all states should be explicit about accepting tribal ID on Election Day.
- Liberalized absentee ballot rules would also be helpful to Native communities. As many Indian voters are disabled and elderly, live far away from their precinct, and don't have transportation, tribes encourage members to vote by absentee ballot. Yet obstacles remain. Some voters are denied a chance to vote if they have requested a ballot and then show up at the polls. Thompson believes South Dakota's practice of tossing absentee ballots if a voter shows up at the ED would serve as an effective built-in protection. In addition, she believes there should be greater scrutiny of GOTV groups requesting absentee ballots without permission. Precinct location is a longstanding issue, but Thompson recognizes that states have limited resources. In the absence of those resources, better absentee ballot procedures are needed.

- Basic voter registration issues and access are also important in native communities and need to be addressed.
- Thompson is mixed on what restrictions should be placed on poll watcher behavior, as she believes open elections and third party helpers are both important. However, she would be willing to explore some sort of stronger recourse and set of rules concerning poll watchers' behavior. Currently, the parties are aware that no recourse exists, and try to get away with what they will. This is not unique to a single party—both try to stay within law while shaking people up. The existing VRA provision is 'fluffy'—unless you have a consent decree, you have very little power. Thompson thinks a general voter intimidation law that is left a bit broad but that nonetheless makes people aware of some sort of kickback could be helpful.

Jason Torchinsky, Assistant General Counsel, American Center for Voting Rights

Regarding the August 2005 Report

ACVR has not followed up on any of the cases it cited in the 2005 report to see if the allegations had been resolved in some manner. Mr. Torchinsky stated that there are problems with allegations of fraud in the report and prosecution---just because there was no prosecution, does not mean there was no vote fraud. He believes that it is very hard to come up with a measure of voter fraud short of prosecution. Mr. Torchinsky does not have a good answer to resolve this problem.

P. 35 of the Report indicates that there were coordinated efforts by groups to coordinate fraudulent voter registrations. P. 12 of the Ohio Report references a RICO suit filed against organizations regarding fraudulent voter registrations. Mr. Torchinsky does not know what happened in that case. He stated that there was a drive to increase voter registration numbers regardless of whether there was an actual person to register. He stated that when you have an organization like ACORN involved all over the place, there is reason to believe it is national in scope. When it is the same groups in multiple states, this leads to the belief that it is a concerted effort.

Voting Problems

Mr. Torchinsky stated there were incidents of double voting---ex. a double voter in Kansas City, MO. If the statewide voter registration database requirement of HAVA is properly implemented, he believes it will stop multiple voting in the same state. He supports the HAVA requirement, if implemented correctly. Since Washington State implemented its statewide database, the Secretary of State has initiated investigations into felons who voted. In Philadelphia the major problem is permitting polling places in private homes and bars – even the homes of party chairs.

Mr. Torchinsky believes that voter ID would help, especially in cities in places like Ohio and Philadelphia, PA. The ACVR legislative fund supports the Real ID requirements suggested by the Carter-Baker Commission. Since federal real ID requirements will be in place in 2010, any objection to a voter ID requirement should be moot.

Mr. Torchinsky stated that there are two major poll and absentee voting problems---(1) fraudulent votes-ex. dead people voting in St. Louis and (2) people voting who are not legally eligible-ex. felons in most places. He also believes that problems could arise in places that still transport paper ballots from the voting location to a counting room. However, he does not believe this is as widespread a problem now as it once was.

Suggestions

Implement the Carter-Baker Commission recommendations because they represent a reasonable compromise between the political parties.

Data Collection and Monitoring

- The (Voting) section developed a new database before the 2004 election to log complaint calls and what was done to follow up on them. They opened many investigations as a result of these complaints, including one on the long lines in Ohio (see DOJ letter on website, as well as critical commentary on the DOJ letter's analysis). DOJ found no Section 2 violation in Ohio. John Tanner should be able to give us this data. However, the database does not include complaints that were received by monitors and observers in the field.
- All attorney observers in the field are required to submit reports after Election Day to the Department. These reports would give us a very good sense of the scope and type of problems that arose on that day and whether they were resolved on the spot or required further action.
- The monitoring in 2004 was the biggest operation ever. Prior to 2000, only certain jurisdictions could be observed – a VRA covered jurisdiction that was certified or a jurisdiction that had been certified by a court, e.g. through a consent decree. Since that time, and especially in 2004, the Department has engaged in more informal "monitoring." In those cases, monitors assigned to certain jurisdictions, as opposed to observers, can only watch in the polling place with permission from the jurisdiction. The Department picked locations based on whether they had been monitored in the past, there had been problems before, or there had been allegations in the past. Many problems that arose were resolved by monitors on the spot.

Processes for Cases not Resolved at the Polling Site

- If the monitor or observer believes that a criminal act has taken place, he refers it to the Public Integrity Section (PIN). If it is an instance of racial intimidation, it is referred to the Civil Rights Criminal Division. However, very few such cases are prosecuted because they are very hard to prove. The statutes covering such crimes require actual violence or the threat of violence in order to make a case. As a result, most matters are referred to PIN because they operate under statutes that make these cases easier to prove. In general, there are not a high number of prosecutions for intimidation and suppression.
- If the act is not criminal, it may be brought as a civil matter, but only if it violated the Voting Rights Act – in other words, only if there is a racial aspect to the case. Otherwise the only recourse is to refer it to PIN.
- However, PIN tends not to focus on intimidation and suppression cases, but rather cases such as alleged noncitizen voting, etc. Public Integrity used to only go after systematic efforts to corrupt the system. Now they focus on scattered individuals, which is a questionable resource choice. Criminal prosecutors over the past 5 years have been given more resources and more leeway because of a shift in focus and policy toward noncitizens and double voting, etc.
- There have been very few cases brought involving African American voters. There have been 7 Section 2 cases brought since 2001 – only one was brought on behalf of African American voters. That case was initiated under the Clinton administration. The others have included Latinos and discrimination against whites.

Types of Fraud and Intimidation Occurring

- There is no evidence that polling place fraud is a problem. There is also no evidence that the NVRA has increased the opportunity for fraud. Moreover, regardless of NVRA's provisions, an election official can always look into a voter's registration if he or she believes that person should no longer be on the list. The Department is now suing Missouri because of its poor registration list.

- The biggest problem is with absentee ballots. The photo ID movement is a vote suppression strategy. This type of suppression is a bigger problem than intimidation. There has been an increase in vote suppression over the last five years, but it has been indirect, often in the way that laws are interpreted and implemented. Unequal implementation of ID requirements at the polls based on race would be a VRA violation.
- The most common type of intimidation occurring is open hostility by poll workers toward minorities. It is a judgment call whether this is a crime or not – Craig Donsanto of PIN decides if it rises to a criminal matter.
- Election Day challenges at the polls could be a VRA violation but such a case has never been formally pursued. Such cases are often resolved on the spot. Development of a pre-election challenge list targeted at minorities would be a VRA violation but this also has never been pursued. These are choices of current enforcement policy.
- Long lines due to unequal distribution of voting machines based on race, list purges based on race and refusal to offer a provisional ballot on the basis of race would also be VRA violations.

Recommendations

- Congress should pass a new law that allows the Department to bring civil actions for suppression that is NOT race based, for example, deceptive practices or wholesale challenges to voters in jurisdictions that tend to vote heavily for one party.
- Given the additional resources and latitude given to the enforcement of acts such as double voting and noncitizen voting, there should be an equal commitment to enforcement of acts of intimidation and suppression cases.
- There should also be increased resources dedicated to expanded monitoring efforts. This might be the best use of resources since monitors and observers act as a deterrent to fraud and intimidation.

Joseph Sandler, Counsel to the Democratic National Committee

2004-Administrative Incompetence v. Fraud

Sandler believes the 2004 election was a combination of administrative incompetence and fraud. Sandler stated there was a deliberate effort by the Republicans to disenfranchise voters across the country. This was accomplished by mailing out cards to registered voters and then moving to purge from the voters list those whose cards were returned. Sandler indicated that in New Mexico there was a deliberate attempt by Republicans to purge people registered by third parties. He stated that there were intentional efforts to disenfranchise voters by election officials like Ken Blackwell in Ohio.

The problems with machine distribution in 2004 were not deliberate. However, Sandler believes that a large problem exists in the states because there are no laws that spell out a formula to allocate so many voting machines per voter.

Sandler was asked how often names were intentionally purged from the voter lists. He responded that there will be a lot of names purged as a result of the creation of the voter lists under HAVA. However, Sandler stated most wrongful purging results from incompetence.

Sandler also said there was not much intimidation at the polls because most such efforts are deterred and that the last systematic effort was in Philadelphia in 2003 where Republicans had official looking cars and people with badges and uniforms, etc.

Sandler stated that deliberate dissemination of misinformation was more incidental, with individuals misinforming and not a political party. Disinformation did occur in small Spanish speaking communities.

Republicans point to instances of voter registration fraud but Sandler believes it did not occur, except for once in a blue moon. Sandler did not believe non-citizen voting was a problem. He also does not believe that there is voter impersonation at the polls and that Republicans allege this as a way of disenfranchising voters through restrictive voter identification rules.

Fraud and Intimidation Trends

- Sandler stated that over the years there has been a shift from organized efforts to intimidate minority voters through voter identification requirements, improper purging, failure to properly register voters, not allocating enough voting machines, failure to properly use the provisional ballot, etc., by voter officials as well as systematic efforts by Republicans to deregister voters.
- At the federal level, Sandler said, the voting division has become so politicized that it is basically useless now on intimidation claims. At the local level, Sandler does not believe politics prevents or hinders prosecution for vote fraud.

Sandler's Recommendations:

- Moving the voter lists to the state level is a good idea where carefully done
- Provisional ballots rules should follow the law and not be over-used
- No voter ID
- Partisanship should be taken out of election administration, perhaps by giving that responsibility by someone other than the Secretary of State. There should at least be conflict of interest rules
- Enact laws that allow private citizens to bring suit under state law

All suggestions from the DNC Ohio Report:

1. The Democratic Party must continue its efforts to monitor election law reform in all fifty states, the District of Columbia and territories.
2. States should be encouraged to codify into law all required election practices, including requirements for the adequate training of official poll workers.
3. States should adopt uniform and clear published standards for the distribution of voting equipment and the assignment of official pollworkers among precincts, to ensure adequate and nondiscriminatory access. These standards should be based on set ratios of numbers of machines and pollworkers per number of voters expected to turn out, and should be made available for public comment before being adopting.
4. States should adopt legislation to make clear and uniform the rules on voter registration.
5. The Democratic Party should monitor the processing of voter registrations by local election authorities on an ongoing basis to ensure the timely processing of registrations and changes, including both newly registered voters and voters who move within a jurisdiction or the state, and the Party should ask state Attorneys General to take action where necessary to force the timely updating of voter lists.
6. States should be urged to implement statewide voter lists in accordance with the Help America Vote Act ("HAVA"), the election reform law enacted by Congress in 2002 following the Florida debacle.
7. State and local jurisdictions should adopt clear and uniform rules on the use of, and the counting of, provisional ballots, and distribute them for public comment well in advance of each election day.
8. The Democratic Party should monitor the purging and updating of registered voter lists by local officials, and the Party should challenge, and ask state Attorneys General to challenge, unlawful purges and other improper list maintenance practices.
9. States should not adopt requirements that voters show identification at the polls, beyond those already required by federal law (requiring that identification be shown only by first time voters who did not show identification when registering.)
10. State Attorneys General and local authorities should vigorously enforce, to the full extent permitted by state law, a voter's right to vote without showing identification.
11. Jurisdictions should be encouraged to use precinct-tabulated optical scan systems with a computer assisted device at each precinct, in preference to touchscreen ("direct recording equipment" or "DRE") machines.

12. Touchscreen (DRE) machines should not be used until a reliable voter verifiable audit feature can be uniformly incorporated into these systems. In the event of a recount, the paper or other auditable record should be considered the official record.
13. Remaining punchcard systems should be discontinued.
14. States should ask state Attorneys General to challenge unfair or discriminatory distribution of equipment and resources where necessary, and the Democratic Party should bring litigation as necessary.
15. Voting equipment vendors should be required to disclose their source code so that it can be examined by third parties. No voting machine should have wireless connections or be able to connect to the Internet.
16. Any equipment used by voters to vote or by officials to tabulate the votes should be used exclusively for that purpose. That is particularly important for tabulating/aggregating computers.
17. States should adopt "no excuse required" standards for absentee voting.

18. States should make it easier for college students to vote in the jurisdiction in which their school is located.
19. States should develop procedures to ensure that voting is facilitated, without compromising security or privacy, for all eligible voters living overseas.
20. States should make voter suppression a criminal offense at the state level, in all states.
21. States should improve the training of pollworkers.
22. States should expend significantly more resources in educating voters on where, when and how to vote.
23. Partisan officials who volunteer to work for a candidate should not oversee or administer any elections.

John Ravitz, Executive Director, New York City Board of Elections

Process

If there is an allegation of fraud or intimidation, the commissioners can rule to act on it. For example, in 2004 there were allegations in Queens that people had registered to vote using the addresses of warehouses and stores. The Board sent out teams of investigators to look into this. The Board then developed a challenge list that was to be used at the polls if any of the suspect voters showed up to vote. If the allegation rises to a criminal level, the Board will refer it to the county district attorney. If a poll worker or election official is involved, the Board may conduct an internal investigation. That individual would be interviewed, and if there is validity to the claim, the Board would take action.

Incidences of Fraud and Intimidation

Mr. Ravitz says there have been no complaints about voter intimidation since he has been at the Board. There have been instances of over-aggressive poll workers, but nothing threatening. Voter fraud has also generally not been a problem.

In 2004, the problem was monitors from the Department of Justice intimidating voters. They were not properly trained, and were doing things like going into the booth with voters. The Board had to contact their Department supervisors to put a stop to it.

Charges regarding "ballot security teams" have generally just been political posturing.

The problem of people entering false information on voter registration forms is a problem. However, sometimes a name people allege is false actually turns out to be the voter's real name. Moreover, these types of acts do not involve anyone actually casting a fraudulent ballot.

With respect to the issue of voters being registered in both New York and Florida, the Board now compares its list with that of Florida and other places to address the problem. This will be less of an issue with the use of statewide voter registration databases, as information becomes easier to share. Despite the number of people who were on the voter registration lists of both jurisdictions, there was no one from those lists who voted twice.

Most of the problems at the polls have to do with poll workers not doing what they are supposed to do, not any sort of malfeasance. This indicates that improved training is the most important measure we can take.

There have been instances in which poll workers ask voters for identification when they shouldn't. However, the poll workers seem to do it when they cannot understand the name when the voter tells it to them. The Board has tried to train them that no matter what, the poll worker cannot ask for identification in order to get the person's name.

Absentee ballot fraud has also not been a problem in New York City. This is likely because absentee ballots are counted last – eight days after election day. This is so that they can be checked thoroughly and verified. This is a practice other jurisdictions might consider.

New York City has not had a problem with ex-felons voting or with ex-felons not knowing their voting rights. The City has not had any problems in recent years with deceptive practices, such as flyers providing misinformation about voting procedures.

Recommendations

Better poll worker training

John Tanner, Director, Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, U.S. Department of Justice

Mr. Tanner would not give us any information about or data from the section's election complaint in-take phone logs; data or even general information from the Interactive Case Management (ICM) system-its formal process for tracking and managing work activities in pursuing complaints and potential violations of the voting laws; and would give us only a selected few samples of attorney-observer reports, reports that every Voting Section attorney who is observing elections at poll sites on Election Day is required to submit. He would not discuss in any manner any current investigations or cases the section is involved in. He also did not believe it was his position to offer us recommendations as to how his office, elections, or the voting process might be improved.

Authority and Process

The Voting Section, in contrast to the Public Integrity section as Craig Donsanto described it, typically looks only at systemic problems, not problems caused by individuals. Indeed, the section never goes after individuals because it does not have the statutory authority to do so. In situations in which individuals are causing problems at the polls and interfering with voting rights, the section calls the local election officials to resolve it.

Federal voting laws only apply to state action, so the section only sues local governments – it does not have any enforcement power over individuals. Most often, the section enters into consent agreements with governments that focus on poll worker training, takes steps to restructure how polls are run, and deals with problems on Election Day on the spot. Doing it this way has been most effective – for example, while the section used to have the most observers in the South, systematic changes forced upon those jurisdictions have made it so now the section does not get complaints from the South.

The section can get involved even where there is no federal candidate on the ballot if there is a racial issue under the 14th and 15th Amendments.

When the section receives a complaint, attorneys first determine whether it is a matter of individuals or systemic. When deciding what to do with the complaint, the section errs on the side of referring it criminally because they do not want civil litigation to complicate a possible criminal case.

When a complaint comes in, the attorneys ask questions to see if there are even problems there that the complainant is not aware are violations of the law. For example, in the Boston case, the attorney did not just look at Spanish language cases under section 203, but also brought a Section 2 case for violations regarding Chinese and Vietnamese voters. When looking into a case, the attorneys look for specificity, witnesses and supporting evidence.

Often, lawsuits bring voluntary compliance.

Voter Intimidation

Many instances of what some people refer to as voter intimidation are more unclear now. For example, photographing voters at the polls has been called intimidating, but now everyone is at the polls with a camera. It is hard to know when something is intimidation and it is difficult to show that it was an act of intimidation.

The fact that both parties are engaging in these tactics now makes it more complicated. It makes it difficult to point the finger at any one side.

The inappropriate use of challengers on the basis of race would be a violation of the law. Mr. Tanner was unaware that such allegations were made in Ohio in 2004. He said there had never been an investigation into the abusive use of challengers.

Mr. Tanner said a lot of the challenges are legitimate because you have a lot of voter registration fraud as a result of groups paying people to register voters by the form. They turn in bogus registration forms. Then the parties examine the registration forms and challenge them because 200 of them, for example, have addresses of a vacant lot.

However, Mr. Tanner said the Department was able to informally intervene in challenger situations in Florida, Atkinson County, Georgia and in Alabama, as was referenced in a February 23 Op-Ed in USA Today. Mr. Tanner reiterated the section takes racial targeting very seriously.

Refusal to provide provisional ballots would be a violation of the law that the section would investigate.

Deceptive practices are committed by individuals and would be a matter for the Public Integrity Section. Local government would have to be involved for the voting section to become involved.

VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

Unequal implementation of ID rules, or asking minority voters only for ID would be something the section would go after. Mr. Tanner was unaware of allegations of this in 2004. He said this is usually a problem where you have language minorities and the poll workers cannot understand the voters when they say their names. The section has never formally investigated or solely focused a case based on abuse of ID provisions. However, implementation of ID rules was part of the Section 2 case in San Diego. Mr. Tanner reiterated that the section is doing more than ever before.

When asked about the section's references to incidents of vote fraud in the documents related to the new state photo identification requirements, Mr. Tanner said the section only looks at retrogression, not at the wisdom of what a legislature does. In Georgia, for example, everyone statistically has identification, and more blacks have ID than whites. With respect to the letter to Senator Kit Bond regarding voter ID, the section did refer to the perception of concern about dead voters because of reporting by the Atlanta Journal-Constitution. It is understandable that when you have thousands of bogus registrations that there would be concerns about polling place fraud. Very close elections make this even more of an understandable concern. Putting control of registration lists in the hands of the states will be helpful because at this higher level of government you find a higher level of professionalism.

It is hard to know how much vote suppression and intimidation is taking place because it depends on one's definition of the terms – they are used very loosely by some people. However, the enforcement of federal law over the years has made an astounding difference so that the level of discrimination has plummeted. Registration of minorities has soared, as can be seen on the section's website. Mr. Tanner was unsure if the same was true with respect to turnout, but the gap is less. That information is not on the section's website.

The section is not filing as many Section 2 cases as compared to Section 203 cases because many of the jurisdictions sued under Section 2 in the past do not have issues anymore. Mr. Tanner said that race based problems are rare now.

NVRA has been effective in opening up the registration process. In terms of enforcement, Mr. Tanner said they do what they can when they have credible allegations. There is a big gap between complaints and what can be substantiated. Mr. Tanner stated that given the high quality of the attorneys now in the section, if they do not investigate it or bring action, that act complained of did not happen.

Recommendations

Mr. Tanner did not feel it was appropriate to make recommendations

Kevin Kennedy, Executive Director of the State Board of Elections, Wisconsin

Complaints of fraud and intimidation do not usually come to Kennedy's office. Kennedy says that complainants usually take their allegations to the media first because they are trying to make a political point.

Election Incidents of Fraud

The investigations into the 2004 election uncovered some cases of double voting and voting by felons who did not know they were not eligible to vote, but found no concerted effort to commit fraud. There have been a couple of guilty pleas as a result, although not a number in the double digits. The task force and news reports initially referred to 100 cases of double voting and 200 cases of felon voting, but there were not nearly that many prosecutions. Further investigation since the task force investigation uncovered that in some instances there were mis-marks by poll workers, fathers and sons mistaken for the same voter, and even a husband and wife marked as the same voter. The double votes that are believed to have occurred were a mixture of absentee and polling place votes. It is unclear how many of these cases were instances of voting in two different locations.

In discussing the case from 2000 in which a student claimed – falsely – that he had voted several times, Kennedy said that double voting can be done. The deterrent is that it's a felony, and that one person voting twice is not an effective way to influence an election. One would need to get a lot of people involved for it to work.

The task force set up to investigate the 2004 election found a small number of illegal votes but given the 7,000 alleged, it was a relatively small number. There was no pattern of fraud.

EAC SUMMARY OF EXPERT INTERVIEWS FOR
VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

The one case Kennedy could recall of an organized effort to commit fraud was in the spring of 2003 or 2004. A community service agency had voters request that absentee ballots be sent to the agency instead of to the voters and some of those ballots were signed without the voters' knowledge. One person was convicted, the leader of the enterprise.

In Milwaukee, the main contention was that there were more ballots than voters. However, it was found that the 7,000 vote disparity was tied to poll worker error. The task force found that there was no concerted effort involved. Kennedy explained that there are many ways a ballot can get into a machine without a voter getting a number. These include a poll worker forgetting to give the voter one; someone does Election Day registration and fills out a registration form but does not get a number because the transaction all takes place at one table; and in Milwaukee, 20,000 voters who registered were not put on the list in time and as a short term solution the department sent the original registration forms to the polling places to be used instead of the list to provide proof of registration. This added another element of confusion that might have led to someone not getting a voter number.

The Republican Party used this original list and contracted with a private vendor to do a comparison with the U.S. postal list. They found initially that there were 5,000 bad addresses, and then later said there were 35,000 illegitimate addresses. When the party filed a complaint, the department told them they could force the voters on their list to cast a challenge ballot. On Election Day, the party used the list but found no one actually voting from those addresses. Kennedy suspects that the private vendor made significant errors when doing the comparison.

In terms of noncitizen voting, Kennedy said that there is a Russian community in Milwaukee that the Republican Party singles out every year but it doesn't go very far. Kennedy has not seen much in the way of allegations of noncitizen voting.

However, when applying for a drivers license, a noncitizen could register to vote. There is no process for checking citizenship at this point, and the statewide registration database will not address this. Kennedy is not aware of any cases of noncitizen voting as a result, but it might have happened.

Kennedy said that the biggest concern seemed to be suspicions raised when groups of people are brought into the polling site from group homes, usually homes for the disabled. There are allegations that these voters are being told how to vote.

Incidents of Voter Intimidation

In 2004, there was a lot of hype about challenges, but in Wisconsin, a challenger must articulate a basis under oath. This acts as a deterrent, but at the same time it creates the potential that someone might challenge everyone and create long lines, keeping people from voting. In 2004, the Republican Party could use its list of suspect addresses as a legitimate basis for challenges, so there is the potential for abuse. It is also hard to train poll workers on that process. In 2004, there were isolated cases of problems with challengers.

In 2002, a flyer was circulated only in Milwaukee claiming that you had vote by noon. This was taken as an intimidation tactic by the Democrats.

Reforms

Wisconsin has had difficulty with its database because 1) they have had a hard time getting a good product out of the vendor and 2) until now there was no registration record for one-quarter of the voters. Any jurisdiction with fewer than 5000 voters was not required to have a registration list.

In any case, once these performance issues are worked out, Kennedy does believe the statewide voter registration database will be very valuable. In particular, it will mean that people who move will not be on more than one list anymore. It should also address the double voting issue by identifying who is doing it, catching people who do it, and identifying where it could occur.

Recommendations

- Better trained poll workers
- Ensure good security procedures for the tabulation process and more transparency in the vote counting process

Evelyn Stratton, Justice, Supreme Court of Ohio

The 2004 Election

Justice Stratton stated that usually in the period right before an election, filings die down due to the Ohio expedited procedures for electoral challenges. However, the 2004 election was unusual because there were motions and cases decided up to the day of the election. Justice Stratton believed that most of the allegations were knee-jerk reactions without any substance. For example, without any factual claims, suit was brought alleging that all voter challengers posed a threat to voters. Thematically, allegations were either everyday voting problems or "conspiracies" depending on where the complaint came from. The major election cases in 2004 revolved around Secretary of State Blackwell.

Justice Stratton made a point that the Ohio Supreme Court bent over backwards in the 2004 election to be fair to both sides. There was never any discussion about a ruling helping one political party more than the other.

Justice Stratton cited two cases that summarize and refute the 2004 complaints---819 NE 2d 1125 (Ohio 2004) and 105 Ohio St. 3d 458 (2004).

General Election Fraud Issues

Justice Stratton has seen very few fraud cases in Ohio. Most challenges are for technical statutory reasons. She remembered one instance where a man who assisted handicapped voters marked the ballot differently than the voter wanted. Criminal charges were brought against this man and the question that the Ohio Supreme Court had to decide was whether ballots could be opened and inspected to see how votes were cast.

Justice Stratton claimed she knew of isolated incidences of fictitious voter registration but these were not prosecuted. She has not seen any evidence of ballots being stuffed, dead people voting, etc.

Suggestions for Changes in Voting Procedures

- The Ohio Supreme Court is very strict about latches---if a person sits on their rights too long, they loose the right to file suit. The Ohio expedited procedures make election challenges run very smooth. Justice Stratton does not remember any suits brought on the day of the election.
- lower courts need to follow the rules for the expedited procedures. Even given the anomalies with lower courts permitting late election challenges in 2004, the Ohio Supreme Court does not want to make a new rule unless this pattern repeats itself in 2008.
- last minute challenges should not be permitted
- supports a non-partisan head of state elections.

Tony Sirvello, Executive Director, International Association of Clerks, Recorders, Election Officials and Treasurers

Incidents of Election Fraud

Sirvello stated that one problem with election crimes is that they are not high on the priority list of either district attorneys or grand juries. Therefore, complaints of election crime very rarely are prosecuted or are indicted by the grand jury. In 1996 in Harris County, 14 people voted twice but the grand jury refused to indict. One woman voted twice, once during early voting and once on Election Day. She said she thought there were two elections. The jury believed her. Sirvello believes none of the people intentionally voted more than once. He said that he believes double voting is not as big of an issue as people make it out to be.

In 1986, it was found that there were 300 more ballots than voter signatures. It was clear that the elections officials stuffed the ballot boxes. The case was brought before a grand jury, but there was no indictment because all of the defendants were friends and relatives of each other and none would admit what had been done.

Sirvello stated that there have been isolated circumstances where a voter would show up at the poll and his name had already been signed and he had voted.

Finally, Sirvello indicated that some people who worked in Houston but did not live in Harris County were permitted to vote.

Specific Absentee Ballot/Vote By Mail Issues

Sirvello said that mail voting presents the largest problem. With mail voting there is too much opportunity to influence voters or to fraudulently request a ballot. If one applied for an absentee ballot, their name and address was made available to candidates and political consultants who would often send people to collect the ballot. Many did not want to give up the ballot but wanted to mail it personally. The result was to discourage voting.

In Texas, a person could only apply for an absentee ballot if over 65 years of age. Parties, candidates and consultants would get the list of voters over 65 and send them a professional mail piece telling them they could vote by mail and a ballot with everything filled out except the signature. Problems ensued -- for example, voters would print their names rather than sign them, and the ballot was rejected. In other cases, the elderly would give their absentee ballot to someone else.

If a person applied for an absentee ballot but then decided not to cast it but to vote in person, that person had to bring the non-voted absentee ballot to the poll and surrender it. If they did not they would not be permitted to vote at the polling place.

Incidents of Voter Intimidation

Sirvello only reported isolated cases of intimidation or suppression in Harris County. These mostly occurred in Presidential elections. Some people perceived intimidation when being told they were not eligible to vote under the law. Sirvello stated that the big issue in elections now is whether there should be a paper trail for touch screen voting.

Recommendations

- District attorneys need to put more emphasis on election crime so people will not believe that it goes unpunished.
- There should be either a national holiday for Election Day or a day should be given off of work without counting as a vacation day so that better poll workers are available and there can be more public education on election administration procedures.

Harry Van Sickle, Commissioner of Elections, and Deputy Chief Counsel to the Secretary of State Larry Boyle, Pennsylvania

Fraud and Intimidation

Neither Van Sickle nor Boyle was aware of any fraud of any kind in the state of Pennsylvania over the last five years. They are not aware of the commission of any deceptive practices, such as flyers that intentionally misinform as to voting procedures. They also have never heard of any incidents of voter intimidation. With respect to the mayoral election of 2003, the local commission would know about that.

Since the Berks County case of 2003, where the Department of Justice found poll workers who treated Latino voters with hostility among other voting rights violations, the Secretary's office has brought together Eastern Pennsylvania election administrators and voting advocates to discuss the problems. As a result, other counties have voluntarily chosen to follow the guidance of the Berks County federal court order.

Regarding the allegations of fraud that surrounded the voter identification debate, Mr. Boyle said was not aware of any instances of fraud involving identity. He believes this is because Pennsylvania has laws in place to prevent this. For example, in 2002 the state legislature passed an ID law that is stricter than HAVA's -- it requires all first time voters to present identification. In addition, the SURE System --

the state's statewide voter registration database – is a great anti-fraud mechanism. The system will be in place statewide in the May 2006 election.

In addition, the state took many steps before the 2004 election to make sure it would be smooth. They had attorneys in the counties to consult on problems as well as staff at the central office to take calls regarding problems. In addition, in 2004 the state used provisional ballots for the first time. This resolved many of the problems that used to occur on Election Day.

Mr. Boyle is not aware of any voter registration fraud. This is because when someone registers to vote, the administrator does a duplicate check. In addition, under new laws a person registering to vote must provide their drivers license or Social Security number which are verified through the Department of Motor Vehicles and the Social Security Administration. Therefore, it would be unlikely that someone would be able to register to vote falsely.

Process

Most problems are dealt with at the local level and do not come within the review of the Secretary of State's office. For instance, if there is a complaint of intimidation, this is generally dealt with by the county courts which are specially designated solely to election cases on Election Day. The Secretary does not keep track of these cases. Since the passage of NVRA and HAVA counties will increasingly call the office when problems arise.

Recommendations

Mr. Boyle suggested we review the recommendations of the Pennsylvania Election Reform Task Force which is on the Secretary's website. Many of those recommendations have been introduced in the legislature.

Craig Donsanto, Director, Public Integrity Section, U.S. Department of Justice

Questions

How are Prosecution Decisions Made?

Craig Donsanto must approve all investigations that go beyond a preliminary stage, all charges, search warrant applications and subpoenas and all prosecutions. The decision to investigate is very sensitive because of the public officials involved. If a charge seems political, Donsanto will reject it. Donsanto gives possible theories for investigation. Donsanto and Noel Hillman will decide whether to farm out the case to an AUSA. Donsanto uses a concept called predication. In-other-words, there must be enough evidence to suggest a crime has been committed. The method of evaluation of this evidence depends on the type of evidence and its source. There are two types of evidence---factual (antisocial behavior) and legal (antisocial behavior leading to statutory violations). Whether an indictment will be brought depends on the likelihood of success before a jury. Much depends on the type of evidence and the source. Donsanto said he "knows it when he sees it." Donsanto will only indict if he is confident of a conviction assuming the worst case scenario – a jury trial.

A person under investigation will first receive a target letter. Often, a defendant who gets a target letter will ask for a departmental hearing. The defendant's case will be heard by Donsanto and Hillman. On occasion, the assistant attorney general will review the case. The department grants such hearings easily because such defendants are likely to provide information about others involved.

The Civil Rights Division, Voting Rights Section makes its own decisions on prosecution. The head of that division is John Tanner. There is a lot of cooperation between

Does the Decision to Prosecute Incorporate Particular Political Considerations within a State Such as a One Party System or a System in which the Party in Power Controls the Means of Prosecution and Suppresses Opposition Complaints?

Yes. Before, the department would leave it to the states. Now, if there is racial animus involved in the case, there is political bias involved, or the prosecutor is not impartial, the department will take it over.

Does it Matter if the Complaint Comes from a Member of a Racial Minority?

EAC SUMMARY OF EXPERT INTERVIEWS FOR
VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

No. But if the question involves racial animus, that has also always been an aggravating factor, making it more likely the Department will take it over

What Kinds of Complaints Would Routinely Override Principles of Federalism?

Federalism is no longer big issue. DOJ is permitted to prosecute whenever there is a candidate for federal office.

Are There Too Few Prosecutions?

DOJ can't prosecute everything.

What Should Be Done to Improve the System?

- The problem is asserting federal jurisdiction in non-federal elections. It is preferable for the federal government to pursue these cases for the following reasons:
  - federal districts draw from a bigger and more diverse jury pool;
  - the DOJ is politically detached; local district attorneys are hamstrung by the need to be re-elected;
  - DOJ has more resources – local prosecutors need to focus on personal and property crimes---fraud cases are too big and too complex for them;
  - DOJ can use the grand jury process as a discovery technique and to test the strength of the case.
- In U.S. v. McNally, the court ruled that the mail fraud statute does not apply to election fraud. It was through the mail fraud statute that the department had routinely gotten federal jurisdiction over election fraud cases. 18 USC 1346, the congressional effort to "fix" McNally, did not include voter fraud.
- As a result, the department needs a new federal law that allows federal prosecution whenever a federal instrumentality is used, e.g. the mail, federal funding, interstate commerce. The department has drafted such legislation, which was introduced but not passed in the early 1990s..

Other Information

The Department has held four symposia for DEOs and FBI agents since the initiation of the Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative. In 2003, civil rights leaders were invited to make speeches, but were not permitted to take part in the rest of the symposium. All other symposia have been closed to the public. (Peg will be sending us the complete training materials used at those sessions. These are confidential and are the subject of FOIA litigation).

There are two types of attorneys in the division:

- prosecutors, who take on cases when the jurisdiction of the section requires it; the US Attorney has recused him or herself; or when the US Attorney is unable to handle the case (most frequent reason) and
- braintrust attorneys who analyze the facts, formulate theories, and draft legal documents.

Cases:

Donsanto provided us with three case lists: Open cases (still being investigated) as of January 13, 2006 – confidential; election fraud prosecutions and convictions as a result of the Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative October 2002-January 13, 2006 and cases closed for lack of evidence as of January 13, 2006

If we want more documents related to any case, we must get those documents from the states. The department will not release them to us.

Although the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate complaints of fraud, the number of cases that the department is investigating and the number of indictments the department is pursuing are both up dramatically.

Since 2002, the department has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters, and double voters than ever before. Previously, cases were only brought when there was a pattern or scheme to corrupt the process. Charges were not brought against individuals – those cases went un-prosecuted. This change in direction, focus, and level of aggression was by the decision of the Attorney General. The reason for the change was for deterrence purposes.

EAC SUMMARY OF EXPERT INTERVIEWS FOR

The department is currently undertaking three pilot projects to determine what works in developing the cases and obtaining convictions and what works with juries in such matters to gain convictions:

- Felon voters in Milwaukee.
- Alien voters in the Southern District of Florida. FYI – under 18 USC 611, to prosecute for “alien voting” there is no intent requirement. Conviction can lead to deportation. Nonetheless, the department feels compelled to look at mitigating factors such as was the alien told it was OK to vote, does the alien have a spouse that is a citizen.
- Double voters in a variety of jurisdictions.

The department does not maintain records of the complaints that come in from DEOs, U.S attorneys and others during the election that are not pursued by the department. Donsanto asserted that U.S. attorneys never initiate frivolous investigations.

Sharon Priest, former Secretary of State, Arkansas

Process:

When there is an allegation of election fraud or intimidation, the county clerk refers it to the local district attorney. Most often, the DA does not pursue the claim. There is little that state administrators can do about this because in Arkansas, county clerks are partisanly elected and completely autonomous. Indeed, county clerks have total authority to determine who is an eligible voter.

Data:

There is very little data collected in Arkansas on fraud and intimidation cases. Any information there might be stays at the county level. This again is largely because the clerks have so much control and authority, and will not release information. Any statewide data that does exist might be gotten from Susie Storms from the State Board of Elections.

Most Common Problems

The perception of fraud is much greater than the actual incidence of fraud.

- The DMV does not implement NVRA in that it does not take the necessary steps when providing the voter registration forms and does not process them properly. This leads to both ineligible voters potentially getting on the voting rolls (e.g. noncitizens, who have come to get a drivers license, fill out a voter registration form having no intention of actually voting) and voter thinking they are registered to vote to find they are not on the list on Election Day. Also, some people think they are automatically registered if they have applied for a drivers license.
- Absentee ballot fraud is the most frequent form of election fraud.
- In Arkansas, it is suspected that politicians pay ministers to tell their congregations to vote for them
- In 2003, the State Board documented 400 complaints against the Pulaski County Clerk for engaging in what was at least borderline fraud, e.g. certain people not receiving their absentee ballots. The case went to a grand jury but no indictment was brought.
- Transportation of ballot boxes is often insecure making it very easy for insiders to tamper with the ballots or stuff the ballot boxes. Priest has not actually witnessed this happen, but believes it may have.
- Intimidation at the poll sites in court houses. Many voters are afraid of the county judges or county employees and therefore will not vote. They justifiably believe their ballots will be opened by these employees to see who they voted for, and if they voted against the county people, retribution might ensue.

EAC SUMMARY OF EXPERT INTERVIEWS FOR

- Undue challenges to minority language voters at the poll sites
- Paid registration collectors fill out phony names, but these individuals are caught before anyone is able to cast an ineligible ballot.

Suggested Reforms for Improvement:

- Nonpartisan election administration
- Increased prosecution of election crimes through greater resources to district attorneys. In addition, during election time, there should be an attorney in the DA's office who is designated to handle election prosecution.
- There should be greater centralization of the process, especially with respect to the statewide database. Arkansas has a "bottom up" system. This means the counties still control the list and there is insufficient information sharing. For example, if someone lives in one county but dies in another, the county in which the voter lived – and was registered to vote – will not be notified of the death.

OK, I will get started on the interview summaries today.

DOJ (Donsanto and Tanner) raised objections to the consultants' description of their interviews, which state that DOJ officials agreed they were bringing fewer intimidation and suppression cases. An advocacy group is going after DOJ, accusing the agency of doing just that for political reasons, so this is something DOJ wants corrected.

Apart from the consultants pre-existing bias that "the feds aren't doing enough", a big part of the problem appears to have been a misunderstanding over terminology. When our consultants used the term "intimidation", they included all sorts of suppression activities. When Craig Donsanto used the term "intimidation", he was using the definition under federal criminal vote fraud statutes, which requires the action be accompanied by threat of physical or economic harm. (He told me he has had only one such case in 30 years.) His office is actively pursuing voter suppression activities under statutes other than federal voter intimidation laws (e.g.; the recent case in NH where a campaign operative conspired to block election day GOTV telephone lines of the opposing party). A copy of Tanner's comments on the interview summary in the status report for the Standards and Advisory Boards meetings is attached.

I had many long discussions with Tova and Job about this. I was able to get them to soften their description (see 4th bullet on page 7 of the draft report), but not entirely to my satisfaction. Also, at the Working Group meeting, it was agreed that the consultants would add a note to their definition to clarify that the working definition for purposes of the research includes activities that do not meet the federal definition of voter intimidation. The resulting note on page 5 of the draft report is too vague.

DOJ has not seen everything the consultants put in the draft final report, so they may have additional concerns. For example, the consultants' recommendations include the following:

Attend the Department of Justice's Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Symposium . The consultants also believe it would be useful for any further activity in this area to include attendance at the next Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Symposium. According to the Department, DEOs are required to attend annual training conferences centered on combating election fraud and voting rights abuses. These conferences sponsored by the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division and the Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division, feature presentations by civil rights officials and senior prosecutors from the Public Integrity Section and the U.S. Attorneys' Offices. According to the Department, DEOs are required to attend annual training conferences centered on combating election fraud and voting rights abuses. These conferences sponsored by the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division and the Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division, feature presentations by civil rights officials and senior prosecutors from the Public Integrity Section and the U.S. Attorneys' Offices.

Footnote:

By attending the symposium researchers could learn more about the following:
How DEOs are trained, e.g. what they are taught to focus their resources on; How they are instructed to respond to various types of complaints; How information about previous elections and voting issues is presented; and, How the Voting Rights Act, the criminal laws governing election fraud and intimidation, the National Voter Registration Act, and the Help America Vote Act are described and explained to participants.

DOJ has stated that this is an internal meeting, involving only DOJ officials, US Attorneys and FBI. EAC researchers cannot be admitted without opening the meeting to other outsiders. DOJ does not want to do this, probably for two reasons: (1) confidential information on current enforcement cases may be discussed; and (2) making enforcement strategies public could give unscrupulous individuals a virtual "how to" manual for circumventing such strategies when committing election crimes.

We may also have a hard time gaining access to the DOE reports and the Voting Section records of complaints, as they probably aren't considered public documents.

Happy to help, especially as I have to assume the blame for the report turned in by the consultants. I think you were aware that I was disappointed that it was not a more professional product. As I was not clear what the Commission's position is on editing such reports after receipt of the final, and as the consultants insisted that their work not be changed, I felt a bit stymied. Let me know what else I can do.

In the meantime, I'm revisiting some drafts received on the Vote Count-Recount best practices to see if I can encourage more improvements before submission of the final. We're still waiting for the state-by-state summary of practices, originally delayed by the subcontractor's nonperformance, which could affect goes into the best practices. I think some of the emphasis I see in the drafts on post election audits and proper recordkeeping will help respond to some of the issues raised in the literature review for the voting fraud-voter intimidation study.

1. Everyone does not define voting fraud and voter intimidation the same way.

In some cases, what may have been honest administrative mistakes or errors due to poor poll worker training are lumped together with genuine voter suppression efforts and labeled as voter intimidation or voting fraud. Examples: (1) many authors consider certain voter suppression tactics to be voter intimidation that do not rise to the definition used in criminal enforcement of election crimes; (2) some charge that a DOJ ballot integrity measure in South Dakota was voter intimidation; and (3) some mistakes made in the maintenance of voter registration lists are labeled as fraud.

2. There seems to be no systematic nationwide study that reports all (or most) verified instances of voting fraud and voter intimidation or suppression efforts in a particular election or a particular period in U.S. history.

Some sources focus on certain areas of the country, which can bias the study if these areas are more or less susceptible to fraud and suppression. Some focus on the alleged (but not necessarily verified) misdeeds of one political party or another. Still others focus on unverified allegations reported to a toll-free phone line. In some cases, it is not clear if the incidents were intentional voter suppression or genuine poll worker mistakes (e.g.; not providing provisional ballots or in appropriately asking voters for ID). Minnite's study is as close as they get to a systematic study.

3. There are a number of obstacles to gathering compete data on voting fraud and voter intimidation/suppression nationwide in any election.

Authors often have limited resources (time and money) to collect such information. Investigation and prosecution of voting fraud and voter intimidation or suppression occurs at different levels of government (Federal, state and local). These investigations and prosecutions are not reported to and recorded by a central authority. Some voting fraud is inherently more difficult to identify and to prove than others (e.g.; impersonation of another voter at the polls is more difficult, due to the transient nature of some jurisdictions and the fact that impersonators not identified as a fraud at the polls are hard to identify later, than voter registration, vote buying, and absentee ballot fraud). At least some voting fraud and voter intimidation appears to go unreported and uninvestigated, and some prosecutions are unsuccessful due to local politics and law enforcement affiliations and the lack of sufficient resources at the Federal, state, and local levels to support the labor intensive effort.

4. Most sources seem to agree that voter registration and absentee balloting fraud are the most common forms of voting fraud. Absentee ballot fraud often is accompanied by vote buying or voter coercion. Also frequently alleged were instances of ineligible voters (usually felons, but sometime non-citizens, under aged individuals, or non-residents) that voted. But not all agree that these are the only common forms of fraud.

Some contend that voting in the name of another at the polling place is common, but that such instances are extremely hard to prove. Most instances of ineligible voters voting were linked to improper voter list maintenance or confusion on the part of local election officials as to state law on felon disenfranchisement.

5. A number of sources have identified numerous instances of attempted voter suppression, but no instances of voter intimidation that could be prosecuted under Federal criminal laws is alleged.

Examples of voter suppression efforts include: (1) phone calls and mailings deliberately directing targeted voters to vote on the wrong day or to go to the wrong polling place, or that provide incorrect and threatening information about the voter qualifications and legal consequences of voting; (2) targeted, inappropriate challenges to voters at the polls or shortly before election day; (3) people posing as law enforcement agents at targeted polling places. When such tactics target minority communities, they may be attacked through civil action by DOJ under Voting Rights Act provisions, but they do not qualify for criminal penalties under Federal voter intimidation law. Currently, there is no Federal election law providing criminal penalties for voter suppression efforts. When the suppression adversely affects a political party, but does not have a racial component, DOJ may be hard pressed to pursue the matter unless other Federal criminal law has been violated (e.g.; suppression of phone banks in New Hampshire).

6. Unsupervised voter registration drives by political parties and advocacy groups are a primary source of fraudulent voter registration applications and missing (perhaps deliberately) voter registration applications.

The practice of paying persons to man voter registration drives (particularly, but not only, when the person is paid by the head) is a frequent source of fraudulent voter registration applications. Partisan drives have resulted in applications from persons of “the wrong party” being held back or destroyed. Therefore, while the applicant believes they have registered, the election official has no record of that registration.

7. Many authors contend that proper implementation of the National Voter Registration Act of 1993 (NVRA) and the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) will reduce or at least not increase the potential for fraud and voter suppression, but some argue that provisions in these laws increase the likelihood of fraud or voter suppression.

Many argue that proper implementation of the list maintenance and fail-safe voting provisions of the NVRA and HAVA’s requirements for the statewide voter registration list, voter ID for certain first-time voters, and provisional voting will reduce the potential for voting fraud and voter intimidation. Others argue that the list maintenance provisions of NVRA cause “dead wood” to be left on the voter rolls, providing opportunity for fraud, or that HAVA’s voter ID and list matching requirements can be used as voter suppression tactics.

People for the American Way and the NAACP, "The Long Shadow of Jim Crow," December 6, 2004.

This report describes the pervasive and repeated practices of voter intimidation and vote suppression that have taken place in very recent years and during contemporary American history. It goes on to describe the numerous instances of voter intimidation and suppression during the 2000 election, the 1990s, the 1980s and back through the civil rights movement of the 1960s, putting current efforts in historical perspective.

Describing the chronology of events in this way demonstrates the developing patterns and strategic underpinnings of the tactics used over the last forty years. Examples include:

- Florida law enforcement questioned elderly African American voters in Orlando regarding the 2003 mayoral race, which had already been resolved, shortly before the 2004 election;
- the 2004 Florida felon purge list;
- the case of South Dakota in 2004 in which Native Americans were improperly and illegally required to show photo identification at the polls or denied the right to vote, and similar improper demands for ID from minorities in other parts of the country;
- the use of challengers in minority districts in many locations;
- the challenge to the right of African American students to vote in Texas in 2004;
- the presence of men looking like law enforcement challenging African American voters at the polls in Philadelphia in 2003;
- the distribution of flyers in Louisiana and elsewhere in a number of elections over the last few years in minority areas telling them to vote on the wrong day; and
- the FBI investigation into thousands of Native American voters in South Dakota in 2002.

Laughlin McDonald, "The New Poll Tax," The American Prospect vol. 13 no. 23, December 30, 2002.

Argues that "the discriminatory use of so-called 'ballot security' programs" has been a reoccurring scandal since the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. These programs are deceptively presented as preventing voter fraud and thereby furthering good government. However, McDonald states "but far too often they [the ballot security programs] are actually designed to suppress minority voting -- and for nakedly partisan purposes." Blames the federal government as well as the states for use of suspect ballot security programs. McDonald cites several ballot security efforts that were really disguised attempts at minority voter suppression:

- SD-DOJ "voting integrity initiative".
- AR - poll watchers driving away voters in predominantly black precincts by taking photos of them and demanding identification during pre-election day balloting.
- MI - "spotters" at heavily Democratic precincts was an effort to intimidate black voters and suppress Democratic turnout
- SC - one county's officials instituted a new and unauthorized policy allowing them to challenge voters who gave rural route or box numbers for their registration address (disproportionately affecting African Americans).
- the 1981 gubernatorial election anti-fraud initiative leading to the well known consent decree prohibiting the Republicans from repeating this, a similar Republican effort in Louisiana in 1986 in Senator John Breaux's race which again resulted in prohibition by a state court judge, and a similar effort by Republicans in Senator Jesse Helms 1990 reelection.

programs (especially voter ID). Indicates that the crux of the problem is lax enforcement of federal voters rights laws ("there is no record of the purveyors of any ballot-security program being criminally prosecuted by federal authorities for interfering with the right to vote." The only positive case law McDonald cited was a decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit that affirmed "an award of damages ranging from $500 to $2,000, payable by individual poll officials to each of seven black voters who had been unlawfully challenged, harassed, denied assistance in voting or purged from the rolls in the town of Crawfordville [Arkansas].")

Recommends that Congress and the states should adopt "nondiscriminatory, evenly applied measures to ensure the integrity of the ballot."

Wisconsin Legislative Audit Bureau, "An Evaluation: Voter Registration Elections Board" Report 05-12, September, 2005.

Current voter registration practices were determined to be insufficient to ensure the accuracy of voter registration lists used by poll workers or to prevent ineligible persons from registering to vote. In six municipalities where sufficient information was available, there was 105 instances of potentially improper or fraudulent voting in the 2004 elections. These included: 98 ineligible felons who may have voted; 2 individuals who may have voted twice; 1 voter who may have been underage; and 4 absentee ballots that should not have been counted because the voters who cast them died before Election Day (all but dead voters were forwarded to appropriate district attorneys for investigation). Statutes require that clerks send cards to everyone who registers by mail or on Election Day. However, only 42.7 % of the 150 municipalities surveyed sent cards to both groups, and 46 % did not send any address verification cards to those registering to vote on Election Day in November 2004. Statutes also require clerks to provide the local district attorney with the names of any Election Day registrants whose cards are undeliverable at the address provided. However, only 24.3 % of the clerks who sent cards also forwarded names from undeliverable cards to district attorneys. District attorneys surveyed indicated that they require more information than is typically provided to conduct effective investigations. To ensure that voter registration lists contain only the names of qualified electors, municipal clerks are required by statute to remove or inactivate the names of individuals who have not voted in four years, to update registration information for individuals who move or change their names, and to remove or inactivate the names of deceased individuals. They are also required to notify registered voters before removing their names from registration lists. These statutory requirements are not consistently followed:

- 85.3 % of municipalities removed the names of inactive voters from their voter registration lists;
- 71.4 % sometimes or always notified registered voters before removing their names; and
- 54.0 % reported removing the names of ineligible felons.
- registration lists contain duplicate records and the names of ineligible individuals (e.g.; more than 348,000 electronic voter registration records from eight municipalities were reviewed, identifying 3,116 records that appear to show individuals who are registered more than once in the same municipality).

Recommendations:

- adjust the early registration deadline to provide clerks more time to prepare registration lists;
- establish more stringent requirements for special registration deputies, including prohibiting compensation based on the number of individuals registered;
- establish uniform requirements for demonstrating proof of residence for all registrants;
- provide municipal clerks with more flexibility in the use of address verification cards;
- Authorize civil penalties for local election officials and municipalities that fail to comply with election laws; and
- implement mandatory elections training requirements for municipal clerks.

Report also recognized that the new HAVA registration procedures would help with existing registration problems.

EAC SUMMARY OF LITERATURE REVIEW FOR VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

Milwaukee Police Department, Milwaukee County District Attorney's Office, Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Attorney's Office "Preliminary Findings of Joint Task Force Investigating Possible Election Fraud," May 10, 2005.

On January 26, 2005, the Milwaukee Police Department, Milwaukee County District Attorney's Office, Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the United States Attorney's Office formed a task force to investigate alleged voting irregularities during the November 2004 elections. The task force has made the following specific determinations based on evidence examined to date:

- evidence of more than 100 individual instances of suspected double-voting, voting in names of persons who likely did not vote, and/or voting in names believed to be fake.
- more than 200 felons voted when they were not eligible to do so. (In order to establish criminal cases, the government must establish willful violations in individual instances);
- persons who had been paid to register voters as "deputy registrars" falsely listed approximately 65 names in order to receive compensation for the registrations. (The evidence does not indicate that these particular false registrations were later used to cast votes); and,
- the number of votes counted from the City of Milwaukee exceeds the number of persons recorded as voting by more than 4,500. (Evidence indicates widespread record keeping errors with respect to recording the number of voters)

The investigation concentrated on the 70,000+ same-day registrations. It found that a large majority of the reported errors were the result of data entry errors, such as street address numbers being transposed. However, the investigation also found more than 100 instances where votes were cast in a manner suggesting fraud. These include:

- persons with the same name and date of birth recorded as voting more than once;
- persons who live outside Milwaukee, but who used non-existent City addresses to register and vote in the City (141 of them were same day registrants; in several instances, the voter explicitly listed municipality names other than Milwaukee on the registration cards);
- persons who registered and voted with identities and addresses that cannot in any way be linked to a real person;
- persons listed as voting under a name and identity of a person known to be deceased;
- persons whose identities were used to vote, but who in subsequent interviews told task force investigators that they did not, in fact, vote in the City of Milwaukee.

Investigation also found:

- persons who were paid money to obtain registrations allegedly falsified approximately 65 names on registration forms, allegedly to obtain more money for each name submitted.
- more than 200 felons who were not eligible to vote in the 2004 election, but who are recorded as having done so.
- same-day registrations were accepted in which the card had incomplete information that would help establish identity. For example: 48 original cards for persons listed as voting had no name; 548 had no address; 28 did not have signatures; and another 23 cards had illegible information (part of approximately 1,300 same-day registrations for which votes were cast, but which election officials could not authenticate as proper voters within the City).
- the post-election misfiling or loss of original green registration cards that were considered duplicates, but that in fact corresponded to additional votes. These cards were used to record votes, but approximately 100 cards of interest to investigators can no longer be located. In addition, other original green registration cards continue to be found.

EAC SUMMARY OF LITERATURE REVIEW FOR VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

National Commission on Federal Election Reform, "Building Confidence in U.S. Elections," Center for Democracy and Election Management, American University, September 2005.

Among the observations made that are relevant to the EAC study of fraud and intimidation are the following:

- The November 2004 elections showed that irregularities and fraud still occur.
- Failure to provide voters with such basic information as their registration status and their polling site location raises a barrier to voting as significant as inconsistent procedures on provisional ballots or voter ID requirements.
- There is no evidence of extensive fraud in U.S. elections or of multiple voting, but both occur, and it could affect the outcome of a close election.
- The Commission is concerned that the different approaches to identification cards might prove to be a serious impediment to voting.
- Voter registration lists are often inflated by the inclusion of citizens who have moved out of state but remain on the lists. Moreover, under the National Voter Registration Act, names are often added to the list, but counties and municipalities often do not delete the names of those who moved. Inflated voter lists are also caused by phony registrations and efforts to register individuals who are ineligible. At the same time, inaccurate purges of voter lists have removed citizens who are eligible and are properly registered.
- Political party and nonpartisan voter registration drives generally contribute to the electoral process by generating interest in upcoming elections and expanding participation. However, they are occasionally abused. There were reports in 2004 that some party activists failed to deliver voter registration forms of citizens who expressed a preference for the opposing party.
- Vote by mail raises concerns about privacy, as citizens voting at home may come under pressure to vote for certain candidates, and it increases the risk of fraud.
- While election fraud is difficult to measure, it occurs. The U.S. Department of Justice has launched more than 180 investigations into election fraud since October 2002. These investigations have resulted in charges for multiple voting, providing false information on their felon status, and other offenses against 89 individuals and in convictions of 52 individuals. The convictions related to a variety of election fraud offenses, from vote buying to submitting false voter registration information and voting-related offenses by non-citizens. In addition to the federal investigations, state attorneys general and local prosecutors handle cases of election fraud. Other cases are never pursued because of the difficulty in obtaining sufficient evidence for prosecution or because of the low priority given to election fraud cases.
- Absentee ballots remain the largest source of potential voter fraud
- Non-citizens have registered to vote in several recent elections
- The growth of "third-party" (unofficial) voter registration drives in recent elections has led to a rise in reports of voter registration fraud.
- Many states allow the representatives of candidates or political parties to challenge a person's eligibility to register or vote or to challenge an inaccurate name on a voter roll. This practice of challenges may contribute to ballot integrity, but it can have the effect of intimidating eligible voters, preventing them from casting their ballot, or otherwise disrupting the voting process.

Its pertinent recommendations for reform are as follows:

- Interoperable state voter databases are needed to facilitate updates in the registration of voters who move to another state and to eliminate duplicate registrations, which are a source of potential fraud.
- Voters should be informed of their right to cast a provisional ballot if their name does not appear on the voter roll, or if an election official asserts that the individual is not eligible to vote, but States should take additional and effective steps to inform voters as to the location of their precinct
- The Commission recommends that states use "REAL ID" cards for voting purposes.
- To verify the identity of voters who cast absentee ballots, the voter's signature on the absentee ballot can be matched with a digitized

version of the signature that the election administrator maintains. While such signature matches are usually done, they should be done consistently in all cases, so that election officials can verify the identity of every new registrant who casts an absentee ballot.

- Each state needs to audit its voter registration files to determine the extent to which they are accurate (with correct and current information on individuals), complete (including all eligible voters), valid (excluding ineligible voters), and secure (with protections against unauthorized use). This can be done by matching voter files with records in other state agency databases in a regular and timely manner, contacting individuals when the matches are inconclusive, and conducting survey research to estimate the number of voters who believe they are registered but who are not in fact listed in the voter files.
- Each state should oversee political party and nonpartisan voter registration drives to ensure that they operate effectively, that registration forms are delivered promptly to election officials, that all completed registration forms are delivered to the election officials, and that none are "culled" and omitted according to the registrant's partisan affiliation. Measures should also be adopted to track and hold accountable those who are engaged in submitting fraudulent voter registrations. Such oversight might consist of training activists who conduct voter registration drives and tracking voter registration forms to make sure they are all accounted for. In addition, states should apply a criminal penalty to any activist who deliberately fails to deliver a completed voter registration form.
- Investigation and prosecution of election fraud should include those acts committed by individuals, including election officials, poll workers, volunteers, challengers or other nonvoters associated with the administration of elections, and not just fraud by voters.
- In July of even-numbered years, the U.S. Department of Justice should issue a public report on its investigations of election fraud. This report should specify the numbers of allegations made, matters investigated, cases prosecuted, and individuals convicted for various crimes. Each state's attorney general and each local prosecutor should issue a similar report.
- The U.S. Department of Justice's Office of Public Integrity should increase its staff to investigate and prosecute election-related fraud.
- In addition to the penalties set by the Voting Rights Act, it should be a federal felony for any individual, group of individuals, or organization to engage in any act of violence, property destruction (of more than $500 value), or threatened act of violence that is intended to deny any individual his or her lawful right to vote or to participate in a federal election.
- To deter systemic efforts to deceive or intimidate voters, the Commission recommends federal legislation to prohibit any individual or group from deliberately providing the public with incorrect information about election procedures for the purpose of preventing voters from going to the polls.
- States should define clear procedures for challenges, which should mainly be raised and resolved before the deadline for voter registration. After that, challengers will need to defend their late actions. On Election Day, they should direct their concerns to poll workers, not to voters directly, and should in no way interfere with the smooth operation of the polling station.
- State and local jurisdictions should prohibit a person from handling absentee ballots other than the voter, an acknowledged family member, the U.S. Postal Service or other legitimate shipper, or election officials. The practice in some states of allowing candidates or party workers to pick up and deliver absentee ballots should be eliminated.
- All states should consider passing legislation that attempts to minimize the fraud that has resulted from "payment by the piece" to anyone in exchange for their efforts in voter registration, absentee ballot, or signature collection.
- Nonpartisan structures of election administration are very important, and election administrators should be neutral, professional, and impartial.
- No matter what institutions are responsible for conducting elections, conflict-of-interest standards should be introduced for all federal, state, and local election officials. Election officials should be prohibited by federal and/or state laws from serving on any political campaign committee, making any public comments in support of a candidate, taking a public position on any ballot measure, soliciting campaign funds, or otherwise campaigning for or against a candidate for public office. A decision by a secretary of state to serve as co-chair of his or her party's presidential election committee would clearly violate these standards.

Recommendation on Voter Identification -

- Report premises its burdensome identification proposals on the need to ensure ballot integrity and on the existence of or potential for widespread fraud. However, the Report admits that there is simply "no evidence" that the type of fraud that could be solved by stricter voter identification – individual voters who misrepresent their identity at the polls – is a widespread problem.
- The photo ID proposal guards against only one type of fraud: individuals arriving at the polls to vote using false information, such as the name of another registered voter, or a recent but not current address. Since the costs of this form of fraud are extremely high (federal law provides for up to five years' imprisonment), and the benefits to any individual voter are extremely low, it is highly unlikely that this will ever occur with any frequency. The limited types of fraud that could be prevented by a Real ID requirement are extremely rare and difficult.
- In the most comprehensive survey of alleged election fraud to date, Professor Loraine Minnite and David Callahan have shown that the incidence of individual voter fraud at the polls is negligible. A few prominent examples support their findings. In Ohio, a statewide survey found four instances of ineligible persons voting or attempting to vote in 2002 and 2004, out of 9,078,728 votes cast – a rate of 0.00004%. Earlier this year, Georgia Secretary of State Cathy Cox stated that she could not recall one documented case of voter fraud relating to the impersonation of a registered voter at the polls during her ten-year tenure as Secretary of State or Assistant Secretary of State.
- The Report attempts to support its burdensome identification requirements on four specific examples of purported fraud or potential fraud. None of the Report's cited examples of fraud stand up under closer scrutiny. This response report goes through each instance of fraud raised by the Commission report and demonstrates that in each case the allegation in fact turned out later not to be true or the fraud cited was not of the type that would be addressed by a photo identification requirement.
- The Report fails to provide a good reason to create greater hurdles for voters who vote at the polls than for those who vote absentee. Despite the fact that absentee ballots are more susceptible to fraud than regular ballots, the Report exempts absentee voters from its proposed Real ID and proof of citizenship requirements.

Other points in ID requirement:

- Report does not explain why the goals of improved election integrity will not be met through the existing provisions in the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA).
- Report fails to consider alternative measures to advance its goals that are less restrictive to voters. To the extent that any limited fraud by individuals at the polls does trickle into the system, it can be addressed by far less restrictive alternatives. The first step is to recognize that only voters who appear on the registration list may vote a regular ballot. Proper cleaning of registration lists – and proper use of the lists at the poll – will therefore go a long way toward ensuring that every single ballot is cast by an eligible voter.
- In addition to the better registration lists that full implementation will provide, better record keeping and administration at the polls will reduce the limited potential for voting by ineligible persons. In the unlikely event that implementation of current law is not able to wipe out whatever potential for individual fraud remains, there are several effective and less burdensome alternatives to the Report's Real ID recommendation that received wholly insufficient consideration.
- Costs - If required as a precondition for voting, photo identification would operate as a de facto poll tax that could disenfranchise low-income voters. To alleviate this burden, the Report appropriately recommends that the "Real ID" card itself be issued free of charge. Nevertheless, the percentage of Americans without the documentary proof of citizenship necessary to obtain Real IDs is likely to remain high because the requisite documents are both expensive and burdensome to obtain. (Each of the documents an individual is required to show in order to obtain a "Real ID" card or other government-issued photo ID card costs money or presumes a minimal level of economic resources. Unless the federal and all state governments waive the cost of each of these other forms of identification, the indirect costs of photo IDs will be even greater than their direct costs. In addition, since government-issued IDs may only be obtained at specified government offices, which may be far from voters' residences and workplaces, individuals seeking such IDs will have to incur transportation costs and the costs of taking time off from work to visit those offices during often-abbreviated business hours.)

- Since voting generally depends on the voter's address, and since many states will not accept IDs that do not bear an individual's current voting address, an additional 41.5 million Americans each year will have ID that they may not be able to use to vote.
- The burden would fall disproportionately on the elderly, the disabled, students, the poor, and people of color.
- The ID recommendations reduce the benefits of voter registration at disability and other social service agencies provided by the National Voter Registration Act of 1993. Individuals who seek to register at those offices—which generally do not issue IDs Census data demonstrate that African Americans and Latinos are more than three times more likely than whites to register to vote at a public assistance agency, and that whites are more likely than African Americans and Latinos to register when seeking a driver's license. Accordingly, the voter registration procedure far more likely to be used by minorities than by whites will no longer provide Americans with full eligibility to vote.
- The Report's proposal to use Real ID as a condition of voting is so excessive that it would prevent eligible voters from proving their identity with even a valid U.S. passport or a U.S. military photo ID card. The Report's proposal to use Real ID as a condition of voting is so excessive that it would prevent eligible voters from proving their identity with even a valid U.S. passport or a U.S. military photo ID card

Recommendation on Database Information Sharing Across States -serious efficacy, privacy, and security concerns raised by a nationally distributed database of the magnitude it contemplates. These problems are exacerbated by the Report's recommendation that an individual's Social Security number be used as the broadly disseminated unique voting identifier.

Recommendation on Voting Rights of Ex-Felons - This recommendation would set a standard more generous than the policies of the most regressive thirteen states in the nation but more restrictive than the remaining thirty-seven. The trend in the states is toward extension of the franchise.

Chandler Davidson, Tanya Dunlap, Gale Kenny, and Benjamin Wise, "Republican Ballot Security Programs: Vote Protection or Minority Vote Suppression – or Both?" A Report to the Center for Voting Rights & Protection, September, 2004.

Focuses on vote suppression through "ballot security programs" (programs that, in the name of protecting against vote fraud, almost exclusively target heavily black, Latino, or Indian voting precincts and have the intent or effect of discouraging or preventing voters in those precincts from casting a ballot). Noteworthy characteristics of these programs:

- focus on minority precincts almost exclusively
- is often on only the flimsiest evidence that vote fraud is likely to be perpetrated in such precincts;
- in addition to encouraging the presence of sometimes intimidating white Republican poll watchers or challengers who may slow down voting lines and embarrass potential voters by asking them humiliating questions, these programs have sometimes posted people in official-looking uniforms with badges and side arms who question voters about their citizenship or their registration
- warning signs may be posted near the polls, or radio ads may be targeted to minority listeners containing dire threats of prison terms for people who are not properly registered—messages that seem designed to put minority voters on the defensive.
- sometimes false information about voting qualifications is sent to minority voters through the mail."
- doing mailings, collecting returned materials, and using that as a basis for creating challenger lists and challenging voters at the polls, started in the 1950s and continues to today (problem with this practice is that reasons for a mailing to be returned include a wrong address, out of date or inaccurate addresses, poor mail delivery in minority areas, and matching mistakes)

Provide numerous examples from the last 50 years to demonstrate his thesis, going through the historical development of Republican ballot security programs from the 1950s through to the present (including more recent incidents, such as 1981 in New Jersey, 1982 Dallas, Louisiana 1986, Houston 1986, Hidalgo 1988 Orange County 1988, North Carolina 1990, South Carolina 1980-1990, and South Dakota 2002). Author cites and quotes internal Republican letters and memoranda, primary sources and original documents, media reports, scholarly works, as well as the words of judges' rulings in some of the cases that ended up in litigation to prove his argument. author cites and quotes internal Republican letters and memoranda, primary sources and original documents, media reports, scholarly works, as well as the words of judges' rulings in some of the cases that ended up in litigation to prove his argument.

Some of the features of vote suppression efforts put forth by Republicans under the guise of ballot security programs:

1. An organized, often widely publicized effort to field poll watchers in what Republicans call "heavily Democratic," but what are usually minority, precincts;
2. Stated concerns about vote fraud in these precincts, which are occasionally justified but often are not;
3. Misinformation and fear campaigns directed at these same precincts, spread by radio, posted signs in the neighborhoods, newspapers, fliers, and phone calls, which are often anonymously perpetrated;
4. Posting "official-looking" personnel at polling places, including but not limited to off-duty police—sometimes in uniform, sometimes armed;
5. Aggressive face-to-face challenging techniques at the polls that can confuse, humiliate, and intimidate—as well as slow the voting process—in these same minority precincts;
6. Challenging voters using inaccurate, unofficial lists of registrants derived from "do-not-forward" letters sent to low-income and minority neighborhoods;
7. Photographing, tape recording, or videotaping voters; and
8. Employing language and metaphors that trade on stereotypes of minority voters as venal and credulous.

The report ends with some observations on the state of research on the incidence of fraud, which the author finds lacking. He suggests that vote suppression of qualified minority voters by officials and partisan poll-watchers, challengers, and uniformed guards should also be considered as included in any definition of election fraud. Recommends Democrats should not protest all programs aimed at ballot integrity, but rather work with Republicans to find solutions to problems that confront both parties and the system as a whole.

Alec Ewald, "A Crazy Quilt of Tiny Pieces: State and Local Administration of American Criminal Disenfranchisement Law," The Sentencing Project, November 2005.

Presents results from the first nationwide study to document the implementation of American felony disenfranchisement law. Data came from two main sources: a 33-state survey of state elections officials (spring 2004) and telephone interviews with almost one hundred city, county, town, and parish officials drawn from 10 selected states.

Major Conclusions:

1. Broad variation and misunderstanding in interpretation and enforcement of voting laws (more than one-third [37%] of local officials interviewed in ten states either described their state's fundamental eligibility law incorrectly, or stated that they did not know a central aspect of that law. / Local registrars differ in their knowledge of basic eligibility law, often within the same state. Differences also emerge in how they are notified of criminal convictions, what process they use to suspend, cancel, or "purge" voters from the rolls, whether particular documents are required to restore a voter to eligibility, and whether they have information about the criminal background of new arrivals to the state.)
2. Misdemeanants disenfranchised in at least five states (the commonly-used term "felon disenfranchisement" is not entirely accurate, since at least five states – Colorado, Illinois, Michigan, South Carolina, and Maryland -- also formally bar some or all people convicted of misdemeanors from voting [ it is likely that misdemeanants in other states who do retain the formal right to vote could have difficulty exercising that right, given ignorance of their eligibility and the lack of clear rules and procedures for absentee voting by people in jail who have not been convicted of a felony / Maryland excludes persons convicted of many misdemeanors, such as "Unlawful operation of vending machines," "Misrepresentation of tobacco leaf weight," and "Racing horse under false name."]

3. Significant ambiguities in voting laws (disenfranchisement in Tennessee is dependent on which of five different time periods a felony conviction occurred between 1973 and the present / in Oregon, disenfranchisement is determined not by conviction or imprisonment for a felony, but for being placed under Department of Corrections supervision / since 1997, some persons convicted of a felony and sentenced to less than 12 months' custody have been sent to county jails and hence, are eligible to vote.
4. Disenfranchisement results in contradictory policies within states (the "crazy-quilt" pattern of disenfranchisement laws exists even within states / Alabama and Mississippi have both the most and least restrictive laws in the country, a result which is brought about by the fact that certain felonies result in the loss of voting rights for life, while others at least theoretically permit people in prison to vote / most felonies in Alabama result in permanent disenfranchisement, but drug and DUI offenses have been determined to not involve the "moral turpitude" that triggers the loss of voting rights / in Mississippi, ten felonies result in disenfranchisement, but do not include such common offenses as burglary and drug crimes.
5. Confusing policies lead to the exclusion of legal voters and the inclusion of illegal voters: The complexity of state disenfranchisement policies results in frequent misidentification of voter eligibility, largely because officials differ in their knowledge and application of disqualification and restoration law and procedures.
6. Significant variation and uncertainty in how states respond to persons with a felony conviction from other states: No state has a systematic mechanism in place to address the immigration of persons with a felony conviction, and there is no consensus among indefinite-disenfranchisement states on whether the disqualification is properly confined to the state of conviction, or should be considered in the new state of residence. Interpretation and enforcement of this part of disenfranchisement law varies not only across state lines, but also from one county to another within states. Local officials have no way of knowing about convictions in other states, and many are unsure what they would do if a would-be voter acknowledged an old conviction. Because there is no prospect of a national voter roll, this situation will continue even after full HAVA implementation.
7. Disenfranchisement is a time-consuming, expensive practice: Enforcement requires elections officials to gather records from different agencies and bureaucracies, including state and federal courts, Departments of Corrections, Probation and Parole, the state Board of Elections, the state police, and other counties' elections offices.

Policy Implications

1. Policies disenfranchising people living in the community on probation or parole, or who have completed a sentence are particularly difficult to enforce: States which disenfranchise only persons who are currently incarcerated appear able to enforce their laws more consistently than those barring non-incarcerated citizens from voting.
2. Given large-scale misunderstanding of disenfranchisement law, many eligible persons incorrectly believe they cannot vote, or have been misinformed by election officials: More than one-third of election officials interviewed incorrectly described their state's law on voting eligibility. More than 85% of the officials who misidentified their state's law either did not know the eligibility standard or specified that the law was more restrictive than was actually the case.
3. Occasional violation of disenfranchisement law by non-incarcerated voters not surprising: Given the complexity of state laws and the number of state officials who lack an understanding of restoration and disqualification procedures, it should come as no surprise that many voters are ignorant of their voting status, a fact that is likely to have resulted in hundreds of persons with a felony conviction registering and voting illegally in recent years.

EAC SUMMARY OF LITERATURE REVIEW FOR VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

4. Taken together, these findings undermine the most prominent rationale for disenfranchisement: that the policy reflects a strong, clear consensus that persons with a felony conviction are unfit to vote and constitute a threat to the polity: First, when significant numbers of the people who administer elections do not know important aspects of disenfranchisement law, it is hard to conclude that the restriction is necessary to protect social order and the "purity" of the ballot box. Second, because they are all but invisible in the sentencing process, "collateral" sanctions like disenfranchisement simply cannot accomplish the denunciatory, expressive purposes their supporters claim. We now know that disenfranchisement is not entirely "visible" even to the people running American elections. Third, deep uncertainty regarding the voting rights of people with felony convictions who move from one state to another indicates that we do not even know what purpose disenfranchisement is supposed to serve – whether it is meant to be a punishment, or simply a non-penal regulation of the franchise.

Recommendations

1. Clarify Policies Regarding Out-of-State Convictions: State officials should clarify their policies and incorporate into training programs the means by which a felony conviction in another state affects an applicant's voting eligibility. For example, sentence-only disenfranchisement states should clarify that newcomers with old felony convictions from indefinite disenfranchisement states are eligible to vote. And those states which bar some people from voting even after their sentences are completed must clarify whether new arrivals with old felony convictions from sentence-only disenfranchisement states are automatically eligible, and must explain what procedures, if any, should be followed for restoration.
2. Train Election Officials: Clarify disenfranchisement policies and procedures for all state and local election officials through development of materials and training programs in each state. At a minimum, this should include distribution of posters, brochures and FAQ sheets to local and state elections offices.
3. Train Criminal Justice Officials: Provide training on disqualification and restoration policies for all correctional and criminal justice officials, particularly probation and parole staff. Correctional and criminal justice officials should also be actively engaged in describing these policies to persons under criminal justice supervision.
4. Review Voting Restrictions on Non-Incarcerated People: Given the serious practical difficulty of enforcing laws disqualifying people who are not incarcerated from voting – problems which clearly include both excluding eligible people from voting and allowing those who should be ineligible to vote -- state policymakers should review such policies to determine if they serve a useful public purpose.

American Center for Voting Rights "Vote Fraud, Intimidation and Suppression in the 2004 Presidential Election," August 2, 2005.

Using court records, police reports and news articles, ACVR Legislative Fund presented this Report documenting hundreds of reported incidents and allegations from around the country. The report most often alleges voter intimidation and voter registration fraud, and to a lesser degree absentee ballot fraud and vote buying. This report alleges a coordinated effort by members of some organizations to rig the election system through voter registration fraud, the first step in any vote fraud scheme that corrupts the election process by burying local officials in fraudulent and suspicious registration forms. paid Democrat operatives were far more involved in voter intimidation and suppression activities than were their Republican counterparts during the 2004 presidential election. Identified five cities as "hot spots" which require additional immediate attention, based on the findings of this report and the cities' documented history of fraud and intimidation: Philadelphia, PA, Milwaukee, WI, Seattle, WA, St. Louis/East St. Louis, MO/IL, and Cleveland, OH. Refutes charges of voter intimidation and suppression made against Republican supporters, discusses similar charges against Democrats, details incidents vote fraud and illegal voting and finally discusses problems with vote fraud, voter registration fraud and election irregularities around the country. Recommends:

- Both national political parties should formally adopt a zero-tolerance fraud and intimidation policy that commits the party to pursuing and fully prosecuting individuals and allied organizations who commit vote fraud or who seek to deter any eligible voter from participating in the election through fraud or intimidation. No amount of legislative reform can effectively deter those who commit acts of fraud if there is no punishment for the crime and these acts continue to be tolerated.

EAC SUMMARY OF LITERATURE REVIEW FOR VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

- States should adopt legislation requiring government-issued photo ID at the polls and for any voter seeking to vote by mail or by absentee ballot. Government-issued photo identification should be readily available to all citizens without cost and provisions made to assure availability of government-issued identification to disabled and low-income citizens.
- States should adopt legislation requiring that all polling places be fully accessible and accommodating to all voters regardless of race, disability or political persuasion and that polling locations are free of intimidation or harassment.
- States should create and maintain current and accurate statewide voter registration databases as mandated by the federal Help America Vote Act ("HAVA") and establish procedures to assure that the statewide voter roll is current and accurate and that the names of eligible voters on the roll are consistent with the voter roll used by local election authorities in conducting the election.
- States should adopt legislation establishing a 30-day voter registration cutoff to assure that all voter rolls are accurate and that all registrants can cast a regular ballot on Election Day and the election officials have opportunity to establish a current and accurate voter roll without duplicate or fictional names and assure that all eligible voters (including all recently registered voters) are included on the voter roll at their proper precinct.
- States should adopt legislation requiring voter registration applications to be delivered to the elections office within one week of being completed so that they are processed in a timely manner and to assure the individuals registered by third party organizations are properly included on the voter roll.
- States should adopt legislation and penalties for groups violating voter registration laws, and provide the list of violations and penalties to all registration solicitors. Legislation should require those organizations obtaining a voter's registration to deliver that registration to election officials in a timely manner and should impose appropriate penalties upon any individual or organization that obtains an eligible voter's registration and fails to deliver it to election authorities.
- States should adopt legislation prohibiting "bounty" payment to voter registration solicitors based on the number of registration cards they collect.

The Advancement Project, "America's Modern Poll Tax: How Structural Disenfranchisement Erodes Democracy" November 7, 2001

Written after the 2000 election, thesis of report is that structural disenfranchisement—the effect of breakdowns in the electoral system, is the new poll tax. Structural disenfranchisement includes "bureaucratic blunders, governmental indifference, and flagrant disregard for voting rights." Blame for structural disenfranchisement is laid squarely at the feet of states and localities that "shirk their responsibilities or otherwise manipulate election systems," resulting in voters "either turned away from the polls or their votes are thrown out." Data and conclusions in the Report are taken from eight sample case studies of states and cities across the country and a survey of state election directors that reinforces the findings of the case studies (New York City—in six polling places Chinese translations inverted the Democrats with the Republicans; Georgia—the state computer crashed two weeks before the election, dropping thousands of voters from the rolls; Virginia—registration problems kept an untold number from voting; Chicago—in inner-city precincts with predominately minority populations, almost four out of every ten votes cast for President (in 2000) were discarded; St. Louis—thousands of qualified voters were placed on inactive lists due to an overbroad purge; Florida—a voting list purge of voters whose name and birth date closely resembled those of people convicted of felonies; and, Texas—significant Jim Crow like barriers to minority voting.) Most ballot blockers involve the structural elements of electoral administration: "ill-trained poll workers, failures to process registration cards on time or at all, inaccurate registration rolls, overbroad purges of voter rolls, unreasonably long lines, inaccurate ballot translations and a shortage of translators to assist voters who have limited English language skills."

Findings:

- election directors lack the resources to effectively do their jobs and some lack the "ability or will to force local election officials to fix serious problems”;

- election officials are highly under funded and legislatures refuse to grant their requests for more money;
- due to a lack of funds, election officials must use old and inferior equipment and can't improve training or meet structural needs;
- election officials are generally unaware of racial disparities in voting; only three of the 50 state election administrators are non-white.

Recommendations:

- federal policies that set nationwide and uniform election policies;
- federal guarantee of access to provisional ballots;
- enforcement of voter disability laws;
- automatic restoration of voting rights to those convicted of a crime after they have completed their sentence;
- a centralized data base of voters administered by non-partisan individuals;
- federal standards limiting precinct discarded vote rates to .25 %;
- federal requirements that jurisdiction provide voter education, including how to protect their right to vote; and laws that strengthen the ability of individuals to bring actions to enforce voting rights and anti-discrimination laws.

The Brennan Center and Professor Michael McDonald “Analysis of the September 15, 2005 Voter Fraud Report Submitted to the New Jersey Attorney General,” The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law, December 2005.

A September 15, 2005 Report submitted to the New Jersey Attorney General included lists of purportedly illegitimate votes in New Jersey in the 2004 general election, including lists of 10,969 individuals who purportedly voted twice and lists of 4,756 voters who were purportedly dead or incarcerated in November 2004. Analysis of the suspect lists reveals that the evidence submitted does not show what it purports to show: cause for concern that there is serious risk of widespread fraud given the state of the New Jersey voter registration rolls. These suspect lists were compiled by attempting to match the first name, last name, and birth date of persons on county voter registration files. Analysis reveals several serious problems with the methodology used to compile the suspect lists that compromise the lists' practical value. For example, middle initials were ignored throughout all counties, so that “J_____ A. Smith” was presumed to be the same person as “J_____ G. Smith.” Suffixes were also ignored, so that fathers and sons – like “B_____ Johnson” and “B_____ Johnson, Jr.” – were said to be the same person. A presumption that two records with the same name and date of birth must represent the same person is not consistent with basic statistical principles.

Re Claim of Double Voting by 4,497 Individuals:

- 1,803 of these 4,397 records of ostensibly illegal votes seem to be the product of a glitch in the compilation of the registration files (far more likely that data error is to blame for the doubly logged vote - to irregularities in the data processing and compilation process for one single county);
- another 1,257 entries of the 4,397 records probably represent similar data errors;
- approximately 800 of the entries on the list likely represent different people, with different addresses and different middle initials or suffixes;
- for approximately 200 of the entries in this category, however, less information is available (lack of or differences in middle initial or middle name);
- 7 voters were apparently born in January 1, 1880 – which is most likely a system default for registrations lacking date-of-birth information;
- for 227 voters, only the month and year of birth are listed: this means only that two voters with the same name were born in the same month and year, an unsurprising coincidence in a state of several million people;
- leaves approximately 289 votes cast under the same name and birth date – like votes cast by “P_____ S. Rosen,” born in the middle of the baby boom – but from two different addresses. It may appear strange, but there may be two P_____ S. Rosens, born on the same date in 1948 – and such coincidences are surprisingly common. . In a group of just 23 people, it is more likely than not that two will share the same birthday. For 40 people, the probability is 90%. Many, if not most, of the 289 alleged double votes of persons registered at different addresses most likely reflect two separate individuals sharing a first name, last name, middle initial, and birth date.

But there is no doubt that there are duplicate entries on New Jersey's registration rolls. It is well known that voter registration rolls contain "deadwood" – registration entries for individuals no longer living at a given address or deceased. There is no evidence, however, that these extra registrations are used for widespread illegal voting. Moreover, the problem of deadwood will soon be largely resolved: both the National Voter Registration Act of 1993 and the Help America Vote Act of 2002 require states to implement several systems and procedures as of January 1, 2006, that will clean the voter rolls of duplicate or invalid entries while protecting eligible voters from unintended disfranchisement.

Democratic National Committee, "Democracy at Risk: The November 2004 Election in Ohio," DNC Services Corporation, 2005

Study re 2004 election in Ohio. Findings considered related to EAC study:

- Statewide, 6 % of all voters reported feelings of intimidation: 16 percent of African Americans reported experiencing intimidation versus only 5 % of white voters.
- African American voters were 1.2 times more likely than white voters to be required to vote provisionally. Of provisional voters in Cuyahoga County, 35% were African American, compared to 25% of non-provisional voters, matched by geography.
- Under Ohio law, the only voters who should have been asked for identification were those voting in their first Federal election who had registered by mail but did not provide identification in their registration application. Although only 7% of all Ohio voters were newly registered (and only a small percentage of those voters registered by mail and failed to provide identification in their registration application), more than one third (37% reported being asked to provide identification.—meaning large numbers of voters were illegally required to produce identification. African American voters statewide were 47% more likely to be required to show identification than white voters. Indeed, 61% of African American men reported being asked to provide identification at the polls.
- Scarcity of voting machines caused long lines that deterred many people from voting: 3% of voters who went to the polls left their polling places and did not return due to the long lines; statewide, African American voters reported waiting an average of 52 minutes before voting while white voters reported waiting an average of 18 minutes; overall, 20% of white Ohio voters reported waiting more than twenty minutes, while 44% of African American voters reported doing so.

The report also includes a useful summary and description of the reports that came through Ohio Election Protection on Election Day, which included a wide variety of problems, including voter intimidation and discrimination.

Pertinent recommendations:

- codify into law all required election practices, including requirements for the adequate training of official poll workers
- adopt legislation to make clear and uniform the rules on voter registration.
- adopt uniform and clear published standards for the distribution of voting equipment and the assignment of official pollworkers among precincts, to ensure adequate and nondiscriminatory access
- improve training of official poll workers
- adopt clear and uniform rules on the use of, and the counting of, provisional ballots, and distribute them for public comment well in advance of each election day
- not adopt requirements that voters show identification at the polls, beyond those already required by federal law; vigorously enforce, to the full extent permitted by state law, a voter's right to vote without showing identification.

- make voter suppression a criminal offense at the state level, in all states
- implement statewide voter lists in accordance with the Help America Vote Act ("HAVA")
- expend significantly more resources in educating voters on where, when and how to vote.
- partisan officials who volunteer to work for a candidate should not oversee or administer any elections.

Supervision of the Justice Department's nationwide response to election crimes:

Election Crimes Branch oversees the Department's handling of all election crime allegations other than those involving civil rights violations, which are supervised by the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division. Specifically, the Branch supervises four types of corruption cases: crimes that involve the voting process, crimes involving the financing of federal election campaigns, crimes relating to political shakedowns and other patronage abuses, and illegal lobbying with appropriated funds. Vote frauds and campaign-financing offenses are the most significant and also the most common types of election crimes. The purpose of Headquarters' oversight of election crime matters is to ensure that the Department's nationwide response to election crime is uniform, impartial, and effective. An Election Crimes Branch, headed by a Director and staffed by Section attorneys on a case-by-case basis, was created within the Section in 1980 to handle this supervisory responsibility.

Voting Fraud:

During 2002 the Branch assisted United States Attorneys' Offices in Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Nevada, North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, West Virginia, and Wisconsin in handling vote fraud matters that occurred in their respective districts. During 2003 the Branch assisted United States Attorneys' Offices in Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, New Jersey, Nevada, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Virgin Islands, West Virginia, and Wisconsin in handling vote fraud matters that occurred in their respective districts. During 2004 the Branch assisted United States Attorneys' Offices in the following states in the handling of vote fraud matters that occurred in their respective districts: Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Nevada, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Puerto Rico, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, Virginia, West Virginia, Washington, and Wisconsin. This assistance included evaluating vote fraud allegations to determine whether investigation would produce a prosecutable federal criminal case, helping to structure investigations, providing legal advice concerning the formulation of charges, and assisting in establishing several task force teams of federal and state law enforcement officials to investigate vote fraud matters.

Litigation:

The Branch Director or Section attorneys also prosecute selected election crimes, either by assuming total operational responsibility for the case or by handling the case jointly with a United States Attorney's Office. The Section also may be asked to supervise the handling of a case in the event of a partial recusal of the local office. For example, in 2002 the Branch continued to supervise the prosecution of a sheriff and his election attorney for using data from the National Crime Information Center regarding voters' criminal histories to wage an election contest.

District Election Officer Program:

The Branch also assists in implementing the Department's long-standing District Election Officer (DEO) Program. This Program is designed to ensure that each of the 93 United States Attorneys' Offices has a trained prosecutor available to oversee the handling of election crime matters within the district and to coordinate district responses with Headquarters regarding these matters. The DEO Program involves the appointment of an Assistant United States Attorney in each federal district to serve a two-year term as a District Election Officer; the training of these prosecutors in the investigation and prosecution of election crimes; and the coordination of election-related initiatives and other law enforcement activities between Headquarters and the field. In addition, the DEO Program is a crucial feature of the Department's nationwide Election Day Program, which occurs in connection with the federal general elections held in November of even-numbered years. The Election Day Program ensures that federal prosecutors and investigators are available both at the Department's Headquarters in Washington and in each district to receive and handle complaints of election irregularities from the public while the polls are open and that the public is aware of how these individuals can be contacted on election day. In 2002 the Department enhanced the DEO Program by establishing a Ballot Integrity Initiative.

Ballot Integrity Initiative:

Beginning in September of 2002, the Public Integrity Section, acting at the request of the Attorney General, assisted in the implementation of a Ballot Integrity Initiative for the 2002 general election and subsequent elections. This initiative included increasing the law enforcement priority the Department gives to election crimes; holding a special day-long training event in Washington, DC for representatives of the 93 United States Attorneys' Offices; publicizing the identities and telephone numbers of the DEOs through press releases issued shortly before the November elections; and requiring the 93 U.S. Attorneys to communicate the enhanced federal prioritization of election crime matters to state and local election and law enforcement authorities. As part of Ballot Integrity Initiative, on October 8, 2002, the Public Integrity Section and the Voting Rights Section of the Department's Civil Rights Division co-sponsored a Voting Integrity Symposium for District Election Officers representing each of the 93 federal judicial districts. Topics discussed included the types of conduct that are prosecutable as federal election crimes and the federal statutes used to prosecute such cases. Attorney General John Ashcroft delivered the keynote address on the importance of election crime and ballot integrity enforcement. Assistant Attorney General of the Civil Rights Division Ralph Boyd and Assistant Attorney General of the Criminal Division Michael Chertoff also spoke to attendees on the protection of voting rights and the prosecution of election cases. As part of Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative, on September 23 and 24, 2003, the Public Integrity Section and the Voting Rights Section of the Department's Civil Rights Division co-sponsored a two-day Symposium for DEOs representing each of the 93 federal judicial districts. Topics discussed included the types of conduct that are prosecutable as federal election crimes and the federal statutes used to prosecute such cases. Assistant Attorney General of the Civil Rights Division Alexander Acosta and Assistant Attorney General of the Criminal Division Christopher A. Wray delivered the keynote addresses on the importance of protecting voting rights and the prosecution of election cases. On July 20 and 21, 2004, the Public Integrity Section and the Voting Section of the Department's Civil Rights Division co-sponsored a two-day symposium for DEOs representing each of the 93 federal judicial districts. Topics discussed included the types of conduct that are prosecutable as federal election crimes and the federal statutes available to prosecute such cases, and the handling of civil rights matters involving voting. Attorney General John Ashcroft delivered the keynote address on the importance of protecting voting rights and the prosecution of election fraud. In addition, Assistant Attorney General Christopher A. Wray of the Criminal Division and Assistant Attorney General R. Alexander Acosta of the Civil Rights Division addressed conference attendees on voting rights and election fraud enforcement issues respectively.

As a result of the Initiative, during 2002 the number of election crime matters opened by federal prosecutors throughout the country increased significantly, as did the Section's active involvement in election crime matters stemming from the Initiative. At the end of 2002, the Section was supervising and providing advice on approximately 43 election crime matters nationwide. In addition, as of December 31, 2002, 11 matters involving possible election crimes were pending in the Section. During 2002 the Section closed two election crime matters and continued its operational supervision of 8 voting fraud cases (conspiracy to illegally obtain criminal history records to use to challenge voters (AL) and 7 cases of vote buying involving 10 defendants (KY)).

EAC SUMMARY OF LITERATURE REVIEW FOR VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

Craig Donsanto, "The Federal Crime of Election Fraud," Public Integrity Section, Department of Justice, prepared for Democracy.Ru, n.d., at http://www.democracy.ru/english/library/international/eng\_1999-11.html

Addresses the role of the United States Department of Justice in matters of election fraud, specifically: what sort of election-related conduct is potentially actionable as a federal crime; what specific statutory theories apply to frauds occurring in elections lacking federal candidates on the ballot, what federalism; procedural, and policy considerations impact on the federalization of this type of case; and how Assistant United States Attorneys should respond to this type of complaint. As a general rule, the federal crime of voter fraud embraces only organized efforts to corrupt of the election process itself: i.e., the registration of voters, the casting of ballots, and the tabulation and certification of election results. Moreover, this definition excludes all activities that occur in connection with the political campaigning process, unless those activities are themselves illegal under some other specific law or prosecutorial theory. This definition also excludes isolated acts of individual wrongdoing that are not part of an organized effort to corrupt the voting process. Mistakes and other gaffs that inevitably occur are not included as voter fraud. Prosecuting election fraud offenses in federal court is further complicated by the constitutional limits that are placed on federal power over the election process. The conduct of elections is primarily a state rather than a federal activity.

Four situations where federal prosecution is appropriate:

1. Where the objective of the conduct is to corrupt the outcome of a federal elective contest, or where the consequential effect of the corrupt conduct impacts upon the vote count for federal office;
2. Where the object of the scheme is to discriminate against racial, ethnic or language minority groups, the voting rights of which have been specifically protected by federal statutes such as the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. section 1973 et seq.;
3. Where federalization is required in order to redress longstanding patterns of electoral fraud, either at the request of state or local authorities, or in the face of longstanding inaction by state authorities who appear to be unwilling or unable to respond under local law; and,
4. Where there is a factual basis to believe that fraudulent registration or voting activity is sufficiently connected to other forms of criminal activity that perusing the voter fraud angle will yield evidence useful in the prosecution of other categories of federal offense

Four advantages to federal prosecution:

1. Voter fraud investigations are labor intensive - local law enforcement agencies often lack the manpower and the financial resources to take these cases on;
2. Voter fraud matters are always politically sensitive and very high profile endeavors at the local level - local prosecutors (who are usually themselves elected) often shy away from prosecuting them for that reason; the successful prosecution of voter fraud cases demands that critical witnesses be examined under oath before criminal charges based on their testimony are filed.
3. Many states lack the broad grand jury process that exists in the federal system; and
4. The defendants in voter fraud cases are apt to be politicians - or agents of politicians - and it is often impossible for either the government or the defendant to obtain a fair trial in a case that is about politics and is tried to a locally-drawn jury. The federal court system provides for juries to be drawn from broader geographic base, thus often avoiding this problem.

Several prosecutorial theories used by United States Attorneys to federalize election frauds are discussed.

Four questions used by prosecutors in evaluating the credibility of election complaints:

1. does the substance of the complaint assuming it can be proven through investigation - suggest a potential crime;
2. is the complaint sufficiently fact-specific that it provides leads for investigators to pursue;
3. is there a federal statute that can be used to federalize the criminal activity at issue; and,
4. is there a special federal interest in the matter that warrants federalization rather than deferral to state law enforcement.

All federal election investigations must avoid the following: non-interference in elections unless absolutely necessary to preserve evidence; interviewing voters during active voting periods; seizing official election documentation; investigative activity inside open polls; and prosecutors must adhere to 18 U.S.C. section 592, prohibiting the stationing of armed men at places where voting activity is taking place.

People for the American Way, Election Protection 2004, Election Protection Coalition, at <http://www.electionprotection2004.org/edaynews.htm>

Election Protection 2004 was the nation's most far-reaching effort to protect voter rights before and on Election Day. The historic nonpartisan program included: (1) a toll-free number, 1-866-OUR-VOTE, with free, immediate and multi-lingual assistance to help voters with questions about registration and voting, and assist voters who encounter barriers to the ballot box; (2) distribution of more than five million "Voters' Bills of Rights" with state-specific information; (3) 25,000 volunteers, including 6,000 lawyers and law students, who watched for problems and assisted voters on the spot at more than 3,500 predominantly African-American and Latino precincts with a history of disenfranchisement in at least 17 states; and (4) civil rights lawyers and advocates represented voters in lawsuits, preserved access to the polls, exposed and prevented voter intimidation, worked with election officials to identify and solve problems with new voting machines, technology and ballot forms, and protected voter rights in advance and on Election Day.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression Stories (Abridged):

- An Associated Press story noted Election Protection's exposure of reported voter suppression tactics in Colorado: Officials with the Election Protection Coalition, a voter-rights group, also said some voters in a predominantly black neighborhood north of Denver found papers on their doorsteps giving them the wrong address for their precinct.
- Election Protection received a report from Boulder County, Colorado that a poll worker made racist comments to Asian American voter and then told her she was not on the list and turned her away. The voter saw others filling out provisional ballots and asked for one but was denied. Another Asian American woman behind her in line was also given trouble by the same poll worker (he questioned her nationality and also turned her away).
- Election Protection received a report from Florissant County, Missouri from a voter who lives in predominantly white neighborhood. While waiting in line to vote, a Republican challenger challenged the black voters by requesting more proof of identification, residence, and signature match, while asking nothing from white voters. Also, the same voter reportedly asked a few questions about voting but an election officials refused to provide any meaningful answer, insisting that "it's very simple", but provided white voters with information when requested. There was one other black voter in line who was also singled out for same treatment while white voters were not.
- The Election Protection hotline received reports from Pinellas County, Florida that individuals purporting to be from the Kerry campaign are going door-to-door handing out absentee ballots, and asking voters to fill them out, and then taking the ballots from them, saying "Vote here for Kerry. Don't bother going to the polls."
- The Election Protection Coalition received a report from a woman whose sister lives in Milwaukee and is on government assistance. Her sister was reportedly told by her "case manager" that if she voted for Kerry, she would stop receiving her checks.
- An illiterate, older and disabled voter in Miami-Dade asked for assistance reading the ballot and reported that a poll worker yelled at him and refused to assist him and also refused to allow him to bring a friend into the booth in order to read the ballot to him.
- The Election Protection Coalition have gathered reports that flyers are circulating in a black community in Lexington, South Carolina claiming they those who are behind on child support payments will be arrested as the polls.
- Minority voters from Palm Beach County, Florida reported to the hotline that they received middle-of-the-night, live harassing phone calls warning them away from the polls.
- A volunteer for Rock the Vote reported that two illiterate voters in Michigan requested assistance with their ballots but were refused and reportedly mocked by poll workers.
- The hotline received a call from a radio DJ in Hillsborough County, Florida, who stated that he has received many calls (most of which were from African-Americans) claiming that poll workers were turning voters away and not "letting" them vote.

EAC SUMMARY OF LITERATURE REVIEW FOR VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION RESEARCH

- The hotline received a call from Pima County, Arizona, indicating that Democratic voters received calls throughout Monday evening, providing incorrect information about the precinct location. Voters have had to be transported en masse in order to correct the problem.
- A caller from Alabama claims that he was told at his polling place that he could vote there for everything but the President and that he would have to go elsewhere in order to vote for a presidential candidate.
- Poll monitors in Philadelphia reports groups of lawyers, traveling in threes, who pull voters out of line and challenge them to provide ID, but when challenged themselves, they hop into waiting cars or vans and leave. Similar activity by Republican lawyers in Philadelphia was reported in the 2002 election.
- In Cuyahoga, Ohio, a caller reported that all black voters are being asked to show ID, while white voters are not. Caller report that he is black and had to show ID while his girlfriend is white and did not have to show ID.
- Two months ago, suspicious phone calls to newly registered Democrats —telling them they weren't, in fact, registered to vote — were traced to the Republican headquarters in the Eastern Panhandle. On Monday, Democrats there said the calls have started again, even after the Berkeley County Clerk — a Republican — sent the party a cease-and-desist letter. The Berkeley prosecutor, who also is county Democratic chairman, has called on the U.S. attorney to investigate.
- In Tuscon, Arizona a misleading call informing voters that they should vote on November 3 has been traced back to the state GOP headquarters. The FBI is investigating.
- A man driving around in a big van covered in American flags and a big picture of a policeman was reportedly parked in front of a polling place; he then got out and moved within the 75 ft limit, until he was asked to leave; he then was found inside the polling place and was again asked to leave. Election Protection volunteers contacted officials and the man was eventually removed.
- The Election Protection hotline has received a report from individuals who claim to have received recorded telephone message coming from Bill Clinton and ACT and reminding them to vote on Nov. 3rd.
- In Massachusetts, the EP Hotline has received a report that a radio station (WILD) is broadcasting that voters will be arrested on the spot if they have outstanding parking tickets.
- In Richland, South Carolina Election Protection has received a report of a poll manager turning away individuals who do not have photo ID issued to the county or a driver's license; an EP lawyer spoke with the Poll Manager at 8:20 am and told her that people with other forms of ID should be allowed to vote by provisional ballot.
- In Greenville, a caller reported that a white poll worker was asking Blacks for multiple form of I.D. Fortunately, the voter who reported the problem did have a second I.D. but reported that some others were turned away. Election Protection attorneys have alerted election officials.
- In Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, an official looking flyer advises Democratic voters to "create a peaceful voting environment" by voting on Wednesday, November 3
- The week before the election, flyers were circulated in Milwaukee under the heading "Milwaukee Black Voters League" with some "warnings for election time." The flyer listed false reasons for which you would be barred from voting (such as a traffic ticket) and then warned that "If you violate any of these laws you can get ten years in prison and your children will get taken away from you."
- There is a Jefferson County flyer which tells voters "See you at the Poles!sic"... on November 4.

Report to Congressional Requesters, September 2005.

[SUMMARY FAILS TO NOTE ELECTION OFFICIALS' RESPONSES THAT LITTLE VOTING FRAUD OR VOTER INTIMIDATION WAS DETECTED. DETECTED VOTING FRAUD WAS RELATED TO SUBMISSION OF FALSE/MATERIALLY INCORRECT VOTER REGISTRATION APPLICATIONS AND TO ABSENTEE BALLOT FRAUD. VOTER SUPPRESSION EFFORTS OCCUR.] This Report focuses on the efforts of local election officials in 14

jurisdictions within 7 states to manage the registration process, maintain accurate voter registration lists, and ensure that eligible citizens in those jurisdictions had the opportunity to cast ballots during the 2004 election. The Report concentrates on election officials' characterization of their experiences with regard to (1) managing the voter registration process and any challenges related to receiving voter registration applications; checking them for completeness, accuracy, and duplication; and entering information into voter registration lists; (2) removing voters' names from voter registration lists and ensuring that the names of eligible voters were not inadvertently removed; and (3) implementing HAVA provisional voting and identification requirements and addressing any challenges encountered related to these requirements. The Report also provides information on motor vehicle agency (MVA) officials' characterization of their experiences assisting citizens who apply to register to vote at MVA offices and forwarding voter registration applications to election offices. The Report analyzed information collected from elections and motor vehicle agency offices in seven states—Arizona, California, Michigan, New York, Texas, Virginia, and Wisconsin. The 14 jurisdictions we selected were Gila and Maricopa Counties, Arizona; Los Angeles and Yolo Counties, California; City of Detroit and Delta Township, Michigan; New York City and Rensselaer County, New York; Bexar and Webb Counties, Texas; Albemarle and Arlington Counties, Virginia; and the cities of Franklin and Madison, Wisconsin.

Election officials representing all but one of the jurisdictions surveyed following the November 2004 election said they faced some challenges managing the voter registration process, including (1) receiving voter registration applications; (2) checking them for completeness, accuracy, and duplication; and (3) entering information into voter registration lists; when challenges occurred, election officials reported they took various steps to address them. All but 1 of the jurisdictions reported removing names from registration lists during 2004 for various reasons, including that voters requested that their names be removed from the voter registration list; information from the U.S. Postal Service (USPS) showing that voters had moved outside the jurisdiction; felony records received from federal, state, or local governments identifying voters as ineligible due to felony convictions; and death records received from state or local vital statistics offices. All of the jurisdictions reported that they permitted citizens to cast provisional ballots during the November 2004 election. In addition, 12 of the 14 jurisdictions to which this was applicable reported that they offered certain first-time voters who registered by mail the opportunity to cast provisional ballots. Local election officials in 12 of the 13 jurisdictions 13 we surveyed reported that they set up mechanisms to inform voters—without cost—about the outcome of their provisional votes during the November 2004 election. These mechanisms included toll-free telephone numbers, Web sites, and letters sent to the voters who cast provisional ballots. Election officials representing 8 of the 14 jurisdictions reported facing challenges implementing provisional voting for various reasons, including some poll workers not being familiar with provisional voting or, in one jurisdiction representing a large number of precincts, staff not having sufficient time to process provisional ballots.

Lori Minnite and David Callahan, "Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud," Demos: A Network of Ideas and Action, 2003.

A comprehensive survey and analysis of vote fraud in the United States. The methodology included doing nexis searches for all 50 states and surveying existing research and reports. In addition, Minnite did a more in-depth study of 12 diverse states by doing nexis searches, studying statutory and case law, and conducting interviews with election officials and attorneys general. Finally, the study includes an analysis of a few of the most high profile cases of alleged fraud in the last 10 years, including the Miami mayoral election (1997), Orange County congressional race (1996), and the general election in Missouri (2000). In these cases, Minnite shows that many allegations of fraud do not end up being meritorious. Minnite finds that available evidence suggests that the incidence of election fraud is minimal and rarely affects election outcomes. Election officials generally do a very good job of protecting against fraud. Conditions that give rise to election fraud have steadily declined over the last century as a result of weakened political parties, strengthened election administration, and improved voting technology. There is little available evidence that election reforms such as the National Voter Registration Act, election day registration, and mail-in voting have resulted in increases in election fraud. Election fraud appears also to be very rare in the 12 states examined more in-depth. Legal and news records turned up little evidence of significant fraud in these states or any indication that fraud is more than a minor problem. Interviews with state officials further confirmed this impression. Minnute found that, overall, the absentee mail-in ballot process is the feature most vulnerable to voter fraud. There is not a lot of evidence of absentee ballot fraud but the potential for fraud is greatest in this area because of a lack of uniformly strong security measures in place in all states to prevent fraud.

Suggested reforms to prevent what voter fraud does take place:

1. effective use of new statewide voter registration databases;
2. identification requirements for first time voters who register by mail should be modified to expand the list of acceptable identifying documents;
3. fill important election administration positions with nonpartisan professionals;
4. strengthen enforcement through adequate funding and authority for offices responsible for detecting and prosecuting fraud; and
5. establish Election Day Registration because it usually requires voter identification and authorization in person before a trained election worker, which reduces the opportunity for registration error or fraud.

People for the American Way, NAACP, Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights, "Shattering the Myth: An Initial Snapshot of Voter Disenfranchisement in the 2004 Elections," December 2004.

A description and analysis of the complaints and allegations of voting irregularities gathered by the Election Protection program during the 2004 presidential election. Election Protection received more than a thousand complaints of voter suppression or intimidation. Complaints ranged from intimidating experiences at polling places to coordinated suppression tactics. For example:

- Police stationed outside a Cook County, Illinois, polling place were requesting photo ID and telling voters if they had been convicted of a felony that they could not vote.
- In Pima, Arizona, voters at multiple polls were confronted by an individual, wearing a black tee shirt with "US Constitution Enforcer" and a military-style belt that gave the appearance he was armed. He asked voters if they were citizens, accompanied by a cameraman who filmed the encounters.
- There were numerous incidents of intimidation by partisan challengers at predominately low income and minority precincts
- Voters repeatedly complained about misinformation campaigns via flyers or phone calls encouraging them to vote on a day other than November 2, 2004 or of false information regarding their right to vote. In Polk County, Florida, for example, a voter received a call telling her to vote on November 3. Similar complaints were also reported in other counties throughout Florida. In Wisconsin and elsewhere voters received flyers that said:
  - "If you already voted in any election this year, you can't vote in the Presidential Election."
  - "If anybody in your family has ever been found guilty of anything you can't vote in the Presidential Election."
  - "If you violate any of these laws, you can get 10 years in prison and your children will be taken away from you."

There were also numerous reports of poll workers refusing to give voters provisional ballots.

The following is a summary of the types of acts of suppression and intimidation included in the report and a list of the states in which they took place. All instances of irregularities that were more administrative in nature have been omitted:

1. Improper implementation of voter identification rules, especially asking only African Americans for proof of identity: Florida, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana
2. Individuals at the polls posing as some sort of law enforcement authority and intimidating and harassing voters: Arizona, Missouri
3. Intimidating and harassing challengers at the polls: Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Missouri, Minnesota
4. Deceptive practices and disinformation campaigns, such as the use of flyers with intentional misinformation about voting rights or voting procedures, often directed at minority communities; the use of phone calls giving people misinformation about polling sites and

other procedures; and providing verbal misinformation at the polls in a way that appears to have been intentionally misleading: Florida, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, North Carolina, Arkansas, Texas

5. Refusal to provide provisional ballots to certain voters: Ohio, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan, Colorado, Missouri, Texas, Georgia, Louisiana
6. Registration applications submitted through third parties that were not processed: Arizona, Michigan, Nevada (registration forms destroyed by Sproul Associates)
7. Improper removal from the voter registration list: Arizona
8. Individuals questioning voters' citizenship: Arizona
9. Police officers at the polls intimidating voters: Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Missouri, North Carolina

The report does not provide corroborating evidence for the allegations it describes. However, especially in the absence of a log of complaints received by the Department of Justice, this report provides a very useful overview of the types of experiences some voters more than likely endured on Election Day in 2004.

Books

John Fund, Stealing Elections: How Voter Fraud Threatens Our Democracy, Encounter Books, 2004.

Focuses almost entirely on alleged transgressions by Democrats. Fund's accusations, if credible, would indicate that fraud such as voter registration fraud, absentee ballot fraud, dead people voting, and felon voting is prevalent throughout the country. However, due to its possible biases, lack of specific footnoting, and insufficient identification of primary source material, caution is strongly urged with respect to utilizing this book for assessing the amount and types of voter fraud and voter intimidation occurring.

Fund says that "Election fraud, whether its phony voter registrations, illegal absentee ballots, shady recounts or old-fashioned ballot-box stuffing, can be found in every part of the United States, although it is probably spreading because of the ever-so-tight divisions that have polarized the country and created so many close elections lately. Fund argues that fraud has been made easier by the passage of the National Voting Rights Act because it allows ineligible voters to remain on the voter rolls, allowing a voter to vote in the name of someone else. He claims dead people, people who have moved, and people in jail remain on the voting list. He believes because of NVRA illegal aliens have been allowed to vote.

Absentee balloting makes it even worse: someone can register under false names and then use absentee ballots to cast multiple votes. Groups can get absentee ballots for the poor and elderly and then manipulate their choices.

Provides a number of examples of alleged voter fraud, mostly perpetrated by Democrats. For example, he claims much fraud in St. Louis in 2000, including illegal court orders allowing people to vote, felons voting, people voting twice, dead people voting, voters were registered to vacant lots, election judges were not registered and evidence of false registrations. Another case he pays a great deal of attention to are the alleged transgressions by Democrats in Indian Country in South Dakota 2002, including voter registration fraud, suspicious absentee ballot requests, vote hauling, possible polling place fraud, abusive lawyers at polling sites, and possible vote buying.

Andrew Gumbel, Steal this Vote: Dirty Elections and the Rotten History of Democracy in American, Nation Books, 2005.

Bulk of the book comprises stories from United States electoral history outside the scope of this project; however, tales are instructive in showing how far back irregular and illegal voting practices go. Focuses almost entirely on alleged transgressions by Republican, although at times it does include complaints about Democratic tactics. Gumbel's accusations, if credible, especially in the Bush-Gore election, would indicate there were a number of problems in key states in such areas as intimidation, vote counting, and absentee ballots. However, due to its possible biases, lack of specific footnoting, and insufficient identification of primary source material, caution is strongly urged with respect to utilizing this book for assessing the amount for civilians overseas in their efforts to vote by absentee ballot, leading many of them to be disenfranchised.

Legal

Indiana Democratic Party vs. Rokita, U.S. District Court Southern District of Indiana (Indianapolis) 1:05-cv-00634, U.S. Court of Appeals, 7th Circuit 06-2218

Although the proponents of SEA 483 asserted that the law was intended to combat voter fraud, no evidence of the existence of such fraud has ever been provided. No voter has been convicted of or even charged with the offense of misrepresenting his identity for purposes of casting a fraudulent ballot in person, King Dep. 95-96; Mahern Aff. ¶¶ 2-3, though there have been documented instances of absentee ballot fraud. King Dep. 120. Indeed, no evidence of in person, on-site voting fraud was presented to the General Assembly during the legislative process leading up to the enactment of the Photo ID Law. Mahern Aff. ¶¶ 2-

The State cannot show any compelling justification for subjecting only voters who vote in person to the new requirements of the Photo ID Law, while exempting absentee voters who vote by mail or persons who live in state-certified residential facilities.

On the other hand, absentee ballots are peculiarly vulnerable to coercion and vote tampering since there is no election official or independent election observer available to ensure that there is no illegal coercion by family members, employers, churches, union officials, nursing home administrators, and others.

Law gives virtually unbridled discretion to partisan precinct workers and challengers to make subjective determinations such as (a) whether a form of photo identification produced by a voter conforms to what is required by the Law, and (b) whether the voter presenting himself or herself at the polls is in fact the voter depicted in the photo Robertson Dep. 29-34, 45; King Dep. 86, 89. This is significant because any voter who is challenged under this Law will be required to vote by provisional ballot and to make a special trip to the election board's office in order to have his vote counted. Robertson Dep. 37; King Dep. 58.

The Photo ID Law confers substantial discretion, not on law enforcement officials, but on partisan precinct poll workers and challengers appointed by partisan political officials, to determine both whether a voter has presented a form of identification which conforms to that required by the Law and whether the person presenting the identification is the person depicted on it. Conferring this degree of discretion upon partisan precinct officials and members of election boards to enforce the facially neutral requirements of the Law has the potential for becoming a means of suppressing a particular point of view.

The State arguably might be justified in imposing uniform, narrowly-tailored and not overly-burdensome voter identification requirements if the State were able to show that there is an intolerably high incidence of fraud among voters misidentifying themselves at the polls for the purpose of casting a fraudulent ballot. But here, the State has utterly failed to show that this genre of fraud is rampant or even that it has ever occurred in the context of on-site, in-person voting (as opposed to absentee voting by mail) so as to justify these extra burdens, which will fall disproportionately on the poor and elderly.

And where the State has already provided a mechanism for matching signatures, has made it a crime to misrepresent one's identity for purposes of voting, and requires the swearing out of an affidavit if the voter's identity is challenged, it already has provisions more than adequate to prevent or minimize fraud in the context of in-person voting, particularly in the absence of any evidence that the problem the Law seeks to address is anything more than the product of hypothesis, speculation and fantasy.

In-person voter-identity fraud is notoriously difficult to detect and investigate. In his book Stealing Elections, John Fund observes that actual in-person voter fraud is nearly undetectable without a voter photo-identification requirement because anybody who provides a name that is on the rolls may vote and then walk away with no record of the person's actual identity. The problem is only exacerbated by the increasingly transient nature of society. Documentation of in-person voter fraud often occurs only when a legitimate voter at the polls hears a fraudulent voter trying to use her name, as happened to a woman in California in 1994. See Larry J. Sabato & Glenn R. Simpson, Dirty Little Secrets 292 (1996).

Regardless of the lack of extensive evidence of in-person voter fraud, the Commission on

Federal Election Reform (known as the Baker-Carter Commission) recently concluded that "there is no doubt that it occurs." State Ex. 1, p. 18.1 Legal cases as well as newspaper and other reports confirm that in-person voter-identity fraud, including voter impersonation, double votes, dead votes, and fake addresses, plague federal and state elections. [The memorandum details several specific cases of various types of alleged voting fraud from the past several years]

Though they are largely unable to study verifiable data concerning in-person voter fraud, scholars are well aware of the conditions that foster fraudulent voting. See Fund, supra; Sabato & Simpson, supra, 321. In particular, fraud has become ever more likely as "it has become more difficult to keep the voting rolls clean of 'deadwood' voters who have moved or died" because such an environment makes "fraudulent voting easier and therefore more tempting for those so inclined." Sabato & Simpson, supra, 321. "In general, experts believe that one in five names on the rolls in Indiana do not belong there." State Ex. 25.

For this case, Clark Benson, a nationally recognized expert in the collection and analysis of voter-registration and population data, conducted his own examination of Indiana's voter registration lists and concluded that they are among the most highly inflated in the nation.

The Crawford Plaintiffs cite the concessions by Indiana Election Division Co-Director King and the Intervenor-State that they are unaware of any historical in-person incidence of voter fraud occurring at the polling place (Crawford Brief, p. 23) as conclusive evidence that in-person voter fraud does not exist in Indiana. They also seek to support this conclusion with the testimony of two "veteran poll watchers," Plaintiff Crawford and former president of the Plaintiff NAACP, Indianapolis Chapter, Roderick E. Bohannon, who testified that they had never seen any instances of in-person voter fraud.

(Id.)

While common sense, the experiences of many other states, and the findings of the Baker-Carter Commission all lead to the reasonable inferences that (a) in-person polling place fraud likely exists, but (b) is nearly impossible to detect without requiring photo identification, the State can cite to no confirmed instances of such fraud. On the other hand, the Plaintiffs have no proof that it does not occur.

At the level of logic, moreover, it is just reasonable to conclude that the lack of confirmed incidents of in-person voting fraud in Indiana is the result of an ineffective identification security system as it is to conclude there is no in-person voting fraud in Indiana. So while it is undisputed that the state has no proof that in-person polling place fraud has occurred in Indiana, there does in fact remain a dispute over the existence vel non of in-person polling place fraud.

It is also important to understand that the nature of in-person election fraud is such that it is nearly impossible to detect or investigate. Unless a voter stumbles across someone else trying to use her identity, see Sabato & Simpson, supra, 292, or unless the over-taxed poll worker happens to notice that the voter's signature is different from her registration signature State Ex. 37, ¶ 9, the chances of detecting such in-person voter fraud are extremely small. Yet, inflated voter-registration rolls provide ample opportunity for those who wish to commit in-person voter fraud.

See Fund, supra, 24, 65, 69, 138; Sabato & Simpson, supra, 321. And there is concrete evidence that the names of dead people have been used to cast fraudulent ballots. See Fund, supra, 64. Particularly in light of Indiana's highly inflated voter rolls State Ex. 27, p. 9, Plaintiffs' repeated claims that there has never been any in-person voter fraud in Indiana can hardly be plausible, even if the state is unable to prove that such fraud has in fact occurred.

Common Cause of Georgia vs. Billups*, U.S. District Court, Northern District of Georgia (Rome) 4:05-cv-00201-HLM U.S. Court of Appeals, 11th Circuit 05-15784

The Secretary of State, as the Chief Election Officer in Georgia, informed the General Assembly before the passage of Act 53 in a letter (attached hereto as Exhibit A), and also informed the Governor in a letter (attached hereto as Exhibit B) before he signed the bill into law, that there had been no documented cases of fraudulent voting by persons who obtained ballots unlawfully by misrepresenting their identities as registered voters to poll workers reported to her office during her nine years as Secretary of State.

Although the Secretary of State had informed the members of the General Assembly and the Governor prior to the enactment of Act 53, that her office had received many complaints of voter fraud involving absentee ballots and no documented complaints of fraud that involve ballots that were cast in person at the polls, the General Assembly ignored this information and arbitrarily chose instead to require only those registered voters who vote in person to present a Photo ID as a condition of voting, but deliberately refused to impose the same requirement on absentee voters.

According to a press release prepared by the Communications Office of the Georgia House of Representatives, the purpose of Act 53 is: to address the issue of voter fraud by placing tighter restrictions on voter identification procedures. Those casting ballots will now be required to bring a photo ID with them before they will be allowed to vote.

Al Marks, Vice Chairman for Public Affairs and Communication of the Hall County GOP told the Gainesville Times: I don't think we need it for voting, because I don't think there's a voter fraud problem. Gainesville Times, "States Voters Must Present Picture IDs" (September 15, 2005) (www.gainesvilletimes.com).

There is no evidence that the existing provisions of Georgia law have not been effective in deterring and preventing imposters from fraudulently obtaining and casting ballots at the polls by misrepresenting their true identities to election officials and passing themselves off as registered voters whose names appear on the official voter registration list.

The pretextual nature of the purported justification for the burden which the Photo ID requirement imposes on the right to vote is shown by the following facts:

(a) Fraudulent voting was already prohibited by existing Georgia law without unduly burdening the right of a citizen to vote.

(i) Fraudulent voting was already prohibited as a crime under O.C.G.A. §§ 21-2-561, 21-2-562, 21-2-566, 21-2-571, 21-2-572 and 21-2-600, punishable by a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment for up to ten years, or both.

(ii) Voter registration records are updated periodically by the Secretary of State and local election officials to eliminate people who have died, have moved, or are no longer eligible to vote in Georgia for some other reason.

(iii) Existing Georgia law also required election officials in each precinct to maintain a list of names and addresses of registered voters residing in that precinct, and to check off the names of each person from that official list as they cast their ballots.

(iv) Registered voters were also required by existing Georgia law to present at least one of the seventeen forms of documentary identification to election officials who were required, before issuing the voter a ballot, to match the name and address shown on the document to the name and address on the official roll of registered voters residing in the particular precinct. O.C.G.A. § 21-2-417.

(b) There is no evidence that the existing Georgia law has not been effective in deterring or preventing fraudulent in-person voting by impersonators - the only kind of fraudulent voting that might be prevented by the Photo ID requirement. To the contrary, the Secretary of State, who, as the Superintendent of Elections, is the highest election official in Georgia, informed both the General Assembly (Exhibit A) and the Governor (Exhibit B) in writing that there had been no documented cases of fraudulent in person voting by imposters reported to her during her nine years in office.

(c) If the true intention of the General Assembly had been to prevent fraudulent voting by imposters, the General Assembly would have imposed the same restrictions on the casting of absentee ballots - particularly after the Secretary of State had called to their attention the fact that there had been many documented instances of fraudulent casting of absentee ballots reported to her office.

(d) Fraudulent in-person voting is unlikely, would be easily detected if it had occurred in significant numbers, and would not be likely to have a substantial impact on the outcome of an election:

(i) Many people vote at a local neighborhood polling place where they are likely to be known to and recognized by neighbors or poll workers.

(ii) Voters were required by existing Georgia law (O.C.G.A. § 21-2-417), to provide one of the seventeen means of identification to election officials.

(iii) Election officials are required, before issuing the ballot to the voter, to check off the name of either voter from an up-to-date list of the names and addresses of every registered voter residing in the precinct. If an imposter arrived at a poll and was successful in fraudulently obtaining a ballot before the registered voter arrived at the poll, a registered voter, who having taken the time to go to the polls to vote, would undoubtedly complain to elections officials if he or she were refused a ballot and not allowed to vote because his or her name had already been checked off the list of registered voters as having voted. Likewise, if an imposter arrived at the polls after the registered voter had voted and attempted to pass himself off as someone he was not, the election official would instantly know of the attempted fraud, would not issue the imposter a ballot or allow him to vote, and presumably would have the imposter arrested or at least investigate the attempted fraud and report the attempt to the Secretary of State as Superintendent of Elections.

U.S. Department of Justice Section 5 Recommendation Memorandum (regarding HB 244), August 25, 2005 at <http://www.votingrights.org/news/downloads/Section%205%20Recommendation%20Memorandum.pdf>

Overview: Five career attorneys with the civil rights department investigated and analyzed Georgia's election reform law. Four of those attorneys recommended objecting to Section 59, the voter identification requirement. The provision required all voters to present government issued photo identification in order to vote. The objection was based on the attorneys' findings that there was little to no evidence of polling place fraud, the only kind of fraud an ID requirement would address, and that the measure would disenfranchise many voters, predominantly minority voters, in violation of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act.

Factual Analysis: The sponsor of the measure in the state legislature said she was motivated by the fact that she is aware of vote buying in certain districts; she read John Fund's book; and that "if there are fewer black voters because of this bill, it will only be because there is less opportunity for fraud. She said that when black voters in her black precincts are not paid to vote, they do not go to the polls."

A member of the Fulton County Board of Registrations and Elections said that prior to November 2004, Fulton County received 8,112 applications containing "missing or irregular" information. Only 55 of those registrants responded to BOE letters. The member concluded that the rest must be "bogus" as a result. He also stated that 15,237 of 105,553 precinct cards came back as undeliverable, as did 3,071 cards sent to 45,907 new voters. Of these 3,071, 921 voted.

Secretary of State Cathy Cox submitted a letter testifying to the absence of any complaints of voter fraud via impersonation during her tenure. In the legal analysis, the attorneys state that if they determine that Georgia could have fulfilled its stated purpose of election fraud, while preventing or ameliorating the retrogression, an objection is appropriate. They conclude that the state could have avoided retrogression by retaining various forms of currently accepted voter ID for which no substantiated security concerns were raised. Another non-retrogressive alternative would have been to maintain the affidavit alternative for those without ID, since "There is no evidence that penalty of law is an insufficient deterrent to falsely signing an affidavit of identity." The attorneys point out that the state's recitation of a case upholding voter fraud in Dodge County does not support the purpose of the Act because that case involved vote buying and selling, not impersonation or voting under a false identity.

I spoke to Job about the documents that I need. He will send me his summary of the articles/books that he read. However, he said that Tova also summarized some of those articles/books. I don't have a contact number/email for Tova. Could you contact her and ask her to provide us with any summary of the articles/books that she read as they are listed in Appendix 2?

Subject Voter Fraud-Voter Intimidation Draft Report

Attached is a copy of the draft voter fraud-voter intimidation report that combines all of the pieces provided to me by the consultants, except for the voluminous Nexis research and case law charts. Tom wants to get this before the Commissioners ASAP, but I need some other eyes to look it over before we do. Although I've made some formatting changes to provide some consistency in presentation, and corrected a couple of glaring errors, I remain concerned about a number of issues:

- As you know, references to DOJ actions/responses have caused some concern at DOJ. But both consultants are adamantly opposed to EAC making substantive changes to their report. Perhaps using footnotes clearly labeled as EAC footnotes would be a method of addressing this issue?
- There are some recommendations regarding DOJ that we (the consultants and I) were told would not be supported by DOJ, and other references to DOJ, none of which have been reviewed by the department. I think we ought to give Craig Donsanto and John Tanner a chance to provide feedback on each of these sections.
- I am a little concerned about the naming of names, particularly in the section that addresses working group concerns. If we publish it as is, it might end up as fodder for some very negative newspaper articles.
- The report currently uses three different voices: third person, first person singular, first person plural. I think this looks really clumsy. If we are not actually making substantive changes, perhaps we could get away with making the presentation consistent in this regard.
- Because the consultants submitted the report in pieces, they did not include proper sequeways. I don't know if we should leave it as is, or insert them where needed.

Please let me know what you think. If it would help, we can schedule a teleconference. --- Peggy

Introduction

Charge Under HAVA

Under the Help America Vote Act, Pub. L. No. 107-252, 116 Stat. 1666 (2002) (“HAVA”), the United States Election Assistance Commission is charged with developing national statistics on voter fraud and developing methods of deterring and investigating voter fraud. Also, the Commission is charged with developing methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation.

Scope of Project

The Commission employed a bipartisan team of legal consultants, Tova Wang and Job Serebrov to develop a preliminary overview work product to determine the quantity and quality of vote fraud and voter intimidation that is present on a national scale. The consultants’ work is neither comprehensive nor conclusive. This first phase of an envisioned two-phase project was constrained by both time and funding. The consultants’ conclusions and recommendations for phase II will be contained in this report.

The consultants, working without the aid of a support staff, divided most of the work. However, the final work product was mutually checked and approved. They agreed upon the steps that were taken needed and the method employed. For all of the documentary sources, the consultants limited the time period under review from January 1, 2001 to January 1, 2006. The research performed by the consultants included interviews, an extensive Nexis search, a review of existing literature, and case research.

Interviews: The consultants chose the interviewees by first coming up with a list of the categories of types of people they wanted to interview. Then the consultants separately, equally filled those categories with a certain number of people. Due to time and resource constraints, the consultants had to pare down this list substantially – for instance, they had to rule out interviewing prosecutors altogether – but still got a good range of people to talk to. The ultimate categories were academics, advocates, elections officials, lawyers and judges. Although the consultants were able to talk to most of the people they wanted to, some were unavailable and a few were not comfortable speaking to them, particularly judges. The consultants together conducted all of the interviews, either by phone or in person. Then the consultants split up drafting the summaries. All summaries were reviewed and mutually approved. Most of the interviews were extremely informative and the consultants found the interviewees to be extremely knowledgeable and insightful for the most part.

Nexis: Initially, the consultants developed an enormous list of possible Nexis search terms. It soon became obvious that it would be impossible to conduct the research that way. As a result, consultant Wang performed the Nexis search by finding search term combinations that would yield virtually every article on a particular subject from the last five years. Consultant Serebrov approved the search terms. Then Wang created an excel spreadsheet in order to break down the articles in way in which they could be effectively analyzed for patterns. Each type of fraud is broken down in a separate chart according to where it took place, the date, the type of election it occurred in, what the allegation was, the publication it came from. Where there was a follow up article, any information that that suggested there had been some further action taken or some resolution to the allegation was also included. For four very complicated and long drawn out situations – Washington State, Wisconsin, South Dakota in 2004, and the vote buying cases in a couple of particular jurisdictions over the last several years –written summaries with news citations are provided.

Existing Literature: Part of the selections made by the consultants resulted from consultant Wang's long-term familiarity with the material while part was the result of a joint web search for articles and books on vote fraud and voter intimidation and suggestions from those interviewed by the consultants. The consultants reviewed a wide range of materials from government reports and investigations, to academic literature, to reports published by advocacy groups. The consultants believe that they covered the landscape of available sources.

Cases: In order to properly identify all applicable cases, the consultants first developed an extensive word search term list. A WestLaw search was performed and the first one hundred cases under each word search term were then gathered in individual files. This resulted in a total of approximately 44,000 cases. Most of these cases were federal as opposed to state and appellate as opposed to trial. Consultant Serebrov analyzed the cases in each file to determine if they were on point. If he found that the first twenty cases were inapplicable, Serebrov would sample forty to fifty other file cases at random to determine applicability. If the entire file did not yield any cases, the file would be discarded. All discarded word search terms were recorded in a separate file. Likewise, if the file only yielded a few applicable cases, it would also be discarded. However, if a small but significant number of cases were on point, the file was later charted. The results of the case search were stark because relatively few applicable cases were found.

Working Definition of Fraud and Intimidation

Note: The definition provided below is for the purposes of this EAC project. Most of the acts described come within the federal criminal definition of fraud, but some may not.

Election fraud is any intentional action, or intentional failure to act when there is a duty to do so, that corrupts the election process in a manner that can impact on election outcomes. This includes interfering in the process by which persons register to vote; the way in which ballots are obtained, marked, or tabulated; and the process by which election results are canvassed and certified.

Examples include the following:

- falsifying voter registration information pertinent to eligibility to cast a vote, (e.g. residence, criminal status, etc).;
- altering completed voter registration applications by entering false information;
- knowingly destroying completed voter registration applications (other than spoiled applications) before they can be submitted to the proper election authority;
- knowingly removing eligible voters from voter registration lists, in violation of HAVA, NVRA, or state election laws;
- intentional destruction by election officials of voter registration records or balloting records, in violation of records retention laws, to remove evidence of election fraud;
- vote buying;
- voting in the name of another;
- voting more than once;
- coercing a voter's choice on an absentee ballot;
- using a false name and/or signature on an absentee ballot;
- destroying or misappropriating an absentee ballot;
- felons, or in some states ex-felons, who vote when they know they are ineligible to do so;
- misleading an ex-felon about his or her right to vote;
- voting by non-citizens who know they are ineligible to do so;
- intimidating practices aimed at vote suppression or deterrence, including the abuse of challenge laws;
- deceiving voters with false information (e.g.; deliberately directing voters to the wrong polling place or providing false information on polling hours and dates);
- knowingly failing to accept voter registration applications, to provide ballots, or to accept and count voted ballots in accordance with the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act;
- intentional miscounting of ballots by election officials;
- intentional misrepresentation of vote tallies by election officials;
- acting in any other manner with the intention of suppressing voter registration or voting, or interfering with vote counting and the certification of the vote.

Voting fraud does not include mistakes made in the course of voter registration, balloting, or tabulating ballots and certifying results. For purposes of the EAC study, it also does not include violations of campaign finance laws.

Summaries of Research Conducted

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.
- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, “dead” voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud, although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.
- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.
- Several people indicate – including representatives from DOJ -- that for various reasons, the Department of Justice is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now and is focusing on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting and felon voting. While the civil rights section continues to focus on systemic patterns of malfeasance, the public integrity section is focusing now on individuals, on isolated instances of fraud.
- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed
- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.
  - With respect to the civil rights section, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one’s definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and the section has not pursued any such cases.
  - Craig Donsanto of the public integrity section says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases the department is investigating and the number of indictments the section is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, the department has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so it can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.
- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud. Of particular note, Sarah Ball Johnson, Executive Director of Elections for Kentucky, emphasized that having had an effective statewide voter registration database for more than thirty years has helped that state avoid most of the fraud problems that have been alleged elsewhere, such as double voting and felon voting.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment

- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama’s “deceptive practices” bill
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected nonpartisanly they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas is a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states’ office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.
- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots “for cause” only if it were politically feasible.
- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the scheme contemplated in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.
- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

Nexis Research

Absentee Ballot Fraud

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters
- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased
- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported on included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places.
- Improper demands for identification
- Poll watchers harassing voters
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters
- Disproportionate police presence
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from “battleground” states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

“Dead Voters and Multiple Voting”

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking of voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person taking criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found 5 such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations in three particular jurisdictions as detailed in the vote buying summary. There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area. All of these cases are concentrated in the Midwest and South.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of voter registration forms. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case charges were filed against ten individuals. In one case a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem has been the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Existing Research

There are many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. There is little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud is the report written by Lori Minnite. The most systematic look at voter intimidation is the report by Laughlin McDonald. Books written about this subject seem to all have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists. It is hoped that this gap will be filled in the “second phase” of this EAC project.

Moreover, reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund’s frequently cited book. Again, this is something that it is hoped will be addressed in the “second phase” of this EAC project by doing follow up research on allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate, but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.
- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Cases

After reviewing over 40,000 cases, the majority of which came from appeals courts, I have found comparatively very few which are applicable to this study. Of those that are applicable, no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it seems that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility. But because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, I suggest that case research for the second phase of this project concentrate on state trial-level decisions.

Methodology

The following is a summary of interviews conducted with a number of political scientists and experts in the field as to how one might undertake a comprehensive examination of voter fraud and intimidation. A list of the individuals interviewed and their ideas are available, and all of the individuals welcome any further questions or explanations of their recommended procedures.

- In analyzing instances of alleged fraud and intimidation, we should look to criminology as a model. In criminology, experts use two sources: the Uniform Crime Reports, which are all reports made to the police, and the Victimization Survey, which asks the general public whether a particular incident has happened to them. After surveying what the most common allegations are, we should conduct a survey of the general public that ask whether they have committed certain acts or been subjected to any incidents of fraud or intimidation. This would require using a very large sample, and we would need to employ the services of an expert in survey data collection. (Stephen Ansolobhere, MIT)
- Several political scientists with expertise in these types of studies recommended a methodology that includes interviews, focus groups, and a limited survey. In determining who to interview and where the focus groups should be drawn from, they recommend the following procedure:
  - Pick a number of places that have historically had many reports of fraud and/or intimidation; from that pool pick 10 that are geographically and demographically diverse, and have had a diversity of problems
  - Pick a number of places that have not had many reports of fraud and/or intimidation; from that pool pick 10 places that match the geographic and demographic make-up of the previous ten above (and, if possible, have comparable elections practices)

- Assess the resulting overall reports and impressions resulting from these interviews and focus groups, and examine comparisons and differences among the states and what may give rise to them.

In conducting a survey of elections officials, district attorneys, district election officers, they recommend that:

- The survey sample be large in order to be able to get the necessary subsets
- The survey must include a random set of counties where there have and have not been a large number of allegations

(Allan Lichtman, American University; Thad Hall, University of Utah; Bernard Grofman, UC – Irvine)

- Another political scientist recommended employing a methodology that relies on qualitative data drawn from in-depth interviews with key critics and experts on all sides of the debate on fraud; quantitative data collected through a survey of state and local elections and law enforcement officials; and case studies. Case studies should focus on the five or ten states, regions or cities where there has been a history of election fraud to examine past and present problems. The survey should be mailed to each state's attorney general and secretary of state, each county district attorney's office and each county board of elections in the 50 states. (Lorraine Minnite, Barnard College)
- The research should be a two-step process. Using LexisNexis and other research tools, a search should be conducted of news media accounts over the past decade. Second, interviews with a systematic sample of election officials nationwide and in selected states should be conducted. (Chandler Davidson, Rice University)
- One expert in the field posits that we can never come up with a number that accurately represents either the incidence of fraud or the incidence of voter intimidation. Therefore, the better approach is to do an assessment of what is most likely to happen, what election violations are most likely to be committed – in other words, a risk analysis. This would include an analysis of what it would actually take to commit various acts, e.g. the cost/benefit of each kind of violation. From there we could rank the likely prevalence of each type of activity and examine what measures are or could be effective in combating them. (Wendy Weiser, Brennan Center of New York University)
- Replicate a study in the United States done abroad by Susan Hyde of the University of California- San Diego examining the impact of impartial poll site observers on the incidence of election fraud. Doing this retrospectively would require the following steps:
  - Find out where there were federal observers
  - Get precinct level voting information for those places

- Analyze whether there was any difference in election outcomes in those places with and without observers, and whether any of these results seem anomalous.

Despite the tremendous differences in the political landscapes of the countries examined by Hyde in previous studies and the U.S., Hyde believes this study could be effectively replicated in this country by sending observers to a random sample of precincts. Rather than compare the incumbent's vote share, such factors such as voter complaints, voter turnout, number of provisional ballots used, composition of the electorate, as well as any anomalous voting results could be compared between sites with and without monitors.

For example, if intimidation is occurring, and if reputable monitors make intimidation less likely or voters more confident, then turnout should be higher on average in monitored precincts than in unmonitored precincts. If polling station officials are intentionally refusing to issue provisional ballots, and the polling station officials are more likely to adhere to regulations while being monitored, the average number of provisional ballots should be higher in monitored precincts than in unmonitored precincts. If monitors cause polling station officials to adhere more closely to regulations, then there should be fewer complaints (in general) about monitored than unmonitored precincts (this could also be reversed if monitors made voters more likely to complain).

Again, random assignment controls for all of the other factors that otherwise influence these variables.

One of the downsides of this approach is it does not get at some forms of fraud, e.g. absentee ballot fraud; those would have to be analyzed separately.

- Another political scientist recommends conducting an analysis of vote fraud claims and purging of registration rolls by list matching. Allegations of illegal voting often are based on matching of names and birth dates. Alleged instances of double voting are based on matching the names and birth dates of persons found on voting records. Allegations of ineligible felon (depending on state law), deceased, and of non-citizen voting are based on matching lists of names, birth dates, and sometimes addresses of such people against a voting records. Anyone with basic relational database skills can perform such matching in a matter of minutes.

However, there are a number of pitfalls for the unwary that can lead to grossly over-estimating the number of fraudulent votes, such as missing or ignored middle names and suffixes or matching on missing birth dates. Furthermore, there is a surprising statistical fact that a group of about three hundred people with the same first and last name are almost assured to share the exact same birth date, including year. In a large state, it is not uncommon for hundreds of Robert Smiths (and other common names) to have voted. Thus, allegations of vote fraud or purging of voter registration rolls by list matching almost assuredly will find a large proportion of false positives: people who voted legally or are registered to vote legally.

Statistics can be rigorously applied to determine how many names would be expected to be matched by chance. A simulation approach is best applied here: randomly assign a birth date to an arbitrary number of people and observe how many match within the list or across lists. The simulation is repeated many times to average out the variation due to chance. The results can then be matched back to actual voting records and purge lists, for example, in the hotly contested states of Ohio or Florida, or in states with Election Day registration where there are concerns that easy access to voting permits double voting. This analysis will rigorously identify the magnitude alleged voter fraud, and may very well find instances of alleged fraud that exceed what might have otherwise happened by chance.

This same political scientist also recommends another way to examine the problem: look at statistics on provisional voting: the number cast might provide indications of intimidation (people being challenged at the polls) and the number of those not counted would be indications of "vote fraud." One could look at those jurisdictions in the Election Day Survey with a disproportionate number of provisional ballots cast and cross-reference it with demographics and number of provisional ballots discarded. (Michael McDonald, George Mason University)

- Spencer Overton, in a forthcoming law review article entitled Voter Identification, suggests a methodology that employs three approaches—investigations of voter fraud, random surveys of voters who purported to vote, and an examination of death rolls provide a better understanding of the frequency of fraud. He says all three approaches have strengths and weaknesses, and thus the best studies would employ all three to assess the extent of voter fraud. An excerpt follows:

1. Investigations and Prosecutions of Voter Fraud

Policymakers should develop databases that record all investigations, allegations, charges, trials, convictions, acquittals, and plea bargains regarding voter fraud. Existing studies are incomplete but provide some insight. For example, a statewide survey of each of Ohio's 88 county boards of elections found only four instances of ineligible persons attempting to vote out of a total of 9,078,728 votes cast in the state's 2002 and 2004 general elections. This is a fraud rate of 0.00000045 percent. The Carter-Baker Commission's Report noted that since October 2002, federal officials had charged 89 individuals with casting multiple votes, providing false information about their felon status, buying votes, submitting false voter registration information, and voting improperly as a non-citizen. Examined in the context of the 196,139,871 ballots cast between October 2002 and

August 2005, this represents a fraud rate of 0.0000005 percent (note also that not all of the activities charged would have been prevented by a photo identification requirement).

A more comprehensive study should distinguish voter fraud that could be prevented by a photo identification requirement from other types of fraud — such as absentee voting and stuffing ballot boxes — and obtain statistics on the factors that led law enforcement to prosecute fraud. The study would demand significant resources because it would require that researchers interview and pour over the records of local district attorneys and election boards.

Hard data on investigations, allegations, charges, pleas, and prosecutions is important because it quantifies the amount of fraud officials detect. Even if prosecutors vigorously pursue voter fraud, however, the number of fraud cases charged probably does not capture the total amount of voter fraud. Information on official investigations, charges, and prosecutions should be supplemented by surveys of voters and a comparison of voting rolls to death rolls.

2. Random Surveys of Voters

Random surveys could give insight about the percentage of votes cast fraudulently. For example, political scientists could contact a statistically representative sampling of 1,000 people who purportedly voted at the polls in the last election, ask them if they actually voted, and confirm the percentage who are valid voters. Researchers should conduct the survey soon after an election to locate as many legitimate voters as possible with fresh memories.

Because many respondents would perceive voting as a social good, some who did not vote might claim that they did, which may underestimate the extent of fraud. A surveyor might mitigate this skew through the framing of the question (“I’ve got a record that you voted. Is that true?”).

Further, some voters will not be located by researchers and others will refuse to talk to researchers. Photo identification proponents might construe these non-respondents as improper registrations that were used to commit voter fraud.

Instead of surveying all voters to determine the amount of fraud, researchers might reduce the margin of error by focusing on a random sampling of voters who signed affidavits in the three states that request photo identification but also allow voters to establish their identity through affidavit—Florida, Louisiana, and South Dakota. In

South Dakota, for example, only two percent of voters signed affidavits to establish their identity. If the survey indicates that 95 percent of those who signed affidavits are legitimate voters (and the other 5 percent were shown to be either fraudulent or were non-responsive), this suggests that voter fraud accounts for, at the maximum, 0.1 percent of ballots cast.

The affidavit study, however, is limited to three states, and it is unclear whether this sample is representative of other states (the difficulty may be magnified in Louisiana in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina's displacement of hundreds of thousands of voters). Further, the affidavit study reveals information about the amount of fraud in a photo identification state with an affidavit exception—more voter fraud may exist in a state that does not request photo identification.

3. Examining Death Rolls

A comparison of death rolls to voting rolls might also provide an estimate of fraud.

Imagine that one million people live in state A, which has no documentary identification requirement. Death records show that 20,000 people passed away in state A in 2003. A cross-referencing of this list to the voter rolls shows that 10,000 of those who died were registered voters, and these names remained on the voter rolls during the November 2004 election. Researchers would look at what percentage of the 10,000 dead-but-registered people who "voted" in the November 2004 election. A researcher should distinguish the votes cast in the name of the dead at the polls from those cast absentee (which a photo identification requirement would not prevent). This number would be extrapolated to the electorate as a whole.

This methodology also has its strengths and weaknesses. If fraudulent voters target the dead, the study might overestimate the fraud that exists among living voters (although a low incidence of fraud among deceased voters might suggest that fraud among all voters is low). The appearance of fraud also might be inflated by false positives produced by a computer match of different people with the same name. Photo identification advocates would likely assert that the rate of voter fraud could be higher among fictitious names registered, and that the death record survey would not capture that type of fraud because fictitious names registered would not show up in the death records. Nevertheless, this study, combined with the other two, would provide important insight into the magnitude of fraud likely to exist in the absence of a photo identification requirement.

Recommendations for Further EAC Activity
on Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation

Consultants' Recommendations

Recommendation 1: Conduct More Interviews

Time and resource constraints prevented the consultants from interviewing the full range of participants in the process. As a result, we recommend that any future activity in this area include conducting further interviews.

In particular, we recommend that more election officials from all levels of government, parts of the country, and parties be interviewed. These individuals have the most direct inside information on how the system works -- and at times does not work. They are often the first people voters go to when something goes wrong and are often responsible for fixing it. They are the ones who must carry out the measures that are designed to both prevent fraud and voter intimidation and suppression. They will most likely know what, therefore, is and is not working.

It would also be especially beneficial to talk to people in law enforcement, specifically federal District Election Officers ("DEOs") and local district attorneys, as well as civil and criminal defense attorneys.

The Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice has all of the 93 U.S. Attorneys appoint Assistant U.S. Attorneys to serve as DEOs for two years. DEOs are required to

- screen and conduct preliminary investigations of complaints, in conjunction with the FBI and RIN, to determine whether they constitute potential election crimes and should become matters for investigation;
- oversee the investigation and prosecution of election fraud and other election crimes in their districts;
- coordinate their district's (investigative and prosecutorial) efforts with DOJ headquarters prosecutors;
- coordinate election matters with state and local election and law enforcement officials and make them aware of their availability to assist with election-related matters;
- issue press releases to the public announcing the names and telephone numbers of DOJ and FBI officials to contact on election day with complaints about voting or election irregularities and answer telephones on election day to receive these complaints; and
- supervise a team of Assistant U.S. Attorneys and FBI special agents who are appointed to handle election-related allegations while the polls are open on election day.<sup>i</sup>

Given the great responsibilities of the DEOs, and the breadth of issues they must deal with, they undoubtedly are great resources for information and insight as to what types of fraud and intimidation/suppression are occurring in their districts.

In many situations, however, it is the local district attorneys who will investigate election fraud and suppression tactics, especially in local elections. They will be able to provide information on what has gone on in their jurisdictions, as well as which matters get pursued and why.

Finally, those who defend people accused of election related crimes would also be useful to speak to. They may have a different perspective on how well the system is working to detect, prevent, and prosecute election fraud.

Recommendation 2: Follow Up on Nexis Research

The Nexis search conducted for this phase of the research was based on a list of search terms agreed upon by both consultants. Thousands of articles were reviewed and hundreds analyzed. Many of the articles contain allegations of fraud or intimidation. Similarly, many of the articles contain information about investigations into such activities or even charges brought. However, without being able to go beyond the agreed search terms, it could not be determined whether there was any later determination regarding the allegations, investigation or charges brought. This leaves a gaping hole: it is impossible to know if the article is just reporting on “talk” or what turns out to be a serious affront to the system.

As a result, we recommend that follow up Nexis research be conducted to determine what, if any, resolutions or further activity there was in each case. This would provide a much more accurate picture of what types of activities are actually taking place.

Recommendation 3: Follow Up on Allegations Found in Literature Review

Similarly, many allegations are made in the reports and books that we analyzed and summarized. Those allegations are often not substantiated in any way and are inherently time limited by the date of the writing. Despite this, such reports and books are frequently cited by various interested parties as evidence of fraud or intimidation.

Therefore, we recommend follow up to the literature review: for those reports and books that make or cite specific instances of fraud or intimidation, a research effort should be made to follow up on those references to see if and how they were resolved.

During the 2004 election and the statewide elections of 2005, the University of Pennsylvania led a consortium of groups and researchers in conducting the MyVote1 Project. This project involved using a 1-800 voter hotline where voters could call for poll location, be transferred to a local hotline, or leave a recorded message with a complaint.

In 2004, this resulted in over 200,000 calls received and over 56,000 recorded complaints.<sup>ii</sup> The researchers in charge of this project have done a great deal of work to parse and analyze the data collected through this process, including going through the audio messages and categorizing them by the nature of the complaint. These categories include registration, absentee ballot, poll access, ballot/screen, coercion/intimidation, identification, mechanical, provisional (ballot).

We recommend that further research include making full use of this data with the cooperation of the project leaders. While perhaps not a fully scientific survey given the self-selection of the callers, the information regarding 200,000 complaints should provide a good deal of insight into the problems voters experienced, especially those in the nature of intimidation or suppression.

Recommendation 5: Further Review of Complaints Filed With U.S. Department of Justice

Although according to a recent GAO report the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice has a variety in ways it tracks complaints of voter intimidation,<sup>iii</sup> the Section was extremely reluctant to provide the consultants with useful information. Further attempts should be made to obtain relevant data. This includes the telephone logs of complaints the Section keeps and information from the database – the Interactive Case Management (ICM) system – the Section maintains on complaints received and the corresponding action taken. We also recommend that further research include a review and analysis of the observer and monitor field reports from Election Day that must be filed with the Section.

Recommendation 6: Review Reports Filed By District Election Officers

Similarly, the consultants believe it would be useful for any further research to include a review of the reports that must be filed by every District Election Officer to the Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice. As noted above, the DEOs play a central role in receiving reports of voter fraud and investigating and pursuing them. Their reports back to the Department would likely provide tremendous insight into what actually transpired during the last several elections. Where necessary, information could be redacted or made confidential.

Recommendation 7: Attend Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Symposium

The consultants also believe it would be useful for any further activity in this area to include attendance at the next Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Symposium. According to the Department,<sup>iv</sup>

Prosecutors serving as District Election Officers in the 94 U.S. Attorneys' Offices are required to attend annual training conferences on fighting election fraud and voting rights abuses... These conferences are sponsored by the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division and the Public Integrity

Section of the Criminal Division, and feature presentations by Civil Rights officials and senior prosecutors from the Public Integrity Section and the U.S. Attorneys' Offices. As a result of these conferences, there is a nationwide increase in Department expertise relating to the prosecution of election crimes and the enforcement of voting rights.

By attending the symposium researchers could learn more about the following:

- How District Election Officers are trained, e.g. what they are taught to focus their resources on, how they are instructed to respond to various types of complaints
- How information about previous election and voting issues is presented
- How the Voting Rights Act, the criminal laws governing election fraud and intimidation, the National Voter Registration Act, and the Help America Vote Act are described and explained to participants

Recommendation 8: Employ Academic or Individual to Conduct Statistical Research

Included in this report is a summary of various methodologies political scientists and others suggested to measure voter fraud and intimidation. While we note the skepticism of the Working Group in this regard, we nonetheless recommend that in order to further the mission of providing unbiased data, further activity in this area include an academic institution and/or individual that focuses on sound, statistical methods for political science research.

Recommendation 9: Explore Improvements to Federal Law

Finally, consultant Tova Wang recommends that future researchers review federal law to explore ways to make it easier to impose either civil or criminal penalties for acts of intimidation that do not necessarily involve racial animus and/or a physical or economic threat.

According to Craig Donsanto, long-time Director of the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, Criminal Division of the U.S. Department of Justice:

As with other statutes addressing voter intimidation, in the absence of any jurisprudence to the contrary, it is the Criminal Division's position that section 1973gg-10(1) applies only to intimidation which is accomplished through the use of threats of physical or economic duress. Voter "intimidation" accomplished through less drastic means may present violations of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973i(b), which are enforced by the Civil Rights Division through noncriminal remedies.<sup>v</sup>

Mr. Donsanto reiterated these points to us on several occasions, including at the working group meeting.

As a result, researchers should examine if there is some way in which current law might be revised or new laws passed that would reach voter intimidation that does not threaten the voter physically or financially, but rather threatens the voter's right to vote as a tangible value in itself. Such an amendment or law would reach all forms of voter intimidation, no matter if it is motivated by race, party, ethnicity or any other criteria. The law would then potentially cover, for example, letters and postcards with language meant to deter voters from voting and both pre-election and Election Day challengers that are clearly mounting challenges solely on illegitimate bases.

In the alternative to finding a way to criminalize such behavior, researchers might examine ways to invigorate measures to deter and punish voter intimidation under the civil law. For example, there might be a private right of action created for voters or groups who have been subjected to intimidation tactics in the voting process. Such an action could be brought against individual offenders; any state or local actor where there is a pattern of repeated abuse in the jurisdiction that such officials did not take sufficient action against; and organizations that intentionally engage in intimidating practices. As a penalty upon finding liability, civil damages could be available plus perhaps attorney's fees.

Another, more modest measure would be, as has been suggested by Ana Henderson and Christopher Edley,<sup>vi</sup> to bring parity to fines for violations under the Voting Rights Act. Currently the penalty for fraud is $10,000 while the penalty for acts to deprive the right to vote is $5,000.

Working Group Recommendations

Recommendation 1: Employ Observers To Collect Data in the 2006 and/or 2008 Elections

At the working group meeting, there was much discussion about using observers to collect data regarding fraud and intimidation at the polls in the upcoming elections. Mr. Ginsberg recommended using representatives of both parties for the task. Mr. Bauer and others objected to this, believing that using partisans as observers would be unworkable and would not be credible to the public.

There was even greater concern about the difficulties in getting access to poll sites for the purposes of observation. Most states strictly limit who can be in the polling place. In addition, there are already so many groups doing observation and monitoring at the polls, administrators might object. There was further concern that observers would introduce a variable into the process that would impact the outcome. The very fact that observers were present would influence behavior and skew the results.

Moreover, it was pointed out, many of the problems we see now with respect to fraud and intimidation does not take place at the polling place, e.g. absentee ballot fraud and deceptive practices. Poll site monitoring would not capture this activity. Moreover, with increased use of early voting, poll site monitoring might have to go on for weeks to be effective, which would require tremendous resources.

Mr. Weinberg suggested using observers in the way they are utilized in international elections. Such observers come into a jurisdiction prior to the election, and use standardized forms at the polling sites to collect data.

Recommendation 2: Do a Study on Absentee Ballot Fraud

The working group agreed that since absentee ballot fraud is the main form of fraud occurring, and is a practice that is great expanding throughout the country, it would make sense to do a stand-alone study of absentee ballot fraud. Such a study would be facilitated by the fact that there already is a great deal of information on how, when, where and why such practices are carried out based on cases successfully prosecuted. Researchers could look at actual cases to see how absentee ballot fraud schemes are conducted in an effort to provide recommendations on more effective measures for preventing them.

Working group members were supportive of one of the methodologies recommended for studying this issue, risk analysis. As Mr. Bauer put it, based on the assumption that people act rationally, do an examination of what types of fraud people are most likely to commit, given the relative costs and benefits. In that way, researchers can rank the types of fraud that are the easiest to commit at the least cost with the greatest effect, from most to least likely to occur. This might prove a more practical way of measuring the problems than trying to actually get a number of acts of fraud and/or intimidation occurring. Mr. Greenbaum added that one would want to examine what conditions surrounding an election would be most likely to lead to an increase in fraud. Mr. Rokita objected based on his belief that the passions of partisanship lead people to not act rationally in an election.

Recommendation 4: Conduct Research Using Database Comparisons

Picking up on a suggestion made by Spencer Overton and explained in the suggested methodology section, Mr. Hearne recommended studying the issue using statistical database matching. Researchers should compare the voter roll and the list of people who actually voted to see if there are “dead” and felon voters. Because of the inconsistent quality of the databases, however, a political scientist would need to work in an appropriate margin of error when using such a methodology.

Recommendation 5: Conduct a Study of Deceptive Practices

The working group discussed the increasing use of deceptive practices, such as flyers with false and/or intimidating information, to suppress voter participation. A number of groups, including the Department of Justice, the EAC, and organizations such as the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights, keep phone logs regarding complaints of such practices, which may be available for review and analysis. This is also an area in which there is often tangible evidence, such as copies of the flyers and postcards themselves. All of this information should be reviewed and analyzed to see how such practices are being conducted and what can be done about them.

Recommendation 6: Study Use of HAVA Administrative Complaint Procedure As Vehicle for Measuring Fraud and Intimidation

The EAC should study the extent to which states are actually utilizing the administrative complaint procedure mandated by HAVA. In addition, the EAC should study whether data collected through the administrative complaint procedure can be used as another source of information for measuring fraud and intimidation.

Recommendation 7: Examine the Use of Special Election Courts

Given that many state and local judges are elected, it may be worth exploring whether special election courts that are running before, during and after election day would be an effective means of disposing with complaints and violations in an expeditious manner. Pennsylvania employs such a system, and the EAC should consider investigating how well it is working to deal with fraud and intimidation problems.

Key Working Group Observations and Concerns

Working Group Observations

1. The main problems today are structural barriers to voting and administrative error. Mr. Perez observed that, in accordance with the research, the biggest issues today are structural barriers to voting, not stealing votes. Election administrators share this view. Election fraud is negligible, and to the extent it occurs, it needs to be prosecuted with stronger criminal laws. The biggest problem is properly preparing people, which is the responsibility of election administrators.
2. Most fraud and intimidation is happening outside of the polling place. Mr. Greenbaum observed that with respect to both voter fraud and voter suppression, such as deceptive practices and tearing up voter registration forms, most of that is taking place outside of the polling place.
3. This issue cannot be addressed through one study or one methodology alone. Mr. Weinberg observed that since there is such a variety in types of fraud and intimidation, one solution will not fit all. It will be impossible to obtain data or resolve any of these problems through a single method.
4. The preliminary research conducted for this project is extremely valuable. Several of the working group members complimented the quality of the research done and although it is only preliminary, thought it would be useful and informative in the immediate future.
5. The Department of Justice is exploring expanding its reach over voter suppression activities. In the context of the conversation about defining voter intimidation, Mr. Donsanto pointed out that while voter intimidation was strictly defined by the criminal law, his section is beginning to explore the slightly different concept of vote suppression, and how to pursue it. He mentioned the phone-jamming case in New Hampshire as an initial success in this effort. He noted that he believes that vote suppression in the form of deceptive practices ought to be a crime and the section is exploring ways to go after it within the existing statutory construct. Mr. Bauer raised the example of a party sending people dressed in paramilitary outfits to yell at people as they go to the polls, telling them they have to show identification. Mr. Donsanto said that under the laws he has to work with today, such activity is not considered corrupt. He said that his lawyers are trying to “bend” the current laws to address aggravated cases of vote suppression, and the phone-jamming case is an example of that. Mr. Donsanto said that within the Department, the term vote “suppression” and translating it into a crime is a “work in progress.”

6. Registration fraud does not translate into vote fraud. Ms. Rogers, Mr. Donsanto and others stated that although phony voter registration applications turned in by people being paid by the form was a problem, it has not been found in their experience to lead to fraudulent voters at the polls. Ms. Rogers said such people were motivated by money, not defrauding the election.
7. Handling of voter fraud and intimidation complaints varies widely across states and localities. Ms. Rogers and others observed that every state has its own process for intake and review of complaints of fraud and intimidation, and that procedures often vary within states. The amount of authority secretaries of state have to address such problems also is different in every state. Mr. Weinberg stated he believed that most secretaries of state did not have authority to do anything about these matters. Participants discussed whether secretaries ought to be given greater authority so as to centralize the process, as HAVA has mandated in other areas.

Working Group Concerns

1. Mr. Rokita questioned whether the purpose of the present project ought to be on assessing the level of fraud and where it is, rather than on developing methods for making such measurements. He believed that methodology should be the focus, “rather than opinions of interviewees.” He was concerned that the EAC would be in a position of “adding to the universe of opinions.”
2. Mr. Rokita questioned whether the “opinions” accumulated in the research “is a fair sampling of what’s out there.” Ms. Wang responded that one of the purposes of the research was to explore whether there is a method available to actually quantify in some way how much fraud there is and where it is occurring in the electoral process. Mr. Rokita replied that “Maybe at the end of the day we stop spending taxpayer money or it’s going to be too much to spend to find that kind of data. Otherwise, we will stop it here and recognize there is a huge difference of opinion on that issue of fraud, when it occurs is obtainable, and that would possibly be a conclusion of the EAC.” Ms. Sims responded that she thought it would be possible to get better statistics on fraud and there might be a way of “identifying at this point certain parts in the election process that are more vulnerable, that we should be addressing.”
3. Mr. Rokita stated that, “We’re not sure that fraud at the polling place doesn’t exist. We can’t conclude that.”
4. Mr. Rokita expressed concern about working with a political scientist. He believes that the “EAC needs to be very careful in who they select, because all the time and effort and money that’s been spent up to date and would be spent in the future could be invalidated by a wrong selection in the eyes of some group.”

Appendix 3

Excerpt from “Machinery of Democracy,” a Brennan Center Report

APPENDIX C

BRENNAN CENTER TASK FORCE ON VOTING SYSTEM SECURITY, LAWRENCE NORDEN, CHAIR

Excerpted from pp. 8-19

METHODOLOGY

The Task Force concluded, and the peer review team at NIST agreed, that the best approach for comprehensively evaluating voting system threats was to: (1) identify and categorize the potential threats against voting systems, (2) prioritize these threats based upon an agreed upon metric (which would tell us how difficult each threat is to accomplish from the attacker's point of view), and (3) determine, utilizing the same metric employed to prioritize threats, how much more difficult each of the catalogued attacks would become after various sets of countermeasures are implemented.

This model allows us to identify the attacks we should be most concerned about (i.e., the most practical and least difficult attacks). Furthermore, it allows us to quantify the potential effectiveness of various sets of countermeasures (i.e., how difficult the least difficult attack is after the countermeasure has been implemented). Other potential models considered, but ultimately rejected by the Task Force, are detailed in Appendix B.

IDENTIFICATION OF THREATS

The first step in creating a threat model for voting systems was to identify as many potential attacks as possible. To that end, the Task Force, together with the participating election officials, spent several months identifying voting system vulnerabilities. Following this work, NIST held a Voting Systems Threat Analysis Workshop on October 7, 2005. Members of the public were invited to write up and post additional potential attacks. Taken together, this work produced over 120 potential attacks on the three voting systems. They are detailed in the catalogs annexed.<sup>20</sup> Many of the attacks are described in more detail at <http://vote.nist.gov/threats/papers.htm>.

The types of threats detailed in the catalogs can be broken down into nine categories: (1) the insertion of corrupt software into machines prior to Election Day; (2) wireless and other remote control attacks on voting machines on Election Day; (3) attacks on tally servers; (4) miscalibration of voting machines; (5) shut off of voting machine features intended to assist voters; (6) denial of service attacks; (7) actions by corrupt poll workers or others at the polling place to affect votes cast; (8) vote buying schemes; (9) attacks on ballots or VVPT. Often, the actual attacks involve some combination of these categories. We provide a discussion of each type of attack in “Categories of Attacks,” infra at pp. 24–27.

PRIORITIZING THREATS: NUMBER OF INFORMED PARTICIPANTS AS METRIC

Without some form of prioritization, a compilation of the threats is of limited value. Only by prioritizing these various threats could we help election officials identify which attacks they should be most concerned about, and what steps could be taken to make such attacks as difficult as possible. As discussed below, we have determined the level of difficulty for each attack where the attacker is attempting to affect the outcome of a close statewide election.

There is no perfect way to determine which attacks are the least difficult, because each attack requires a different mix of resources – well-placed insiders, money, programming skills, security expertise, etc. Different attackers would find certain resources easier to acquire than others. For example, election fraud committed by local election officials would always involve well-placed insiders and a thorough understanding of election procedures; at the same time, there is no reason to expect such officials to have highly skilled hackers or first-rate programmers working with them. By contrast, election fraud carried out by a foreign government would likely start with plenty of money and technically skilled attackers, but probably without many conveniently placed insiders or detailed knowledge of election procedures.

Ultimately, we decided to use the “number of informed participants” as the metric for determining attack difficulty. An attack which uses fewer participants is deemed the easier attack.

We have defined “informed participant” as someone whose participation is needed to make the attack work and who knows enough about the attack to foil or expose it. This is to be distinguished from a participant who unknowingly assists the attack by performing a task that is integral to the attack’s successful execution without understanding that the task is part of an attack on voting systems.

The reason for using the security metric “number of informed participants” is relatively straightforward: the larger a conspiracy is, the more difficult it would be to keep it secret. Where an attacker can carry out an attack by herself, she need only trust herself. On the other hand, a conspiracy that requires thousands of people to take part (like a vote-buying scheme) also requires thousands of people to keep quiet. The larger the number of people involved, the greater the likelihood that one of them (or one who was approached, but declined to take part) would either inform the public or authorities about the attack, or commit some kind of error that causes the attack to fail or become known.

Moreover, recruiting a large number of people who are willing to undermine the integrity of a statewide election is also presumably difficult. It is not hard to imagine two or three people agreeing to work to change the outcome of an election. It seems far less likely that an attacker could identify and employ hundreds or thousands of similarly corrupt people without being discovered.

We can get an idea of how this metric works by looking at one of the threats listed in our catalogs: the vote-buying threat, where an attacker or attackers pay individuals to vote for a particular candidate. This is Attack Number 26 in the PCOS Attack Catalog<sup>22</sup> (though this attack would not be substantially different against DREs or DREs w/ VVPT).<sup>23</sup> In order to work under our current types of voting systems, this attack requires (1) at least one person to purchase votes, (2) many people to agree to sell their votes, and (3) some way for the purchaser to confirm that the voters she pays actually voted for the candidate she supported. Ultimately, we determined that, while practical in smaller contests, a vote-buying attack would be an exceptionally difficult way to affect the outcome of a statewide election. This is because, even in a typically close statewide election, an attacker would need to involve thousands of voters to ensure that she could affect the outcome of a statewide race.<sup>24</sup>

For a discussion of other metrics we considered, but ultimately rejected, see Appendix C.

DETERMINING THE STEPS AND VALUES FOR EACH ATTACK

The Task Force members broke down each of the catalogued attacks into its necessary steps. For instance, Attack 12 in the PCOS Attack Catalog is “Stuffing Ballot Box with Additional Marked Ballots.”<sup>25</sup> We determined that, at a minimum, there were three component parts to this attack: (1) stealing or creating the ballots and then marking them, (2) scanning marked ballots through the PCOS scanners, probably before the polls opened, and (3) modifying the poll books in each location to ensure that the total number of votes in the ballot boxes was not greater than the number of voters who signed in at the polling place.

Task Force members then assigned a value representing the minimum number of persons they believed would be necessary to accomplish each goal. For PCOS Attack 12, the following values were assigned:<sup>26</sup>

Minimum number required to steal or create ballots: 5 persons total.<sup>27</sup>

Minimum number required to scan marked ballots: 1 per polling place attacked.

Minimum number required to modify poll books: 1 per polling place attacked.<sup>28</sup>

After these values were assigned, the Brennan Center interviewed several election officials to see whether they agreed with the steps and values assigned to each attack.<sup>29</sup> When necessary, the values and steps were modified. The new catalogs, including attack steps and values, were then reviewed by Task Force members. The purpose of this review was to ensure, among other things, that the steps and values were sound.

These steps and values tell us how difficult it would be to accomplish a single attack in a single polling place. They do not tell us how many people it would take to change the outcome of an election successfully – that depends, of course, on specific facts about the jurisdiction: how many votes are generally recorded in each polling place, how many polling places are there in the jurisdiction, and how close is the race? For this reason, we determined that it was necessary to construct a hypothetical jurisdiction, to which we now turn.

We have decided to examine the difficulty of each attack in the context of changing the outcome of a reasonably close statewide election. While we are concerned by potential attacks on voting systems in any type of election, we are most troubled by attacks that have the potential to affect large numbers of votes. These are the attacks that could actually change the outcome of a statewide election with just a handful of attack participants.

We are less troubled by attacks on voting systems that can only affect a small number of votes (and might therefore be more useful in local elections). This is because there are many non-system attacks that can also affect a small number of votes (i.e., sending out misleading information about polling places, physically intimidating voters, submitting multiple absentee ballots, etc.). Given the fact that these non-system attacks are likely to be less difficult in terms of number of participants, financial cost, risk of detection, and time commitment, we are uncertain that an attacker would target voting machines to alter a small number of votes.

In order to evaluate how difficult it would be for an attacker to change the outcome of a statewide election, we created a composite jurisdiction. The composite jurisdiction was created to be representative of a relatively close statewide election. We did not want to examine a statewide election where results were so skewed toward one candidate (for instance, the re-election of Senator Edward M. Kennedy in 2000, where he won 73% of the vote<sup>30</sup>), that reversing the election results would be impossible without causing extreme public suspicion. Nor did we want to look at races where changing only a relative handful of votes (for instance, the Governor's race in Washington State in 2004, which was decided by a mere 129 votes<sup>31</sup>) could affect the outcome of an election; under this scenario, many of the potential attacks would involve few people, and therefore look equally difficult.

We have named our composite jurisdiction "the State of Pennasota." The State of Pennasota is a composite of ten states: Colorado, Florida, Iowa, Ohio, New Mexico, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Nevada, Wisconsin and Minnesota. These states were chosen because they were the ten "battleground" states that Zogby International consistently polled in the spring, summer, and fall 2004.<sup>32</sup> These are statewide elections that an attacker would have expected, ahead of time, to be fairly close.

We have also created a composite election, which we label the "Governor's Race" in Pennasota. The results of this election are a composite of the actual results in the same ten states in the 2004 Presidential Election.

We have used these composites as the framework by which to evaluate the difficulty of the various catalogued attacks.<sup>33</sup> For instance, we know a ballot-box stuffing attack would require roughly five people to create and mark fake ballots, as well as one person per polling place to stuff the boxes, and one person per polling place to modify the poll books. But, in order to determine how many informed participants would be needed to affect a statewide race, we need to know how many polling places would need to be attacked.

The composite jurisdiction and composite election provide us with information needed to answer these questions: i.e., how many extra votes our attackers would need to add to their favored candidate's total for him to win, how many ballots our attackers can stuff into a particular polling place's ballot box without arousing suspicion (and related to this, how many votes are generally cast in the average polling place), how many polling places are there in the state, etc. We provide details about both the composite jurisdiction and election in the section entitled "Governor's Race, State of Pennasota, 2007," infra at pp 20-27.

Of the possible metrics we considered, we believe that measuring the number of people who know they are involved in an attack (and thus could provide evidence of the attack to the authorities and/or the media) is the best single measure of attack difficulty; as already discussed, we have concluded that the more people an attacker is forced to involve in his attack, the more likely it is that one of the participants would reveal the attack's existence and foil the attack, perhaps sending attackers to jail. However, we are aware of a number of places where the methodology could provide us with questionable results.

By deciding to concentrate on size of attack team, we mostly ignore the need for other resources when planning an attack. Thus, a software attack on DREs which makes use of steganography<sup>34</sup> to hide attack instruction files (see "DRE w/ VVPT Attack No.1a" discussed in greater detail, infra at pp. 62-65) is considered easier than an attack program delivered over a wireless network at the polling place (see discussion of wireless networks, infra at pp. 85-91). However, the former attack probably requires a much more technologically sophisticated attacker.

Another imperfection with this metric is that we do not have an easy way to represent how much choice the attacker has in finding members of his attack team.

Thus, with PCOS voting, we conclude that the cost of subverting a routine audit of ballots is roughly equal to the cost of intercepting ballot boxes in transit and substituting altered ballots (see discussion of PCOS attacks, infra at pp. 77-83). However, subverting the audit team requires getting a specific set of trusted people to cooperate with the attacker. By contrast, the attacker may be able to decide which precincts to tamper with based on which people he has already recruited for his attack.

In an attempt to address this concern, we considered looking at the number of "insiders" necessary to take part in each attack. Under this theory, getting five people to take part in a conspiracy to attack a voting system might not be particularly difficult. But getting five well-placed county election officials to take part in the attack would be (and should be labeled) the more difficult of the two attacks. Because, for the most part, the low-cost attacks we have identified do not necessarily involve well placed insiders (but could, for instance, involve one of many people with access to commercial off the shelf software ("COTS") during development or at the vendor), we do not believe that using this metric would have substantially changed our analysis.<sup>35</sup>

Finally, these attack team sizes do not always capture the logistical complexity of an attack. For example, an attack on VVPT machines involving tampering with the voting machine software and also replacing the paper records in transit requires the attacker to determine what votes were falsely produced by the voting machine and print replacement records in time to substitute them. While this is clearly possible, it raises a lot of operational difficulties – a single failed substitution leaves the possibility that the attack would be detected during the audit of ballots.

We have tried to keep these imperfections in mind when analyzing and discussing our least difficult attacks.

We suspect that much of the disagreement between voting officials and computer security experts in the last several years stems from a difference of opinion in prioritizing the difficulty of attacks. Election officials, with extensive experience in the logistics of handling tons of paper ballots, have little faith in paper and understand the kind of breakdowns in procedures that lead to traditional attacks like ballot box stuffing; in contrast, sophisticated attacks on computer voting systems appear very difficult to many of them. Computer security experts understand sophisticated attacks on computer systems, and recognize the availability of tools and expertise that makes these attacks practical to launch, but have no clear idea how they would manage the logistics of attacking a paper-based system. Looking at attack team size is one way to bridge this difference in perspective.

EFFECTS OF IMPLEMENTING COUNTERMEASURE SETS

The final step of our threat analysis is to measure the effect of certain countermeasures against the catalogued attacks. How much more difficult would the attacks become once the countermeasures are put into effect? How many more informed participants (if any) would be needed to counter or defeat these countermeasures?

Our process for examining the effectiveness of a countermeasure mirrors the process for determining the difficulty of an attack: we first asked whether the countermeasure would allow us to detect an attack with near certainty. If we agreed that the countermeasure would expose the attack, we identified the steps that would be necessary to circumvent or defeat the countermeasure. For each step to defeat the countermeasure, we determined the number of additional informed participants (if any) that an attacker would need to add to his team. As with the process for determining attack difficulty, the Brennan Center interviewed numerous election officials to see whether they agreed with the steps and values assigned. When necessary, the values and steps for defeating the countermeasures were altered to reflect the input of election officials.

BASIC SET OF COUNTERMEASURES

The first set of countermeasures we looked at is the “Basic Set” of countermeasures. This Basic Set was derived from security survey responses<sup>36</sup> we received from county election officials around the country, as well as additional interviews with more than a dozen current and former election officials. Within the Basic Set of countermeasures are the following procedures:

Inspection

The jurisdiction is not knowingly using any uncertified software that is subject to inspection by the Independent Testing Authority (often referred to as the “ITA”).<sup>37</sup>

Physical Security for Machines

- Ballot boxes (to the extent they exist) are examined (to ensure they are empty) and locked by poll workers immediately before the polls are opened.
- Before and after being brought to the polls for Election Day, voting systems for each county are locked in a single room, in a county warehouse.
- The warehouse has perimeter alarms, secure locks, video surveillance and regular visits by security guards.
- Access to the warehouse is controlled by sign-in, possibly with card keys or similar automatic logging of entry and exit for regular staff.
- Some form of “tamper evident” seals are placed on machines before and after each election.
- The machines are transported to polling locations five to fifteen days before Election Day.

Chain of Custody/Physical Security of Election Day Records

- At close of the polls, vote tallies for each machine are totaled and compared with number of persons that have signed the poll books.
- A copy of totals for each machine is posted at each polling place on Election Night and taken home by poll workers to check against what is posted publicly at election headquarters, on the web, in the papers, or elsewhere.<sup>38</sup>
- All audit information (i.e., Event Logs, VVPT records, paper ballots, machine printouts of totals) that is not electronically transmitted as part of the unofficial upload to the central election office, is delivered in official, sealed and hand-delivered information packets or boxes. All seals are numbered and tamper-evident.
- Transportation of information packets is completed by two election officials representing opposing parties who have been instructed to remain in joint custody of the information packets or boxes from the moment it leaves the precinct to the moment it arrives at the county election center.

- Each polling place sends its information packets or boxes to the county election center separately, rather than having one truck or person pick up this data from multiple polling locations.
- Once the sealed information packets or boxes have reached the county election center, they are logged. Numbers on the seals are checked to ensure that they have not been replaced. Any broken or replaced seals are logged. Intact seals are left intact.
- After the packets and/or boxes have been logged, they are provided with physical security precautions at least as great as those listed for voting machines, above. Specifically, for Pennasota, we have assumed the room in which the packets are stored have perimeter alarms, secure locks, video surveillance and regular visits by security guards and county police officers; and access to the room is controlled by sign-in, possibly with card keys or similar automatic logging of entry and exit for regular staff.

Testing<sup>39</sup>

- An Independent Testing Authority has certified the model of voting machine used in the polling place.
- Acceptance Testing<sup>40</sup> is performed on machines at time, or soon after they are received by County.
- Pre-election Logic and Accuracy<sup>41</sup> testing is performed by the relevant election official.
- Prior to opening the polls, every voting machine and vote tabulation system is checked to see that it is still configured for the correct election, including the correct precinct, ballot style, and other applicable details.

REGIMEN FOR AUTOMATIC ROUTINE AUDIT PLUS BASIC SET OF COUNTERMEASURES.

The second set of countermeasures is the Regimen for an Automatic Routine Audit Plus Basic Set of Countermeasures.

Some form of routine auditing of voter-verified paper records occurs in 12 states, to test the accuracy of electronic voting machines. They generally require between 1 and 10% of all precinct voting machines to be audited after each election. <sup>42</sup>

Jurisdictions can implement this set of countermeasures only if their voting systems produce some sort of voter-verified paper record of each vote. This could be in the form of a paper ballot, in the case of PCOS, or a voter-verified paper trail (“VVPT”), in the case of DREs.

We have assumed that jurisdictions take the following steps when conducting an Automatic Routine Audit (when referring to this set of assumptions “Regimen for an Automatic Routine Audit”):

The Audit

- Leaders of the major parties in each county are responsible for selecting a sufficient number of audit-team members to be used in that county.<sup>43</sup>
- Using a highly transparent random selection mechanism (see point ii, below), the voter-verified paper records for between a small percentage of all voting machines in the State are selected for auditing.
- Using a transparent random selection method, auditors are assigned to the selected machines (two or three people, with representatives of each major political party, would comprise each audit team).
- The selection of voting machines, and the assignment of auditors to machines, occurs immediately before the audits take place. The audits take place as soon after polls close as possible – for example, at 9 a.m. the morning after polls close.
- Using a transparent random selection method, county police officers, security personnel and the video monitor assigned to guard the voter-verified records are chosen from a large pool of on-duty officers and employees on election night.
- The auditors are provided the machine tallies and are able to see that the county tally reflects the sums of the machine tallies before the start of the inspection of the paper.
- The audit would include a tally of spoiled ballots (in the case of VVPT, the number of cancellations recorded), overvotes, and undervotes.

Transparent Random Selection Process

In this report, we have assumed that random auditing procedures are in place for both the Regimen for an Automatic Routine Audit and Regimen for Parallel Testing. We have further assumed procedures to prevent a single, corrupt person from being able to fix the results. This implies a kind of transparent and public random procedure.

For the Regimen for an Automatic Routine Audit there are at least two places where transparent, random selection processes are important: in the selection of precincts to audit, and in the assignment of auditors to the precincts they will be auditing.

Good election security can employ Transparent Random Selection in other places with good effect:

- the selection of parallel testers from a pool of qualified individuals.
- the assignment of police and other security professionals from on-duty lists, to monitor key materials, for example, the VVPT records between the time that they arrive at election central and the time of the completion of the ARA.

If a selection process for auditing is to be trustworthy and trusted, ideally:

- The whole process will be publicly observable or videotaped;<sup>44</sup>
- The random selection will be publicly verifiable, i.e., anyone observing will be able to verify that the sample was chosen randomly (or at least that the number selected is not under the control of any small number of people); and
- The process will be simple and practical within the context of current election practice so as to avoid imposing unnecessary burdens on election officials.

There are a number of ways that election officials can ensure some kind of transparent randomness. One way would be to use a state lottery machine to select precincts or polling places for auditing. We have included two potential examples of transparent random selection processes in Appendix F. These apply to the Regimen for Parallel Testing as well.

REGIMEN FOR PARALLEL TESTING PLUS BASIC SET OF COUNTERMEASURES

The final set of countermeasures we have examined is “Parallel Testing” plus the Basic Set of countermeasures. Parallel Testing, also known as election-day testing, involves selecting voting machines at random and testing them as realistically as possible during the period that votes are being cast.

Parallel Testing

In developing our set of assumptions for Parallel Testing, we relied heavily upon interviews with Jocelyn Whitney, Project Manager for Parallel Testing in the State of California, and conclusions drawn from this Report.<sup>45</sup> In our analysis, we assume that the following procedures would be included in the Parallel Testing regimen (when referring to this regimen “Regimen for Parallel Testing”) that we evaluate:

- At least two of each DRE model (meaning both vendor and model) would be selected for Parallel Testing;
- At least two DREs from each of the three largest counties would be parallel tested;
- Counties to be parallel tested would be chosen by the Secretary of State in a transparent and random manner.
- Counties would be notified as late as possible that machines from one of their precincts would be selected for Parallel Testing;<sup>46</sup>
- Precincts would be selected through a transparent random mechanism;
- A video camera would record testing;
- For each test, there would be one tester and one observer;

- Parallel Testing would occur at the polling place;
- The script for Parallel Testing would be generated in a way that mimics voter behavior and voting patterns for the polling place;
- At the end of the Parallel Testing, the tester and observer would reconcile vote totals in the script with vote totals reported on the machine.

Transparent Random Selection Process

We further assume that the same type of transparent random selection process that would be used for the Regimen for Automatic Routine Audit would also be employed for the Regimen for Parallel Testing to determine which machines would be subjected to testing on Election Day.

APPENDIX C

ALTERNATIVE SECURITY METRICS CONSIDERED

Dollars Spent

The decision to use the number of informed participants as the metric for attack level difficulty came after considering several other potential metrics. One of the first metrics we considered was the dollar cost of attacks. This metric makes sense when looking at attacks that seek financial gain – for instance, misappropriating corporate funds. It is not rational to spend $100,000 on the misappropriation of corporate funds if the total value of those funds is $90,000. Ultimately, we rejected this metric as the basis for our analysis because the dollar cost of the attacks we considered were dwarfed by both (1) current federal and state budgets, and (2) the amounts currently spent legally in state and federal political campaigns.

Time of Attack

The relative security of safes and other safety measures are often rated in terms of “time to defeat.” This was rejected as metric of difficulty because it did not seem relevant to voting systems. Attackers breaking into a house are concerned with the amount of time it might take to complete their robbery because the homeowners or police might show up. With regard to election fraud, many attackers may be willing to start months or years before an election if they believe they can control the outcome. As discussed supra at pp. 35–48, attackers may be confident that they can circumvent the independent testing authorities and other measures meant to identify attacks, so that the amount of time an attack takes becomes less relevant.

EAC REPORT ON VOTER FRAUD AND VOTER INTIMIDATION STUDY*INTRODUCTION

Voter fraud and intimidation is a phrase familiar to many voting-aged Americans. However, it means different things to different people. Voter fraud and intimidation is a phrase used to refer to crimes, civil rights violations, and, at times, even the correct application of state or federal laws to the voting process. Past study of this topic has been as varied as its perceived meaning. In an effort to help understand the realities of voter fraud and voter intimidation in our elections, the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) has begun this, phase one, of a comprehensive study on election crimes. In this phase of its examination, EAC has developed a definition of election crimes and adopted some research methodology on how to assess the true-existence and enforcement of election crimes in this country.

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) calls on the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) to research and study various issues related to the administration of elections. During Fiscal Year 2006, EAC began projects to research several of the listed topics. These topics for research were chosen in consultation with the EAC Standards Board and Board of Advisors. Voter fraud and voter intimidation was a topic that the EAC as well as its advisory boards felt were important to study to help improve the administration of elections for federal office.

EAC began this study with the intention of identifying a common understanding of voter fraud and intimidation and devising a plan for a comprehensive study of these issues. This study was not intended to be a comprehensive review of existing voter fraud and voter intimidation actions, laws, or prosecutions. ~~That~~ To conduct that type of extensive research, a is well beyond the basic understanding that had to be first be established regarding what is commonly referred to as voter fraud and voter intimidation. Once that understanding was reached, a definition had to be crafted to refine and in some cases limit the scope of what reasonably can be researched and studied as evidence of voter fraud and voter intimidation. That definition will serve as the basis for recommending a plan for a comprehensive study of the area.

To accomplish these tasks, EAC employed two consultants, who worked with ~~who along with~~ EAC staff and interns to conducted the research that forms the basis of this report. Consultants were chosen based upon their experience with the topic. ~~In addition,~~ consultants were and to chosen to assure a bipartisan representation in this study. The consultants and EAC staff were charged (1) to research the current state of information on the topics of voter fraud and voter intimidation; (2) to develop a uniform definition of voter fraud and voter intimidation; and (3) to propose recommended strategies for researching this subject.

EAC consultants reviewed existing studies, articles, reports and case law on voter fraud and intimidation. ~~In addition, EAC consultants~~ and conducted interviews with selected experts in the field. ~~Last, EAC consultants and staff~~ then presented their study initial findings to a working group that provided feed-back. The working group participants were:

Throughout the process, EAC staff assisted the consultants by providing statutes and cases on this subject as well as supervision on the direction, scope and product of this research.

The consultants drafted a report for EAC that included their summaries of existing laws, cases, studies and reports on voter fraud and intimidation as well as summaries of the interviews that they conducted. The draft report also provided a definition of voter fraud and intimidation and made certain recommendations developed by the consultants or by the working group on how to pursue further study of this subject. This document was vetted and edited by EAC staff to produce this final report.

EXISTING INFORMATION ABOUT FRAUD AND INTIMIDATION

To begin our study of voter fraud and voter intimidation, EAC consultants reviewed the current body of information on voter fraud and intimidation. ~~What the world knows~~ The information available about these issues comes largely from a very limited body of reports, articles, and books. There are volumes of case law and statutes in the various states that also impact our understanding of what actions or inactions are legally considered fraud or intimidation. Last, there is anecdotal information available through media reports and interviews with persons who have administered elections, prosecuted fraud, and studied these problems. All of these resources were used by EAC consultants to provide an introductory look at the available knowledge of voter fraud and voter intimidation.

Reports and Studies of Voter Fraud and Intimidation

Over the years, there have been a number of studies conducted about the concepts of voter fraud and voter intimidation. EAC reviewed many of these studies and reports to develop a base-line understanding of the information that is currently available about voter fraud and voter intimidation. EAC consultants reviewed the following articles, reports and books, summaries of which are available in Appendix “___”:

During our review of these documents, we learned a great deal about the type of research that has been conducted in the past concerning voter fraud and voter intimidation. None of the studies or reports was based on a comprehensive study, survey or review of all allegations, prosecutions or convictions of state or federal crimes related to voter fraud or voter intimidation. Most reports focused on a limited number of case studies or instances of alleged voter fraud or intimidation. For example, "Shattering the Myth: An Initial Snapshot of Voter Disenfranchisement in the 2004 Elections," a report produced by the People for the American Way, focused exclusively on citizen reports of fraud or intimidation to the Election Protection (is this DOJ?) program during the 2004 presidential election. Similarly, reports produced annually by the Department of Justice, Public Integrity Division, deal exclusively with crimes reported to and prosecuted by the United States Attorneys and/or the Department of Justice through the Public Integrity Section.

It is also apparent from a review of these articles and books that there is no consensus on the pervasiveness of voter fraud and voter intimidation. Some reports, such as "Building Confidence in U.S. Elections," suggest that there is little or no evidence of extensive fraud in U.S. elections or of multiple voting. This conflicts directly with other reports, such as the "Preliminary findings of Joint Task Force Investigating Possible Election Fraud," produced by the Milwaukee Police Department, Milwaukee County District

Attorney's Office, FBI and U.S. Attorney's Office. That report cited evidence of more than 100 individual instances of suspected double-voting, voting in the name of persons who likely did not vote, and/or voting using a name believed to be fake.

Voter intimidation is also a topic of some debate. Generally, speaking, because there is little agreement on what constitutes actionable voter intimidation. Some studies and reports cover only intimidation that involves physical or financial threats, while others cover non-criminal intimidation, even legal practices, that they allege suppress suppression of the vote.

One point of agreement is that absentee voting and voter registration by third-party groups create opportunities for fraud. A number of studies cited circumstances in which voter registration drives have falsified voter registration applications or have destroyed voter registration applications of voters of a certain party. Others conclude that paying persons per voter registration application creates the opportunity and perhaps the incentive for fraud.

Interviews with Experts

In addition to reviewing prior studies and reports on voter fraud and intimidation, EAC consultants interviewed a number of persons regarding their experiences and research of voter fraud and voter intimidation. Persons interviewed included:

Wade Henderson

Executive Director,
Leadership Conference for Civil Rights

Pat Rogers

Attorney, New Mexico

Wendy Weiser

Deputy Director,
Democracy Program, The Brennan
Center

Rebecca Vigil-Giron

Secretary of State, New Mexico

William Groth

Attorney for the plaintiffs in the Indiana voter identification litigation

Sarah Ball Johnson

Executive Director,
State Board of Elections, Kentucky

Lori Minnite

Barnard College, Columbia University

Stephen Ansolobhere

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Neil Bradley

ACLU Voting Rights Project

Chandler Davidson

Rice University

Nina Perales

Counsel,
Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund

Tracey Campbell

Author, Deliver the Vote

Douglas Webber

Assistant Attorney General, Indiana

Heather Dawn Thompson
Director of Government Relations,
National Congress of American Indians

Kevin Kennedy
Executive Director
State Board of Elections, Wisconsin

Jason Torchinsky
Assistant General Counsel,
American Center for Voting Rights

Evelyn Stratton
Justice
Supreme Court of Ohio

Robin DeJarnette
Executive Director,
American Center for Voting Rights

Tony Sirvello
Executive Director
International Association of Clerks,
Recorders, Election Officials and Treasurers

Harry Van Sickle
Commissioner of Elections,
Pennsylvania

Joseph Rich
Former Director
Voting Section, Civil Rights Division
U.S. Department of Justice

Joseph Sandler
Counsel
Democratic National Committee

Craig Donsanto
Director, Public Integrity Section
U.S. Department of Justice

John Ravitz
Executive Director
New York City Board of Elections

John Tanner
Director
Voting Section, Civil Rights Division
U.S. Department of Justice

Sharon Priest
Former Secretary of State, Arkansas

These interviews in large part confirmed the conclusions that were gleaned from the articles, reports and books that were analyzed. For example, the interviewees largely agreed that absentee balloting is subject to the greatest proportion of fraudulent acts, followed by vote buying and voter registration fraud. They similarly pointed to voter registration drives by third-party groups as a source of fraud, particularly when the workers are paid per registration. Many asserted that impersonation of voters is probably the least frequent type of fraud, ~~citing as reasons that~~ because it was the most likely type of fraud to be discovered and due to the stiff ~~that there are stiff~~ penalties associated with this type of fraud.

Interviewees differed on what they believe constitutes actionable voter intimidation. Law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies tend to look to the criminal definitions of voter intimidation, which generally require some threat of physical or financial harm. On the other hand, voter rights advocates tended to point to activities such as challenger laws, voter identification laws, ~~the location of polling place~~ locations, and distribution of voting machines as activities that can constitute voter intimidation.

Those interviewed also expressed opinions on the enforcement of voter fraud and voter intimidation laws. States have varying authorities to enforce these laws. In some states, enforcement is left to the county or district attorney, and in others enforcement is managed by the state’s attorney general. Regardless, voter fraud and voter intimidation are difficult to prove and require resources and time that many local law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies do not have. Federal law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies have more time and resources but have limited jurisdiction and. ~~They can only prosecute crimes related to elections involving federal candidates.~~ Those interviewed differed on the effectiveness of the current system of enforcement, including those ~~that~~ who allege that prosecutions are not sufficiently aggressive and those ~~that~~ who feel that the current laws are sufficient for prosecuting fraud and intimidation.

Case Law and Statutes

Consultants reviewed ~~over~~ more than 40,000 cases that were identified using a series of search terms related to voter fraud and voter intimidation. The majority of these cases came from appeal courts. This is not a ~~surprising situation~~, since most cases that are publicly reported come from courts of appeal. Very few cases that are decided at the district court level are reported for public review.

Very few of the identified cases were applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, no apparent thematic pattern emerged. However, it did seem (WHY DID IT “SEEM” THIS WAY? IS THERE EVIDENCE?) that the greatest number of cases reported on fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

A listing of the cases reviewed in this study is attached as Appendix “ ___ ”.

Media Reports

EAC consultants reviewed thousands of media reports concerning a wide variety of potential voter fraud or voter intimidation, including:

- absentee ballot fraud,
- voter registration fraud,
- voter intimidation and suppression,
- deceased voters,
- multiple voting,
- felons voting,
- non-citizens voting,
- vote buying,
- deceptive practices, and

- fraud by election officials.

While these reports showed that there were a large number of allegations of voter fraud and voter intimidation, they provided much less information as to whether the allegations were ever formalized as complaints to law enforcement, whether charges were filed, whether prosecutions ensued, and whether any convictions were made. The media reports were enlightening as to the pervasiveness of complaints of fraud and intimidation throughout the country, the correlation between fraud allegations and the perception that the state was a “battleground” or “swing” state, and the fact that there were reports of almost all types of voter fraud and voter intimidation. However, these reports do not provide much data for analysis as to the number of complaints, charge and prosecutions of voter fraud and intimidation throughout the country.

DEFINITION OF ELECTION CRIMES

From our study of available information on voter fraud and voter intimidation, we have learned that these terms mean many things to many different people. These terms are used casually to refer to anything from vote buying to refusing to register a voter to falsifying voter registration applications. Upon further inspection, however, it is apparent that there is no common understanding or agreement of what is and what is not constitutes “voter fraud” and “voter intimidation.” Some think of voter fraud and voter intimidation only as criminal acts, while others include actions that may constitute civil wrongs, civil rights violations, and even legal and appropriate activities. ~~In order to~~ To arrive come up with a common definition and list of activities that can be studied, EAC assessed the appropriateness of the terminology that is currently in use and applied certain factors to limit the scope and reach of what can and will be studied by EAC in the future.

New Terminology

The phrase “voter fraud” is really a misnomer for a concept that is much broader. “Fraud” is a concept that connotes an intentional act of deception, which may constitute either a criminal act or civil tort depending upon the willfulness of the act.

Fraud, n. 1. A knowing misrepresentation of the truth or concealment of a material fact to induce another to act to his or her detriment. • Fraud is usu. a tort, but in some cases (esp. when the conduct is willful) it may be a crime.

Black’s Law Dictionary, Eighth Edition, p. 685.

A “voter” is a person who is eligible to and engages in the act of voting. Black’s Law Dictionary, Eighth Edition, p. 1608. Using these terms to form a definition of “voter fraud,” it means fraudulent or deceptive acts committed by the voter or in which the voter is the victim. Thus, a voter who intentionally provides false information on a voter registration application or intentionally impersonates another registered voter and attempts to vote for that person would be committing “voter fraud.” Similarly, a person who knowingly provides false information to a voter about the location of the voter's polling place commits fraud on the voter.

The phrase "voter fraud" does not capture a myriad of other criminal acts that are related to elections which are not perpetrated by the voter and/or do not involve an act of deception. For example, "voter fraud" does not capture actions or willful inaction by candidates and election workers. When an election official willfully and knowingly refuses to register to vote a ~~non~~ otherwise-legally eligible person it is a crime. This is a crime that involves neither the voter nor an act of deception.

To further complicate matters, the phrases "voter fraud" and "voter intimidation" are used to refer to actions or inactions that are criminal as well as those that are potentially civil wrongs and even those that are legal. Obviously, criminal acts and civil wrongs are pursued in a very different manner. Criminal acts are prosecuted by the local, state or federal government. Generally, civil wrongs are prosecuted by the individual who believes that they were harmed. In some cases, when civil rights are involved, the civil division of the Department of Justice may become involved.

The goal of this study was to develop a common definition of what is generically referred to as "voter fraud" and "voter intimidation" that would serve as the basis of a future, comprehensive study of the existence of these problems. In order to meet that goal, we recognize that the current terminology does not accurately represent the spectrum of activities that we desire to study. Furthermore, we recognize that the resources, both financial and human capital, needed to study allegations and prosecutions of criminal acts, suits involving civil torts, and allegations of potential voter suppression through the use of legal election processes are well beyond the resources available to EAC. As such, EAC has defined "election crimes," a phrase that captures all crimes related to the voter registration and voting processes.

What is an Election Crime for Purposes of this Study

Election crimes are intentional acts or willful failures to act, prohibited by state or federal law, that are designed to cause ineligible persons to participate in the election process, eligible persons to be excluded from the election process, ineligible votes to be cast in an election, eligible votes not to be cast or counted, or other interference with or invalidation of election results. Election crimes generally fall into one of four categories: acts of deception, acts of coercion, acts of damage or destruction, and failures or refusals to act.

Generally speaking, election crimes can be committed by voters, candidates, election officials, or any other members of the public ~~that~~ who desire to criminally impact the result of an election. However, crimes that are based upon ~~knowing~~ intentional or willful failure to act assume that a duty to act exists. Election officials have affirmative duties to act with regard to elections. By and large, other groups and individuals do not have such duties.

The victim of an election crime can be a voter, a group of voters, an election official, a candidate, or the public, in general. Election crimes can occur during any stage of the election process, including but not limited to qualification of candidates; voter registration; campaigning; voting system preparation and programming; voting either early, absentee, or election day; vote tabulation; recounts; and recalls.

The following are examples of activities that may constitute election crimes. This list is not intended to be exhaustive, but is representative of what states and the federal government consider criminal activity related to elections.

Acts of Deception

- o Knowingly causing to be mailed or distributed, or knowingly mailing or distributing, literature that includes false information about the voter's precinct or polling place, ~~regarding~~ the date and time of the election or ~~regarding~~ a candidate;
- o Possessing an official ballot outside the voting location, unless the person is an election official or other person authorized by law or local ordinance ~~to possess~~ a ballot outside of the polling location;
- o Making, or knowingly possessing, a counterfeit of an official election ballot;
- o Signing a name other than his/her own to a petition proposing an initiative, referendum, recall, or nomination of a candidate for office;
- o Knowingly signing more than once for the proposition, question, or candidate at one election;
- o Signing a petition proposing an initiative or referendum when the signer is not a qualified voter.
- o Voting or attempting to vote in the name of another person;
- o Voting or attempting to vote more than once ~~at~~ during the same election;
- o Intentionally making a false affidavit, swearing falsely, or falsely affirming under an oath required by a statute regarding their voting status, including when registering to vote, requesting an absentee ballot or presenting to vote in person;
- o Registering to vote without being entitled to register;
- o Knowingly making a material false statement on an application for voter registration or re-registration; and
- o Voting or attempting to vote in an election after being disqualified or when the person knows that he/she is not eligible to vote.

Acts of Coercion

- o Using, threatening to use, or causing to be used force, coercion, violence, restraint, or inflicting, threatening to inflict, or causing to be inflicted damage harm, or loss, upon or against another person to induce or compel that person to vote or refrain from voting or to register or refrain from registering to vote;
- o Knowingly paying, offering to pay, or causing to be paid money or other thing of valuable thing to a person to vote or refrain from voting for a candidate or for or against an election proposition or question;

- Knowingly soliciting or encouraging a person who is not qualified to vote in an election;
- Knowingly challenging a person's right to vote without probable cause or on fraudulent grounds, or engaging in mass, indiscriminate, and groundless challenging of voters solely for the purpose of preventing voter from voting or delay the process of voting;
- As an employer, attempting by coercion, intimidation, threats to discharge or to lessen the remuneration of an employee, to influence his/her vote in any election, or who requires or demands an examination or inspection by himself/herself or another of an employee's ballot;
- Soliciting, accepting, or agreeing to accept money or other valuable thing in exchange for signing or refraining from signing a petition proposing an initiative;
- Inducing or attempting to induce an election official to fail in the official's duty by force, threat, intimidation, or offers of reward;
- Directly or through any other person advancing, paying, soliciting, or receiving or causing to be advanced, paid, solicited, or received, any money or other valuable consideration to or for the use of any person in order to induce a person not to become or to withdraw as a candidate for public office; and
- Soliciting, accepting, or agreeing to accept money or other thing of valuable thing e in exchange for registering to vote.

Acts of Damage or Destruction

- Removing or destroying any of the supplies or other conveniences placed in the voting booths or compartments ~~for the purpose of enabling the voter to vote his or her ballot;~~
- Removing, tearing down, or defacing election materials, instructions or ballots;
- Fraudulently altering or changing the vote of any elector, by which such elector is prevented from voting as ~~the~~ the person intended;
- Knowingly removing, altering, defacing or covering any political sign of any candidate for public office for a prescribed period prior to and following the election;
- Intentionally changing, attempting to change, or causing to be changed an official election document including ballots, tallies, and returns; and
- Intentionally delaying, attempting to delay, or causing to be delayed the sending of certificate, register, ballots, or other materials whether original or duplicate, required to be sent by jurisdictional law.

Failure or Refusal to Act

- Intentionally failing to perform an election duty, or knowingly committing an unauthorized act with the intent to effect the election;
- Knowingly permitting, making, or attempting to make a false count of election returns;
- Intentionally concealing, withholding, or destroying election returns or attempts to do so;

- o Marking a ballot by folding or physically altering the ballot so as to recognize the ballot at a later time;
- o Attempting to learn or actually and unlawfully learning how a voter marked a ballot;
- o Distributing or attempting to distribute election material knowing it to be fraudulent;
- o Knowingly refusing to register a person who is entitled to register under the rules of that jurisdiction; and
- o Knowingly removing the eligibility status of a voter who is eligible to vote; and
- o Knowingly refusing to allow an eligible voter to cast his/her ballot.

What is not an Election Crime for Purposes of this Study

There are some actions or inactions that may constitute crimes or civil wrongs that we do not include in our definition of “election crimes.” All crimes or civil violations related to campaign finance reporting either at the state or federal level are not “election crimes” for purposes of this study and any future study conducted by EAC. Similarly, criminal acts that are unrelated to elections, voting, or voter registration are not “election crimes,” even when those offenses occur in a polling place, voter registration office, or a candidate’s office or appearance. For example, an assault or battery that results from a fight in a polling place or at a candidate’s office is not an election crime. Similarly, violations of ethical provisions such as the Hatch Act are not “election crimes.” Last, and actions that do not rise to the level of criminal activity, ~~that such as~~ is a misdemeanor, relative felony or felony, are not “election crimes.”

RECOMMENDATIONS ON HOW TO STUDY ELECTION CRIMES

As a part of its study, EAC sought recommendations on ways that EAC can study research the existence of election crimes. EAC consultants, the working groups and some of the persons interviewed developed recommendations. ~~In addition, the working group and some of the persons interviewed~~ as a part of this study provided the following recommendations.

Recommendation 1: Conduct More Interviews

Future activity in this area should include conducting additional interviews. In particular, more election officials from all levels of government, parts of the country, and political parties should be interviewed. It would also be especially beneficial to talk to ~~people in~~ law enforcement officials, specifically federal District Election Officers (“DEOs”) and local district attorneys, as well as civil and criminal defense attorneys.

Recommendation 2: Follow Up on Media Research

The media search conducted for this phase of the research was based on a list of search terms agreed upon by EAC consultants. Thousands of articles were reviewed and hundreds analyzed. Many of the articles contained allegations of fraud or intimidation.

Similarly, many of the articles contained information about investigations into such activities or even charges brought. (THIS SENTENCE CONTRADICTS WHAT WAS SAID EARLIER ABOUT THE LACK OF MEDIA ARTICLES ON FOLLOW UP.) Additional media research should be conducted to determine what, if any, resolutions or further activity there was in each case.

Recommendation 3: Follow Up on Allegations Found in Literature Review

Many of the allegations made in the reports and books that were analyzed and summarized by EAC consultants were not substantiated and were certainly limited by the date of publication of those pieces. Despite this, such reports and books are frequently cited by various interested parties as evidence of fraud or intimidation. Further research should include follow up on the allegations discovered in the literature review.

Recommendation 4: Review Complaints Filed With “MyVote1” Voter Hotline

During the 2004 election and the statewide elections of 2005, the University of Pennsylvania led a consortium of groups and researchers in conducting the MyVote1 Project. This project involved using a ~~1-800 toll-free~~ voter hotline where that voters could call for poll locations, be transferred to a local hotline, or leave a recorded message with a complaint. In 2004, this resulted in ~~over more than~~ 200,000 calls received and ~~over more than~~ 56,000 recorded complaints.

Further research should be conducted using the MyVote1 data with the cooperation of the project leaders. While perhaps not a fully scientific survey given the self-selection of the callers, the information regarding ~~200,000~~ 56,000 complaints may provide a good deal of insight into the problems voters may have experienced, especially those in the nature of issues regarding intimidation or suppression.

Recommendation 5: Further Review of Complaints Filed With U.S. Department of Justice

~~Although a~~ According to a recent GAO report, the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice has a variety in ways it tracks complaints of voter intimidation. Attempts should be made to obtain relevant data, including the telephone logs of complaints and information from the Interactive Case Management (ICM) system. Further research should also include a review and analysis of the DOJ/OPM observer and “monitor field reports” (NOT SURE WHAT THIS MEANS) from Election Day.

Recommendation 6: Review Reports Filed By District Election Officers

Further research should include a review of the reports that must be filed by every District Election Officer to the Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice. The DEOs play a central role in receiving reports of voter fraud and investigating and pursuing them. Their reports back to the Department would likely provide tremendous insight into what actually transpired during the last several elections. Where necessary, information could be redacted or made confidential.

Recommendation 7: Attend Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Symposium

Further activity in this area should include attending the next Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Symposium. At this conference, prosecutors serving as District Election Officers in the 94 U.S. Attorneys' Offices obtain annual training on fighting election fraud and voting rights abuses. These conferences are sponsored by the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division and the Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division, and feature presentations by Civil Rights officials and senior prosecutors from the Public Integrity Section and the U.S. Attorneys' Offices. By attending the symposium researchers could learn more about the following: how District Election Officers are trained; how information about previous election and voting issues is presented; and how the Voting Rights Act, the criminal laws governing election fraud and intimidation, the National Voter Registration Act, and the Help America Vote Act are described and explained to participants.

Recommendation 8: Conduct Statistical Research

EAC should measure voter fraud and intimidation using interviews, focus groups, and a survey and statistical analysis of the results of these efforts. The sample should be based on the following factors:

- Ten locations that are geographically and demographically diverse where there have historically been many reports of fraud and/or intimidation;
- Ten locations (geographically and demographically diverse) that have not had many reports of fraud and/or intimidation;

EAC should also conduct a survey of elections officials, district attorneys, and district election officers. (WHAT WOULD WE SURVEY THEM ABOUT?) The survey sample should be large in order to be able to get the necessary subsets, and it. The sample must include a random set of counties where there have and have not been a large number of allegations.

Recommendation 9: Explore Improvements to Federal Law

Future researchers should review federal law to explore ways to make it easier to impose either civil or criminal penalties for acts of intimidation that do not necessarily involve racial animus and/or a physical or economic threat.

Recommendation 10: Use Observers to Collect Data on Election Day

Use observers to collect data regarding fraud and intimidation at the polls in on Election Day. There may be some limitations to the ability to conduct this type of research, including difficulty gaining access to polling places for the purposes of observation.

Recommendation 11: Study Absentee Ballot Fraud

Because absentee ballot fraud constitutes a large portion of election crimes, a stand-alone study of absentee ballot fraud should be conducted. Researchers should look at actual cases to see how absentee ballot fraud schemes are conducted in an effort to provide recommendations on more effective measures for preventing them fraud when absentee ballots are used.

Recommendation 12: Use Risk Analysis Methodology to Study Fraud

Conduct an analysis of what types of fraud people are most likely to commit. Researchers ~~can~~ will use that risk analysis to rank the types of fraud based on the “ease of commission” (WHAT DOES THIS MEAN?) and the impact of the fraud.

Recommendation 13: Conduct Research Using Database Comparisons

Researchers should compare information on databases to determine whether the voter rolls contain deceased persons and felons. In addition, the voter rolls can then be compared with the list of persons who voted to determine whether a vote was recorded by someone who is deceased ~~voters~~ or if felons actually voted.

Recommendation 14: Conduct a Study of Deceptive Practices

The working group discussed the increasing use of deceptive practices, such as flyers and phone calls with false and/or intimidating information, to suppress voter participation. A number of groups, such as the Department of Justice, the EAC, and organizations such as the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights, keep phone logs regarding complaints of such practices. These logs should be reviewed and analyzed to see how and where such practices are being conducted and what can be done about them.

Recommendation 15: Study Use of HAVA Administrative Complaint Procedure as Vehicle for Measuring Fraud and Intimidation

EAC should study the extent to which states are ~~actually~~ utilizing the administrative complaint procedure mandated by HAVA. In addition, the EAC should study whether data collected through the administrative complaint procedure can be used as another source of information for measuring fraud and intimidation.

Recommendation 16: Examine the Use of Special Election Courts

Given that many state and local judges are elected, it may be worth exploring whether special election courts should be established to handle fraud and intimidation complaints before, during, and after Election Day. Pennsylvania employs such a system and could investigate how well that system is working.

Accepted Recommendations

There has never been a comprehensive study that gathered data regarding all claims, charges, and prosecutions of voting crimes. EAC feels that a comprehensive study is the most important research that it can offer the election community and the public. As such, EAC has adopted all or a part of six of the 16 recommendations made by EAC consultants and the working group.

While several of the other recommendations could be used to obtain more anecdotal information regarding election crimes, EAC believes that what is needed is a comprehensive survey and study of the information available from investigatory agencies, prosecutorial bodies and courts on the number and types of complaints, charges and prosecutions of election crimes. Additional media reviews, additional interviews and the use of observers to collect information from voters on Election Day will only serve to continue the use of anecdotal data to report on election crimes. Hard data on complaints, charges and prosecutions exists and we should gather and use that data, rather than rely on the perceptions of the media or the members of the public as to what might be fraud or intimidation.

Some of the recommendations are beyond the scope of the current study. While election courts may be a reasonable conclusion to reach after we determine ~~what~~the volume and type of election crimes ~~are~~ being reported, charged or prosecuted, it is premature to embark on an analysis of that solution without more information. Last, some of the recommendations do not support a comprehensive study of election crimes. While a risk analysis might be appropriate in a smaller scale study, EAC desires to conduct a broader survey to avoid the existing problem of anecdotal and limited scope of information.

In order to further its goal of developing a comprehensive data set regarding election crimes, EAC intends to engage in the following research activities in studying the existence and enforcement of election crimes:

Survey Chief Election Officers Regarding Administrative Complaints

Likely sources of complaints concerning voting crimes are the administrative complaint processes that states were required to establish as a part of complying with HAVA. Those complaint procedures were required to be in place prior to a state receiving any funds under HAVA. Citizens are permitted to file complaints under those procedures with the state's chief election official, and those complaints must be resolved within 60 days. The procedures also allow for alternative dispute resolution of claims.

In order to determine how many of these complaints allege the commission of election crimes, EAC will survey the states' chief election officers regarding complaints that have been filed, investigated, and resolved since January 1, 2004. EAC will use the definition of election crimes provided above in this report in its survey so that data regarding a uniform set of offenses ~~can~~will be collected.

Several chief state election officials have developed investigation units focused on receiving, investigating, and referring complaints of election crimes. These units were established to bolster the abilities of state and local law enforcement to investigate allegations of election crimes. California, New York and Florida are just three examples of states that have these types of units.

EAC will use a survey instrument to gather information on the numbers and types of complaints that have been received by, investigated, and ultimately referred to local or state law enforcement by election crime investigation units since January 1, 2004. This These data will help us understand the pervasiveness of perceived fraud, as well as the number of claims that state election officials felt were meritorious of being referred to local and state law enforcement or prosecutorial agencies for further action.

While voters, candidates and citizens may call national hotlines or the news media to report allegations of election crimes, it is those complaints that are made to law enforcement that can be investigated and ultimately prosecuted. Thus, it is critical to the study of election crimes to obtain statistics regarding the number and types of complaints that are made to law enforcement, how many of those complaints result in the perpetrator being charged or indicted, and how many of those charges or indictments result in pleas or convictions.

Thus, EAC will survey law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies at the local, state and federal level to determine the number and types of complaints, charges or indictments, and pleas or convictions of election crimes since January 1, 2004. In addition, EAC will seek to obtain an understanding of why some complaints are not charged or indicted and why some charges or indictments are not prosecuted.

Analyze Survey Data in Light of State Laws and Procedures

Once a reliable data set concerning the existence and enforcement of election crimes is assembled, a real analysis of the effectiveness of fraud prevention measures can be conducted. For example, data can be analyzed to determine if criminal activities related to elections are isolated to certain areas or regions of the country. Data collected from the election official surveys can be compared to the data regarding complaints, charges and prosecutions gathered from the respective law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies in each jurisdiction. The effect and/or effectiveness of provisions such as voter identification laws and challenger provisions can be assessed based on hard data from areas where these laws exist. Last, analyses such as the effectiveness of enforcement can be conducted in light of the resources available to the effort.

CONCLUSION

Election crimes are nothing new to our election process. The pervasiveness of these crimes and the fervor with which they have been enforced has created a great deal of debate among academics, election officials, ~~and political pundits and voters~~. Past studies of these issues have been limited in scope and some have been riddled with bias. These are issues that deserve comprehensive and nonpartisan review. EAC, through its clearinghouse role, will collect and analyze data on election crimes throughout the country. These data not only will tell us what types of election crimes are committed and where fraud exists, but also inform us of what factors impact the existence, prevention, and prosecution of election crimes.

I don't know that we can say that EAC will produce a report on the subject in the near future. We will have the consultants' report to EAC, which I don't believe constitutes an EAC report/statement. The consultants' report never was intended to be the definitive study of voting fraud/voter intimidation that the news media and others seem to be seeking. One of the primary goals of the report was to provide recommendations for future EAC action/direction of study. In order to do this, the consultants did some preliminary research to get an idea of what problems were occurring. I don't know how soon EAC will decide which recommendations, if any, to pursue. --- Peggy

Hello everyone,

Brian Friel of the National Journal has posed the following questions regarding the fraud report. Since we know this is something everyone on the Hill will definitely read, I want to make sure everyone agrees with these responses. I need to get this info to him by noon tomorrow.

Tom -- do you want me to run this language by the commissioners?

1. Are there any plans to release voter fraud report since several groups have called for its release; or if there is some procedure that would be necessary for EAC to determine that it should be released? The status report created by EAC staff was presented to EAC's Board of Advisors and Standards Board to provide an update on the research project. This meeting was open to the public. As a small agency of only 23 employees, including four commissioners, it is necessary for EAC to contract with third parties and experts to conduct research. The information provided by third parties is used by staff to develop EAC final policy or reports. No documents, drafts, or recommendations presented to EAC by third parties constitute official EAC policy. Currently, EAC staff is reviewing the data presented regarding voter fraud and intimidation and will produce a final report in the near future.

Is the fourth position still vacant and does this impact the decision for release of the report. There is a vacancy on the commission, but the vacancy has not impacted the timeline for releasing the fraud report.

All-

In anticipation of our 45-minute conference call scheduled for Tuesday, September 6 at 4:00 PM, I would ask the three consultants ( Steve, Job and Tova) to come prepared to talk about the following:

The major topics and issues which you see as needing immediate attention, definition, delineation, etc.
Rough timelines and timeframes for addressing these major issues and topics
Your major roles and responsibilities and the timelines you envision for meeting your major deliverables

We all realize that this conversation is just a start; I look forward to this beginning and to framing the tasks that lie ahead of us between now and September 30.

Have a wonderful holiday!!

Subject Kick off activities for the EAC Voting fraud/voter intimidation project

Greetings-

Tom Wilkey and I have just completed a series of very informative and productive conversations with each of you and are anxious to move to the next step of this process.

We hope to assemble our consultant team on this project, within the next three weeks and are presently awaiting final approval of your contracts from our Commissioners. We anticipate this will take place in the next week to ten days.

We would like to assemble the team- Steve Ansolabehere of MIT, Tova Wang from The New Century Foundation and Job Serebrov, who has worked extensively on these issues for the State of Arkansas, during the week of September 11. Please get back to us with some tentative dates during that week that might work with your schedule.

We look forward to working with all of you and appreciate your efforts on behalf of the EAC.

Statement of Work

Assistance with developing an Election Assistance Commission (EAC) Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Project

Background

Section 241 of HAVA enumerates a number of periodic studies of election administration issues in which the U.S. Election Assistance Commission may elect to engage. In general “On such periodic basis as the Commission may determine, the Commission shall conduct and make available to the public studies regarding the election administration issues described in subsection (b)”

Sections 241(b) (6) and (7) list the following election administration issues:

(6) Nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring and investigating voting fraud in election for Federal offices.

(7) Identifying, deterring and investigating methods of voter intimidation.

Building on this HAVA reference to studies of voting fraud and voter intimidation, the EAC Board of Advisors has indicated that further study of these issues to determine how the EAC might respond to them is a high priority.

The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) seeks to identify one or more senior-level project consultants to develop various project activities and studies related to voting fraud and voter intimidation affecting Federal elections.

The consultant(s) must of have knowledge of voting fraud and voter intimidation along with an understanding of the complexities, nuances and challenges which surround the topics. The EAC is particularly interested in candidates with experience in elections, with public policy and with the law. The consultant (s) must be able to demonstrate an ability to approach the issues of voting fraud and voter intimidation in a balanced, nonpartisan fashion.

Duties

The consultant(s), whose contract would run for the period September-February, 2005, would be responsible for the following.

1. Identifying what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation affecting Federal elections.
2. Performing background research, including Federal and state-by state administrative and case law review related to voting fraud and voter intimidation, and a review of current voting fraud and voter intimidation activities taking place with key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations. A written summary of this research, and a copy of any source documentation used, will be presented to EAC.
3. Identifying, in consultation with EAC, and convening a working group of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation. The working group's goals and objectives and meeting agendas will be vetted with key EAC staff.
4. Developing a project scope of work and a project work plan related to voting fraud and voter intimidation. The consultants (s) will develop a draft scope of work and project work plan for EAC's consideration based on research into the topics, the deliberations and findings of the working group, and the consultants' understanding of EAC's mission and agency objectives.
5. Authoring a report summarizing the key findings of this preliminary study of voting fraud and voter intimidation. The report will also include suggestions for specific activities that EAC may undertake to address these topics.

From this initial research and exploration of these topics the consultant (s) may be retained to help oversee follow-on research projects and contracts EAC may pursue on the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation.

Special Considerations

Work for Hire. The services performed under the terms of this agreement are considered "work for hire," and any intellectual property or deliverables, including but not limited to, research, policies, procedures, manuals, and other works submitted; or which are specified to be delivered; or which are developed or produced and paid for by EAC, shall be owned exclusively by EAC, including copyright. EAC or its assignees have the exclusive right to reproduce all work products from this agreement without further payment to the Contractor.

Terms and Conditions

The period of performance for this consulting contract is six months, with a fixed price ceiling of $XXXXXX for labor. The consultant (s) is expected to work at least 200 hours in performing this work. The EAC estimates that the most efficient distribution of these hours would be as follows: XXXXXX. The period of performance and level of effort can be revised in writing by mutual agreement of the EAC and the consultant, as required.

The Consultant is required to travel to the EAC Washington, D.C. offices on a periodic, as needed basis, throughout the duration of the contract. The Consultant will be reimbursed, at the Federal government rates, for hotel and ground transportation costs, other approved incidental expenses, and per diem costs while working on-site at the EAC offices. An estimated $XXXXXX has been allocated for reimbursement for travel and other allowable expenses.

Invoicing

Invoices may be submitted monthly in equal payments for labor. Expenses claimed for reimbursement shall be itemized with appropriate receipts provided. Invoices shall be delivered to Ms. Diana Scott, Administrative Officer, U.S. Election Assistance Commission, 1225 New York Avenue, N.W., Suite 1100, Washington DC 20005.

Deliverables and Timetable

| Deliverable   | Due Date         |
|---|------------------|
| Draft project work plan (Phase I)   | ASAP after award |
| Progress Reports to Contracting Officer's Representative (COR)  | Monthly          |
| A written summary of background research on voting fraud and voter intimidation.                        | TBD              |
| Identifying and convening a working group knowledgeable about voting fraud and voter intimidation.      | TBD              |
| Developing a project scope of work and project work plan ( Phase II)                                    | TBD              |

Subject Finishing touches on the Statement of Work for the Voter Fraud/Intimidation consultants

History  This message has been replied to

All-

This morning the Commissioners approved the Statement of Work for the Voter Fraud/Voter Intimidation project consultants, with the caveat that some additional language would be added and the SOW polished up.

Tom, Peg and I are scheduled to interview the first candidate tomorrow morning at 10:00 am and will need your edits to this SOW by COB today.

I am attaching the item again, just in case you don't have a copy. Since I have an appointment out of the office and will be leaving at 4:00 today, I ask that you get your changes and edits to Nicole so that she may enter them and get the revised copy to the candidate first thing in the morning .

Thanks for your input on this.

Subject Finalizing a Statement of Work for consultants working on a voter fraud and intimidation project

Greetings-

Tom Wilkey and I are working to schedule a series of conference calls with three consultants we have identified to work with us to help us develop the voter fraud and voter intimidation project.

We have tentatively scheduled a series of telephone interviews with these three consultants (all of whom would be hired to work on this project) for August 17, 18 and 19.

Attached you will find a draft of a Statement of Work that has been developed for these consultants. Dan Murphy's contract was used as a template for this.

I've sent this document to you all because I need your edits and corrections to this document, based on your expertise either in contracting, human resources or the subject area.

Since Tom and I will be interviewing the candidates in two weeks, I'm hoping you can react to the document and get to Tom and Nicole your changes by mid-week next week.

I will then ask Nicole to send the draft statement of work to the three candidates, so they might refer to it, prior to our interviews.

Thanks for your input and assistance.

Subject Job Description for a Voter Fraud Project Consultant

Commissioners-

Attached please find a first draft of a short job description outlining EAC's expectations for a project consultant on voter fraud.

As you are aware, Julie has shared with me the resume of someone with an interest in the position. Ray has indicated that he participates in a legal list-serve group that has recently focused on voter fraud issues. This list-serve is probably a good place to "advertise" the consultant opportunity.

Let me know your thoughts on next steps. I look forward to getting this project up and running.

Job Description*U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) Voter Fraud Project Consultant

The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) seeks to identify a senior-level project consultant to assist with the oversight and development of a study and possible project examining U.S. election voter fraud.

The consultant must have a knowledge of voter fraud and an understanding of the complexities, nuances and challenges which surround the topic. The EAC is particularly interested in candidates with experience in elections, with public policy and the law. The consultant must be able to demonstrate an ability to approach the issue of voter fraud in a balanced, nonpartisan fashion.

This consultant, whose contract would run for the period June-November, 2005, would be responsible for conceptualizing a project scope of work around the issue and from that, developing a statement of work for a research project around the topic.

In consultation with EAC staff, EAC Commissioners, and other key EAC stakeholders, the consultant will develop a project plan around voter fraud. The consultant will recommend certain EAC project activities related to voter fraud and will develop a scope of work for an EAC research study on voter fraud. The consultant will oversee and manage various processes related to EAC contracts awarded for work related to voter fraud.

EAC's consultant fees are competitive and are awarded based on the candidates' relevant background and experience.

Thanks for your comments.

Last night, I took the case charts and assembled into one 200 -page document. So, that is compiled. I have also amended to include Job and Tova's bios as appendix "1". I have established both your summaries and theirs into alternative appendixes and will talk to the commissioners about that. One question that I have is whether we would need to go through and "clean up" their summaries? I have compiled them into a single document (that is one for interviews and one for literature). Other than the DOJ issue, are there any other "problems" that you recall?

Thanks for your comments.

Last night, I took the case charts and assembled into one 200 -page document. So, that is compiled. I have also amended to include Job and Tova's bios as appendix "1". I have established both your summaries and theirs into alternative appendixes and will talk to the commissioners about that. One question that I have is whether we would need to go through and "clean up" their summaries? I have compiled them into a single document (that is one for interviews and one for literature). Other than the DOJ issue, are there any other "problems" that you recall?

I would hope that we can refer to it as a status report on the research project (prepared by EAC staff based upon information available at the time from our consultants, Tova and Job). Calling it a preliminary report has given rise to some confusion. That confusion has led to complaints from project working group members and requests from outsiders, who mistakenly think that EAC has released the document written by our consultant that fully reports on the preliminary research into voting fraud and voter intimidation and makes recommendations for future EAC action. --- Peggy

Just a note to clarify that we are not releasing the preliminary report on voting fraud and voter intimidation (Tova & Job's report) because the draft report is going through EAC review. The only document we can offer at this time is the status report on the research project, which was delivered to our boards and which apparently is considered public information. The status report does not address any recommendations for future EAC action.

I am using some of my work at home time on the draft report. Hopefully, I can meet with Julie and Tamar next week. After that, we will have a better idea of when it will be ready for a Commissioner briefing. ---

Mr. Chairman,

Will Lester of the Associated Press wants to interview you briefly via phone about the preliminary fraud report. I recommend you accomodate him, as he has dutifully covered EAC, and plans to include us in a story next week about the election lanscape. He has requested a copy of the preliminary report, which I am sending to him. He only needs a few minutes, and as we discussed, i think the message is that these are preliminary findings that we presented to our advisory boards to get their input. When the final report is complete, we will release it. You can also use some of the talking pts from your speech, such as the challenge related to the very definition of the term "fraud," as people define it differently. How about I set it up for noon?

The only question he asked that I don't know the answer to is when we expect the final report. Peg... please weigh in on this.

INTRODUCTION

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

In September 2005, the Commission hired two consultants with expertise in this subject matter, Job Serebrov and Tova Wang, to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;
- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

As of the date of this report, the consultants have drafted a definition of election fraud, reviewed relevant literature and reports, interviewed persons from government and private sectors with subject matter expertise, analyzed news reports of alleged election fraud, reviewed case law, and established a project working group.

DEFINITION OF ELECTION FRAUD

The consultants drafted a definition of election fraud that includes numerous aspects of voting fraud (including voter intimidation, which is considered a subset of voting fraud) and voter registration fraud, but excludes campaign finance violations and election administration mistakes. This draft will be discussed and probably refined by the project working group, which is scheduled to convene on May 18, 2006.

LITERATURE REVIEW

The consultants found many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. They found little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud appears to be the report written by Lori Minnite, entitled "Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud". The most systematic look at voter intimidation appears to be the report by Laughlin McDonald, entitled "The New Poll Tax". The consultants found that books written about this subject all seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Moreover, the consultants found that reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund's frequently cited book, "Stealing Elections".

Consultants found that researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate; but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.

- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.
- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Recommendations

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research include a follow up study of allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles. They also suggest that the research should focus on filling the gap between the lack of reports based on methodical studies by social or political scientists and the numerous, but less scientific, reports published by advocacy groups.

INTERVIEWS

The consultants jointly selected experts from the public and private sector for interviews. The consultants' analysis of their discussions with these members of the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities follows.

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.
- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, "dead" voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud,

although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.

- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.
- Several people indicate that, for various reasons, DOJ is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. Interviews with DOJ personnel indicate that the Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance in this area. While the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, continues to maintain an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process (including voter suppression), it also has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting.
- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed.
- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.

- With respect to DOJ's Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one's definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and his office has not pursued any such cases.
- Craig Donsanto of DOJ's Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases DOJ is investigating and the number of indictments his office is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, in addition to pursuing systematic election corruption schemes, DOJ has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so that his agency can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.
- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment.
- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama's "deceptive practices" bill.
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected as non partisan officials, they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas are a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states' office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.

- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots “for cause” only if it were politically feasible.
- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the proposal in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.
- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

NEWS ARTICLES

Consultants conducted a Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006. A systematic, numerical analysis of the data collected during this review is currently being prepared. What follows is an overview of these articles provided by the consultants.

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.
- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.
- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms;
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with.

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles, in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;

- Poll watchers harassing voters;
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;
- Disproportionate police presence;
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate; and
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from “battleground” states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

“Dead Voters and Multiple Voting”

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials, and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found five such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia). There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of completed voter registration applications. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case, charges were filed against ten individuals. In another case, a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this Nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem was the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Recommendation

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research should include a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

CASE LAW RESEARCH

After reviewing over 40,000 cases from 2000 to the present, the majority of which came from appeals courts, the consultants found comparatively few applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, the consultants found that no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it appears to them that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

Recommendation

Because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, consultants suggest that subsequent EAC research include a review of state trial-level decisions.

PROJECT WORKING GROUP

Consultants and EAC worked together to select members for the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group that included election officials and representatives of advocacy groups and the legal community who have an interest and expertise in the subject matter. (See Attachment A for a list of members.) The working group is scheduled to convene at EAC offices on May 18, 2006 to consider the results of the preliminary research and to offer ideas for future EAC activities concerning this subject.

FINAL REPORT

After convening the project working group, the consultants will draft a final report summarizing the results of their research and the working group deliberations. This report will include recommendations for future EAC research related to this subject matter. The draft report will be reviewed by EAC and, after obtaining any clarifications or corrections deemed necessary, will be made available to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors for review and comment. Following this, a final report will be prepared.

Dear Mr. Chairman:

The last submission from the Vote Fraud-Voter Intimidation Study consultants is dated August 8. At this time, EAC staff are reviewing all items submitted for the report to the Commission with an eye toward the best way of presenting the information to the Commissioners for their consideration. There has been some delay in this staff review process, for which I take full responsibility.

Subject Re: Definition of Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation

Peggy,

Per our discussion, I have some initial concerns regarding the definitions that have been proposed.

1. Fraud is a legal term of art. Fraud is an intentional act or omission (i.e. actual fraud or constructive fraud) of misrepresentation or deceit. There is no such thing as defacto fraud or quasi fraud. Fraud must be intentional.... negligence alone is not fraud.

The general definition of voter fraud must concise and universally applicable (this in the challenging part). After this definition is created and intellectually tested, one can then create examples and explanations. These would 1) apply the definition to the entire election process (from beginning to end) and (2) apply it to action by voters, 3rd parties and election officials. Through this process a determination may be made regarding whether three definitions are needed or just one.

2. The document has no definition of voter intimidation. What is voter intimidation and how does it differ from voter fraud? I assume this would also be an intentional act.

3. Definitions need to be concise and tight. Such definitions need to be able to be broken down into elements. Each of these elements must have clear, applicable and enforceable meaning. This can be a challenge. For example use of the term "any illegal act" is unclear, begs the question and suggests that fraud only occurs in the course of committing a related crime.

These are just my initial thoughts.

Deliberative Process Privilege

"Fraud" should be defined as any illegal act that has a clear and direct distorting impact on the election results. It includes adding illegal votes and tampering with vote counts as well as actions such as voter intimidation and deceptive practices that serve to subtract legal votes. Illegally keeping certain voters from voting has the same distorting effect on election outcomes as ineligible voters casting ballots or some form of modern ballot box stuffing. Fraud may involve wrongdoing by individual voters, election workers or organized groups such as campaigns or political parties.

Vote fraud usually breaks down into three categories---intentional fraud, de facto fraud, and quasi-fraud. Research and investigation of fraud should focus on those forms of fraud that are known to have had true impacts on election outcomes.

"Intentional fraud" includes acts that are intentionally planned. Such forms of fraud include the following:

- Absentee/mail ballot fraud, e.g. coercing another voter's choice, use of a false or other voter's name and signature, destruction or misappropriation of an absentee or mail-in ballot
- Ex-felons knowingly and willingly casting illegal ballots
- Knowingly and willingly misleading an ex-felon about his or her right to vote
- Voting more than once
- Noncitizen voting
- Intimidating practices e.g. intimidating signs, inappropriate police presence, abusive/threatening treatment by poll workers or others that deter voters from voting
- Deceptive practices e.g. providing false information to voters about the voting process, such as when and/or where to vote, who is eligible to vote
- Fraud by election administrators in the handling or counting of ballots, misrepresentation of vote tallies
- Vote buying
- Addition or destruction of cast ballots by elections officials
- Intentional wrongful removal of eligible voters from voter registration lists
- Knowingly falsifying registration information pertinent to eligibility to cast a vote, e.g. residence, criminal status, etc.

The second type of fraud is de facto fraud. This occurs when the intent to commit fraud is lacking, but the party or parties' actions results in fraud nonetheless. De facto fraud more often is a result of a misapplication of election statutes or the application of a long established practice or tradition in a way that contradicts the intent of the statute. Examples of de facto fraud include the abusive use of challengers to voter registrations or to voters' eligibility at the polls and wrongful purging of voter lists.

The last form of fraud, "quasi-fraud," is the most difficult to classify as such because the correct law (case law or legislative act) is applied but the result is to deprive voters of their electoral rights. This type of fraud is also the most difficult to catch because it requires both legal electoral expertise and almost always occurs on the day of the election. One example of this is Arkansas supreme court case law making election statutes mandatory before an election but discretionary after. The discretion is left up to the county board of election commissioners. These are not elected but are either the chairs of the two main political parties or a person elected by the county central committee should the chair decide not to serve. The result is that election statutes are never enforced after the election. It therefore permits past patterns of fraud to persist.

Two areas that are of major concern but do not come within the purview of fraud for the purposes of this type of research are registration forms in the name of another or fake person(s), which from the evidence do not usually result in illegal votes; and electronic vote machine tampering, for which there is as of now no definitive evidence has taken place in a U.S. election.

It sounds similar to the issues I had with the Donsanto interview. It was a classic example of the interviewers' interpreting what was said through their own biases.

It also is true that the original interview summaries failed to differentiate between the criminal definition of intimidation and the consultants use of the term.. The consultants have revised their definition to note that it goes beyond the legal definition, but we may need to repeat the statement where the DOJ interviews are referenced.

I have already brought the Donsanto matter to our contractors' attention. When they responded that they did not think they should redraft that section, I told them that the section will likely be edited. It appears that we will have to do the same with the reference to Tanner's interview.

Why don't we discuss this with Tanner (and Donsanto) after we have had a chance to review a consolidated draft of the final report? We can determine what clarifications or corrections are necessary at that time.

I have not yet seen a draft final report. My best guess is that Tanner is concerned about the summary of his interview. I have already had discussions with our consultants about the description of the Donsanto interview, at which I was present. Wilkey knows that I won't let it go as is. I wasn't at the Tanner interview, but would be interested in hearing where he thinks the consultants went wrong.

It is possible that, due to my objections re the Donsanto interview, the consultants may have asked Tanner to review their description of his interview. I won't know for sure until I can contact them.

I gave you and Gavin a folder that included a summary of interviews, etc before the working group meeting. Also, the report delivered to the boards on this project is in the shared drawer under Research in Progress-Voting Fraud-Intimidation. That is everything I have at the moment.

Existing Research Analysis

There are many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. There is little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud is the report written by Lori Minnite. The most systematic look at voter intimidation is the report by Laughlin McDonald. Books written about this subject seem to all have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists. It is hoped that this gap will be filled in the “second phase” of this EAC project.

Moreover, reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund’s frequently cited book. Again, this is something that it is hoped will be addressed in the “second phase” of this EAC project by doing follow up research on allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate, but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.

- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

The estimated additional hours needed to bring the Voting Fraud/Voter Intimidation Project to a logical stopping point (without requiring a draft statement of work for any future RFPs on the topic) are:

Expert Interviews:

3 hours of scheduling

17 hours conducting the interviews

15 hours summarizing and analyzing the interviews

Subtotal: 35 hours

Nexis research, organization of research, summary of research (Tova): 180 hours

Lexis research, organization of research, summary of research (Job): 180 hours

Subtotal: 360 hours

Working Group preparation and meeting time: 20 hours

Final Report: 45 hours

Grand Total: 460

The sooner we find out if the Commissioners will accept this extension, the better. If the extension (or new contract for 3 additional months) is not accepted, we have to figure out what can be done in the limited time remaining. --- Peggy

Intimidation Project

Dear Commissioners:

The consultants' contracts for EAC's voting fraud and voter intimidation project require Tova Wang and Job Serebrov to work in consultation with EAC staff and the Commissioners "to identify a working group of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation". The contracts do not specify the number of working group members but, as EAC has to pay for the group's travel and we want the size of the group to be manageable, I recommend that we limit the number to 6 or 8. Please let me know if you think that this limit is too conservative .

Attached for your review and comment are two lists of potential working group members for this project. One list was submitted by Job, the other by Tova. Tova and Job have provided brief summaries of each candidate's relevant experience and have placed asterisks next to the names of the individuals whom they particularly recommend. I can provide more extensive biographies of these individuals, if you need them. If EAC agrees that the recommended working group members are acceptable, an equal number may be selected from each list in order to maintain a balanced perspective.

Absent from the attached lists is the name of a representative from the U.S. Department of Justice's Election Crimes Branch. At this time, I am working through the DOJ bureaucracy to determine to what degree Craig Donsanto will be permitted to participate. If he cannot be named as a working group member, we may still be able to use him as a resource.

Please provide your feedback to me no later than Monday , November 28. I am available to meet with you if you would like to discuss this matter further.

Subject: Eagleton

In his note regarding the Eagleton contract, Hans has raised some of the same concerns I raised from the beginning of any discussions I had regarding this contract with our staff, and at our first formal meeting with Eagleton. In reviewing their work product from time to time, I continue to have concerns about a lack of balanced input and have repeatedly voiced them with staff and with Eagleton. I did this when the initial peer review group was proposed and again during their presentation at our meeting in Pasadena (the outreach slide in their public presentation showed outreach to seven groups, of which only one could be considered conservative-leaning). Now, as I have just had the opportunity to read their July progress report, it appears that Eagleton seems to be going into a larger analysis of the voter fraud issue than was authorized in the contract. My suspicion is that Dan Tokaji is injecting his views into this to dismiss or diminish the concerns some people may have about voter fraud. I could be wrong, but his previous writings lead me to believe otherwise.

I only found one mention of voter fraud in the contract with Eagleton. It is in Section 3.5 regarding provisional voting, where it discusses "minimizing opportunity for voter fraud." Yet, on page 4 of the July progress report from Eagleton, in describing their work plan for the next month it states: "we will expand upon vote fraud research and examine further the relationship between instances of vote fraud and ensuing election reforms." This clearly seems to be going beyond the mandate we gave them as I thought they were going to be looking at voter fraud relating to provisional voting (as the contract calls for), not voter fraud as it relates to election reforms. While voter fraud was never mentioned in the contract regarding the voter ID issue, page 5 of their July report indicates that their narratives "will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud." In addition to this, page 6 describes a look into the "relationship between voter ID regime and vote fraud."

Voter fraud is clearly an issue that is perceived differently from the Right and from the Left. I have struggled with determining what a clear definition of voter fraud is myself, and therefore want to obtain various perspectives and good analysis on this issue before I formulate a solid conclusion in my mind. It has been my understanding all along that the whole voter fraud/voter intimidation issue is going to be studied by the EAC using a balanced group of consultants--not Eagleton and Moritz, who are likely to focus on just on the number of prosecutions of voter fraud, rather than the complaints made or the fact that many election officials are frustrated that some prosecutors don't take their complaints about voter fraud seriously. I am not convinced at this point that we will get a balanced and objective study from Eagleton/Moritz on voter fraud. I am puzzled on why they seem to be expending a significant portion of their time on this and would want to know if we somehow authorized them to do more research into the voter fraud issue.

On page 7 of their July report Eagleton indicates that communications with the EAC on the Peer Review

008342

Group "were not clear or timely." I would like to know what this refers to. Also, I may have missed it, but I do not recall seeing the final list of who is serving as the Peer Review group.

The August 15th copy of the July report that I received from Karen did not include the attachment of the financial report of expenses incurred. I would like to see that attachment.

Outside of our NIST work, this contract represents our largest single outside expenditure of our operational funds. Any single expenditure of $500,000+ needs to be closely monitored. I, for one, am not going to sign off on any report that appears to have been written from a biased viewpoint, especially one that doesn't appear to be interested in hearing from conservative organizations or right-leaning researchers, or seems to minimize any input from them. I've already had questions from congressional staff and others on why we picked Eagleton and Moritz, as they are perceived by some as biased against Republicans. I assured the critics that we have insisted all along on an objective study from Eagleton. An unbalanced or biased study from them will not only hurt my credibility, but also that of the EAC. I'm not suggesting that we stop their work, but I do want Tom and Julie to inform them in no uncertain terms that we will not accept a report that does not seriously consider all viewpoints on provisional voting and the voter ID issue, and that any study or interpretations they present to us reflect a diversity of opinions on these subjects. We also need for staff to determine whether their considerable work into the voter fraud area is authorized in the contract. We should not be paying for and receiving work we did not authorize.

The contract clearly calls for "alternative approaches" on voter ID requirements and "alternatives" on provisional voting. I agreed to support this contract to Eagleton because I was assured that we would receive a variety of approaches from their work, and not just those from a liberal perspective.

INTRODUCTION

This report describes our progress from July 1 through July 31, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

The effort this month continued to focus on research for the analysis and alternatives paper, including the compilation of Provisional Voting statutes, regulations, and litigation from the 50 states. We also prepared and delivered testimony at the EAC's regular monthly meeting in Pasadena on July 28.

The data collection, analysis, and compilation are all on schedule. Because of delays in agreeing on the composition of the Peer Review Group with EAC, however, the actual completion and submission of the analysis and alternatives paper to the EAC will most likely be delayed about a week beyond the target date in the work plan. We are scheduled to discuss the draft paper and guidance document prior to submission, with the EAC on September 6, and the final draft cannot be completed until several days after that date.

The document report is divided into 4 sections that cover: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, Project Management, and the Financial Report. Each section references the specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract.

Please direct any questions or comments about this report to Tom O'Neill at:

[REDACTED]

PROVISIONAL VOTING

Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to provisional voting. Work on the first of these must be complete before proceeding to later tasks. Task 3.4 was completed this month.

Task 3.4: Collect and analyze state legislation, administrative procedures, and court cases. Understand the disparities and similarities of how provisional voting was implemented around the country.

LEGISLATION, REGULATIONS, AND LITIGATION

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. This information constitutes the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task. It also will provide a base of understanding for the analysis of states' actual experience with provisional voting in 2004, for which the Eagleton team has lead responsibility.

Description: The Moritz team has created a 50-state chart to summarize information on provisional voting, compiled statutes, case law and administrative procedures regarding Provisional Voting.

Progress: The 50-state (plus District of Columbia) chart created to collect data on provisional voting is complete. We have collected the statutes for all states. State by state summaries of provisional voting have been written for 47 states and D.C. A memorandum summarizing provisional voting litigation is complete. The collection of the documents associated with the litigation is nearing completion.

Challenges: The variety in the form of provisional voting legislation from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: The remaining 3 state summaries of provisional voting will be completed by August 8. Analysis of all the information, data, and survey results concerning provisional voting data will be performed in August.

PREPARATION FOR AND EXPERIENCE WITH PROVISIONAL VOTING

The Eagleton team has researched and compiled a narrative of each state's experience with provisional voting in 2004. At the end of July the survey of 400 local election officials was nearing its end, and – as of this writing – is now complete with an analysis and report in draft form. We will rely on the survey results to improve our understanding of actual practice in administering provisional voting, including the steps local officials took to prepare for the election.

PROVISIONAL VOTING NARRATIVES

Description: To construct the narratives, a researcher examined newspaper accounts, state websites, and reports from third-party organizations to gather information on the experience with provisional voting in the 2004 election. To organize the information derived from this examination, we created an information system that catalogues information about the states (i.e. whether a state was new to provisional voting, the percentage of provisional votes counted, the method of notifying voters if their vote was counted, etc.) and combined it with Moritz's collection and analysis of statutes, regulations and litigation.

Progress: The state-by-state database is complete, as is a first draft of all state narratives. This work has been shared with the larger team and is being reviewed currently in preparation for constructing analysis and recommendation of alternative approaches for provisional voting required under Task 3.5.

Work Plan: In the next month, revisions of the narratives will be complete. In addition to this research, we will expand upon vote fraud research and examine further the relationship between instances of vote fraud and ensuing election reforms.

SURVEY OF COUNTY ELECTION OFFICIALS

Description: The Center for Public Interest Polling (CPIP) at Eagleton conducted a national survey of county election officials to measure several aspects of provisional voting. The survey was designed to determine the following factors related to provisional voting at the county (or equivalent election jurisdiction) level:

- The content and quality of instructions provided to county officials by the states;
- The steps taken by county officials to pass information on to poll workers;
- Differences in experience between states new to provisional voting and those that had some form of provisional ballot before HAVA; and
- Recommendations to improve and/or reduce the need for provisional voting.

Progress: The fielding and initial analysis of the survey results are complete.

Work Plan: The information derived from the survey will be considered in drafting the analysis and alternatives document required under Task 3.5.

VOTER IDENTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. During the reporting period, we have completed tasks 3.10 and 3.11. The research on Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of provisional voting.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation with regard to Voter Identification Requirements. When complete, this information will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: The Moritz team has compiled statutes on Voter Identification, and will provide a summarized analysis of this research to the project team for review.

Progress: The chart created to collect data on voter identification is complete and is now being reviewed. Voter identification statutes are being collected.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging because of the different terminology used from state to state to codify voter identification issues, and because many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variety from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: Review of the voter identification chart, the collection of the voter identification statutes, and the writing of the state by state summaries will be completed by the end of August.

SUPPLEMENTS TO LEGAL ANALYSIS

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter ID in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of voter ID requirements. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern with more rigorous identification requirements for all voters. We are following these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.

Individual narratives for the states with significant activity in voter ID will provide a resource for understanding the wide range of experience in the 2004 election. The narratives will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud, a focus of the concern with increasing the rigor of voter ID requirements. The next key milestones will be the completion of the state database and drafting the first narratives.

VOTER ID AND TURNOUT ANALYSIS

The second supplemental analysis will provide objective information on a contentious feature of the debate over voter ID in the states: the effects of more rigorous voter ID regimes on voter turnout and the relationship between the voter ID regime and vote fraud. As part of this effort, Eagleton is undertaking a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state's voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We are creating a database and gathering statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election.

Progress: The collection of data for the Voter ID-Turnout analysis is complete. The assembled database contains population demographic data, voter registration data and voter turnout data from all 50 states, 3113 Counties, and the District of Columbia. It also contains exit poll data from the 50 states, providing demographic data of voter turnout. The analysis of that data is well underway.

Challenges: The initial methodology that was devised to investigate the questions involved in this part of the study proved insufficient, as the necessary data was unobtainable (the Census Bureau has not yet released their 2004 data). After re-developing an appropriate methodology, the necessary data has been assembled, we have resumed the analysis of this data.

Projection: The analysis of the impact that voter identification requirements have upon voter turnout should be completed around mid-August.

Task 3.11 Public meeting on Voter Identification Requirements

Description: In early July, we continued our efforts to identify specific Voter ID topics or issues and panelists who could shed light on them. We recommended a focus on the debate over Voter ID now underway in the states. To provide a vivid picture of the debate, we recommended that one panel include specific legislators on opposite sides of the issue from two different states, Mississippi and Wisconsin. We also discussed adding a researcher to the panel in order to place the debate in a national or historical context. We also recommended a panel of two academic researchers with contrasting points of view, to address the effects of Voter ID provisions under HAVA. In response to our suggestions, EAC staff recommended a panel of two state election directors to address the interaction of Voter ID with HAVA.

By mid-July, the EAC had decided which topics and speakers should be invited, however most of those speakers proved unable to attend.

Progress: Tom O'Neill and Dan Tokaji attended the EAC Public Meeting held in Pasadena on July 28. Their presentations at the meeting described the progress of the research and our developing perspective on how to assess the quality of the provisional voting process in the states and identify possible steps for improvement.

Challenges: The changes in the scheduling of the July meeting delayed and ultimately made it impossible to assemble a panel, from which we could derive substantive insight into voter identification issues as they are playing out in the states. Additionally, due to the date of the hearing, the information from the hearing was not available as early in the research process as contemplated in the contract.

Projection: Preparation of the hearing summary will likely be delayed, due to the team's focus on preparation of the analysis and alternatives paper.

PROJECT MANAGEMENT

PEER REVIEW GROUP

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group (PRG). The EAC indicated at our first meeting in May that it would review our recommendations for members of the PRG. Our initial vision of the PRG was a small group of scholars and representatives of advocacy organizations that would comment on the research design, review drafts of our analyses and reports, and, in general, identify areas of the research that should be strengthened and help us improve the breadth, depth and clarity of reports based on that research.

Progress: Upon reflection, the project team agreed that the PRG should not include representatives of advocacy groups. We concluded that as representatives they would feel obligated to act as advocates for positions already taken by their groups. While advocacy organizations might be consulted as stakeholders during the course of our work, they were unlikely to achieve the goals we had in mind for the PRG as a source of advice on research design, methodology, and analysis. We submitted a revised list of potential members, substantially comprised of academics, to the EAC for review.

The EAC responded with suggestions concerning both the balance of the PRG's membership and the creation of additional committees to review our work. We provided an analysis of the cost and time involved in adopting the EAC's suggestions as well as with suggestions for a balanced selection of academics for the Peer Review Group. In the end, the EAC determined that Eagleton should appoint a balanced Peer Review Group of its own choosing. Initial phone calls were made to all members of that group by the end of July, and written invitations and descriptions of the process have gone to all possible members who had indicated their interest in serving.

Challenges: Communications on this issue with the EAC were not clear or timely. The purpose of the PRG is to review our work, and to comment on our research design, which is well underway. We had planned to have the PRG in place early enough in the project to enable them to provide feedback, including the research design. While we are confident in the quality of our work, the experience and perspective of the Peer Review Group will strengthen our analysis and recommendations as we find a way to receive its critique in the more limited time now available. The delay in creating the Peer Review Group will result in a delay in the completion of the final draft of the analysis and alternatives paper and in the preliminary guidance document.

Projections: The work of the PRG will be about 2 weeks behind the milestones indicated in the work plan.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and an internal website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law will be merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding provisional voting and voter identification.

Progress: The Moritz team has provided Eagleton staff with all completed work. An Eagleton staff member reviews the content and formats of data from all supporting research and will (re-)format once the work has been completed for the compendium and reports submitted to the EAC. The researchers and staff at Eagleton have created a shared folder on the Institute's server for the safe storage of work and access for those staff members. All of this work is being reviewed by the project team to ensure that a broad survey is being performed.

Projections: By the end of July 2005, much of the above referenced research has been completed. The entire project team has begun the process of reviewing all work, and will combine and format all documents and materials in preparation for our final reporting to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: All project team members have signed on to the Intranet site. The Intranet facilitates the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.

Progress: Project team members regularly post drafts, completed materials and spreadsheets online for internal review. The intranet has been extremely helpful to team members and serves as an internal website with announcements and important documents readily available to all team members.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Our contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (732) 932-0165, EXT. 2235.

A detail of expenses incurred from project inception through June 30, 2005, is attached.

INTRODUCTION

This report describes our progress from the start of the project on May 26 through June 30, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

The objective of the contract is to assist the EAC in the collection, analysis and interpretation of information regarding HAVA provisional voting and voter identification requirements on which to base policy recommendations as guidance for the states in the conduct of the 2006 elections. The work has begun well, thanks to the clarity of the EAC's expectations and the strong collaboration by the scholars and staff at the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey, and the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University.

The document report is divided into 4 sections that cover: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, Project Management, and the Financial Report. Each section references the specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract.

Please direct any questions or comments about this report to Tom O'Neill at:

PROVISIONAL VOTING

Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to provisional voting. Work on the first of these must be complete before proceeding to later tasks. The work plan provides for two months to complete Task 3.4. Work on this task is on schedule.

Task 3.4: Collect and analyze state legislation, administrative procedures, and court cases. Understand the disparities and similarities of how provisional voting was implemented around the country.

LEGISLATION, REGULATIONS, AND LITIGATION

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. When complete, this information will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task. It also will provide a base of understanding for the analysis of states' actual experience with provisional voting in 2004, for which the Eagleton team has lead responsibility.

Description: The Moritz team includes faculty, an executive administrator, a reference librarian, and several research assistants. It began immediately to compile statutes, case law and administrative procedures regarding Provisional Voting. The team has created a 50 state chart to summarize information on provisional voting. Categories for which state statutes and administrative procedures are being reviewed include:

- When did the state create a system compliant with the HAVA provisional ballot requirements?
- Who may be eligible to cast a provisional ballot? and
- What is the process for discovering whether your provisional ballot was counted in the election?

Progress: Initial research for 27 states, including the collection of provisional voting statutes is complete. This phase of the work is on schedule for completion by August 1. By the beginning of the week of July 11, Moritz's full time research assistant will move from voter identification research to gathering and organizing case law on provisional voting.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging; states use different terminology to codify provisional voting issues. Many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variation from state to state makes creating a snapshot view across states a challenge. The team is meeting this challenge, and the work is on schedule.

PREPARATION FOR AND EXPERIENCE WITH PROVISIONAL VOTING

The Eagleton team is constructing a narrative description for each state of the 50 states and the District of Columbia. It is also surveying a stratified random sample of county election officials to improve its understanding of actual practice in administering provisional voting.

Description: To construct the narratives, a researcher is examining newspaper accounts, state websites, and reports from third-party organizations to determine what information is publicly available about these issues during the 2004 election. To organize the information derived from this examination, we are creating an information system that will make it possible to catalog the basic information about the states (i.e. whether a state was new to provisional voting, the percentage of provisional votes counted, the method of notifying voters if their vote was counted, etc.) and combine it with Moritz's collection and analysis of statutes, regulations and litigation. The information system will make it possible to provide answers to such topics of particular interest listed in the contract as: How did preparation for provisional voting vary between states that had some form of provisional voting and those that did not?" and "How did litigation affect implementation?"

Progress: The researcher in this area has identified sources of information for every state and the collection process is well underway. Verified database entries for 24 states are complete, as are two state narrative summaries. This phase of the research is on schedule for completion by the end of July.

Challenges: A key challenge is determining just what states actually did in practice to verify and count provisional ballots. A second challenge has been determining the variations in policy within individual states. We are still wrestling with resolving this challenge, but the work is on schedule.

Work Plan: By the end of the July, the compilation of statutes, administrative regulations, and litigation will be complete and ready to be combined with the state-by-state narrative compiled by Eagleton. That will form the basis for the analysis and recommendation of alternative approaches for provisional voting required under Task 3.5.

SURVEY OF COUNTY ELECTION OFFICIALS

This survey will help the research team understand more about such key topics of interest as:

- "How did the experience of provisional voting vary between states that previously had some form of provisional voting and those where provisional voting was new in 2004?"
- "Did state and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots?"
- "Did local officials have a clear understanding of how to implement provisional voting?"

The survey results will supplement the information on these topics from the compilation of statutes, regulations and cases and from the narrative we are constructing for each state.

Description: The Center for Public Interest Polling (CPIP) at Eagleton is conducting a national survey of county election officials to measure several aspects of provisional voting. The survey is designed to determine the following factors related to provisional voting at the county level:

- The content and quality of instructions provided to county officials by the states
- The steps taken by county officials to pass information on to poll workers;
- Differences in experience between states new to provisional voting and those that had some form of provisional ballot before HAVA; and
- Recommendations to improve and/or reduce the need for provisional voting

Progress: The survey instrument is complete. CPIP has compiled a list of election officials at the county level and at the municipal or regional level for states that do not assign the election responsibility to counties. It was forwarded to the call center, Schulman, Ronca & Bucuvalas Inc., (SRBI) the week of July 5, 2005. A sample will be drawn the week of July 12. Human Subjects Approval from Rutgers University was granted July 12. Pre-notification letters will be sent to election officials around July 12-13, 2005. The EAC has reviewed a draft of this letter, which we have now revised to make clear that the survey will increase our understanding of the provisional voting process, but is not being conducted on behalf of the EAC.

Challenges: We made special efforts to expedite Human Subject Approval to meet the schedule in the work plan. In the absence of an existing, reliable database of local election officials, we had to create one especially for this project. In order to provide a valid comparison between the states new to provisional voting with those that previously had some form of provisional ballot we doubled the sample size from 200 to 400. This increase will require an increase in the budget for the survey from $15,000 to about $24,000. We intend to reallocate costs within the existing budget to make this improvement possible, and will submit a letter describing the reallocation to the EAC in mid-July.

The sample has been, and will continue to represent the biggest challenge in this survey. Compiling the sample required substantial coordination and research to determine the accuracy of the identity and contact information for potential respondents. The difficulty in determining the appropriate contact is attributed to variation in county election officials' titles, jurisdiction types, and state and county election structures across the country. In addition to the potential pitfalls of reaching the appropriate county official, another factor in actually making contact with this special population will be dependent upon the hours that they keep, and may be hindered by the summer season.

Work Plan: This questionnaire will be pre-tested by July 15, and will field July 18 through August 5, 2005. This is somewhat later than projected in the revised work plan, but the information will arrive in time to be considered in drafting the analysis and alternatives document required under Task 3.5.

VOTER IDENTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. During the reporting period, we have made substantial progress in the first two tasks, which constitute the information-gathering phase of the work on Voter ID. The research of Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of provisional voting.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. When complete, this information will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: A team of Election Law@Moritz faculty, executive administrator, a reference librarian, and several research assistants is compiling statutes on Voter Identification, and providing a summarized analysis of this research.

Progress: The Moritz team has created a 50-state chart to record data on voter identification. Categories for which state statutes and administrative regulations are being reviewed include: “Who is required to present ID”, “Types of ID required”, and “Consequences of having no ID”. We have completed the initial research for 45 states and have collected the voter identification statutes for those states. An Election Law@Moritz Fellow is conducting an academic literature review on voter identification. This literature review will help shape the analytical framework that will guide us when the compendium of statutes and administrative regulations is complete.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging because of the different terminology used from state to state to codify voter identification issues, and because many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variety from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Projections: At the current rate, a draft of the voter identification chart should be complete on schedule, by the end of July. Work on the literature review will continue into August, but will be available to inform the analysis of alternative approaches for voter identification called for by Task 3.12 of the contract.

SUPPLEMENTS TO LEGAL ANALYSIS

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of voter id requirements. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern with more rigorous identification requirements for all voters. We are following these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.

Individual narratives for the states with significant activity in voter ID will provide a resource for understanding the wide range of experience in the 2004 election. The narratives will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud, a focus of the concern with increasing the rigor of voter ID requirements. This work is on schedule to be completed by the end of July. The next key milestones will be the completion of the state database and drafting the first narratives.

VOTER ID AND TURNOUT ANALYSIS

The second supplemental analysis will provide objective information on a contentious feature of the debate over voter ID in the states: the effects of more rigorous voter ID regimes on voter turnout and the relationship between the voter ID regime and vote fraud. As part of this effort, Eagleton is undertaking a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state's voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We are creating a database and gathering statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election. Analysis on the county-level will enable us to estimate the influence of ID requirements on various age groups, races, ethnicities and gender groups. We are compiling data from both the 2000 and 2004 Presidential elections to measure the effect that changes in ID requirements may have had on voter turnout through two national election cycles.

Progress: The structure of the database is complete. It contains demographic information from the Census, and turnout data from various sources. The researcher assigned to this task is devising the syntax that will be required to run the statistics when the dataset is complete. The methodology for this part of the study is complete, and the actual data collection will soon be finished.

Projection: We are waiting for the Census Bureau to release the 2004 County Demographic Estimates. We have ordered and await the arrival of 2 datasets that contain voter turnout and voter registration numbers on the county-level for both the 2000 and 2004 elections. Once these two sources of information are received, the researcher will insert this information into the existing database, clean up the dataset, and begin to run the statistics. By that point, the researcher will have separated the states into various ID-requirement groupings that have been determined by the team, which will require coordination with several other parts of the study. This work is on schedule. By the end of July, the researcher should have county-level and state-level statistics on the impact of each ID system upon turnout, analyzed through various demographic features on the county-level.

Task 3.11 Public meeting on Voter Identification Requirements

Description: We are working closely with EAC staff, particularly the General Counsel, to plan a half day public meeting on Voter ID requirements. Presentations at the meeting will form an important part of the information we are compiling about Voter ID requirements and the strengths and shortcomings of a range of alternative approaches.

Progress: We have recommended a focus on the debate over Voter ID now underway in the states. To provide a vivid picture of the debate, we have recommended that one panel include legislators on opposite sides of the issue from two different states. Our research identified Mississippi and Wisconsin as two states to focus on, and we have recommended specific legislators from each. We have discussed with staff adding a researcher to the panel to put the debate in Wisconsin and Mississippi in either a national or historic context. We also recommended two researchers from contrasting points of view, to address the effects of Voter ID provisions under HAVA and broader provisions that are now the subject of national debate. EAC staff recommended a panel of two state election directors to address the interaction of Voter ID with HAVA. We are awaiting a decision on our recommendations from EAC staff. We have no reason not to believe that the work is on schedule to be completed in time to organize a productive meeting on July 28.

Challenges: The date and location of this hearing has been changed twice since the beginning of the project. It was originally scheduled to take place in late June, but was rescheduled for July to allow the June hearing to focus on voting machine technology. The regular meeting was rescheduled for July 26 in Minneapolis, and was recently changed to July 28 in Pasadena. The changes in the scheduling of the July meeting have complicated our choice of panelists. More seriously, the changes mean that information from the hearing will not be available as early in the research process as contemplated in the contract. This timeframe will now require the team to summarize the hearing events at the same time that we are drafting the analysis and alternatives paper in early August.

Additionally, while our contract states that the "Contractor shall be responsible for all aspects of planning and conducting this hearing in consultation with the EAC," we have been asked only to make recommendations of topics and panelists, and the arrangements for the organization of the hearing are in other hands. This lack of clarity has caused some confusion and has delayed invitations to panelists. Thanks to frequent communication with members of the EAC, the process now seems to be working smoothly.

Projection: We believe the work is on schedule for completion in time to recruit the panelists for the July 28 hearing. Preparation of the hearing summary will likely be delayed because of the need to complete the analysis and alternatives paper.

PROJECT MANAGEMENT

Immediately after announcement of the award of the contract, Eagleton and Moritz began supplementing the core group that had prepared to proposal to building a highly qualified team to undertake the work. That team was in place by mid June, just a few weeks after the contract award.

As described in the proposal, the direction of the project is the responsibility of a five-person committee of faculty and staff from Eagleton and Moritz, chaired by Dr. Ruth Mandel, Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics. Project Director Thomas O'Neill, a consultant to Eagleton, reports to this team and provides day-to-day guidance and coordination for the research. A weekly meeting of all the researchers engaged in the project if the primary means of coordinating the work. We have recently added an internal website to facilitate the review and revision of written materials.

Task 3.1 Update the Work Plan

The first task was completed on time with the submission of a detailed work plan and timeline. EAC staff requested that the work plan be supplemented with a Gantt chart created on MS Project, and we submitted that a few days later.

PEER REVIEW GROUP

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group (PRG). The EAC indicated at our first meeting in May that it would review our recommendations for members of the PRG. Our initial vision of the PRG was a small group of scholars and representatives of advocacy organizations that would comment on the research design, review drafts of our analyses and reports, and, in general, identify areas of the research that should be strengthened and help us improve the breadth, depth and clarity of reports based on that research.

Progress: Upon reflection, the project team agreed that the PRG should not include representatives of advocacy groups. We concluded, as representatives they would feel obligated to act as advocates for positions already taken by their groups. While advocacy organizations should be consulted as stakeholders during the course of our work, they were unlikely to achieve the goals we had in mind for the PRG as a source of advice on research design, methodology, and analysis. We submitted a revised list of potential members, substantially comprised of academics, to EAC for review.

The EAC responded with suggestions concerning both the balance of the PRG's membership and the creation of additional committees to review our work. We answered with an analysis of the cost and time involved adopting the EAC's suggestions as well as with suggestions for a balanced selection of academics for the Peer Review Group. We have not received response on this correspondence from the EAC, and the recruitment of the group is on hold.

Challenges: Communications on this issue with the EAC have not been clear or timely. The PRG should be in place now to comment on our research design while there is still time to refine it. While we are confident in the quality of our work, the wisdom and perspective of the outstanding candidates we have proposed for membership would strengthen the analysis and reports of our work.

Projections: We have effectively brought these challenges to the attention of EAC staff and look forward to a resolution speedy enough to allow recruitment of the PRG's members before the end of the month. If we meet that goal, the work of the PRG will be about 2 weeks behind the milestones indicated in the work plan.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and a website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law will be merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding provisional voting and voter identification.

Progress: The Moritz team has provided Eagleton staff with samples of the work that they are performing. An Eagleton staff member will be reviewing the content and formats of data from all supporting research and (re-)formatting once the work has been completed. The researchers and staff at Eagleton have created a shared folder on the Institute's server for the safe storage of work and access for those staff members. All of this work is being reviewed by the project team to ensure that a broad survey is being performed.

Challenges: There are no evident challenges to this task at this time.

Projections: By the end of July 2005, much of the above referenced research will have been completed with respective materials and charts near completion. At that time, staff at Eagleton will review, combine and format all documents and materials in preparation for our final reporting to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: A trial Intranet for the project became available during the week of June 26. The Intranet will facilitate the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.

Progress: After meetings with staff members of Rutgers University Computer Services (RUCS) and subsequent submission of a proposal by RUCS for technical support and hosting of the Intranet and the evaluation of alternative commercial services, the project team decided at its June 28th meeting to publish the Intranet through www.intranets.com, one of the leading commercial services. This decision was based on lower costs and earlier publication schedules than offered under the RUCS proposal. The Intranet services were evaluated during a free trial period, which demonstrated the ease of design and navigation of the proposed service.

Challenges: There are no immediate challenges to completion of this task by the timeframe specified below.

Projections: Design, testing and publication of initial content of the Intranet service is continuing, with all participants expected to be provided access by July 8, 2005.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Given that the report reflects the first month of the project, several procedures for payment of subcontractors on the project were initiated. Expenses related to those members of the team are not reflected in this report because they have not yet been incurred.

A detail of expenses incurred from project inception through June 30, 2005, is attached.

On behalf of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), thank you in advance for agreeing to assist us with the review of research conducted by the Eagleton Institute of Politics on voter identification. By Friday, May 5, 2006, you will receive, in electronic form, the research paper and relevant data analysis which supports the paper's findings. Through this independent review by a small group of experts familiar with elections data and research we are seeking feedback on:

- The research methodology which was used to support the paper's conclusions
- The specific statistical applications which were used to analyze the data and arrive at various conclusions

If there are alternate methodological and statistical approaches to analyzing the data on voter identification, and if there is other data on voter identification that you think should have been included in the analysis, please be certain to note this in your comments.

On May 11, 2006 EAC will conduct a 60-90 minute phone call with key Eagleton Institute staff responsible for the research, members of Eagleton's peer review group and the EAC-identified reviewers who have been asked to consider the research. Through this dialogue EAC hopes to gather varying perspectives and insights on the research strategies and methods that were employed by Eagleton. As a result of this conversation, EAC anticipates that some revisions will be made to the Eagleton research paper. This paper is scheduled to be presented to EAC's Board of Advisors and Standards Boards in late May.

While EAC agency policy does not allow us to provide you with financial compensation for your review of this research we greatly appreciate your willingness to assist us with this important task. We believe that the research findings we will provide on voter identification are important and will most certainly be enhanced by your insights and expertise.

Sincerely,

The EAC has identified three academics who are going to serve as peer reviewers of the Eagleton Voter ID paper and research.

They are Jonathan Nagler of New York University, Jan Leighley, University of Arizona, and Adam Berinsky of MIT.

They are ready to review the documents as soon as they are available.

I would like to them one week to review the material and then have a joint conference call on Thursday, May 11, in which we would all have an opportunity to discuss the research methodology and statistical analysis, along with general comments and suggestions.

If you are able to get to me the paper and the supporting data analysis, I will distribute to the documents ASAP.

Also let me know, if you would, your availability on May 11 to do this conference all.

I anticipate that it will last approximately 90 minutes.

Analysis of Effects of Voter Identification Requirements on Turnout
Tim Vercellotti
Eagleton Institute of Politics
Rutgers University

Introduction

A key area of disagreement in the policy debate over voter identification requirements concerns how such requirements affect voter turnout. Opponents of voter identification laws argue that they constitute an institutional barrier to voting, particularly among the poor, African-Americans, Hispanics, the elderly and people with disabilities (Baxter and Galloway 2005, Electionline.org 2002, Jacobs 2005, Young 2006). This argument holds that voter identification requirements create an extra demand on voters, and thus may discourage some of them from participating in elections. Further, critics argue that requiring voters to produce some form of government-issued photo identification on Election Day is more demanding than requiring, for example, that they state their names at the polling place because of the various steps needed to procure a photo identification card, ~~such as a driver's license.~~ Supporters of voter identification requirements, on the other hand, argue that the requirements are necessary to combat voter fraud, safeguard the integrity of the electoral process, and engender faith in the electoral process among citizens (Young 2006).

This report examines the potential variation in turnout rates based on the type of voter identification requirement in place in each state on Election Day 2004. It draws on two sets of data – aggregate turnout data at the county level for each state, as compiled by the Eagleton Institute of Politics, and individual-level survey data included in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau. Classification of voter identification requirements comes from a review of state statutes conducted by the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University.

Types of voter identification requirements

Each state is classified as having one of five types of ~~identification~~ID requirements in place on Election Day 2004. Upon arrival at polling places, voters had to either: state their names (nine states); sign their names (13 states and the District of Columbia); match their signature to a signature on file with the local election board (eight states); provide a form of identification that did not necessarily include a photo (15 states); or provide a photo identification (five states).<sup>1</sup> It was then possible to code the states according to these requirements, and test the assumption that voter identification requirements would pose an increasingly demanding requirement in this order: stating one's name, signing one's name, matching one's signature to a signature on file, providing a form of identification, and providing a form of photo identification.

But election laws in numerous states offer exceptions to these requirements if individuals lack the necessary form of identification. Laws in those states set a minimum standard that a voter must meet in order to vote using a regular ballot (as opposed to a provisional ballot). Thus it is also possible to categorize states based on the minimum requirement for voting with a regular ballot. In 2004 the categories were somewhat different compared to the maximum requirement, in that none of the states required photo identification as a minimum standard for voting with a regular ballot. Four states, however, required voters to swear an affidavit as to their identity (Florida, Indiana, Louisiana, and North Dakota). The five categories for minimum requirements were: state name (12 states), sign name (14 states and the District of Columbia), match one's signature to a signature on file (six states), provide a non-photo identification (14 states), or swear an affidavit (four states). This analysis treats the array of minimum identification requirements also in terms of increasing demand on the voter: state name, sign name, match signature, provide non-photo identification, and, given the potential legal consequences for providing false information, swearing an affidavit.

Analysis of aggregate data

If one treats maximum voter identification requirements as an ordinal variable, with photo identification as the most demanding requirement, one finds some statistical support for the premise that as the level of required proof increases, turnout declines. Averaging across counties in each state, statewide turnout is negatively correlated with voter identification requirements ( $r = -.21$ ,  $p < .0001$ ). In considering the array of minimum requirements, with affidavit as the most demanding requirement, voter identification also is negatively correlated with turnout ( $r = -.16$ ,  $p < .0001$ ). Breaking down the turnout rates by type of requirement reveals in greater detail the relationship between voter identification requirements and voter turnout.

Differences in voter turnout at the state level in 2004 varied based on voter identification requirements.<sup>2</sup> Taking into account the maximum requirements, an average of 63.1 percent of the voting age population turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 59.3 percent in states that required photo identification. A similar trend emerged when considering minimum requirements. Sixty-one percent of the voting age population turned out in states requiring voters to state their names, compared to 58.7 percent in states that required an affidavit from voters. While the trend is not perfectly linear, there is a general movement toward lower turnout as requirements tend toward requiring greater levels of proof.

Voter identification requirements alone, however, do not determine voter turnout. Multivariate models that take into account other predictors of turnout can place the effects of voter identification in a more accurate context. I estimated the effects of voter identification requirements in multivariate models that also took into account the electoral context in 2004 and demographic characteristics of the population in each county. To capture electoral context I included whether the county was in a presidential battleground state (any state in which the margin of victory for the winning candidate was five percent or less), and whether the county was in a state with a competitive race for governor and/or the U.S. Senate (also using the threshold of a margin of victory of five percent or less). Drawing from U.S. Census projections for 2003, I included the percentage of the voting-age population in each county that was Hispanic or African-American to control for ethnicity and race. I controlled for age using the 2003 Census projection for the percentage of county residents age 65 and older, and I controlled for socioeconomic status by including the percentage of individuals who fell below the poverty line in each county in the 2000 Census.

I estimated a series of random intercept models to account for the likelihood that data from counties were correlated within each state (for further explanation of random intercept and other multilevel models, see Bryk and Raudenbush 1992, Luke 2004, Singer 1998).<sup>3</sup> The dependent variable in each model was voter turnout at the county level, with turnout calculated as the percentage of the voting-age population that voted in the 2004 election.

Turning first to an analysis using the maximum identification requirements, those requirements had a small and negative effect on turnout in 2004, controlling for electoral context and demographic factors. Both contextual factors (whether the county was in a state that was a battleground state and whether that state had a competitive race for governor and/or U.S. Senate) increased voter turnout. As the percentage of senior citizens in the county increased, so did turnout. The percentage of African-Americans in the county had no effect, but the percentage of Hispanic adults exerted a negative effect on voter turnout, as did the percentage of individuals living below the poverty line.

I then sought to test the hypothesis that voter identification requirements dampen turnout among minorities and the poor, a claim voiced by some critics of the requirements. To test this idea I incorporated a series of interactions between the maximum voter identification requirements and the percentage of African-Americans, Hispanics, and poor individuals in the counties. The interaction involving African-Americans was not significant, but those involving Hispanics and poor individuals were significant.<sup>4</sup> Thus, voter identification requirements have a greater effect for Hispanics and those living below the poverty line. A chi-square test of the difference in the deviance for each model (represented by -2 log likelihood in Table 2), shows that the model with interactions provides a better fit to the data ( $p = 0.0003$ ).

Comment [01]

I also estimated the effects of the minimum voter identification requirements holding constant the effects of electoral context and the demographic variables.

<sup>3</sup> The data analyses provided evidence that there was, indeed, a clustering of data within each state. The intraclass correlation, bounded by 0 and 1, measures the variation between the states. A random intercept model using only the intercept as a predictor generated an intraclass correlation of .40, indicating considerable variation between the states.

<sup>4</sup> The interactions are labeled in Tables 2 and 3 as VID*African-American, VID*Hispanic, and VID*Poverty. To calculate the effects of voter identification requirements for a specific group, one must add the estimates for voter identification, the group, and the interaction. Doing so for Hispanic adults results in an estimate of -0.36 [-0.04 (voter id) - 0.38 (Hispanic) + 0.06 (voter id X Hispanic)].

The effects of the minimum requirements are not statistically significant ( $p = 0.15$ ). The battleground state variable continues to exert a positive influence on turnout, while the presence of a competitive race for governor and/or U.S. Senate has no statistically significant effect. As in the maximum identification requirements models, as the percentage of the population that is Hispanic or poor increases, turnout declines. As the percentage of elderly increases, so does turnout. The proportion of African-Americans in the population does not affect turnout. Adding interactive effects to the model results in a statistically significant and negative effect of minimum voter identification requirements on turnout. But one must interpret this estimate with caution. A chi-square test for the difference in fit between the two models shows no significant difference ( $p = 0.08$ ), and thus no improvement to the fit when adding the interactions between voter identification requirements and the percentages of the county that is Hispanic or lives below the poverty line.

Analysis of the aggregate data at the county level generates some support for the hypothesis that as the burden of voter identification requirements increases, turnout declines, at least in the case of the maximum requirements. This is particularly so for counties with concentrations of Hispanic residents or individuals who live below the poverty line. But aggregate data cannot fully capture the individual demographic factors that may figure into the decision to turn out to vote. For example, previous research has found that education is a powerful determinant of turnout (Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980, but see also Nagler 1991). Married individuals also are more likely to vote than those who are not married (Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002; Alvarez, Nagler and Wilson 2004; Fisher, Kenny, and Morton 1993). To fully explore the effects of voter identification requirements on turnout, it is important to examine individual-level data as well.

Individual-level analysis

Individual-level turnout data exists in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau. The Census Bureau conducts the CPS monthly to measure unemployment and other workforce data, but the bureau adds a battery of voter participation questions to the November survey in even-numbered years to coincide with either a presidential or midterm-Congressional election.

One of the advantages of the CPS is the sheer size of the sample. The survey's Voting and Registration Supplement consisted of interviews, either by telephone or in person, with 96,452 respondents.<sup>5</sup> The large sample size permits analyses of smaller groups, such as Black or Hispanic voters or voters with less than a high school education. The analyses reported here are based on reports from self-described registered voters. I omitted those who said they were not registered to vote. I also excluded those who said they cast absentee ballots because the identification requirements for absentee ballots may differ from those required when one votes in person. In addition, I eliminated from the sample respondents who said they were not U.S. citizens.

<sup>5</sup> It is important to note that the Census Bureau allows respondents to answer on behalf of themselves and others in the household during the interview. While proxy reporting of voter turnout raises the possibility of inaccurate reports concerning whether another member of the household voted, follow-up interviews with those for whom a proxy report had been given in the November 1984 CPS showed 99 percent agreement between the proxy report and the information given by the follow-up respondent (U.S. Census Bureau 1990).

It is important to note here that the voter turnout rate for the CPS sample is much higher than the turnout rates presented in the aggregate data analysis. The U.S. Census Bureau reported that 89 percent of registered voters in the CPS sample said they voted (U.S. Census Bureau 2005). Turnout among the voting-age population was 58 percent in 2004, according to the aggregate data analysis. The difference is a result of several factors. One factor consists of the different denominators in calculating the turnout rate – registered voters versus the much larger voting-age population. Also, previous research has shown that, generally speaking, some survey respondents overstate their incidence of voting. Researchers speculate that over-reports may be due to the social desirability that accompanies saying one has done his or her civic duty, or a reluctance to appear outside the mainstream of American political culture (U.S. Census Bureau 1990). It is also possible that voting is an indication of a level of civic engagement that predisposes voters to agree to complete surveys at a higher rate than non-voters (Flanigan and Zingale 2002). Hence the voter turnout rates reported in the CPS tend to be much higher than the actual turnout rate for the nation (Flanigan and Zingale 2002). Even with this caveat, however, the CPS serves as a widely accepted source of data on voting behavior.

In addition, I eliminated from the sample respondents who said they were not U.S. citizens.

The dependent variable in these analyses is whether a respondent said he or she voted in the November 2004 election.<sup>6</sup> In addition to the voter identification requirements, the models include two other state-level factors that might have influenced turnout in 2004: whether the state was considered a battleground state in the presidential election, and whether there was a competitive gubernatorial and/or U.S. Senate race in the state (see Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002, Alvarez et al. 2004, and Kenny et al. 1993 for similar approaches). As in the aggregate analysis, the threshold that determined whether the state was a battleground state or had a competitive statewide race was a margin of victory of five percent or less. At the individual level, I controlled for gender, age in years, education, household income, and dummy variables representing whether a voter was Black/non-Hispanic, Hispanic, or another non-white race (with white/non-Hispanic voters as the omitted category for reference purposes). Drawing on previous research on voting behavior, I also controlled for whether an individual was employed, or at least a member of the workforce (as opposed to being a full-time student, a homemaker, or retired). Both employment and workforce membership have been shown to be positive predictors of turnout (see Mitchell and Wlezien 1995). Marital status, whether one is a native-born citizen and residential mobility also have emerged as significant predictors of turnout (Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002, Alvarez et al. 2004, Kenney et al. 1993, Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980). I included in the model variables for whether a respondent was married (coded 1 if yes, 0 otherwise), and whether one was a native-born citizen (coded 1 if yes, 0 otherwise). I measured residential mobility by coding for whether the respondent had moved to a new address in the six months prior to the interview (coded 1 if yes, 0 otherwise).

<sup>6</sup> The U.S. Census Bureau reported, based on the November 2004 CPS, that 89 percent of those who identified themselves as registered voters said they voted in 2004 (U.S. Census Bureau 2005). Previous research has shown that, generally speaking, some survey respondents overstate their incidence of voting. Researchers speculate that over-reports may be due to the social desirability that accompanies saying one has done his or her civic duty, or a reluctance to appear outside the mainstream of American political culture (U.S. Census Bureau 1990). It is also possible that voting is an indication of civic engagement that predisposes voters to agree to complete surveys at a higher rate than non-voters (Flanigan and Zingale 2002). Hence the voter turnout rates reported in the CPS tend to be up to 10 percentage points higher than the actual turnout rate for the nation (Flanigan and Zingale 2002). Even with this caveat, however, the CPS serves as a widely accepted source of data on voting behavior.

Results

The dependent variable is whether a respondent said he or she voted in the November 2004 election (coded 1 for yes, 0 for no). I estimated models using probit analysis, and estimated robust standard errors to control for correlated error terms for observations from within the same state.

The two models in Table 4 use either the maximum or minimum voter identification requirements in each state. The two models generate virtually identical results. ~~Voter identification requirements exert a statistically significant negative effect on whether survey respondents said they had voted in 2004.~~ Of the other state factors, only the competitiveness of the presidential race had a significant effect on turnout. In terms of demographic influences, African-American voters were more likely than white voters to say they had cast a ballot, while those of other non-white races were less likely than white voters to say they had turned out. Hispanic voters were not statistically different from white voters in terms of reported turnout. Consistent with previous research, age, education, income, and marital status all were positive predictors of voting. Women also were more likely to say they voted than men. Those who had moved within six months before the interview were less likely to say they had voted.

While the probit models provide statistical support for the influence of voter identification requirements and other variables on turnout, probit coefficients do not lend themselves to intuitive interpretation. Another common approach in studies of election requirements is to examine how the predicted probability of voter turnout would vary as election requirements vary. I used the probit coefficients to calculate the predicted probability of voting at each level of voter identification requirements while holding all other independent variables in the models at their means.<sup>7</sup> I calculated the probabilities taking into account both maximum and minimum requirements, with photo identification serving as the most demanding of the maximum requirements and affidavits as the most demanding minimum requirement.

Allowing the voter identification requirement to vary while holding constant all other variables in the model showed that the predicted probability of turnout ranged from 91.2 percent ~~0.912 if all voters had to state their names for stating one's name~~ to 88.7 percent ~~if all voters had to~~ provide for photo identification under the maximum requirements. In other words, the probability of voting dropped with each level of voter identification requirement, with a total drop of .025, or 2.5 percent, across the five types of identification. When taking into account the minimum requirement for identification, the probability showed a similar decline, with a slightly larger total drop of 3.3 percent.

Among the key variables of interest in the debate over voter identification requirements are race, age, income, and education. Given the large sample size (54,973 registered voters), it was possible to break the sample into sub-samples along those demographic lines to explore variation in predicted probability by group. I disaggregated the sample by the variable of interest (such as race, for example), omitting that variable while I re-ran the probit model with the remaining predictors of voter turnout, including the voter identification requirements.<sup>8</sup> If the analysis showed that the voter identification requirements had a statistically significant effect on turnout, I used the probit coefficients from the model to calculate the predicted probability of voting for each group across the five requirements while holding the other variables in the model constant.

Both the maximum and minimum identification requirements had negative and statistically significant effects for white voters. Allowing the requirements to vary from stating one's name to providing photo identification or an affidavit showed drops of 2.5 percent and 3.3 percent respectively in the predicted probability of voting. The identification requirements had no effect on the probability of African-Americans voting, but the minimum identification requirements had a comparatively sizable effect on voter turnout among Hispanics. The predicted probability of Hispanics voting ranged from 87 percent if stating one's name would be the required form of identification to 77.3 percent if a voter would have to provide an affidavit in order to vote, a difference of 9.7 percent.

The effects of voter identification requirements also varied by age, with the greatest variation occurring among voters ages 18 to 24.

Voters in that age group had a predicted probability of 83.9 percent if when the maximum requirement would be to state one's name, and the probability drops 8.9 percentage points if voters would have to provide photo identification. The range was from 83.1 percent to 75.4 percent under the minimum requirements. The gap in probability narrowed in older age groups (4.8 percent for the maximum requirements and 5.8 percent for the minimum requirements for those ages 25 to 44; 1.8 percent for the minimum requirements for those ages 45 to 64, and 2.4 percent for the minimum requirements for those ages 65 and older).

Comment [02]: The turnout figures shown in the analysis of the aggregate data range of 57.3% turnout to 63.1% turnout. When using the individual data based on self-reports, the turnout figures approach 90%. I think a couple of sentences explaining the difference in the data between the two different analyses would be helpful here, even for readers comfortable with the statistical techniques used.

Variation also emerged along the lines of income, with the effects of voter identification requirements varying to a greater extent for voters in households below the poverty line compared to those living above the poverty line.

While the maximum set of requirements did not have a statistically significant effect for voters living below the poverty line, the minimum set of requirements had a significant and negative effect. The probability of voting was 78.4 for poor voters if they would have to identify themselves by giving their name, and the probability declined to 73.1 if they would have to provide an affidavit attesting to their identity. Both the maximum and minimum sets of requirements had a significant and negative effect on voters living above the poverty line, but the difference in probability across the effects was narrower (2.3 percent for the maximum requirements and 3.1 percent for the minimum requirements).

The effects of voter identification requirements varied across education levels as well, with those lowest in education demonstrating the widest variation in probabilities as identification requirements ranged from least to most demanding.

Registered voters who had less than a high school education had a 77.5 percent probability of voting if the maximum requirement would be stating one's name, and a 70.8 percent probability if they would have to provide photo identification under the maximum requirement, a difference of 6.7 percent. The difference from the lowest to the highest requirement among the minimum requirements was 7.4 percent. The difference in probabilities ranged from 3.3 percent for the maximum requirements to 4.5 percent for the minimum requirements for voters with a high school diploma. The range of effects of voter identification requirements was smaller among those with higher levels of education (and non-existent for one category — voters with some college education).

Discussion and conclusion

The results presented here provide evidence that as the level of demand associated with voter identification requirements increases, voter turnout declines. This point emerged from both the aggregate data and the individual-level data, although not always for both the maximum and minimum sets of requirements. The overall effect for all registered voters was fairly small, but even a slight decline in turnout has the potential to alter the outcome of a close election.

The effects of voter identification requirements were more pronounced for specific subgroups. Hispanic voters and the poor appeared to be less likely to vote if the level of required identification becomes more demanding, according to both the aggregate and the individual-level data. In the individual-level data, for Hispanic voters, the probability of voting dropped by 9.7 percent across the various levels of minimum identification requirements. Survey respondents living in poor households would be 5.3 percent less likely to vote as the requirements varied from stating one's name to attesting to one's identity in an affidavit.

Effects of voter requirements also varied with education. Registered voters who had not graduated from high school would be 6.7 percent less likely to say they voted if the maximum requirement is photo identification as opposed to stating one's name as the maximum requirements ranged from stating one's name to providing photo identification. When considering the minimum requirements, those with less than a high school education would be 7.4 percent less likely to say they voted if the requirement was an affidavit as opposed to stating one's name. Age was also a key factor, with voters ages 18 to 24 being 7.7 percent to 8.9 percent less likely to vote as the requirements ranged from stating one's name to providing a photo identification or affidavit.

Two concerns aired by critics of voter identification requirements were not borne out by the results. African-American voters did not appear to be affected by voter identification requirements, according to both the aggregate data and individual-level data analyses. Also, the elderly, while they would be slightly less likely to vote as requirements ranged from least to most demanding, would not necessarily be affected in the dramatic manner predicted by some opposed to photo identification requirements in particular.

In examining the effects of voter identification requirements on turnout, there is still much to learn. The data examined in this project could not capture the dynamics of how identification requirements might lower turnout. If these requirements dampen turnout, is it because individuals are aware of the requirements and stay away from the polls because they cannot or do not want to meet the requirements?<sup>10</sup> Or, do the requirements result in some voters being turned away when they cannot meet the requirements on Election Day? The CPS data do not include measures that can answer these questions, pointing up the need for collection of additional data. Knowing more about the "on the ground" experiences of voters concerning identification requirements could guide policy-makers at the state and local level in determining whether and at what point in the electoral cycle a concerted public information campaign might be most effective in helping voters to meet identification requirements. Such knowledge also could help in designing training for poll workers, election judges to handle questions about, and potential disputes over, voter identification requirements.

<sup>10</sup> The individual-level data offer some insight here. If advance knowledge of the voter identification requirements were to dampen turnout, it is reasonable to expect that advance knowledge of those requirements also could discourage some individuals from registering to vote. I ran the same probit models using voter registration as the dependent variable (coded 1 if the respondent said he or she was registered, and 0 if the respondent was not registered). Neither the maximum nor minimum array of voter identification requirements had a statistically significant effect on the probability that a survey respondent was registered to vote.

Subject The Fraud "Report"

I am recommending that we use Thursday's meeting, a public forum, to be on the record about this report.

My thought is that Tom should report the matter to us in his report. New Business?? Just stating the facts as they exist, including the nature of the study, how we have handled the numerous requests and inquiries that we have received, etc.

Please let me know what you think about this suggestion. Thanks.

Subject Pasadena Meeting

History:

 This message has been replied to.

Julie: My plane arrives at LAX at about 5, and I should arrive in Pasadena after 7. I don't think we could meet until about 8 p.m. Does that fit your plans? I am staying at the Huntington, about a mile from the Cal Tech campus. You can always reach me by cell phone [REDACTED]

Dan and I have divided up our presentation this way: I will describe the overall research effort and the major questions to which we are seeking answers. I'll also outline the methods we are using to develop those answers and report on the current status of the work. Dan will describe in greater detail Moritz's research and compilation of the statutes, regulation and case law and describe some of the key matters of substance involved in developing our report.

The outline of my talk on Power Point is not yet complete, but the unfinished version is attached to give you a clearer impression of the presentation. I assume the meeting room will have a projector and screen. If that is not the case let me know and I'll print the Power Point slides and hand them out to the Commissioners.

Tom,

I'm so sorry for taking so long to get back to you. I am hoping that you have moved forward with your update presentation. My general thoughts are very simple, just a presentation on the research that you have done thus far, the plans that you have made for additional research, but not to include any preliminary conclusions at this point.

Is there a possibility that I could get a copy of what you guys are thinking of presenting prior to the meeting? I am sure that the Commissioners will want it in advance to prepare questions for you and Dan.

Also, you and I had planned to get together on Wednesday. What time are you arriving? I plan to go over to the university and view the room just after I arrive (around 1:00). Would you have some time around 3:30 or 4:00?

Subject RE: Status of agenda recommendations

Julie: The great strength that Doug Chapin would bring (as opposed to a historian) is that he could put the presentations from Mississippi and Wisconsin in national perspective. The debate over voter id, as you know, is taking place across the country. The terms of the debate everywhere are strikingly similar: voter access versus ballot security. Chapin could provide the context that would make it possible for the commissioners to appreciate the presentations of the two legislators as examples of a broader, national debate

A historian, as opposed to Chapin would provide a different sort of context. The historian would describe as a step in the evolution of the franchise.

The panel would be stronger if the two legislators' stories were put in context. The 10 – 15 minutes spent on context, whether current or historical, would, I think, be well worth it.

What are your thoughts about just having the legislators and not the historian. I am just thinking time-wise, we may be a bit tight. Do you think we can get the same sense of how these debates have come up and been resolved through the legislators?

Julie:

I have made a little progress on the search for a scholar of the history of voter registration and voter ID to present the historical perspective in the opening panel at the July meeting. But none of the 3 suggestions below are obviously preferable to Doug Chapin.

Three possibilities are:

Dayna L. Cunningham, author of "Who Are to Be the Electors? A Reflection on the History of Voter Registration in the United States," 9 Yale L. & Pol'y Rev. 370 (1991). She was Assistant Counsel in the Voting Rights Project of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund at the time she wrote the article. She was active as a pro bono lawyer on election issues in Florida in 2004, and is now with Lord-Ross Philanthropic Advisors in Boston. dcunningham@lordross.org (914) 907-8895

R. Michael Alvarez, author of "Voter Registration," among other articles on registration issues. Currently at Caltech. <http://www.hss.caltech.edu/~rma/home.html>. He is a candidate for our Peer Review Group. My sense is that his experience and interests are more in current issues than in the history of the development of voter registration and voter ID.

Alexander Keyssar, author of "The Right to Vote: The Contested History of Democracy in the United States." Currently at the Kennedy School of Government, but on leave. http://ksgfaculty.harvard.edu/alexander\_keyssar

Julie:

We agree with your conception of the hearing as including 3 panels.

Panel 1 on the History of Voter ID and Experiences Adopting Voter ID Requirements.

We are looking for a scholar in this area as an alternative to Doug Chapin to speak to the historical perspective. The other panelists should represent Mississippi and Wisconsin, a pro voter ID speaker from one state and an opponent from the other. The choices, more detail on them is contained in my earlier memo on this topic, are:

Mississippi: Rep William Denny (pro) or Rep. Walter Robinson (con)
Wisconsin: Sen. Joe Leibhan (pro) or Sen. Judith Robinson (con)

Panel 2 on Voter ID and HAVA.

Your suggestions ere (Andino of SC and Thompson of TN) look fine.

Panel 3 on Voter ID, Turnout and HACA

Minnite of Barnard and Samples of Cato.

On the subject of this hearing: in view of the change from Minneapolis to Pasadena, we would like to know if the commitment to the date and place is now certain enough that we should buy plane tickets. Affecting the travel decision will be the availability of a webcast of the event. Do you plan to offer that, as you did at the Columbus hearing?

Julie: Nice to see you in New York yesterday. Here is the list of states categorized by whether provisional voting was new to them post HAVA or whether they had had some form or provisional ballot pre-HAVA. As we discussed, this list will be used in sampling and analyzing the survey of local election officials is that is about to begin. The EAC's review of the list would be helpful in ensuring that we have assigned states to the correct category.

Have a good 4th.

Subject June 30 Panel --comment OSU

Julie:

I have now heard from Ned Foley at OSU. He makes a useful observation and suggestion.

Ned cautions that there just might be residual animosity between the two Mississippi legislators that would become apparent at the hearing. (I have not talked to any of the panelists recommended, but by Mississippi informant, a legislative staffer, said that the debate while emotional cleared the air and left everyone feeling better.)

Ned suggests that since Wisconsin Indiana, Arizona and New Mexico have experienced much the same debate, the panel could be structured to include a "pro" view from one state, say Mississippi, and the "con" view from another one of the other four. I can't offer you a specific legislator from one of those other states at this minute, but if you elect to take that approach, finding one should not be difficult.

I should have a recommendation to you for the panels on Wednesday. Your recommendation of John Samples strikes me as very well chosen. He has opined on the topic of voter id and turnout for USA today --and he has a PhD from Rutgers.

Just to provide a preview of what I think our recommendation will be, I now envision two panels. The first would look at Voter ID requirements within the 4 corners of HAVA through presentations by election directors from two contrasting states (probably Michigan and Pennsylvania), perhaps supplemented by an analyst who can put the stories of these two states in a broader context.

The second panel would broaden the scope to include voter id issues that go beyond first-time mail registrants. This second panel would explore the debate between those who argue for tighter ID requirements to prevent fraud and those who caution that tighter requirements will depress turnout, especially among older voters, African Americans and immigrants. This panel could be composed of two Mississippi legislators (not the two we discussed a few days ago) and two analysts, possibly Samples and Lorraine Minnite, the Barnard political scientist who was the lead researcher on the Demos election fraud study (and who has a professional interest in immigrant voting patterns).

The Eagleton team is meeting on this, among other topics, tomorrow morning. I'll then consult with our Moritz colleagues and make a few phone calls to identify the best candidates from Mississippi and put together a recommendation for you.

Your reaction to this plan as it takes shape would be welcome.

In light of information that Mr. Flemming may be an opponent to Senator Lott, it would not be wise for us to include Mr. Flemming on the panel. I am sure that there is another state rep or senator that would have the same opinion that would be able to be substituted.

Voter ID exposes raw emotions in House.doc

Voter ID exposes raw emotions in House
Lawmakers represent two Mississippis
By: Emily Wagster Pettus, Associated Press 03/23/2004

JACKSON - Reps. Erik Fleming and Philip Gunn both live in Clinton and are close to the same age. Their state House districts twist and weave around one another in the metro Jackson suburbs.

But in some ways, the two state lawmakers represent two different Mississippis.

Fleming, 39, is a black Democrat. Gunn, 41, is a white Republican.

The day after an emotionally wrenching House debate over voter ID, Fleming and Gunn stayed at the Capitol to quietly discuss one of Mississippi's most racially divisive political issues: Should people be required to prove their identity at the polls?

Like many white legislators, Gunn supports voter identification. He says requiring a driver's license or other ID would prevent people from voting in others' names.

"It is not a racial issue for the younger members - the younger white members. There are legitimate problems with our process, and voter ID is one way to fix them," said Gunn, who was elected last year only after some precincts were revoted in a disputed Republican primary.

Like most black lawmakers, Fleming opposes voter ID. He points to Mississippi's history of racial strife designed to keep blacks from voting - from poll taxes to shootings.

"From the black perspective, it's all about inclusion. From the white perspective, it's all about fairness," Fleming said.

Last Thursday, a House debate on an affidavit-voting bill stretched more than three hours after Republican lawmakers offered voter ID amendments.

An amendment by Rep. Bill Denny, R-Jackson, would have required a voter to show anything from a driver's license to a pilot's license before casting an affidavit ballot. It was adopted 77-45, with solid opposition from blacks and a few whites and support from white Republicans and many white Democrats, including Speaker Billy McCoy.

That prompted speeches from more than three dozen of the 122 House members, for and against ID.

Several black lawmakers, including Rep. Tyrone Ellis, D-Starkville, told personal stories of being threatened for trying to exercise their constitutional rights.

"You get shot at, you get burned out, then someone puts this before you and you tell me how you vote," Ellis said, his voice rising.

The Mississippi House is generally divided into three factions - white Republicans, black Democrats and rural white Democrats. During Thursday's debate, lawmakers say it became clear that the voter ID disagreement threatened the coalition of black and rural white Democrats that had brought McCoy into the speakership in January.

White Democrats who had voted for the ID amendment started going to the podium to urge defeat of the bill. Among them was Rep. Bo Eaton, D-Taylorsville.

"I feel it was an issue that was going to divide the House, when we don't even have a balanced budget yet," Eaton said the next day.

Rep. Steve Holland, D-Plantersville, was on the verge of tears as he said he was switching his vote - from supporting ID to opposing passage of the bill.

The bill was defeated 47-72.

On Friday morning after most of their colleagues had left for the weekend, Fleming and Gunn sat on the last row of the House chamber and chatted about ID. They wondered aloud how they could find a solution palatable not only to their constituents but to the diverse state as a whole.

Gunn wondered if the U.S. Justice Department - which oversees changes in Mississippi's voting system to ensure fairness to minorities - would accept a bill requiring ID for younger people but not for older ones who had lived through the turbulent civil rights era.

"We have to respect the feelings of the older members of the Black Caucus," Gunn said. "You can't ask them to forget what they went through. You can't ask them to ignore it."

Fleming said he was encouraged when a white lawmaker walked back to his desk during the debate and said: "I know where you're coming from."

Fleming said he's "very optimistic" that lawmakers eventually will find a solution to address concerns about voting integrity and inclusion. A voter ID bill has passed the Senate and awaits consideration in a House committee - but it's not clear whether that bill will make it to the full House.

Gunn said last week's House debate gave members a chance to express their feelings without accusing each other of being stupid.

Fleming agreed and added: "I think this was a discussion or a come-to-Jesus meeting that was 40 years in the making."

Subject June 30 Hearing Panelists

Julie:

Thanks for you call. Our conversation helped me crystallize further the recommendations we will make to the Commission about the material to be covered at the hearing.

I believe we will recommend two panels of 3 or 4 people each for the June 30 hearing. One will cover the relatively narrow HAVA Voter ID requirements with presentations by 2 state-level voting administrators with contrasting experiences. The contrast between Michigan and Pennsylvania might prove especially instructive because it would demonstrate the relationship between the quality of the data base and requirements for voter identification. Since the hearing is being held in Manhattan, perhaps inviting a speaker from New York instead of Pennsylvania would make sense. I'd appreciate your thoughts on that.

Two other speakers could address the issue of broader Voter ID requirements to reduce vote fraud by requiring some form of identification for each voter at the polling place. The experience in Mississippi over the past 5 years has been particularly dramatic, as illustrated by the attached news article from the local press last year. As we discussed, inviting the 2 legislators profiled in the article might make for powerful testimony.

The final 2 speakers we believe should be academics who have studied the relationship between Voter ID regimes, voter participation and vote fraud and who have conflicting evidence and conclusions to offer. We have found at least two university based researchers who can present the view that stricter Voter ID requirement do not reduce vote fraud and do dampen participation. We have not yet identified a researcher from the other end of the spectrum, but we are looking actively. Your suggestions would be most welcome.

Below is our current list of possibilities for your review.

Tom

JUNE 30 HEARING
POSSIBLE PANELISTS OR TOPICS

Possible States to be represented by one or more panelists

Mississippi

Debate over voter id issues has been dramatic. The resonance of Mississippi on voting issues would lend interest to the testimony. Voter id legislation was not approved in the current legislative session and has been a source of contention at least since 1999.

008433

Michigan

Strong database state; lax Voter ID requirements don't seem to present as much of a problem (although one hears rumors about Detroit); interesting contrast to NY. With Pennsylvania would present contrasts in the importance of the Statewide Voter Data Base

New York

Had a significant problem with provisional ballots, suggesting that their relatively lax ID rules might be problematic; also Tom Wilkey will have good contacts there. The hearing is there.

Pennsylvania

Relatively lax ID rules and apparently quite a few problems with provisional ballots in 2004. Had start up problems with its data base and would offer comparisons between counties where the data base was well established and those where is new. Should be weighed against New York for inclusion as a contrast with Michigan

Wisconsin

Governor Doyle vetoed the legislature's first attempt at tightening voter ID requirements, and instead offered a package to recruit and train more qualified poll workers and calls for improvements in voter registration procedures.

Academics on Voter ID, Turnout, and Vote Fraud

Spencer Overton

Professor, GWU Law School. Has written op-eds arguing that the empirical research is insufficient to support the need for more ID to reduce fraud. He is working on a book on the topic.

John Fortier

Research Fellow at the American Enterprise Institute. Recommended by Norm Ornstein. Google revealed no publications on this topic by Fortier.

Lorraine C. Minnite

Assistant Professor of Political Science, Barnard College. Lead researcher of the Demos election fraud study and researcher in immigrant voting patterns. Found that the incidence of fraud perpetrated by individual voters in the United States was very low and had a minimal impact on election outcomes.

Guy-Uriel Charles

Associate Professor of Law, Center for the Study of Political Psychology University of Minnesota. His areas of interest include Election Law and Election Law Disputes and African American Voting Concerns. He is a member of the National Research Commission on Elections and Voting of the Social Science Research Council

Tom,

The following answers, I hope, your questions. I am happy to discuss this further.

1. Does the EAC have a preference for a venue for the meeting? Have any arrangements --preliminary or otherwise-- been made to secure that facility? If not, I assume EAC would prefer a public building or an academic setting such as the auditorium you used at the law school in Columbus.

EAC has a meeting location for this meeting and the hearing that will follow. The meeting and hearing will be held at the Marriot Marquis Hotel. I will have staff provide the address and room.

2. Has the EAC made arrangements for a transcriber to record the meeting of the Commissioners? If so, is it the EAC's intention that we will use the same transcriber for the panel? If not, should we arrange for a transcriber for the entire day? Are there federal rules on payments for transcription services that we should follow?

While EAC has not yet made arrangements for a transcriber, we will as we will need one for the meeting and the hearing.

3. Will EAC support staff attend the hearing to sign in those attending, issue name tags, etc., or are these duties that we should be prepared to carry out?

Yes, EAC will have staff available for this function.

4. Will the EAC issue the news release about the meeting and the panel?

008435

Yes.

5. What do federal regulation indicate that I may offer speakers we bring in from these states in terms of travel, accommodations, meals, etc? Will speakers have to pay for their travel and accommodations and then request reimbursement or can we pay their bills directly?

Federal travel regulations apply. However, once you have made recommendations on panelists and the Commission has approved those panelists, we will take care of their travel arrangements and accommodations.

Arizona, California, Mississippi, Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin.

I can imagine that the Commission will not want to use Arizona. There is a great deal of controversy around some proposed legislation that was introduced and passed by the Arizona legislature last year. EAC has not yet taken a position on that controversy, but may. Until such time as EAC has formalized its opinion on this, EAC will not want to invite a public debate on this issue.

I will call you later to discuss any questions or concerns. I am in a meeting from 1 - 3 (EDT)

Karen Lynn-Dyson suggested I consult directly with you about arrangements for the Commission's June 30 meeting in New York. As I understood our discussions in Washington last week, as your consultants we will be responsible for organizing the portion of the meeting that will cover the Voter Identification issue, while EAC staff will organize the regular meeting of the Commissioners. Is that understanding correct?

Because time is short, we know we must move quickly on the arrangements.

1. Does the EAC have a preference for a venue for the meeting? Have any arrangements --preliminary or otherwise-- been made to secure that facility? If not, I assume EAC would prefer a public building or an academic setting such as the auditorium you used at the law school in Columbus.

5. What do federal regulation indicate that I may offer speakers we bring in from these states in terms of travel, accommodations, meals, etc? Will speakers have to pay for their travel and accommodations and then request reimbursement or can we pay their bills directly?

These are the states we are currently evaluating for the Voter ID presentations: Arizona, California, Mississippi, Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin. We may pick 4 of these, or fewer if we determine that one state should have two panelists representing different viewpoints: Karen tells me you have been working with several of these, and your counsel would sharpen the judgment we bring to bear on our selection. I am particularly interested in the Mississippi experience and would like to discuss that with you. . .perhaps by phone. The project team is aiming to agree on a panel of speakers to submit to the the EAC early next week. Panelists should receive their invitations at least two weeks in advance (more would be better), especially if we want to get onto their schedules.

Dan and I have divided up our presentation this way: I will describe the overall research effort and the major questions to which we are seeking answers. I'll also outline the methods we are using to develop those answers and report on the current status of the work. Dan will describe in greater detail Moritz's research and compilation of the statutes, regulation and case law and describe some of the key matters of substance involved in developing our report.

The outline of my talk on Power Point is not yet complete, but the unfinished version is attached to give you a clearer impression of the presentation. I assume the meeting room will have a projector and screen. If that is not the case let me know and I'll print the Power Point slides and hand them out to the Commissioners.

I'm so sorry for taking so long to get back to you. I am hoping that you have moved forward with your update presentation. My general thoughts are very simple, just a presentation on the research that you have done thus far, the plans that you have made for additional research, but not to include any preliminary conclusions at this point.

Is there a possibility that I could get a copy of what you guys are thinking of presenting prior to the meeting? I am sure that the Commissioners will want it in advance to prepare questions for you and Dan.

Also, you and I had planned to get together on Wednesday. What time are you arriving? I plan to go over to the university and view the room just after I arrive (around 1:00). Would you have some time around 3:30 or 4:00?

All of the arrangements have been made. CalTech is letting us use the Baxter Lecture Hall in the Baxter Humanities building. We are still working on webcasting. CalTech cannot or will not host it on their site, but we are trying to get it done through another source.

We have a block of rooms at the Westin. We will likely have some extras if you would like to use them. I will confirm this in the next few days.

Julie: The great strength that Doug Chapin would bring (as opposed to a historian) is that he could put the presentations from Mississippi and Wisconsin in national perspective. The debate over voter id, as you know, is taking place across the country. The terms of the debate everywhere are strikingly similar: voter access versus ballot security. Chapin could provide the context that would make it possible for the commissioners to appreciate the presentations of the two legislators as examples of a broader, national debate

A historian, as opposed to Chapin would provide a different sort of context. The historian would describe as a step in the evolution of the franchise.

The panel would be stronger if the two legislators' stories were put in context. The 10 – 15 minutes spent on context, whether current or historical, would, I think, be well worth it.

Tom,

What are your thoughts about just having the legislators and not the historian. I am just thinking time-wise, we may be a bit tight. Do you think we can get the same sense of how these debates have come up and been resolved through the legislators?

I have made a little progress on the search for a scholar of the history of voter registration and voter ID to present the historical perspective in the opening panel at the July meeting. But none of the 3 suggestions below are obviously preferable to Doug Chapin.

Three possibilities are:

Dayna L. Cunningham, author of "Who Are to Be the Electors? A Reflection on the History of Voter Registration in the United States," 9 Yale L. & Pol'y Rev. 370 (1991). She was Assistant Counsel in the Voting Rights Project of the NAACP Legal Defense

R. Michael Alvarez, author of "Voter Registration," among other articles on registration issues. Currently at Caltech. <http://www.hss.caltech.edu/~rma/home.html>. He is a candidate for our Peer Review Group. My sense is that his experience and interests are more in current issues than in the history of the development of voter registration and voter ID.

I have reviewed the agenda that your group proposed with regard to the meeting on Voter ID. The attached are some suggestions on a few changes. We have had Chris Thomas and Secretary Cortes speak at recent meetings of EAC. So, I have included a few other ideas of states that have and those that do have ID requirements. Please take a look at this. Perhaps we can chat about it on Tuesday, July 5.

Julie:

I should have a recommendation to you for the panels on Wednesday. Your recommendation of John Samples strikes me as very well chosen. He has opined on the topic of voter id and turnout for USA today --and he has a PhD from Rutgers.

Just to provide a preview of what I think our recommendation will be, I now envision two panels. The first would look at Voter ID requirements within the 4 corners of HAVA through presentations by election directors from two contrasting states (probably Michigan and Pennsylvania), perhaps supplemented by an analyst who can put the stories of these two states in a broader context.

The second panel would broaden the scope to include voter id issues that go beyond first-time mail registrants. This second panel would explore the debate between those who argue for tighter ID requirements to prevent fraud and those who caution that tighter requirements will depress turnout, especially among older voters, African Americans and immigrants. This panel could be composed of two Mississippi legislators (not the two we discussed a few days ago) and two analysts, possibly Samples and Lorraine Minnite, the Barnard political scientist who was the lead researcher on the Demos election fraud study (and who has a professional interest in immigrant voting patterns).

The Eagleton team is meeting on this, among other topics, tomorrow morning. I'll then consult with our Moritz colleagues and make a few phone calls to identify the best candidates from Mississippi and put together a recommendation for you.

Your reaction to this plan as it takes shape would be welcome.

Subject Re: Arrangements for June 30 Meeting

Tom,

The following answers, I hope, your questions. I am happy to discuss this further.

1. Does the EAC have a preference for a venue for the meeting? Have any arrangements --preliminary or otherwise-- been made to secure that facility? If not, I assume EAC would prefer a public building or an academic setting such as the auditorium you used at the law school in Columbus.

EAC has a meeting location for this meeting and the hearing that will follow. The meeting and hearing will be held at the Marriot Marquis Hotel. I will have staff provide the address and room.

2. Has the EAC made arrangements for a transcriber to record the meeting of the Commissioners? If so, is it the EAC's intention that we will use the same transcriber for the panel? If not, should we arrange for a transcriber for the entire day? Are there federal rules on payments for transcription services that we should follow?

While EAC has not yet made arrangements for a transcriber, we will as we will need one for the meeting and the hearing.

3. Will EAC support staff attend the hearing to sign in those attending, issue name tags, etc., or are these duties that we should be prepared to carry out?

Yes, EAC will have staff available for this function.

4. Will the EAC issue the news release about the meeting and the panel?

Yes.

5. What do federal regulation indicate that I may offer speakers we bring in from these states in terms of travel, accommodations, meals, etc? Will speakers have to pay for their travel and accommodations and then request reimbursement or can we pay their bills directly?

Federal travel regulations apply. However, once you have made recommendations on panelists and the Commission has approved those panelists, we will take care of their travel arrangements and accommodations.

Arizona, California, Mississippi, Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin.

I can imagine that the Commission will not want to use Arizona. There is a great deal of controversy around some proposed legislation that was introduced and passed by the Arizona legislature last year. EAC has not yet taken a position on that controversy, but may. Until such time as EAC has formalized its opinion on this, EAC will not want to invite a public debate on this issue.

008458

I will call you later to discuss any questions or concerns. I am in a meeting from 1 - 3 (EDT)

Subject Arrangements for June 30 Meeting

Julie,

Karen Lynn-Dyson suggested I consult directly with you about arrangements for the Commission's June 30 meeting in New York. As I understood our discussions in Washington last week, as your consultants we will be responsible for organizing the portion of the meeting that will cover the Voter Identification issue, while EAC staff will organize the regular meeting of the Commissioners. Is that understanding correct?

Because time is short, we know we must move quickly on the arrangements.

1. Does the EAC have a preference for a venue for the meeting? Have any arrangements --preliminary or otherwise-- been made to secure that facility? If not, I assume EAC would prefer a public building or an academic setting such as the auditorium you used at the law school in Columbus.
2. Has the EAC made arrangements for a transcriber to record the meeting of the Commissioners? If so, is it the EAC's intention that we will use the same transcriber for the panel? If not, should we arrange for a transcriber for the entire day? Are there federal rules on payments for transcription services that we should follow?
3. Will EAC support staff attend the hearing to sign in those attending, issue name tags, etc., or are these duties that we should be prepared to carry out?
4. Will the EAC issue the news release about the meeting and the panel?
5. What do federal regulation indicate that I may offer speakers we bring in from these states in terms of travel, accommodations, meals, etc? Will speakers have to pay for their travel and accommodations and then request reimbursement or can we pay their bills directly?

These are the states we are currently evaluating for the Voter ID presentations: Arizona, California, Mississippi, Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin. We may pick 4 of these, or fewer if we determine that one state should have two panelists representing different viewpoints: Karen tells me you have been working with several of these, and your counsel would sharpen the judgment we bring to bear on our selection. I am particularly interested in the Mississippi experience and would like to discuss that with you. . .perhaps by phone. The project team is aiming to agree on a panel of speakers to submit to the the EAC early next week. Panelists should receive their invitations at least two weeks in advance (more would be better), especially if we want to get onto their schedules.

I will be in a meeting tomorrow from 10:30 -- 1:00 p.m. but will be available the rest of the day for a phone conversation. My cell phone --on which you can always reach me-- is 908-794-1030.

As you know, I am well aware that the research Job and I produced belongs to the EAC. Nonetheless, I was wondering whether there might be some way I can use just the Nexis material solely for my own further research purposes. Anything I might publish using that underlying data as enhanced by my further research would be in my name and my name only, not that of the EAC. I put a tremendous amount of work into collecting and organizing that data and I would like the opportunity to continue this research on an ongoing basis. It would be a shame if it was not put to some further use.

Subject Voter ID, Fraud & Intimidation--Need your input

Hello all,

A columnist from the WaPo has asked for info about both the voter ID and the fraud and intimidation reports. This was prompted by the accusation that the president was concerned that the fired prosecutors were not aggressively pursuing voter fraud cases. She had heard that we were refusing to release this information, so I am trying to demonstrate otherwise, as well as show that we have discussed these projects numerous times in public meetings. Please take a look at my draft email to her and let me know if you have any suggestions. She needs to hear back from me by 4 p.m. Thanks for your help with this.

Ms. Cocco,

Per your questions, go here to view the testimony regarding voter ID from our Feb. 2 public meeting. As I mentioned, at this meeting EAC Chair Donetta Davidson requested that staff review the initial research provided by Eagleton and produce a final report, which would include recommendations for further study on this subject. Currently, staff is working to finalize the voter ID report.

Regarding the voter fraud and intimidation research, at a May 2006 public meeting of our Standards Board and Board of Advisors, the EAC project manager for this research presented a staff update on the project. Go here to view the agenda, page 3. The document you referred to was the update the project manager gave at this public meeting, and it has been made available to anyone who asked for it. The final culmination of this project can be found here, and links to the attachments provided by the consultants are available by going to page 24 of this report. The commissioners adopted this report at a public meeting in Dec. 2006.

As a small agency of 23 employees, including the four commissioners, it is necessary for the agency to contract with consultants to gather the initial data for these projects. After EAC receives the initial data, the agency reviews the data for accuracy and then releases a final report.

Subject Media inquiry RE: fraud research

Hello everyone,

Brian Friel of the National Journal has posed the following questions regarding the fraud report. Since we know this is something everyone on the Hill will definitely read, I want to make sure everyone agrees with these responses. I need to get this info to him by noon tomorrow.

Tom -- do you want me to run this language by the commissioners?

1. Are there any plans to release voter fraud report since several groups have called for its release; or if there is some procedure that would be necessary for EAC to determine that it should be released? The status report created by EAC staff was presented to EAC's Board of Advisors and Standards Board to provide an update on the research project. This meeting was open to the public. As a small agency of only 23 employees, including four commissioners, it is necessary for EAC to contract with third parties and experts to conduct research. The information provided by third parties is used by staff to develop EAC final policy or reports. No documents, drafts, or recommendations presented to EAC by third parties constitute official EAC policy. Currently, EAC staff is reviewing the data presented regarding voter fraud and intimidation and will produce a final report in the near future.

Is the fourth position still vacant and does this impact the decision for release of the report. There is a vacancy on the commission, but the vacancy has not impacted the timeline for releasing the fraud report.

EAC Releases Findings of Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Study
No consensus on the regularity of voting fraud and voting intimidation found
Agency accepts recommendations to conduct a comprehensive study on elections crimes

WASHINGTON, D.C. (December 5, 2006) – The United States Election Assistance Commission (EAC) today voted on the findings of the “Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Study” and accepted recommendations to conduct a comprehensive assessment of all claims, charges and prosecutions of voting crimes.

The study, which was largely based on anecdotal information was reviewed and analyzed by two independent research consultants, represents the first phase of the information gathering process. The second phase, which the EAC voted to proceed with, is a more comprehensive data-driven survey and study of elections crimes and voter intimidation and will also offer consistency to the study and the public dialogue of the issue identifying a common definition of the issue for the use of elections officials, civil rights and voter advocacy groups, law enforcement officials and attorneys.

The recommendations accepted by EAC today include:

- Survey Chief Elections Officers to Review and Assess Administrative Complaints: EAC will survey the states’ chief election officers regarding complaints that have been filed, investigated and resolved since January 1, 2004.
- Survey State Election Crime Investigation Units Regarding Complaints Filed and Referred: EAC will gather information on the numbers and types of complaints that have been received by, investigated, and ultimately referred to local or state law enforcement by election crime investigation units since January 1, 2004.
- Survey Law Enforcement and Prosecutorial Agencies Regarding Complaints and Charge of Voting Crimes: EAC will survey law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies at the local, state and federal level to determine the number and types of complaints, charges, or indictments, and pleas or convictions of election crimes since January 1, 2004.
- Analyze Survey Data in Light of State Laws and Procedures: EAC will use the reliable data gathered from each survey group to analyze the effectiveness of fraud prevention and reporting measures.

In order to arrive at the findings, EAC consultants reviewed existing studies, articles, reports and case law on voting fraud and intimidation and conducted interviews with experts in the field regarding their experiences and research. According to the findings, while there is currently no consensus on the frequency of voting fraud and voter intimidation, most participants agreed that absentee balloting is subject to the greatest proportion of fraudulent acts, followed by vote buying and voter registration fraud.

Following today’s vote to approve the survey recommendations, EAC will work to complete a comprehensive survey and subsequent study on voting fraud and voter intimidation based on hard data by the end of 2007. Additionally, by mid-2008, EAC will develop a set of voluntary best practices for state election officials and prosecuting authorities to use in assessing legitimate claims and bringing them to justice.

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) mandates that EAC research and study various issues related to the administration of elections. During Fiscal Year 2006, EAC in consultation with the Standards Board and Board of Advisors selected voting fraud and voter intimidation from a list of potential research topics that serve to improve the administration of elections for federal office.

EAC is an independent bipartisan commission created by HAVA. It is charged with administering payments to states and developing guidance to meet HAVA requirements, implementing election administration improvements, adopting voluntary voting system guidelines and serving as a national clearinghouse and resource of information regarding election administration. The EAC commissioners are Paul DeGregorio, chairman; Donetta Davidson and Gracia Hillman.

I don't know that we can say that EAC will produce a report on the subject in the near future. We will have the consultants' report to EAC, which I don't believe constitutes an EAC report/statement. The consultants' report never was intended to be the definitive study of voting fraud/voter intimidation that the news media and others seem to be seeking. One of the primary goals of the report was to provide recommendations for future EAC action/direction of study. In order to do this, the consultants did some preliminary research to get an idea of what problems were occurring. I don't know how soon EAC will decide which recommendations, if any, to pursue. --- Peggy

Dear Mr. Wilkey:

I want to follow up with you about the reports the Eagleton Institute of Politics and Moritz College of Law have submitted on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification. As you know, your office has accepted them as the final work products required under our contract with the EAC.

With the new academic year about to begin, we want now to make the two reports available for use by researchers, legislators, election officials, and others interested in these topics. We have already received requests for them from other researchers who are interested in reviewing our findings for their own work. Also, at both Eagleton and the Moritz College of Law, we intend to draw on this research for teaching, scholarship and possibly public seminars. That the EAC originally commissioned these studies to offer lessons for the 2006 elections based on experience in 2004 further supports the importance of quick action.

As we noted in our June 29th submission of the final reports, we would of course prefer that notice of their availability be issued jointly by the EAC, Rutgers, and Ohio State. If, however, the Commission would rather not proceed in that direction, then the two universities will work on our own to make the reports publicly available.

I would appreciate it if you would give me a call this week or next at the latest to discuss the best way to move forward.

Sincerely,

John Weingart, Associate Director

June 8, 2006

Dear Chairman DeGregorio:

Karen Lynn-Dyson relayed the Commission's decision in your meeting of June 1 to take more time to consider how to proceed with the delivery of EAC research reports on provisional voting and voter identification.

The Eagleton-Moritz research team, of course, encourages the Commission's thoughtful consideration of the two reports, but we are mindful of the need to deliver revised documents that respond to the Commission's comments by the close of our contract on June 30th. We believe that if we receive the Commission's final comments on the Provisional Voting report by June 19 we will be able to complete any additional work that the Commission might request and incorporate the results in our final reports before the end of the contract period.

Based on suggestions raised at the meetings, we already plan to supplement the Provisional Voting report with some brief, additional information about the influence of the fail-safe ballot provisions of the National Voting Rights Act on the experience with provisional voting in 2004.

We understand that the Commission must submit the final draft Voter ID report to the same review process by your advisory boards as was followed with the Provisional Voting paper. We understand that step is a prerequisite for wider release. We would appreciate your advice on how to handle this review, given the rapidly approaching end of our contract.

We hope the commission will use both reports, as intended from the outset of this project, as the basis for recommendations for better, if not best, practices to the states. If the Commission cannot decide to issue such recommendations to the states, we hope it will promptly release the reports to provide the states and the broader elections community with this information, analysis and perspective on the issues.

We recognize, based on the reactions at the meetings of the Standards Board and, particularly, the Board of Advisors, that some of the findings, conclusions, and recommendations of the reports will be controversial with some of the Commission's constituencies. But we also believe, based on the comments of the Peer Review Group, the advisors assembled by the Commission, and our response to their critiques, that the reports are grounded on solid research by a well-qualified, nonpartisan team and that the reports will provide new information for the policy process. We believe this information will contribute to achieving the EAC mission of providing helpful information that the states may or may not choose to implement.

The information in the reports can improve the policy process by raising the level of debate over increasingly volatile issues related to election administration. We believe our reports will prove useful to the states as they complete preparations for the 2006 elections. Moreover, the elections community is aware of this work, and awaits the analysis and conclusions.

Hello everyone,
I am trying to get my arms around exactly what information from either the Eagleton voter ID or provisional voting report was sent from this office to outside parties. Please note that I have had several FOIA requests for both reports, so I need to know exactly what has been released to make sure that I have responded to these requests accurately. In other words, I want to make sure that I have not refused to provide data or information that has been provided to third parties. If you do not find any records regarding this request, please respond to this email "no records found." Thank you.

John Weingart
Associate Director
Eagleton Institute of Politics
Rutgers University

New Brunswick, NJ

Dear Mr. Weingart:

Thank you for your recent inquiry of August 16, 2006 regarding the anticipated release of data contained in the Eagleton Institute of Politics and Moritz College of Law studies on provisional voting and voter identification, which were conducted for the U.S. Election Assistance Commission.

As you note in your letter, with the upcoming 2006 elections, election officials could benefit from information, which the EAC could provide, regarding provisional balloting and voter identification processes and procedures. Realizing the importance of providing this information the Commission anticipates releasing its report on provisional voting within the next several weeks. However, in light of ongoing litigation surrounding the topic of voter identification and its impact on the voting process, the Commission does not anticipate releasing a research report, at this time, regarding voter identification processes and their possible impact on voter turnout.

The body of the EAC provisional voting report will contain a series of recommendations for sound practices to be used in the provisional voting process. The information will be drawn from the recommendations and summaries provided in the final Eagleton report. A review by EAC found that the information contained in the state summaries section of the Eagleton provisional voting report was not completely accurate and would require a more thorough review and vetting process by states. Therefore, this information will not be contained in the EAC report. The information contained in the case law section of the Eagleton report will be captured in the information to be provided in EAC's online legal clearinghouse.

I hope that this clarifies how the EAC will be proceeding with the information and research which Eagleton performed related to its contract with the EAC.

Sincerely,

Thomas Wilkey
Executive Director

SUBJECT: Peer Review of Eagleton Statistical Analyses
DATE: April 14, 2006

As we've discussed, there are lingering doubts on the part of several Commissioners and EAC staff about the accuracy and validity of the statistical analysis which Eagleton has performed on its voter identification study. Many of Eagleton's conclusions, observations and recommendations rest on this statistical analysis.

A statistical analysis was also performed. Although their conclusions and recommendations are based on statistical analysis and research, they do not rest on findings as they are for the voter identification study.

Before a final Eagleton report on Provisional Voting is issued, the EAC Standards Board and Board of Commissioners should recommend that a small peer review group be convened. A review by a small panel, comprised of 3-4 experts with backgrounds in election research methodologies and statistics, should yield us the validation and verification of the reliability and validity of the Eagleton research, which we are seeking.

I am further recommending that such a panel be convened either telephonically or in person at EAC's offices on May 10 or May 11. In addition to select EAC staff and interested Commissioners, Eagleton's key researchers/statisticians responsible for conducting the research and analysis would be present during the review. Prior to the review panelists would be given background materials describing, in detail, the methodology and analysis used in the provisional voting and voter identification studies.

The peer review panelists which have been recommended to me include:

Jonathan Nagler- NYU
Jan Leighley- University of Arizona
Ben Highton -UC Davis
Adam Berinsky- MIT
Bernard Grofman- UC Irvine

There may be one or two others whom the Commissioners or EAC staff may wish to recommend.

As you will note, the proposed review panel represents a wide geographic diversity. While budgetary constraints might make a one day in-person peer review meeting unrealistic, it is likely to yield a richness of review and exchange that will not be possible through a series of conference calls with the review panel. Such a one-day peer-review meeting is likely to cost in the range of $7,000. This figure would include a small honoraria that would be given to each peer reviewer.

I look forward to your comments and recommendations. Planning for such a review will need to begin as soon as possible.

Subject Revised Voter ID Analysis

Karen,

Attached is Tim Vercellotti's Voter ID analysis revised to use Citizen Voting Age population as the base for turnout calculations and to take account of comments or issues raised by the EAC and our Peer Review Group. This draft is for distribution to the reviewers who will meet by teleconference on May 11, at, we understand, 11:30 a.m.

You are receiving this at the same time that it is being distributed to the ~~Engleton-Moritz team~~ so that the new reviewers will have a week to prepare for our conversation on the 11. Early next week you will receive a revised summary paper on Voter ID that incorporates the new data and findings in Tim's revised analysis. That too will be for distribution to the new reviewers.

Analysis of Effects of Voter Identification Requirements on Turnout

Tim Vercellotti

Eagleton Institute of Politics

May 4, 2006

Introduction

A key area of disagreement in the policy debate over voter identification requirements concerns whether such requirements dampen voter turnout. Opponents of voter identification laws argue that they constitute an institutional barrier to voting, particularly among the poor, African-Americans, Hispanics, the elderly and people with disabilities (Baxter and Galloway 2005, Electionline.org 2002, Jacobs 2005, Young 2006). This argument holds that voter identification requirements create an extra demand on voters, and thus may discourage some of them from participating in elections. Further, critics of voter identification requirements contend that the effect is greater for some specific types of requirements. For example, critics argue that requiring voters to produce government-issued photo identification on Election Day is more demanding than, say, requiring that they state their names at the polling place. Supporters of voter identification requirements, on the other hand, argue that the requirements are necessary to combat voter fraud, safeguard the integrity of the electoral process, and engender faith in the electoral process among citizens (Young 2006).

This report examines the potential variation in turnout rates based on the type of voter identification requirement in place in each state on Election Day 2004. It draws on two sets of data – aggregate turnout data at the county level for each state, as compiled by the Eagleton Institute of Politics, and individual-level survey data included in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau. Classification of voter identification requirements comes from a review of state statutes conducted by the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University.

Types of voter identification requirements

Based on research performed for this study by the Moritz College of Law, states had one of five types of requirements in place on Election Day 2004. Upon arrival at polling places, voters had to: state their names (nine states); sign their names (13 states and the District of Columbia); match their signature to a signature on file with the local election board (eight states); provide a form of identification that did not necessarily include a photo (15 states); or provide a photo identification (five states).<sup>1</sup> It was then possible to code the states according to these requirements, and test the assumption that voter identification requirements would pose an increasingly demanding requirement in this order: stating one's name, signing one's name, matching one's signature to a signature on file, providing a form of identification, and providing a form of photo identification.

Deliberative Process
Privilege

But election laws in numerous states offer exceptions to these requirements if individuals lack the necessary form of identification, and laws in those states set a minimum standard that a voter must meet in order to vote using a regular ballot (as opposed to a provisional ballot). Thus it is also possible to categorize states based on the minimum requirement for voting with a regular ballot. In 2004 the categories were somewhat different compared to the maximum requirement, in that none of the states required photo identification as a minimum standard for voting with a regular ballot. Four states, however, required voters to swear an affidavit as to their identity (Florida, Indiana, Louisiana, and North Dakota). The five categories for minimum requirements were: state name (12 states), sign name (14 states and the District of Columbia), match one's signature to a signature on file (six states), provide a non-photo identification (14 states), or swear an affidavit (four states). For the purposes of this analysis I treated the array of minimum identification requirements also in terms of increasing demand on the voter: state name, sign name, match signature, provide non-photo identification, and, given the potential legal consequences for providing false information, swearing an affidavit.

Estimating turnout among citizens in the voting-age population

This report examines turnout among U.S. citizens of voting age in both the aggregate- and the individual-level data. Determining citizenship status in the individual-level data simply involved restricting the analyses to individuals who identified themselves as citizens in the November 2004 Current Population Survey. (Those who said they were not citizens did not have the opportunity to answer the supplemental voting questions contained in the Current Population Survey.)

In the aggregate data, determining the percentage of the voting-age population that has U.S. citizenship posed a methodological challenge. The Census Bureau gathers information on the citizenship status of adults ages 18 and older only during the decennial census. While the Census Bureau provides annual estimates of the population to account for changes between decennial censuses, the bureau does not offer estimates for the proportion of the adult population who are citizens as part of the annual estimates. To address this issue I estimated the 2004 citizen voting-age population for each county using a method reported in the analysis of the 2004 Election Day Survey conducted for the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (U.S. Election Assistance Commission, 2005). I calculated the percentage of the 2000 voting-age population who were citizens in 2000, and applied that percentage to the July 1, 2004 estimates for voting-age population in each county. In other words, I assumed that the percentage of the voting-age population that had U.S. citizenship in 2004 was similar to the percentage of the voting-age population who were citizens in 2000.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> McDonald and Popkin (2001) recommend an even more stringent approach to voter turnout calculations. They point out that voting-age population estimates include adults who are ineligible to vote (such as convicted felons), and the estimates overlook eligible citizens living overseas. While estimates of the voting-eligible population are available at the state level, I was unable to find such estimates for individual counties, which provide the unit of analysis for the aggregate data analyzed here.

Analysis of aggregate data

If one treats maximum voter identification requirements as an ordinal variable, with photo identification as the most demanding requirement, one finds some statistical support for the premise that as the level of required proof increases, turnout declines. Averaging across counties in each state, statewide turnout is negatively correlated with maximum voter identification requirements ( $r = -.30, p < .0001$ ). In considering the array of minimum requirements, with affidavit as the most demanding requirement, voter identification also is negatively correlated with turnout ( $r = -.20, p < .0001$ ). Breaking down the turnout rates by type of requirement reveals in greater detail the relationship between voter identification requirements and voter turnout.

The aggregate data show that 60.9 percent of the estimated citizen voting age population voted in 2004. Differences in voter turnout at the state level in 2004 varied based on voter identification requirements. Taking into account the maximum requirements, an average of 64.6 percent of the voting age population turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 58.1 percent in states that required photo identification. A similar trend emerged when considering minimum requirements. Sixty-three percent of the voting age population turned out in states requiring voters to state their names, compared to 60.1 percent in states that required an affidavit from voters.

Voter identification requirements alone, however, do not determine voter turnout. Multivariate models that take into account other predictors of turnout can paint a more complete picture of the relationship between voter identification requirements and turnout. I estimated the effects of voter identification requirements in multivariate models that also took into account the electoral context in 2004 and demographic characteristics of the population in each county. I coded the voter identification requirements on a scale of one to five, with one representing the least demanding form of identification and five representing the most demanding form of identification. To capture electoral context I included whether the county was in a presidential battleground state (any state in which the margin of victory for the winning candidate was five percent or less), and whether the county was in a state with a competitive race for governor and/or the U.S. Senate (also using the threshold of a margin of victory of five percent or less). Drawing from U.S. Census projections for 2003, I included the percentage of the voting-age population in each county that was Hispanic or African-American to control for ethnicity and race. I controlled for age using the 2003 Census projection for the percentage of county residents age 65 and older, and I controlled for socioeconomic status by including the percentage of individuals who fell below the poverty line in each county in the 2000 Census.

I estimated a series of random intercept models to account for the likelihood that data from counties were correlated within each state (for further explanation of random intercept and other multilevel models, see Bryk and Raudenbush 1992, Luke 2004, Singer 1998).<sup>3</sup> The dependent variable in each model was voter turnout at the county level, with turnout calculated as the percentage of the estimated citizen voting-age population that voted in the 2004 election.

Turning first to an analysis using the maximum identification requirements, those requirements had a small and negative effect on turnout in 2004 controlling for electoral context and demographic factors. Both contextual factors (whether the county was in a state that was a battleground state and whether that state had a competitive race for governor and/or U.S. Senate) increased voter turnout. As the percentage of senior citizens in the county increased, so did turnout. The percentage of African-Americans in the county exerted a positive effect on voter turnout, and the percentage of individuals living below the poverty line had a negative effect. The effect of the percentage of Hispanic adults in the county on turnout fell just short of statistical significance ( $p = .05$ ).

I then sought to test the hypothesis that voter identification requirements dampen turnout among minorities and the poor, a claim voiced by some critics of the requirements. To test this idea I incorporated a series of interactions between the maximum voter identification requirements and the percentage of African-Americans, Hispanics, and poor individuals in the counties. The interaction involving African-Americans was not significant, but those involving Hispanics and poor individuals were significant.<sup>4</sup> In addition, adding the interactions to the model resulted in the percentage of Hispanics in the population having a direct and negative effect on turnout. The interactions suggest that voter identification requirements have a greater effect for Hispanics and those living below the poverty line. A chi-square test of the difference in the deviance for each model (represented by  $-2 \log$  likelihood in Table 2), shows that the model with interactions provides a better fit to the data ( $p < 0.005$ ).

I also estimated the effects of the minimum voter identification requirements holding constant the effects of electoral context and the demographic variables.

The effects of the minimum requirements fell short of statistical significance ( $p = 0.08$ ). The battleground state variable continued to exert a positive influence on turnout, while the presence of a competitive race for governor and/or U.S. Senate had no statistically significant effect. As in the maximum identification requirement model, as the percentage of the population that is poor increased, turnout declined. As the percentage of elderly increased, so did turnout. The proportion of African-Americans in the population had a positive effect on turnout, while the percentage of Hispanics did not affect turnout.

---

intercept as a predictor generated an intraclass correlation of .43, indicating considerable variation between the states.

<sup>4</sup> The interactions are labeled in Tables 2 and 3 as VID*African-American, VID*Hispanic, and VID*Poverty. To calculate the effects of voter identification requirements for a specific group, one must add the estimates for voter identification, the group, and the interaction. Doing so for Hispanic adults results in an estimate of  $-0.13 [-0.03$  (voter id)  $- 0.13$  (Hispanic)  $+ 0.03$  (voter id X Hispanic)].

Adding interactive effects to the model resulted in a statistically significant and negative effect of minimum voter identification requirements on turnout. The percentage of Hispanic adults in the county had a significant and negative effect on turnout, and the percentage of individuals below the poverty line continued to have a negative effect. Interactions between the percentages of Hispanics and those below the poverty line and minimum voter identification requirements also were significant. The percentage of African-Americans in the county and the interaction between African-Americans and voter identification requirements were not significant. A chi-square test for the difference in fit between the two models showed that the model with interactions provides a better fit to the data ( $p < .025$ ).

Analysis of the aggregate data at the county level generates some support for the hypothesis that as the demands of voter identification requirements increase, turnout declines. This is particularly so for counties with concentrations of Hispanic residents or individuals who live below the poverty line. But aggregate data cannot fully capture the individual demographic factors that may figure into the decision to turn out to vote. For example, previous research has found that education is a powerful determinant of turnout (Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980, but see also Nagler 1991).<sup>5</sup> Married individuals also are more likely to vote than those who are not married (Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002; Alvarez, Nagler and Wilson 2004; Fisher, Kenny, and Morton 1993). To fully explore the effects of voter identification requirements on turnout, it is important to examine individual-level data as well.

Individual-level analysis

Individual-level turnout data exists in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau. The Census Bureau conducts the CPS monthly to measure unemployment and other workforce data, but the bureau adds a battery of voter participation questions to the November survey in even-numbered years to coincide with either a presidential or midterm Congressional election.

One of the advantages of the CPS is the sheer size of the sample. The survey's Voting and Registration Supplement consisted of interviews, either by telephone or in person, with 96,452 respondents.<sup>6</sup> The large sample size permits analyses of smaller groups, such as Black or Hispanic voters or voters with less than a high school education. The analyses reported here are based on reports from self-described registered voters. I omitted those who said they were not registered to vote. I also excluded those who said they cast absentee ballots because the identification requirements for absentee ballots may differ from those required when one votes in person. In addition, I eliminated from the sample respondents who said they were not U.S.

citizens because the questionnaire design skipped those individuals past the voter registration and turnout questions in the survey.

The dependent variable in these analyses is whether a respondent said he or she voted in the November 2004 election.<sup>7</sup> As in the analysis of aggregate data, I coded voter identification requirements for each respondent's state of residence on a scale of one to five, with one representing the least demanding requirement (stating one's name) and five representing the most demanding requirement (photo identification or affidavit).

In addition to the voter identification requirements, the models include two other state-level factors that might have influenced turnout in 2004: whether the state was considered a battleground state in the presidential election, and whether there was a gubernatorial and/or U.S. Senate race in the state (see Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002, Alvarez et al. 2004, and Kenny et al. 1993 for similar approaches). As in the aggregate data analysis, the threshold that determined whether the state was a battleground state or had a competitive statewide race was a margin of victory of five percent or less. At the individual level, I controlled for gender, age in years, education, household income, and dummy variables representing whether a voter was Black/non-Hispanic, Hispanic, or another non-white race (with white/non-Hispanic voters as the omitted category for reference purposes).<sup>8</sup> Drawing on previous research on voting behavior, I also controlled for whether an individual was employed, or at least a member of the workforce (as opposed to being a full-time student, a homemaker, or retired). Both employment and workforce membership have been shown to be positive predictors of turnout (see Mitchell and Wlezien 1995). Marital status, whether one is a native-born citizen and residential mobility also have emerged as significant predictors of turnout (Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002, Alvarez et al. 2004, Kenney et al. 1993, Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980). I included in the model variables for whether a respondent was married (coded 1 if yes, 0 otherwise), and whether one was a native-born citizen (coded 1 if yes, 0 otherwise). I measured residential mobility by coding for whether the respondent had moved to a new address in the six months prior to the interview (coded 1 if yes, 0 otherwise).

Results

The dependent variable is whether a respondent said he or she voted in the November 2004 election (coded 1 for yes, 0 for no). I estimated models using probit analysis, which

<sup>7</sup> The U.S. Census Bureau reported, based on the November 2004 CPS, that 89 percent of those who identified themselves as registered voters said they voted in 2004 (U.S. Census Bureau 2005). Previous research has shown that, generally speaking, some survey respondents overstate their incidence of voting. Researchers speculate that over-reports may be due to the social desirability that accompanies saying one has done his or her civic duty, or a reluctance to appear outside the mainstream of American political culture (U.S. Census Bureau 1990). It is also possible that voting is an indication of civic engagement that predisposes voters to agree to complete surveys at a higher rate than non-voters (Flanigan and Zingale 2002). Hence the voter turnout rates reported in the CPS tend to be up to 10 percentage points higher than the actual turnout rate for the nation (Flanigan and Zingale 2002). Even with this caveat, however, the CPS serves as a widely accepted source of data on voting behavior.

<sup>8</sup> Asian-Americans are included in the "other non-white races" category. In response to a request from officials at the U.S. Election Assistance Commission who had read an earlier version of this paper and were curious about the experiences of Asian-Americans, I ran models using Asian-Americans as a separate category in addition to the models presented here. Voter identification requirements did not have a statistically significant effect on whether Asian-American voters said they turned out in the 2004 election.

calculates the effects of independent variables on the probability that an event occurred -- in this case whether a respondent said he or she voted. I estimated the models using robust standard errors to control for correlated error terms for observations from within the same state.

The two models in Table 4 use either the maximum or minimum voter identification requirements in each state. The two models generate virtually identical results. Voter identification requirements exert a statistically significant, negative effect on whether survey respondents said they had voted in 2004. Of the other state factors, only the competitiveness of the presidential race had a significant effect on turnout. In terms of demographic influences, African-American voters were more likely than white voters to say they had cast a ballot, while those of other non-white races were less likely than white voters to say they had turned out. Hispanic voters were not statistically different from white voters in terms of reported turnout. Consistent with previous research, age, education, income, and marital status all were positive predictors of voting. Women also were more likely to say they voted than men. Those who had moved within six months before the interview were less likely to say they had voted.

While the probit models provide statistical support for the influence of voter identification requirements and other variables on turnout, probit coefficients do not lend themselves to intuitive interpretation. Another common approach in studies of election requirements is to examine how the predicted probability of voter turnout would vary as election requirements vary. I used the probit coefficients to calculate the predicted probability of voting at each level of voter identification requirements while holding all other independent variables in the models at their means.<sup>9</sup> I calculated the probabilities taking into account both maximum and minimum requirements, with photo identification serving as the most demanding of the maximum requirements and affidavits as the most demanding minimum requirement.

Allowing the voter identification requirement to vary while holding constant all other variables in the model showed that the predicted probability of turnout ranged from 0.912 for stating one's name to 0.887 for photo identification under the maximum requirements. In other words, the probability of voting dropped with each level of voter identification requirement, with a total drop of .025, or 2.5 percent, across the five types of identification.<sup>10</sup> When taking into account the minimum requirement for identification, the probability showed a similar decline, with a slightly larger total drop of 3.3 percent.

Among the key variables of interest in the debate over voter identification requirements are race, age, income, and education. Given the large sample size (54,973 registered voters), it

<sup>10</sup> The voter turnout percentages may seem disproportionately high compared to the turnout rates reported in the aggregate data analysis. It is important to consider that the turnout rates in the aggregate data were a proportion of all citizens of voting-age population, while the turnout rates for the individual-level data are the proportion of only registered voters who said they voted.

was possible to break the sample into sub-samples along those demographic lines to explore variation in predicted probability by group. I disaggregated the sample by the variable of interest, omitting that variable while I re-ran the probit model with the remaining predictors of voter turnout, including the voter identification requirements.<sup>11</sup> If the analysis showed that the voter identification requirements had a statistically significant effect on turnout, I used the probit coefficients from the model to calculate the predicted probability of voting for each group across the five requirements while holding the other variables in the model constant.

Both the maximum and minimum identification requirements had negative and statistically significant effects for White/Non-Hispanic voters. Allowing the requirements to vary from stating one's name to providing photo identification or an affidavit showed drops of 2.5 percent and 3.2 percent respectively in the predicted probability of voting. The identification requirements had no effect on the probability of Black/Non-Hispanics voting, but the minimum identification requirements had a comparatively sizable effect on voter turnout among Hispanics. The predicted probability of Hispanics voting ranged from 87 percent if stating one's name was the required form of identification to 77.3 percent if a voter would have to provide an affidavit in order to vote, a difference of 9.7 percent.

The effects of voter identification requirements also varied by age, with the greatest variation occurring among voters ages 18 to 24.

Voters in that age group had a predicted probability of 83.9 percent when the maximum requirement was stating one's name, and the probability dropped 8.9 percentage points if voters would have to provide photo identification. The range was from 83.1 percent to 75.4 percent under the minimum requirements. The gap in probability narrowed in older age groups (4.8 percent for the maximum requirements and 5.8 percent for the minimum requirements for those ages 25 to 44; 1.8 percent for the minimum requirements for those ages 45 to 64, and 2.4 percent for the minimum requirements for those ages 65 and older).

Breaking down the 18- to 24-year-old age group by race shed additional light on the effects of voter identification requirements on specific groups.

[Table 8 here]

The gap in predicted probability that White/Non-Hispanic voters in the 18- to 24-year-old category would turn out was 9.2 percent when the identification requirements varied from stating one's name to providing photo identification. The gap was 7.8 percent when taking into account the minimum requirements. The effects of maximum voter identification requirements also were statistically significant for African-Americans in the 18- to 24-year-old age group, with a gap in the predicted probability of voting of 10.6 percent. Maximum and minimum voter identification requirements were not a significant predictor of voting among Hispanics ages 18 to 24.

Variation also emerged along the lines of income, with the effects of voter identification requirements varying to a greater extent for voters in households below the poverty line compared to those living above the poverty line.<sup>12</sup>

While the maximum set of requirements did not have a statistically significant effect for voters living below the poverty line, the minimum set of requirements had a significant and negative effect. The probability of voting was .784 for poor voters if they would have to identify themselves by giving their name, and the probability declined to .731 if they would have to provide an affidavit attesting to their identity. Both the maximum and minimum sets of requirements had a significant and negative effect on voters living above the poverty line, but the difference in probability across the effects was narrower (2.3 percent for the maximum requirements and 3.1 percent for the minimum requirements). Given that political discourse about voter identification requirements includes concerns about the effects of the requirements on poor and minority voters, I also ran probit analyses for sub-samples of white and minority voters who fell below the poverty line. The voter identification requirements did not exert statistically significant effects on turnout among poor White/Non-Hispanic and Hispanic voters, but did have a significant effect on Black/Non-Hispanic voters who were below the poverty line.<sup>13</sup> Allowing the maximum voting requirement to vary from the least to the most demanding, the probability that African-American voters below the poverty line said they had voted dropped by 7.5 percent.

The effects of voter identification requirements varied across education levels as well, with those lowest in education demonstrating the widest variation in probabilities as identification requirements ranged from least to most demanding.

Registered voters who had less than a high school education had a 77.5 percent probability of voting if the maximum requirement would be stating one's name, and a 70.8 percent probability if they would have to provide photo identification under the maximum requirement, a difference of 6.7 percent. The difference from the lowest to the highest requirement among the minimum requirements was 7.4 percent. The difference in probabilities ranged from 3.3 percent for the maximum requirements to 4.5 percent for the minimum requirements for voters with a high school diploma. The range of effects of voter identification requirements was smaller among those with higher levels of education (and non-existent for one category – voters with some college education).

<sup>13</sup> The lack of significant effects for poor Hispanic voters is in contrast to the results from the aggregate data analysis. The sub-sample of poor Hispanic voters was small (n = 491), which may have contributed to the lack of statistical significance.

Discussion and conclusion

The results presented here provide evidence that as the level of demand associated with voter identification requirements increases, voter turnout declines. This point emerged from both the aggregate data and the individual-level data, although not always for both the maximum and minimum sets of requirements. The overall effect for all registered voters was fairly small, but still statistically significant.

The effects of voter identification requirements were more pronounced for specific subgroups. Hispanic voters and the poor appeared to be less likely to vote as the level of required identification became more demanding, according to both the aggregate and the individual-level data. In the individual-level data, for Hispanic voters, the probability of voting dropped by 9.7 percent across the various levels of minimum identification requirements. Survey respondents living in poor households were 5.3 percent less likely to vote as the requirements varied from stating one's name to attesting to one's identity in an affidavit. African-American voters from households below the poverty line were 7.5 percent less likely to vote as the maximum requirements varied from stating one's name to providing photo identification.

Effects of voter requirements also varied with education. Registered voters who had not graduated from high school were 6.7 percent less likely to say they voted as the maximum requirements ranged from stating one's name to providing photo identification. When considering the minimum requirements, those with less than a high school education were 7.4 percent less likely to say they voted if the requirement was an affidavit as opposed to stating one's name. Age was also a key factor, with voters ages 18 to 24 being 7.7 percent to 8.9 percent less likely to vote as the requirements ranged from stating one's name to providing a photo identification or affidavit. Breaking down the age group by race, the effects were significant for young White/Non-Hispanic and Black/Non-Hispanic voters.

The results shed additional light on the effects of voter identification requirements on two groups often projected as being particularly sensitive to such requirements: African-American voters and elderly voters. The effects on African-American voters were pronounced for two specific sub-samples: African-American voters living below the poverty line and those in the 18- to 24-year-old age group. Also, the elderly, while they would be slightly less likely to vote as requirements ranged from least to most demanding, would not necessarily be affected in the dramatic manner predicted by some opposed to photo identification requirements in particular.

In examining the effects of voter identification requirements on turnout, there is still much to learn. The data examined in this project could not capture the dynamics of how identification requirements might lower turnout. If these requirements dampen turnout, is it because individuals are aware of the requirements and stay away from the polls because they cannot or do not want to meet the requirements?<sup>14</sup> Or, do the requirements result in some voters

<sup>14</sup> The individual-level data offer some insight here. If advance knowledge of the voter identification requirements were to dampen turnout, it is reasonable to expect that advance knowledge of those requirements also could discourage some individuals from registering to vote. I ran the same probit models using voter registration as the dependent variable (coded 1 if the respondent said he or she was registered, and 0 if the respondent was not being turned away when they cannot meet the requirements on Election Day? The CPS data do not include measures that can answer this question. Knowing more about the "on the ground" experiences of voters concerning identification requirements could guide policy-makers at the state and local level in determining whether and at what point in the electoral cycle a concerted public information campaign might be most effective in helping voters to meet identification requirements. Such knowledge also could help in designing training for election judges to handle questions about, and potential disputes over, voter identification requirements.

U. S. ELECTION ASSISTANCE COMMISSION
OFFICE OF THE EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR
1225 New York Avenue, NW, Suite 1100
Washington, DC. 20005

June 15, 2006

John Weingart, Associate Director
Eagleton Institute of Politics
Rutgers University
191 Ryders Lane
New Brunswick NJ 08901-8557

Dear Mr. Weingart:

During a recent briefing by staff, the EAC discussed and reviewed possible next steps with the provisional voting and voter identification studies as well as the Eagleton contract which is scheduled to conclude on June 30, 2006.

We were in agreement that Eagleton's work on the EAC contract should conclude, as scheduled, by June 30, 2006. In preparation for this conclusion, the EAC requests that the comments and suggestions which were noted during the EAC's recent Board of Advisors and Standards Boards meeting (and were described in Mr. O'Neil's June 8, 2006 letter to Chairman DeGregorio) be included in the final draft report on provisional voting which Eagleton will deliver to the EAC on or about June 30, 2006. The Commissioners have determined that they will take this final draft report and, from it, may develop guidance and best practice recommendations that will be presented to the Board of Advisors and Standards Boards for further review.

The EAC Commissioners have also reviewed and considered next steps with the voter identification draft report which Eagleton has prepared. While the final disposition of the results and findings of this study, on the part of the EAC, are still unclear, the Commissioners have asked that the final draft report of this study also be prepared and submitted to the EAC not later than June 30, 2006.

We look forward to receiving these reports. On behalf of the EAC thank you for the considerable time and energy which the Eagleton/Moritz team has devoted to these critical election issues.

Sincerely,

Mr. Weingart:

On June 30, 2006, your contract with the U.S. Election Assistance Commission, Research Assistance for the Development of Voluntary Guidance on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification procedures, is scheduled to conclude. In the process of closing out this contract and completing the paperwork related to it EAC staff have noted several items related to the contract's deliverables.

Our records indicate that while Eagleton has submitted drafts of its provisional voting and voter identification study reports, formal monthly reports have not been submitted for the months of April and May, 2006. In addition to the submission of these reports, EAC anticipates that a final June monthly report will be delivered by Eagleton two weeks after the contract's conclusion.

EAC has, under the termination for convenience clause of its contract with Rutgers University, and, in the best interest of the Government, elected to terminate the portions of the contract which required the Eagleton Institute of Politics/Moritz School of Law to develop guidance on provisional voting and on voter identification and to hold public hearings related to each of these topics (sections 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.13, 3.14, 3.15 and 3.16 of the contract).

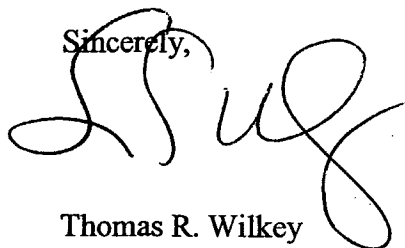

It is EAC's understanding that Rutgers University has not invoiced EAC for the activities and services related to these project deliverables. EAC staff have reviewed the invoices for this contract and have noted that invoices for the months of May and June are outstanding. It is anticipated that EAC will be in receipt of this final contract invoices within the next thirty days.

Should you have any questions or concerns regarding the close-out of this EAC contract, please do not hesitate to contact me at 202-566-3100.

Again, on behalf of EAC, thank you for the valuable research you and your staff have provide for these critical and timely election topics.

RE: October 16, 2006 Letter

Dear Congressman Holt:

Your letter of October 16, 2006 requests the release of EAC's Voter Fraud and Intimidation Report. I would like to take this opportunity to clarify the purpose and status of this study.

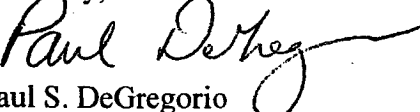

In late 2005, EAC hired two consultants for the purpose of assisting EAC with two things: 1) developing a uniform definition of the phrase voter fraud, and 2) making recommendations on how to further study the existence, prosecution, and means of deterring such voter fraud. In May 2006, a status report on this study was given to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors during their public meetings. During the same week, a working group convened to react to and provide comment on the progress and potential conclusions that could be reached from the work of the two consultants.

The conversation at the working group meeting was lively on the very points that we were trying to accomplish as a part of this study, namely what is voter fraud and how do we pursue studying it. Many of the proposed conclusions that were suggested by the consultants were challenged by the working group members. As such, the consultants were tasked with reviewing the concerns expressed at the working group meeting, conducting additional research as necessary, and providing a draft report to EAC that took into account the working group's concerns and issues.

That draft report is currently being vetted by EAC staff. EAC will release a final report from this study after it has conducted a review of the draft provided by the consultants. However, it is important to remember the purpose of this study -- finding a uniform definition of voter fraud and making recommendations on how to study the existence, prosecution and deterrence of voter fraud -- as it will serve as the basis of the EAC report on this study.

Thank you for your letter. You can be assured that as soon as a final report on the fraud and intimidation study is available, a copy will be made available to the public.

Sincerely,

Paul S. DeGregorio
Chairman

Dear Mr. <sup>T</sup>Wilkey:

I want to follow up with you about the reports the Eagleton Institute of Politics and Moritz College of Law have submitted on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification. As you know, your office has accepted them as the final work products required under our contract with the EAC.

With the new academic year about to begin, we want now to make the two reports available for use by researchers, legislators, election officials, and others interested in these topics. We have already received requests for them from other researchers who are interested in reviewing our findings for their own work. Also, at both Eagleton and the Moritz College of Law, we intend to draw on this research for teaching, scholarship and possibly public seminars. That the EAC originally commissioned these studies to offer lessons for the 2006 elections based on experience in 2004 further supports the importance of quick action.

As we noted in our June 29th submission of the final reports, we would of course prefer that notice of their availability be issued jointly by the EAC, Rutgers, and Ohio State. If, however, the Commission would rather not proceed in that direction, then the two universities will work on our own to make the reports publicly available.

I would appreciate it if you would give me a call this week or next at the latest to discuss the best way to move forward.

Sincerely,

John Weingart, Associate Director

Dear Mr. Weingart:

Thank you for your recent inquiry of August 16, 2006 regarding the anticipated release of data contained in the Eagleton Institute of Politics and Moritz College of Law studies on provisional voting and voter identification, which were conducted for the U.S. Election Assistance Commission.

While your assertion that election officials could benefit from the data compiled in the course of your research may be true, I would urge Eagleton and Moritz to exercise caution in the release of this information without further work to ensure its accuracy and completeness. Eagleton and Moritz received information from several election officials at the Standards Board and Board of Advisors meetings that information contained in the data set and draft report are inaccurate or incomplete. Furthermore, as you will recall, EAC accepted the report based on your data in "draft" due to our concerns about the data and the analysis of that data. In light of those concerns, EAC has not yet completed its review of the "draft" report and has not made final determinations on the release of any future document based on that data and draft report.

As such, you may release the data gathered by Eagleton or Moritz; however this data may not be released in conjunction with or using EAC's name as endorsing the content, quality or veracity of such data. You may not release the draft report that you provided the EAC under contract as this report has not been finalized and has not been officially released EAC. Release of draft reports prior to final action by EAC will only serve to foster confusion and defeat the purpose of the contract for which Eagleton/Moritz was hired. I trust that this clarifies how Eagleton and Moritz may use the data gathered in the performance of its contract with the EAC. If you have any questions, please feel free to contact me.

Sincerely,

Dear Tom:

Thank you for your response to my August 16th letter.

First, we appreciate the EAC's recognition that, apart from the two reports themselves, we may go forward now as scholars and academic institutions with the use of the research we conducted to prepare the reports, including data we collected and analyzed, for purposes of teaching, additional research, and dissemination to other scholars and colleagues at other academic institutions. We will honor your request that we not attribute the EAC's endorsement to this research and thus, insofar as future scholarly activity undertaken by Eagleton or Moritz refers to research conducted pursuant to our work for the EAC, we will note this research does not purport to represent the views of the EAC.

Second, as for the reports themselves, we continue to look forward to their public release in one of two ways: (a) either as reports of the EAC itself, prepared by the Eagleton-Moritz team; or (b) as Eagleton-Moritz reports prepared and received by the EAC, but without the EAC's endorsement or ratification. We need the EAC to quickly resolve which of these two alternatives it prefers. While we of course would welcome the choice of the first alternative, we do not feel it is necessary to achieve much of the purpose of this project, which was to provide information and analysis to the EAC, its stakeholder constituencies, and the public at large, which the EAC itself would be free to use to whatever extent it wishes it preparing advisories to the states and pursuing other policy objectives. These purposes could be achieved by the EAC simply releasing the reports with the disclaimer that that they do not reflect the EAC's views but rather serve as the basis for further public discussion of the issues addressed therein. Indeed, we think any further delay in the release of these reports will serve to defeat the project's purposes.

Therefore, we would be happy to discuss if there is anything we can do to facilitate a speedy determination of which alternative the EAC would like to adopt for the release of these reports.

I look forward to your response as quickly as possible. Please don't hesitate to call me to discuss these issues if that would be helpful.

Sincerely,

Ms. Wendy R. Weiser

New York, NY 10013

Dear Ms. Weiser:

Thank you for your request for information regarding U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) research projects on voter fraud and voter intimidation, provisional ballots and voter identification.

The status report on voter fraud and voter intimidation, prepared by EAC staff, and the draft report on provisional voting, prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics and the Moritz College of Law, are enclosed. EAC personnel are in the process of drafting a report about voter identification. The report will be made available upon completion.

Status documents about voter fraud and voter intimidation and provisional voting were presented to the EAC's Standards Board and Board of Advisors at a public meeting held in May 2006. Neither of these documents were final EAC reports. Per the Help America Vote Act (HAVA), the EAC works with its advisory boards to gather input on activities, including research projects. After discussing the provisional voting research with our advisory boards, they requested further research and clarification and noted that some of information was inaccurate or incomplete. Please see the attached resolutions passed by both entities outlining their concerns. As such, EAC is currently reviewing the draft report on provisional voting to address the concerns of the agency's advisory boards.

As a small agency of only 23 employees, including four commissioners, it is necessary for EAC to contract with third parties and experts to conduct research. The information provided by third parties is used by staff to develop EAC final policy or reports. No documents, drafts or third party recommendations submitted to EAC constitute official EAC policy or opinion and should not be identified or referred to as such.

Please note that our Standards Board and Advisory Board meetings are open to the public and are publicized on the EAC website at www.eac.gov and posted in the Federal Register.

Thank you for your interest, and let us know if we can be of further assistance.

Sincerely,

INTRODUCTION

LEGAL AUTHORITY

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

IMPETUS FOR AND FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority. In September 2005, the Commission hired two consultants with expertise on these subject matters (Job Serebrov and Tova Wang) to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;
- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

PROJECT WORKING GROUP

Consultants and EAC worked together to select members for the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group that included election officials and representatives of advocacy groups and the legal community who have an interest and expertise in the subject matter. (See Attachment A for a list of members.)

The Working Group is scheduled to meet at EAC offices on May 18, 2006 to consider the results of the preliminary research and to offer ideas for future EAC activities concerning this subject.

DEFINITION OF ELECTION FRAUD

The consultants drafted a definition of election fraud that includes numerous aspects of voting fraud (including voter intimidation, which is considered a subset of voting fraud), but excluding campaign finance violations and election administration mistakes. This draft will be discussed by the Working Group and probably refined.

LITERATURE REVIEW

The consultants found many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. They found little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud appears to be the report written by Lori Minnite, entitled "Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud". The most systematic look at voter intimidation appears to be the report by Laughlin McDonald, entitled "The New Poll Tax". Books written about this subject seem to all have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Moreover, reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund's frequently cited book, "Stealing Elections". Again, this is something that it is hoped will be addressed in the "second phase" of this EAC project by doing follow up research on allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles.

Consultants found that researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists. Consultants suggest that this gap will be filled in the "second phase" of this EAC project.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate, but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.
- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

INTERVIEWS

The consultants jointly selected experts from ???

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.
- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, "dead" voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud, although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.
- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.
- Several people indicate – including representatives from DOJ -- that for various reasons, the Department of Justice is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now and is focusing on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting and felon voting. While the civil rights section continues to focus on systemic patterns of malfeasance, the public integrity section is focusing now on individuals, on isolated instances of fraud.

- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed
- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.
  - With respect to the civil rights section, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one's definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and the section has not pursued any such cases.
  - Craig Donsanto of the public integrity section says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases the department is investigating and the number of indictments the section is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, the department has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so it can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.

- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment
- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama's "deceptive practices" bill.
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected nonpartisanly they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas is a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states' office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.
- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots "for cause" only if it were politically feasible.
- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the scheme contemplated in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.
- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

NEWS ARTICLES

Consultants conducted a search of related Nexis articles published between ? and ? The search terms used were jointly agreed upon, and are available upon request. A systematic, numerical analysis of the data collected during this review is currently being prepared. What follows is an overview provided by the consultants.

Overview of the Articles

???

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.
- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.
- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms;
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with.

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles, in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;
- Poll watchers harassing voters;
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;
- Disproportionate police presence;
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate; and
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from “battleground” states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

“Dead Voters and Multiple Voting”

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials, and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found 5 such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations in three particular jurisdictions as detailed in the vote buying summary (attached). There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area. All of these cases are concentrated in the Midwest and South.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida,

Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of voter registration forms. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case charges were filed against ten individuals. In one case a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this Nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem has the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Recommendation

Phase 2 should include a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

CASE LAW RESEARCH

After reviewing over 40,000 cases from 2000 to the present, the majority of which came from appeals courts, consultants found comparatively few which are applicable to this study. Of those that are applicable, no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it seems that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

Recommendation

Because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, consultants suggest that case law research for the second phase of this project concentrate on state trial-level decisions.

MAJOR VOTE BUYING CASES SUMMARY

Between 2001 and 2006, allegations and convictions for vote buying and conspiracies to buy votes were concentrated in three states: Illinois, West Virginia and Kentucky.

In East St. Louis, Illinois, nine individuals, including a former city council member and the head of the local Democratic Party, Charles Powell, Jr., were convicted or pled guilty to vote buying and conspiracy to commit election fraud during the 2004 general election. The government's conspiracy case was almost entirely based on taped conversations in which the defendants discussed buying votes for $5 and whether this would be adequate. Federal prosecutors alleged that the vote buying was financed with $79,000 transferred from the County Democratic Party shortly before the election, although county officials have not been charged. Four defendants were convicted of purchasing or offering to purchase at least one vote directly, while Democratic Party chairman was only convicted of conspiracy.<sup>2</sup> Earlier, three precinct officials and one precinct worker pled guilty to buying votes for $5 or $10 in that same election.<sup>3</sup>

Eastern Kentucky has witnessed a series of vote buying cases over the last several years. The most recent revolved around Ross Harris, a Pike County political fundraiser and coal executive, and his associate Loren Glenn Turner. Harris and Turner were convicted in September 2004 of vote buying, mail fraud, and several other counts.<sup>4</sup> Prosecutors alleged Harris and Turner conspired to buy votes and provided the necessary funds in an unsuccessful 2002 bid for Pike County district judge by former State Senator Doug Hays. Harris supplied nearly $40,000, Turner laundered the money through straw contributors, and the cash was then disbursed in the form of $50 checks ostensibly for 'vote hauling', the legal practice of paying campaign workers to get voters to the polls which is notorious as a cover for buying votes.<sup>5</sup> Harris attempted to influence the race on behalf of Hays in order to get revenge on Hays' opponent for a personal matter.<sup>6</sup>

A grand jury initially indicted 10 individuals in connection with the Harris and Turner case, including Hays and his wife, and six campaign workers. Of the remaining defendants, only one, Tom Varney, also a witness in the Hays case, pled guilty. The others were either acquitted of vote buying charges or had vote buying charges dropped.<sup>7</sup> Prosecutors have announced that their investigation continues into others tied to Harris and may produce further indictments.

The Harris case follows a series of trials related to the 1998 Knott County Democratic primary. Between 2003 and 2004, 10 individuals were indicted on vote buying charges, including a winning candidate in those primaries, Knott County judge-executive Donnie Newsome, who was reelected in 2002. In 2004 Newsome and a supporter were sent to jail and fined. Five other defendants pled guilty to vote buying charges, and three were acquitted. The primary means of vote buying entailed purchasing absentee votes from elderly, infirm, illiterate or poor voters, usually for between $50 and $100. This resulted in an abnormally high number of absentee ballots in the primary.<sup>8</sup> Indictments relating to that same 1998 primary were also brought in 1999, when 6 individuals were indicted for buying the votes of students at a small local college. Five of those indicted were convicted or pled guilty.<sup>9</sup>

Absentee vote buying was also an issue in 2002, when federal prosecutors opened an investigation in Kentucky's Clay County after an abnormal number of absentee ballots were filed in the primary and the sheriff halted absentee voting twice over concerns.<sup>10</sup> Officials received hundreds of complaints of vote-buying during the 2002 primary, and state investigators performed follow up investigations in a number of counties, including Knott, Bell, Floyd, Pike, and Maginoff.<sup>11</sup> No indictments have been produced so far.

So far, relatively few incidents of vote-buying have been substantially identified or investigated in the 2004 election. Two instances of vote buying in local 2004 elections have been brought before a grand jury. In one, a Casey County man was indicted for purchasing votes in a local school board race with cash and whiskey.<sup>12</sup> In the second, the grand jury chose not to indict an individual accused of offering to purchase a teenager's vote on a local proposal with beer.<sup>13</sup>

An extensive vote buying conspiracy has also been uncovered in southern West Virginia. The federal probe, which handed down its first indictment in 2003, has yielded more than a dozen guilty pleas to charges of vote buying and conspiracy in elections since the late 1980s. As this area is almost exclusively dominated by the Democratic Party, vote-buying occurred largely during primary contests.

The first phase of the probe focused on Logan County residents, where vote buying charges were brought in relation to elections in 1996, 2000, 2002 and 2004. In an extraordinary tactic, the FBI planted the former mayor of Logan City, Tom Esposito, as a candidate in a state legislative race. Esposito's cooperation led to guilty pleas from the Logan County Clerk, who pled guilty to selling his vote to Esposito in 1996,<sup>14</sup> and another man who took money from Esposito for the purpose of vote buying in 2004.<sup>15</sup>

Guilty pleas were also obtained in connection with former county sheriff Johnny Mendez, who pled guilty to buying votes in two primary elections in order to elect candidates including himself. In 2000, with a large amount of funding from a prominent local lawyer seeking to influence a state delegate election for his wife, Mendez distributed around $10,000 in payments to voters of $10 to $100. Then, in the 2004 primary, Mendez distributed around $2,000 before his arrest.<sup>16</sup> A deputy of Mendez', the former Logan police chief, also pled guilty to a count of vote buying in 2002.<sup>17</sup>

Prosecutors focusing on neighboring Lincoln County have alleged a long-standing vote-buying conspiracy extending back to the late 1980s. The probe identified Lincoln County Circuit Clerk Greg Stowers as head of a Democratic Party faction which routinely bought votes in order to maintain office. Stowers pled guilty in December 2005 to distributing around $7,000 to buy votes in the 2004 primary. The Lincoln County Assessor, and Stowers' longtime political ally, Jerry Allen Weaver, also pled guilty to conspiracy to buy votes.<sup>18</sup> These were accompanied by four other guilty pleas from party workers for vote buying in primaries. While most specific charges focused on vote buying in the 2004 primary, defendants also admitted buying votes as far back as the 1988, 1990, and 1992 primaries.

The leading conspirators would give party workers candidate slates and cash, which workers would then take to the polling place and use to purchase votes for amounts between $10 and $40 and in one instance, for liquor. Voters would be handed the slate of chosen candidates, and would then be paid upon exiting the polling place. In other cases, the elected officials in question purchased votes in exchange for non-cash rewards, including patronage positions, fixed tickets, favorable tax assessments, and home improvements.<sup>19</sup>

The West Virginia probe is ongoing, as prosecutors are scrutinizing others implicated during the proceedings so far, including a sitting state delegate, who may be under scrutiny for vote buying in a 1990 election, and one of the Lincoln county defendants who previously had vote buying charges against him dropped.<sup>20</sup>

SUMMARY OF RECENT IRREGULARITIES IN SOUTH DAKOTA, WASHINGTON STATE, AND WISCONSIN

Summary of South Dakota Election Irregularities in 2002 and 2004

2002

In fall 2002, one of South Dakota's Senators, Democrat Tim Johnson, was up for re-election, and was engaged in a very close race with his Republican challenger, John Thune. Both parties were engaged in a massive voter registration effort, and registered over 24,000 new voters in the five months between the June primary and the November election, increasing the number of registered voters in the state from around 452,000 to 476,000.<sup>21</sup>

A month before the election, several counties reported irregularities in some of the voter registration documents they'd received. In response to these reports, South Dakota Attorney General, Mark Barnett, with the state US Attorney and the FBI, launched an investigation.<sup>22</sup> Because of the importance of the race in determining the partisan balance of power in the Senate, the voter registration discrepancies got a good deal of national press, including a number of editorials accusing American Indians of stuffing ballot boxes.<sup>23</sup> The following allegations were also picked up by out-of-state newssources, including Fox News and the Wall Street Journal:

- Supporters of Thune, who lost the election by 524 votes, collected 47 affidavits from poll watchers claiming voting irregularities.
- Allegations were made that three individuals were offered money by Johnson supporters to vote.

Barnett, who was alerted to the affidavits when he read an early media report that referred to them, stated that these allegations were either false or didn't warrant concern. "Most of the stuff that's in those other 47 affidavits are the kind of problems that we see in every election. People parking too close to the polling place with a sign in their window, people shooting their mouths off at the polling place. The kind of things that local election officials generally do a pretty good job of policing.”<sup>24</sup> The allegations of voter bribery were false.

Though most of the allegations of fraud that were filed turned out to be false, Attorney General Barnett’s investigation did uncover two cases of voter registration fraud:

- The most high-profile case was that of Becky Red Earth-Villeda. Ms. Red Earth-Villeda was hired by the state Democratic party to register voters on the American Indian reservations. She was charged with 19 counts of forgery. No fraudulent voting was associated with Ms. Red Earth-Villeda, nor was there any evidence that fraudulent voting occurred in the state.<sup>25</sup> All charges were dropped in January 2004, when, in court, it was determined by the state handwriting specialist that Ms. Red Earth-Villeda had not forged the signatures.<sup>26</sup>
- Lyle Nichols. Mr. Nichols was arrested for submitting five forged voter registration cards to his county office. He was working for an organization called the Native American Voter Registration Project, and was paid $3 for each registration. The five charges were dropped after Mr. Nichols pleaded guilty to possession of a forgery, and was sentenced with 54 days in jail, which is how much time he’d already spent there because of the charges.<sup>27</sup>

2004

In October 2004, just before the general election, eight people working for a campus GOP Get-out-the-Vote organization resigned their positions after they were accused of submitting absentee ballot requests that had not been notarized properly. Because many of these ballot requests had already been processed and the ballots themselves had been cast, county auditors decided not to pursue the issue.<sup>28</sup>

Besides this incident, there were no reports of voter registration or voting irregularities in the run-up to the November 2004 election, as there were in

2002.<sup>29</sup> However, as with the primary and special elections in June 2004, there were complaints about voter intimidation from American Indians attempting to vote, as well as difficulties with the adoption of the state's new photo identification regulations (after the 2002 election, the state legislature passed more stringent requirements about the kind of identification voters would need to provide at the polls.)

Incidents:

Voter Intimidation: The Four Directions Committee, an organization dedicated to helping American Indians register to vote and get to the polls, got a temporary restraining order on several Republican supporters who, they alleged, had been setting up video equipment outside of polling places on American Indian reservations and following around American Indians who voted early and recording their license plates. <sup>30</sup>

Vote Buying: A Republican election monitor from Virginia, Paul Brenner, claimed that Senator Tom Daschle's campaign was paying people to vote. Local county auditors believe Brenner started the rumor himself. As there was no evidence for either side, the claims were not taken seriously. <sup>31</sup>

The 2004 Washington state gubernatorial election was decided by one of the narrowest margins in American electoral history; 261 votes – less than a millionth of the 2.8 million votes cast statewide - separated the leading candidate, Republican Dino Rossi, from his competitor, Democrat Christine Gregoire. The state law-mandated recount that followed brought the margin down to 42 votes, and the subsequent hand recount ordered by the state Democratic Party gave Gregoire the lead, with 129 more votes than Rossi.

The race was so close that the parties decided to go to court to dispute the tally – the Republicans wanted the election results set aside and to have a revote; the Democrats sought a court-legitimated win. Each side set out into the field to find a way to swing the election in their favor. The trial and accompanying investigation, which lasted through the spring of 2005, revealed a litany of problems with the state's election system:

- The process by which absentee ballots are matched to the voters who requested them led to discrepancies between the number of absentee ballots received and the number of votes counted.<sup>32</sup>
- After the final certification of the election results, King County discovered 96 uncounted absentee ballots, Pierce county found 64, and Spokane County found eight; all had been misplaced following the election, but there was no mechanism for reconciling the number of absentee ballots received with the number counted.<sup>33</sup>
- Hundreds of felons who were ineligible to vote were able to cast ballots because they were not aware that they needed to apply to have their voting rights re-instated.<sup>34</sup>
- The system for verifying the eligibility of voters who had cast provisional ballots was found to be questionable.<sup>35</sup>
- Due to poll worker error, about 100 provisional ballots were improperly cast, and a hundred more were counted, though they were not verified as having been cast by eligible voters.<sup>36</sup>

The trial also revealed that most of these problems were the result of understaffing and human error.<sup>37</sup> In total, 1,678 ballots were proven to have been cast illegally, but none of these votes was subtracted from the candidates' totals because no evidence was produced in court as to how each individual voted.<sup>38</sup> Further, despite the scrutiny that the election returns revealed, and the extensive discussion of voter fraud throughout the investigation, just eight cases of voter fraud were discovered:

- 4 people were accused of casting absentee ballots for their deceased spouses.<sup>39</sup>
- A mother and daughter were charged with the absentee ballot of the mother's husband who had died earlier in the year
- 1 man cast the ballot of the deceased prior resident of his home.

Instances of Illegal Voting, Milwaukee:

A probe led by U.S. Attorney Steve Biskupic and Milwaukee County District Attorney Michael McCann found about 200 cases of illegal felon voting and at least 100 cases of other forms of illegal voting in the city of Milwaukee. Of these, 14 were prosecuted:

- 10 were instances of felons voting while on probation or parole:
- 5 are awaiting trial. (one of them is DeShawn Brooks)<sup>41</sup>
- 1 has been acquitted<sup>42</sup>
- 1 has been found guilty in trial (Kimberly Prude)<sup>2</sup>
- 3 have reached plea agreements (Milo Ocasio<sup>43</sup>)
- [names: Ethel M. Anderson, Correan F. Edwards, Jiyto L. Cox, Joseph J. Gooden<sup>44</sup>]

- 4 were instances of double voting:
- 1 produced a hung jury (Enrique Sanders)<sup>2</sup>
- 1 was found incompetent to stand trial and his case was dismissed
- 1 initially pleaded guilty but now wants a trial.<sup>45</sup>
- 1 is awaiting trial.

Two of those accused of double voting were driven to multiple polling places in a van, but the identity of the driver of the vehicle is not known, and the DA does not suspect conspiracy.<sup>46</sup>

In addition to these, four people were charged with felonies in the Milwaukee County Circuit Court; two cases were filed against people accused of sending in false registration cards under the auspices of the Association of

Instances of Illegal Voting, Statewide:

The Legislative Audit Bureau, a nonpartisan research agency, released its analysis of state-wide 2004 election results in September 2005. The agency reviewed the names, addresses, and birthdates of over 348,000 individuals credited with having voted in November 2004, from the electronic voter registration records of 6 cooperating municipalities, and compared them to lists from the Department of Corrections of felons serving sentences on election day, and to lists from the municipalities (to check up on double-voting) and to lists from the US Social Security Administration. LAB's search revealed 105 "questionable" votes:

- 98 ballots cast by ineligible felons, 57 of which were in Madison, 2 in Waukesha, 15 in Eau Claire, 16 in Appleton, 1 in the Village of Ashwaubenon
- 2 instances of double-voting (one in Madison, one in Waukesha).
- 4 votes counted despite the voter's having died two weeks or less before the election.
- 1 case in which a 17-year-old voted in Madison.<sup>48</sup>

The LAB referred the names of these people to the appropriate District Attorney for prosecution, and several cases are awaiting trial.

It should be noted that this study is not a complete survey of election returns state-wide in Wisconsin; the LAB's analysis is based on the voting records of the six municipalities that provided the LAB with sufficient information to conduct this study.

It should also be noted that the LAB discovered significant error in the data provided them by these municipalities, including:

- 91 records in which the individual's birthdate was incorrectly recorded as later than November 2, 1986;
- 97 cases in which a person was mistakenly recorded as having voted twice; and
- More than 15,000 records were missing birthdates, making it more difficult to determine voter eligibility by comparing these records to lists of felons and deceased persons.<sup>49</sup>

General Findings

Both reports (the Legislative Audit Bureau's and the report of the Joint Task Force on Election Reform convened in Milwaukee) that did in-depth studies of the Wisconsin election returns in 2004 found that there was no evidence of systematic, wide-spread fraud.<sup>50</sup> As the above statistics indicate, there are very few cases in which an individual intentionally voted illegally, and the majority of the discovered instances of fraudulent voting involved felons who were unaware that they were committing a crime. Certainly the number of fraudulent votes, intentional and unintentional, is dwarfed by the amount of administrative error – and the amount of potential there was for fraud.

Registration Irregularities

Duplicate Registrations: In the data from the six participating municipalities, LAB found 3116 records for individuals who appear to be registered more than once in the same municipality (0.9% of the records they reviewed). These duplications were primarily the result of name changes, in which the registrar neglected to remove the old name from the registration list, previous addresses that were not deleted, and misspellings and other typographical errors.

Deceased Voters: The LAB study found 783 persons who were deceased, but whose records had not been eliminated from the registration lists. Most of the municipalities participating in the survey rely on obituaries and notifications from family members to purge their voter registration lists of deceased voters.

Felons: Comparing a list of felons from the Department of Corrections to their voter registration data lists, LAB found 453 felons who were registered to vote. This is largely because, although municipal clerks are informed of federal felony convictions, they have no way of obtaining records on state felony convictions.<sup>51</sup>

RE: October 18, 2006 Letter

Dear Mr. Neas:

Your letter of October 18, 2006 requests the release of EAC's Voter Fraud and Intimidation Report. I would like to take this opportunity to clarify the purpose and status of this study.

In late 2005, EAC hired two consultants for the purpose of assisting EAC with two things: 1) developing a uniform definition of the phrase voter fraud, and 2) making recommendations on how to further study the existence, prosecution, and means of deterring such voter fraud. In May 2006, a status report on this study was given to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors during their public meetings. During the same week, a working group convened to react to and provide comment on the progress and potential conclusions that could be reached from the work of the two consultants.

The conversation at the working group meeting was lively on the very points that we were trying to accomplish as a part of this study, namely what is voter fraud and how do we pursue studying it. Many of the proposed conclusions that were suggested by the consultants were challenged by the working group members. As such, the consultants were tasked with reviewing the concerns expressed at the working group meeting, conducting additional research as necessary, and providing a draft report to EAC that took into account the working group's concerns and issues.

That draft report is currently being vetted by EAC staff. EAC will release a final report from this study after it has conducted a review of the draft provided by the consultants. However, it is important to remember the purpose of this study -- finding a uniform definition of voter fraud and making recommendations on how to study the existence, prosecution and deterrence of voter fraud -- as it will serve as the basis of the EAC report on this study.

Thank you for your letter. You can be assured that as soon as a final report on the fraud and intimidation study is available, a copy will be made available to the public.

Sincerely,

Paul S. DeGregorio
Chairman

Subject Re: Question-Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Report

Tom:

I sent the consolidated draft of the report last week (minus the Nexis and case law charts) to the lawyers (with a cc: to you), along with the following comments:

- As you know, references to DOJ actions/responses have caused some concern at DOJ. But both consultants are adamantly opposed to EAC making substantive changes to their report. Perhaps using footnotes clearly labeled as EAC footnotes would be a method of addressing this issue?
- There are some recommendations regarding DOJ that we (the consultants and I) were told would not be supported by DOJ, and other references to DOJ, none of which have been reviewed by the department. I think we ought to give Craig Donsanto and John Tanner a chance to provide feedback on each of these sections.
- I am a little concerned about the naming of names, particularly in the section that addresses working group concerns. If we publish it as is, it might end up as fodder for some very negative newspaper articles.
- The report currently uses three different voices: third person, first person singular, first person plural. I think this looks really clumsy. If we are not actually making substantive changes, perhaps we could get away with making the presentation consistent in this regard.
- Because the consultants submitted the report in pieces, they did not include proper segues. I don't know if we should leave it as is, or insert them where needed.

The only comments I've received so far were from Gavin, who said, "I would put forth one point at the outset... if we are creating an EAC report, let create an EAC report. Tova and Job contract employees... I do not see why we can't use all, some or none of their work without footnote or comment."

The series of supporting charts can be found in the shared drawer under T:\RESEARCH IN PROGRESS\VOTING FRAUD-VOTER INTIMIDATION\Report\Consolidated Copy in the subfolders marked Case Charts and Nexis Charts. I continue to work on the formatting of these charts, but at least you and Edgardo can access them. (I would have attached copies to this message, but it would involve too many files.)

We may want to schedule a teleconference on this with the attorneys and Jeannie.

I hope you are feeling better. --- Peggy

Hi Peggy;

Sorry I missed you yesterday when you were here and hope you are beginning to feel better.

As you know the Voter Fraud and Intimidation Report is causing quite a stir.

Can you give me some ball park timeframe for how long it may take to wrap up our review and get a report to the Commissioners

Is there anything I can do to assist with getting you some help on this.

I know you have other things on your mind but I need to find a way to wrap this up soon.

Also I believe that there were some charts of some sort that were not included in the report we got from Tova and Job, are they available for Edgardo to find so that I may take a look at this.

Thanks so much and hope things are getting better for you.

Dear Tom:

Thank you for faxing me a copy of your October 17th response to Wendy Weiser of the Brennan Center. We are pleased that you have made public the report on Provisional Voting but disappointed that you are not ready to do the same with our report on Voter Identification. We would appreciate knowing approximately when you expect to complete the review and consideration of advisory board concerns you mention to Ms. Weiser.

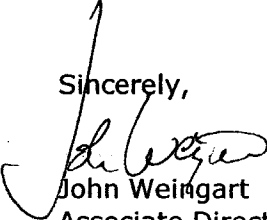

In the meantime, both Eagleton and Moritz plan to place the report on Provisional Voting on our websites along with a paper based on the data compiled for the Voter Identification report. Consistent with your letter faxed to us on August 31st, we plan to include approximately the following language:

"This report on Best Practices To Improve Provisional Voting was prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University (Eagleton) and the Moritz College of Law at Ohio State University (Moritz) under contract to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC). It was submitted to the Commission on June 28th, 2006. Please note that the EAC has not yet made final determinations on the release of any future documents based on this report and its supporting data.

A separate report on Best Practices To Improve Voter Identification Requirements was prepared by Eagleton and Moritz under the same contract and also submitted to the EAC on June 28th, 2006. The Commission is currently reviewing this report and has asked that it not be made public until their review is complete. Timothy Vercellotti and David Anderson of Rutgers University's Eagleton Institute of Politics and Political Science Department respectively presented a paper based on the data compiled for this report at the 2006 meeting of the American Political Science Association. The paper, Protecting The Franchise, or Restricting It? The Effects of Voter Identification Requirements on Turnout, can be viewed by clicking here."

We look forward to your response concerning the release of the Voter Identification report. As always, please let us know if need additional information or if there are other ways in which we can be of assistance with your important and difficult work.

Sincerely,

Re: Request for Records Pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act

Dear Mr. Wilkey:

I write to follow up on the Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA") request I made to the Election Assistance Commission ("EAC") on October 11, 2006 for: (1) the report on voter identification prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics and the Moritz College of Law ("the voter ID report"), and (2) the report on voting fraud and voter intimidation prepared by Tova Wang and Job Serebrov, in consultation with a bipartisan work group ("the voting fraud report").<sup>1</sup> Both reports were prepared using federal funds distributed by the EAC and both were finalized and submitted to the EAC several months ago. I received your October 17, 2006 letter and the accompanying EAC status report, EAC board resolutions, and the report on provisional voting prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics and the Moritz College of Law. I thank you for the report on provisional voting and the other information, but unfortunately, the material you provided is only partially responsive to my request because it failed to include a copy of the voter ID report and the voting fraud report.

Under FOIA, any federal agency, including the EAC, is required to make records "promptly available to any person" who properly requests them. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3)(A) (2006). If an agency decides to withhold the requested records, it must "immediately notify" the person making the request of the "reasons" for the agency's decision and of the person's right to appeal that decision. Id. § 552(a)(6)(A)(i). Your October 17 response, in addition to excluding the requested reports, provided no explanation as to why they were being withheld, as required by federal law. Since there is no basis for the EAC to withhold the voter ID and voting fraud reports, proffered or otherwise, I respectfully appeal your decision to deny access to those reports and also request expedited review.<sup>2</sup> Immediate disclosure of those reports is both in the public interest and within the EAC's statutory mandate to serve as a national clearinghouse on election-related information and to make studies available to the public.

<sup>1</sup> Unlike the usage adopted by the EAC in its October 26, 2006 public meeting, the term "report" in this letter does not refer to a report authored by the EAC or officially approved by the EAC and containing EAC recommendations. Rather, the term should be construed in its ordinary English meaning.

Immediate Disclosure of the Requested Reports is in the Public Interest

The information and research contained in the voter ID and voting fraud reports are urgently needed to assist citizens, policymakers, and courts in their ongoing deliberations on issues of the highest public concern. As you are no doubt aware, the issues of voter ID and voting fraud are currently being considered in the courts, in Congress, and in the state legislatures.

Indeed, on October 20, 2006, three days after the EAC denied my request for the voter ID and voting fraud reports, a unanimous United States Supreme Court underscored the need for more research on voting fraud and the effects of voter ID requirements in the context of a case challenging Arizona's new voter ID law.<sup>3</sup> Justice Stevens explained in his concurrence that factual information is needed to determine "the scope of the disenfranchisement that the novel identification requirements will produce, and the prevalence and character of the fraudulent practices that allegedly justify those requirements." The two factual issues identified by the Court are precisely the subjects of the voter ID and voting fraud reports being withheld by the EAC.

Public disclosure of the voter ID and voting fraud reports is important not only to assist the courts in examining the constitutionality of recently-enacted voter ID laws, but also to assist Congress and state legislatures in their deliberations over proposed voter ID legislation. For example, this summer, the U.S. House of Representatives passed a voter ID bill, H.R. 4844, which is currently being considered by the United States Senate. Given the dearth of studies and research on voter ID and voting fraud, the Senate's deliberations would be greatly enhanced by disclosure of the voter ID and voting fraud reports.

Given how quickly the issues of voter ID and voting fraud are being raised in the courts and in the legislatures, the public simply cannot afford any further delay in the release of the highly-anticipated voter ID and voting fraud reports. Scholars, advocates, and policy makers have long awaited the release of these reports, and many have refrained from undertaking similar studies in the interim. Because the data and other research in those reports were gathered over the course of many months, it would be impossible for others to collect similar information in time to inform the public debate.

The requested reports will provide an invaluable contribution to the national discussion on voter ID and voting fraud. Both reports were prepared by nationally-known experts on election administration. The voting fraud study was also prepared in consultation with a bipartisan working group that held a full-day meeting with the EAC and the researchers on May 18, 2006 to discuss the research results.<sup>4</sup> Both reports consumed substantial time and resources: the EAC granted scholars from the Moritz College of Law and the Eagleton Institute of Politics the voter ID research contract in late 2004, and Tova Wang and Job Serebrov the voting fraud contract in September 2005. Both reports contain substantial data collected over many months of research. And, in both cases, the authors prepared and submitted final reports of their research to the EAC several months ago.<sup>5</sup> The EAC is doing the public a disservice by refusing to release these important reports, at least one of which is within its exclusive control, in a timely manner.

Moreover, the EAC's decision to withhold these reports starkly contrasts with the express policies of other federal agencies that distribute public funds for studies. For example, policy of both the National Institutes of Health and National Science Foundation is to disclose as much information as possible so that the public, including other researchers, can examine and benefit from federally-funded research.<sup>6</sup>

The Brennan Center publishes and disseminates reports, publications, and other informational materials to educate individuals, institutions, the press, legislators, and other policymakers on a variety of issues, including issues related to voting and elections. As an organization primarily engaged in disseminating information, the Brennan Center is well-situated to make the information in the voter ID and voting fraud reports available to the public. The Center also intends to make use of the research in those reports to assist in our own research and proposals on issues of national concern.

Disclosure of the Requested Reports Is Within the EAC's Mandate

As you know, the Election Assistance Commission was established by Congress in the Help America Vote Act of 2002 ("HAVA") to "serve as a national clearinghouse and resource for the compilation of information and review of procedures with respect to the administration of Federal elections."<sup>7</sup> In other words, the EAC's primary function is to make information available to the public. It is inconsistent with this mission for the EAC to delay the release of valuable research, to suppress research with which some or even all Commissioners disagree, or to withhold research while the EAC determines its own position on the issues addressed by the requested reports.

The requested voter ID and voting fraud reports were prepared at the request of the EAC pursuant to the Commission's statutory duty to "conduct and make available to the public studies regarding . . . election administration issues."<sup>8</sup> HAVA specifically mandated the EAC to make available studies concerning "nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office," and "identifying deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation," among other things.<sup>9</sup> It was in light of these statutory provisions that the EAC provided federal funding to well-respected experts to conduct research and prepare the voter ID and voting fraud reports. Those same provisions require the EAC to make those reports "available to the public."

In short, by withholding the requested reports, not only does the EAC violate the broad disclosure provisions of FOIA, discussed more fully below, but it also shirks its statutory responsibility to be a source of public information regarding election administration.

There is No Basis in Law for the EAC to Withhold the Requested Reports

Under FOIA, the EAC is required to disclose all requested documents within its control unless they fall into one of the enumerated statutory exemptions.<sup>10</sup> These exemptions are very narrowly construed, because “[t]he basic purpose of FOIA is to ensure an informed citizenry, vital to the functioning of a democratic society, needed to check against corruption and to hold the governors accountable to the governed.”<sup>11</sup> Moreover, to qualify for an exemption, the EAC is required to explain its reasons for withholding a document with specificity.<sup>12</sup> The EAC has simply not satisfied its burden of showing that the voter ID and voting fraud reports qualify for an exemption. Indeed, it cannot.

The Withheld Reports Do Not Qualify for a FOIA Exemption

Despite the fact that you gave no reason for the EAC’s decision to withhold the requested documents, based on your counsel’s statement at the Commission’s public meeting held on October 26, 2006,<sup>13</sup> we assume that you intend to assert the deliberative process privilege under Exemption 5 of FOIA. That exemption, however, applies only to: (a) intra-agency memoranda that are both (b) predecisional, and (c) deliberative.<sup>14</sup> The voter ID and voting fraud reports meet none of these criteria. Neither report can be said to reveal the decision-making or thought processes of the Commission in any way—which is the essence of the deliberative process privilege. That privilege does not apply here for three independent reasons.

First, although the requested reports are within the EAC’s exclusive control, they cannot be withheld as “intra-agency” memoranda because they were independently prepared by experts outside of the EAC. The mere receipt of federal funds to perform research does not transform an outsider into an arm of the agency.<sup>15</sup> We do not dispute that, under certain circumstances, persons outside an agency can so actively participate in an agency’s policymaking process that they are appropriately considered part of the agency. But in this case, the report authors were essentially grantees whose work product lacked the “extensive, detailed, and virtually day-to-day supervision” that “convert[s] the acts of the [fund] recipient from private acts to governmental acts.”<sup>16</sup>

Second, the withheld reports are not “predecisional” because they were not prepared to assist the EAC in making a policy decision, but rather were commissioned pursuant to the agency’s statutory obligations under HAVA to disseminate studies.<sup>17</sup> Predecisional documents are those “prepared in order to assist an agency decisionmaker in arriving at his decision.”<sup>18</sup> They are typically drafts or “suggestions or recommendations as to what agency policy should be,” or “advice to a superior,” or “suggested dispositions of a case.”<sup>19</sup> A document is only predecisional if the agency can demonstrate that the document is related to a specific decision confronting the agency. Here, however, “[n]o ‘decision’ is being made or ‘policy’ being considered”<sup>20</sup> in connection with the voter ID and voting fraud reports. The EAC did not fund those reports with the expectation that the reports would effectuate policies with the force of law or complete an adjudicatory process. Instead, the reports are “resource opinion[s]” about a state of facts completely unrelated to a tangential policy decision that the EAC may make.<sup>21</sup> As a result, they are not predecisional. To the extent that the EAC claims that the reports relate to “a decision that possibly may be made at some undisclosed time in the future,” that is an insufficient basis to withhold them under Exemption 5.<sup>22</sup>

Third, the withheld reports are not “deliberative” because they do not “reflect[] the give-and-take of the [agency’s] consultative process.”<sup>23</sup> The requested reports cannot become exempted from disclosure merely because the EAC is reviewing them.<sup>24</sup> A document is deliberative if its disclosure is likely “to stifle honest and frank communication within the agency.”<sup>25</sup> There is no danger that disclosure of the voter ID and voting fraud reports would stifle the agency’s communications, since they were prepared independently of the EAC and thus cannot reveal anything about any deliberations or candid communications within the EAC.

The Preparation of an EAC Report is no Justification for Withholding the Requested Reports

The EAC is obligated under FOIA and HAVA to disclose the requested reports regardless of whether it intends to write its own report on voter identification, as your letter suggests.<sup>26</sup>

<sup>24</sup> The DC Circuit has also rejected an interpretation of predecisional that “would result in a huge mass of material being forever screened from public view,” because “[t]he public has an interest in decisions deferred, avoided, or simply not taken for whatever reason, equal to its interest in decisions made, which from their very nature may more easily come to public attention than those never made.” Vaughn v. Rosen, 523 F.2d 1136, 1146 (D.C. Cir. 1975).

<sup>26</sup> It is unclear as to why the EAC’s intent to write a report on voter identification would have any bearing on the EAC’s decision to withholding of the fraud report. Likewise, the inaccuracies in the provisional voting report alleged in your October 17 letter are wholly immaterial to the issue of whether the reports on voter ID and voting fraud should be disclosed. In any event, while inaccuracies may explain why the EAC would choose not to adopt a particular report, it is insufficient to support withholding the documents under FOIA. See Petroleum Info. Corp. v. U.S. Dep’t of Interior, 976 F.2d 1429, 1437 n.10 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (holding risk of public confusion “does not

Neither the voting fraud report nor the voter ID report could “inaccurately reflect or prematurely disclose the views of the agency,”<sup>27</sup> because both reports were written and reviewed by scholars outside the EAC and submitted to the EAC in final form. Factual material that does not reveal an agency’s deliberative process is not protected under Exemption 5,<sup>28</sup> nor are expert opinions that do not reflect the agency’s own deliberations concerning its own decision- or policy-making.<sup>29</sup> Moreover, the mere fact that the EAC might rely on information in the voter ID or voting fraud reports to issue its own report does not transform those reports into deliberative agency materials. As the United States Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit explained,

[A]nyone making a report must of necessity select the facts to be mentioned in it; but a report does not become a part of the deliberative process merely because it contains only those facts which the person making the report thinks material. If this were not so, every factual report would be protected as a part of the deliberative process.<sup>30</sup>

Any Segregable Information Must Be Released

Irrespective of any claimed exemptions, the EAC is under an obligation to release any “reasonably segregable” nonexempt information to requestors.<sup>31</sup> Both the voter ID and voting fraud reports are unlikely to reveal anything about the deliberative process of the EAC, and to the extent that either does, those limited portions can be excised and the balance of the reports released.

Additional FOIA Request

In the event that the EAC denies my renewed request for the voter ID and voting fraud reports or delays another week in providing those materials, we respectfully request copies of (1) all requests for proposals and contracts relating to the voter ID and voting fraud reports; and (2) all written and electronic communications concerning the voter ID and voting fraud reports between the EAC and (a) the Eagleton Institute of Politics, (b) the Moritz College of Law, (c) Tova Wang, (d) Job Serebrov, and (e) any other individuals or entities, including but not limited

From: Tova Andrea Wang
Re: Project on Voter Fraud and Intimidation
Date: December 7, 2006

As one of the consultants and authors of the report on voter fraud and intimidation released by the Election Assistance Commission today, I am writing to request that the EAC restore the information that has been altered and removed from the research report we submitted to the EAC in July, 2006.

Job Serebrov and I spent over a year and hundreds of hours working on the report on voter fraud and voter intimidation in a bipartisan and highly effective manner. The report we wrote was a reflection of the detailed and laborious research we did over these many months. Unfortunately, the report the EAC released today does not fully reflect our research and the report of our findings submitted to the EAC in July, 2006.

After being unable to get any action taken on the report for months, I learned very recently that the General Counsel of the EAC would be taking responsibility for "revising" the report. On November 15 of this year I requested that Job Serebrov and I be permitted to review any revisions or changes made by EAC staff to the draft we submitted. We both offered to work collaboratively and cooperatively with EAC staff to ensure that the document produced was the most informative and useful product possible. This request was denied. Again, on November 29, 2006, upon learning that the report was to become public at an upcoming EAC meeting, I requested in writing that Job Serebrov and I be at least allowed to see embargoed copies of the report to be released before that December 7, 2006 meeting. That request was denied. On December 4, 2006 I offered to sign a confidentiality agreement whereby I would agree not to discuss the report before its public release. That request was also denied.

It is my understanding that with other research reports for which the EAC has contracted consultants there has been a process of give and take between the consultants and the EAC staff and commissioners prior to public release of the report. The consultants in this instance were repeatedly denied that opportunity, leading to today's result.

The issues around voter fraud and intimidation are controversial, making it all the more necessary that the research around it be as free from politics as possible. That is why the EAC made this project a bipartisan effort, with a bipartisan team of consultants and a bipartisan working group to inform and advise us on our work.

The EAC has a statutory obligation to provide the Congress and the American public the best research, data and guidance it can. Knowledge about the extent and nature of voter fraud and intimidation is fundamental to ensuring the right of every eligible American to vote and that every legitimate vote is counted.

Deliberative Process
Privilege

I hope the EAC will reconsider its actions of today and release the report that was written by the consultants so that the Congress and the voters can engage in an informed and honest discussion about one of the most serious issues confronting our democracy today.

Please respond to this request by Monday, December 11. Thank you for your timely consideration.

The Honorable Donetta Davidson
Chairman
U.S. Election Assistance Commission
1225 New York Avenue, N.W.
Suite 1100
Washington, DC 20005

Dear Commissioner Davidson:

We are writing to seek a response to very troubling news reports that included allegations that the Commission may have altered or delayed release of two taxpayer-funded studies of election issues for political purposes.

While the Commission is within its rights to decide what guidance it issues to election officials, it is critical that its actions are not perceived as politically motivated and it is imperative that you provide full documentation about the Commission's proceedings on these matters.

On Wednesday, the New York Times reported that a bipartisan team of election law experts hired by the Commission to research voter fraud in federal elections found that there was little such fraud around the nation, but the Commission revised the report to say that the pervasiveness of voter fraud was still open to debate.

On Monday, Roll Call reported that the Commission two weeks ago rejected the findings of a report, prepared as part of a $560,000 contract with Rutgers University's Eagleton Institute and Ohio State University's Moritz College of Law. That report found that voter identification laws may reduce election turnout, especially by minorities.

It is imperative that the Commission's actions and deliberations are unbiased, free from political influence and transparent. While the Commission does not have to agree with the experts who perform its research, it should make the research available unfettered and unfiltered.

Attached are a series of questions, we would like the Commission to address. We look forward to your timely response.

Sincerely,

Dianne Feinstein

Services and General

We request information and documentation from the Commission that answer the following questions:

COMMISSION'S OVERSIGHT ON EAGLETON CONTRACT TO PERFORM A STUDY ON VOTER IDENTIFICATION

1. Did the Commissioners or Commission senior staff receive any outside communication or pressure to change or not release the entire draft report or portions of the draft language on the voter fraud report? If so, who made those requests?
2. Would you please provide a copy of the approved Request For Proposals, as well as any contract modifications that were agreed to between the Commission and Eagleton Institute and subcontractors?
3. Can you provide the names and qualifications of Election Assistance Commission staff that worked on the Eagleton Institute project?
4. Please indicate how many project meetings occurred during the term of the Eagleton contract, including in-person meetings, conference calls regarding the status of the report, and any meeting where Commissioners were present for at least part of the meeting. Please provide copies of any minutes from those meetings.
5. Please identify the names and affiliations of members of the Peer Review group or groups that examined the Eagleton Institute drafts. Please also indicate the dates upon which any such review of the Eagleton research was conducted, and the specific concerns or complaints that were raised by members of the Peer Review group as to either the analysis or statistical methodology, if any. Please provide copies of any minutes from those meetings.
6. If certain members of the Peer Review groups had concerns with the data or methodology of the Eagleton study, was that information communicated to Eagleton, and were any changes made to the study based on Peer Review group concerns with methodology or data?
7. Who were the individuals (and what were their academic qualifications) that advised the Commission that the data, methodology, or the results of the Eagleton Contract were so flawed that the Commission should reject the report? At what point did the Commission receive input from those individuals?

8. The Commission previewed its research on the Eagleton Institute's study on Provisional Voting at its May 2006 Advisory Board meetings—why was the Voter Identification Draft Study not discussed at that time? What is the status of the Provisional Voting report?
9. In rejecting the Eagleton report, the Commission indicated concerns that there was only one year's worth of data. Given that this was the first year that Commission had studied the results, isn't "one year" what was originally contemplated in the Eagleton contract? Isn't the reason for having a major research institute conduct this study is so they can draw initial assessments from that data—even though that data can be augmented in future years? Because of the rejected report, will the Commission start anew for research in the 2008 elections?
10. What was the final, total cost of the Eagleton contract, and what was produced or released by that Commission as a result of that contract?

COMMISSION'S OVERSIGHT OVER VOTER FRAUD/INTIMIDATION STUDY

1. Did the Commissioners or Commission senior staff receive any outside communication or pressure to change or not release the entire draft report or portions of the draft language on the voter fraud report? If so, who made those requests?
2. Given the bipartisan nature of the Working Group that guided the Voter Fraud/Intimidation report, and the bipartisan nature of the contracted experts who uniformly support the results of this report, what concerns lead the Commission to determine the report should not be released?
3. If there were points in the report that the Commission objected to, were there attempts to work with the contractors to deal with specific concerns? If there were such attempts, please describe them.

4. Who drafted the Commission summary (released in December, 2006) of the Voter Fraud/Intimidation report, and what were their credentials and involvement in the original research process? Were there instructions or guidance given from Commissioners or senior staff as to what portions of the research should be emphasized? Who at the Commission reviewed the summarized report? Since the contracted experts are referred to in the Commission's released report, were the contractors allowed a chance to review or edit that Commission's final report that was released in December, 2006?
5. Please provide copies of any electronic or written communications between Commission employees that relate to the editing of the Voter Fraud/Intimidation report.
6. Please explain what Mr. Job Serebrov was referring to in his email referenced in the New York Times article of April 11, 2007. Please provide any documents in the Commission's possession where employees or contracted experts discussed pressure, political sensitivities, or the failure of the Commission to adopt the Voter Fraud/Intimidation report from March 1, 2006 to present.
7. While we realize that the Commission voted to release its summary report in December 2006, was there a public vote taken to reject the Draft Voter Fraud/Intimidation report? Such a monumental decision to reject the contract experts' work is a policy decision, and one that should be done in public. When was the decision made to reject the original report, and what notice was provided to the public that the Commission would reject that report?
8. Prior to the Draft Voter Fraud/Intimidation report's release, had other organizations requested a copy of that original report? Please include copies of your responses to those organizations, if any.
9. Had any States requested that the Commission or staff provide guidance related to voter identification requirements in the Help America Vote Act, or identification requirements generally? Please provide those requests, and any responses from the Commission.
10. Please indicate what steps the Commission is taking to ensure that political considerations do not impact the agency's research and that decisions are handled in a public and transparent manner.

Dear Chair Davidson:

I am attaching a copy of a memo I am sending to Adam Abroggi, Counsel for the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, responding to his request for information about the Eagleton Institute of Politics' contract with the EAC. If you or your staff notice any errors or significant omissions in my summary of our work and coordination with you, please let me know. Also, please don't hesitate to contact us if there are any other ways in which we can help you to advance informed public consideration of provisional voting, voter identification and the other important issues within your purview.

EAGLETON INSTITUTE OF POLITICS

---

To: Adam Ambrogi, Counsel
Senate Committee on Rules and Administration

From: John Weingart, Associate Director
Eagleton Institute of Politics

April 19, 2007

Adam

In response to your April 10th request, I have pulled together some information about the Eagleton Institute of Politics' contract with the U.S. Election Assistance Commission. Although I did not have a chance to do the thorough review, including comparing notes with all the members of our research team, that would be necessary to compile a full chronology of our work, I hope the following will be useful to you. I will be giving a copy of this memo to EAC Chair Donetta Davidson and Executive Director Tom Wilkey for any assistance it may offer them in responding to Senators Feinstein and Durbin's April 12th letter.

By way of background, Rutgers University's Eagleton Institute of Politics submitted a proposal to the EAC on March 25, 2005 to provide "research assistance to the Election Assistance Commission for the development of voluntary guidance on provisional voting and voter identification procedures." The proposal was submitted after extensive discussions with EAC Commissioners and staff that had begun on Election Day, 2004 when Eagleton had received a phone call from the EAC's then-Executive Director asking if the Institute would be interested in undertaking this work.

The proposal was prepared and submitted in partnership with the Moritz College of Law at Ohio State University. At the EAC's request, we proposed to handle the two research topics in sequence, first submitting a report on Provisional Voting and then preparing and submitting the report on Voter Identification. In describing the Voter Identification portion of the study, the proposal stated:

"We propose to test the hypothesis that more stringent voter ID requirements depress voter participation in general or for the poor, minorities and older voters in particular."

The proposal also included a plan to form a peer review group composed of scholars and practitioners in the areas of elections and voting to examine and comment on the research

The following pages provide a preliminary summary of our major contacts with the EAC during the course of the contract, with a focus on our work on Voter Identification. More extensive review of our files, including the monthly progress reports we submitted to the EAC, may find other relevant discussions, but this list at a minimum should provide a good overview.

May 25, 2005 - Contract awarded

May 26, 2005 - First meeting of Eagleton-Moritz team with EAC Commissioners and staff in Washington. After general discussion of EAC interest in both topics, Commissioner DiGregorio expresses concern that the composition of the project's peer review group was politically unbalanced. Eagleton had proposed including the following five individuals: R. Michael Alvarez, Professor of Political Science at California Institute of Technology; Martha E. Kropf, Assistant Professor of Political Science at the University of Missouri-Kansas City; Daniel H. Lowenstein, Professor of Law at UCLA; Tim Storey, Program Principal at the National Conference of State Legislatures; and Peter G. Verniero, former New Jersey Attorney General and Supreme Court Justice and current Counsel to Sills, Cummis, Epstein and Gross.

Commissioner DiGregorio subsequently suggests other names for our consideration. We are impressed by the list of people he provides and add three of them to the Peer Review Group: John C. Harrison, Professor of Law at the University of Virginia; Timothy G. O'Rourke, Dean of the Fulton School of Liberal Arts at Salisbury University; and Bradley Smith, Professor of Law at Capital University Law School. The Project Peer Review Group then had eight participants.

July 28, 2005 - Brief EAC Commissioners at a public meeting at Cal Tech on progress on the research. Briefing includes this status report on the Voter ID phase of the work: "statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state's voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters will be complete in late August."

August 9, 2005 - First telephone conference with Peer Review Group. Focus is draft Provisional Voting report.

September 6, 2005 - Meet with the EAC in Washington. Brief the Commission on the status of the research on provisional voting.

September 21, 2005 - Second telephone meeting of Project Peer Review Group.

September 30, 2005 - Conference call with EAC Commissioner Martinez and three members of the staff. Commissioner Martinez indicates EAC is generally more comfortable playing the role of a national clearinghouse and therefore prefers to issue reports as "Best Practices" than as "Provisional Guidance." Staff says Eagleton emphasis should be on what states should do as opposed to suggesting how they would do it. Commissioner Martinez concludes meeting saying, "We have been very well served by all the work you and Moritz have done."

008595

Feb. 22, 2006 - Conference call with Project Peer Review Group members after they have reviewed first draft of Voter Identification report. The Peer Reviewers suggest the statistical analysis: (1) Look at whether voter identification requirements are related to voter registration rates, as well as turnout; (2) Describe in further detail the basis for the aggregate and individual-level data analyses; (3) Clarify whether the report is examining turnout among citizens eligible to vote, or all individuals of voting age; (4) Stress in a footnote that Hispanics in the individual-level analysis are Hispanics who describe themselves as citizens who are eligible to vote; (5) Discuss in the Appendix the reasons why turnout rates appear to be higher in the Current Population Survey data than in other sources of data; and (6) Use predicted probabilities as opposed to odds ratios to describe the relationship between voter identification requirements and turnout.

Eagleton subsequently revises draft of the statistical analysis to address all these issues.

March 28, 2006 - Conference call with EAC staff and Eagleton-Moritz research team in advance of team's scheduled briefings of EAC Commissioners in Washington, D.C. on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification reports.

April 3, 2006 - Eagleton-Moritz morning meeting in Washington with EAC Commissioners Davidson and Hillman and staff members. Series of questions and responses on Voter ID methodology.

Commissioners ask whether respondents to the Current Population Survey might be non-citizens who said they were registered and voted. In a subsequent follow-up e-mail, Tim Vercellotti of Eagleton writes that the design of the CPS questionnaire skips non-citizens past questions about registration and voting. Commissioner Davidson asks if the team could examine the relationship between identification requirements and turnout over time. Team members respond that the information on state identification requirements for previous election cycles would require additional extensive research. Commissioner Hillman asks if the report could break out the relationship between voter identification and turnout for African-Americans with education levels of a high school diploma or less, or African-Americans below the poverty line.

Subsequent analyses examined these subgroups as suggested.

Eagleton-Moritz afternoon meeting with Commissioners DiGregorio and Martinez and EAC staff. Series of questions and answers. Commissioner Digregorio concludes he is "disappointed" with the report. Commissioner Martinez says he "appreciates" it.

April 13, 2006 - Conference call between Eagleton and EAC staff. EAC requests that Eagleton convene a conference call of the Project Peer Review Group with EAC staff and/or Commissioners to discuss the statistical analysis of the effects of various Voter Identification requirements on turnout.

EAC staff also reports that the EAC is going to convene its own second peer review group to seek feedback on review by the Project Peer Review Group.

EAC staff also reports that Eagleton is on the preliminary schedule to present Voter ID findings to the EAC's Advisory Board May meeting but that the date and location have not yet been set. EAC staff say they are "unsure where Voter ID project is going. We're going to have to see. We saw lines really drawn politically over Voter ID piece. We'll have to see what statements the agency chooses to make over this topic. It is the topic - It has nothing to do with you. The timing is such that Voter ID is a hot topic."

Defining Election Fraud

Election fraud is any intentional action, or intentional failure to act when there is a duty to do so, that corrupts the election process in a manner that can impact on election outcomes. This includes interfering in the process by which persons register to vote; the way in which ballots are obtained, marked, or tabulated; and the process by which election results are canvassed and certified.

Examples include the following:

- falsifying voter registration information pertinent to eligibility to cast a vote, (e.g. residence, criminal status, etc);
- altering completed voter registration applications by entering false information;
- knowingly destroying completed voter registration applications (other than spoiled applications) before they can be submitted to the proper election authority;
- knowingly removing eligible voters from voter registration lists, in violation of HAVA, NVRA, or state election laws;
- intentional destruction by election officials of voter registration records or balloting records, in violation of records retention laws, to remove evidence of election fraud;
- vote buying;
- voting in the name of another;
- voting more than once;
- coercing a voter's choice on an absentee ballot;
- using a false name and/or signature on an absentee ballot;
- destroying or misappropriating an absentee ballot;
- felons, or in some states ex-felons, who vote when they know they are ineligible to do so;
- misleading an ex-felon about his or her right to vote;
- voting by non-citizens who know they are ineligible to do so;
- intimidating practices aimed at vote suppression or deterrence, including the abuse of challenge laws;
- deceiving voters with false information (e.g.; deliberately directing voters to the wrong polling place or providing false information on polling hours and dates);
- knowingly failing to accept voter registration applications, to provide ballots, or to accept and count voted ballots in accordance with the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act;
- intentional miscounting of ballots by election officials;
- intentional misrepresentation of vote tallies by election officials;

008604

- acting in any other manner with the intention of suppressing voter registration or voting, or interfering with vote counting and the certification of the vote.

Voting fraud does not include mistakes made in the course of voter registration, balloting, or tabulating ballots and certifying results. For purposes of the EAC study, it also does not include violations of campaign finance laws.

U.S. Department of Justice Section 5 Recommendation Memorandum (Georgia voter identification)

Interviews

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.
- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, “dead” voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud, although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.
- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.
- Several people indicate – including representatives from DOJ – that for various reasons, the Department of Justice is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now and is focusing on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting and felon voting. While the civil rights section continues to focus on systemic patterns of malfeasance, the public integrity section is focusing now on individuals, on isolated instances of fraud.
- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed
- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.
  - With respect to the civil rights section, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one’s definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and the section has not pursued any such cases.
  - Craig Donsanto of the public integrity section says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases the department is investigating and the number of indictments the section is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, the department has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so it can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.
- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment
- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama’s “deceptive practices” bill
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected nonpartisanly they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas is a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states' office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.

- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots "for cause" only if it were politically feasible.
- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the scheme contemplated in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.
- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

Nexis Articles Analysis

Note: The search terms used were ones agreed upon by both Job Serebrov and Tova Wang and are available upon request. A more systematic, numerical analysis of the data contained in the Nexis charts is currently being undertaken. What follows is an overview.

Recommendation: In phase 2, consultants should conduct a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

Overview of the Articles

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

1. Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters
2. Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased
3. Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

1. Registering in the name of dead people
2. Fake names and other information on voter registration forms
3. Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms
4. Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses

5. Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported on included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places.
- Improper demands for identification
- Poll watchers harassing voters
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters
- Disproportionate police presence
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from "battleground" states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

"Dead Voters and Multiple Voting"

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking of voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person taking criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found 5 such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations in three particular jurisdictions as detailed in the vote buying summary. There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area. All of these cases are concentrated in the Midwest and South.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of voter registration forms. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case charges were filed against ten individuals. In one case a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem has the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Case Summaries

After reviewing over 40,000 cases, the majority of which came from appeals courts, I have found comparatively very few which are applicable to this study. Of those that are applicable, no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it seems that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility. But because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, I suggest that case research for the second phase of this project concentrate on state trial-level decisions.

Determining a Methodology for Measuring Voter Fraud and Intimidation: Recommendations of Political Scientists

The following is a summary of interviews conducted with a number of political scientists and experts in the field as to how one might undertake a comprehensive examination of voter fraud and intimidation. A list of the individuals interviewed and their ideas are available, and all of the individuals welcome any further questions or explanations of their recommended procedures.

- 1) In analyzing instances of alleged fraud and intimidation, we should look to criminology as a model. In criminology, experts use two sources: the Uniform Crime Reports, which are all reports made to the police, and the Victimization Survey, which asks the general public whether a particular incident has happened to them. After surveying what the most common allegations are, we should conduct a survey of the general public that ask whether they have committed certain acts or been subjected to any incidents of fraud or intimidation. This would require using a very large sample, and we would need to employ the services of an expert in survey data collection. (Stephen Ansolobhere, MIT)
- 2) Several political scientists with expertise in these types of studies recommended a methodology that includes interviews, focus groups, and a limited survey. In determining who to interview and where the focus groups should be drawn from, they recommend the following procedure:
  - Pick a number of places that have historically had many reports of fraud and/or intimidation; from that pool pick 10 that are geographically and demographically diverse, and have had a diversity of problems
  - Pick a number of places that have not had many reports of fraud and/or intimidation; from that pool pick 10 places that match the geographic and demographic make-up of the previous ten above (and, if possible, have comparable elections practices)
  - Assess the resulting overall reports and impressions resulting from these interviews and focus groups, and examine comparisons and differences among the states and what may give rise to them.

In conducting a survey of elections officials, district attorneys, district election officers, they recommend that:

- The survey sample be large in order to be able to get the necessary subsets
- The survey must include a random set of counties where there have and have not been a large number of allegations

(Allan Lichtman, American University; Thad Hall, University of Utah; Bernard Grofman, UC – Irvine)

- 3) Another political scientist recommended employing a methodology that relies on qualitative data drawn from in-depth interviews with key critics and experts on all sides of the debate on fraud; quantitative data collected through a survey of state and local elections and law enforcement officials; and case studies. Case studies should focus on the five or ten states, regions or cities where there has been a history of election fraud to examine past and present problems. The survey should be mailed to each state's attorney general and secretary of state, each county district attorney's office and each county board of elections in the 50 states. (Lorraine Minnite, Barnard College)
- 4) The research should be a two-step process. Using LexisNexis and other research tools, a search should be conducted of news media accounts over the past decade. Second, interviews with a systematic sample of election officials nationwide and in selected states should be conducted. (Chandler Davidson, Rice University)
- 5) One expert in the field posits that we can never come up with a number that accurately represents either the incidence of fraud or the incidence of voter intimidation. Therefore, the better approach is to do an assessment of what is most likely to happen, what election violations are most likely to be committed – in other words, a risk analysis. This would include an analysis of what it would actually take to commit various acts, e.g. the cost/benefit of each kind of violation. From there we could rank the likely prevalence of each type of activity and examine what measures are or could be effective in combating them. (Wendy Weiser, Brennan Center of New York University)
- 6) Replicate a study in the United States done abroad by Susan Hyde of the University of California- San Diego examining the impact of impartial poll site observers on the incidence of election fraud. Doing this retrospectively would require the following steps:
  - Find out where there were federal observers
  - Get precinct level voting information for those places
  - Analyze whether there was any difference in election outcomes in those places with and without observers, and whether any of these results seem anomalous.

Despite the tremendous differences in the political landscapes of the countries examined by Hyde in previous studies and the U.S., Hyde believes this study could be effectively replicated in this country by sending observers to a random sample of precincts. Rather than compare the incumbent's vote share, such factors such as voter complaints, voter turnout, number of provisional ballots used, composition of the electorate, as well as any anomalous voting results could be compared between sites with and without monitors.

For example, if intimidation is occurring, and if reputable monitors make intimidation less likely or voters more confident, then turnout should be higher on average in monitored precincts than in unmonitored precincts. If polling station officials are intentionally refusing to issue provisional ballots, and the polling station officials are more likely to adhere to regulations while being monitored, the average number of provisional ballots should be higher in monitored precincts than in unmonitored precincts. If monitors cause polling station officials to adhere more closely to regulations, then there should be fewer complaints (in general) about monitored than unmonitored precincts (this could also be reversed if monitors made voters more likely to complain).

Again, random assignment controls for all of the other factors that otherwise influence these variables.

One of the downsides of this approach is it does not get at some forms of fraud, e.g. absentee ballot fraud; those would have to be analyzed separately

7) Another political scientist recommends conducting an analysis of vote fraud claims and purging of registration rolls by list matching. Allegations of illegal voting often are based on matching of names and birth dates. Alleged instances of double voting are based on matching the names and birth dates of persons found on voting records. Allegations of ineligible felon (depending on state law), deceased, and of non-citizen voting are based on matching lists of names, birth dates, and sometimes addresses of such people against a voting records. Anyone with basic relational database skills can perform such matching in a matter of minutes.

However, there are a number of pitfalls for the unwary that can lead to grossly over-estimating the number of fraudulent votes, such as missing or ignored middle names and suffixes or matching on missing birth dates. Furthermore, there is a surprising statistical fact that a group of about three hundred people with the same first and last name are almost assured to share the exact same birth date, including year. In a large state, it is not uncommon for hundreds of Robert Smiths (and other common names) to have voted. Thus, allegations of vote fraud or purging of voter registration rolls by list matching almost assuredly will find a large proportion of false positives: people who voted legally or are registered to vote legally.

Statistics can be rigorously applied to determine how many names would be expected to be matched by chance. A simulation approach is best applied here: randomly assign a birth date to an arbitrary number of people and observe how many match within the list or across lists. The simulation is repeated many times to average out the variation due to chance. The results can then be matched back to actual voting records and purge lists, for example, in the hotly contested states of Ohio or Florida, or in states with Election Day registration where there are concerns that easy access to voting permits double voting. This analysis will rigorously identify the magnitude alleged voter fraud, and may very well find instances of alleged fraud that exceed what might have otherwise happened by chance.

This same political scientist also recommends another way to examine the problem: look at statistics on provisional voting: the number cast might provide indications of intimidation (people being challenged at the polls) and the number of those not counted would be indications of "vote fraud." One could look at those jurisdictions in the Election Day Survey with a disproportionate number of provisional ballots cast and cross reference it with demographics and number of provisional ballots discarded. (Michael McDonald, George Mason University)

- 8) Spencer Overton, in a forthcoming law review article entitled Voter Identification, suggests a methodology that employs three approaches— investigations of voter fraud, random surveys of voters who purported to vote, and an examination of death rolls provide a better understanding of the frequency of fraud. He says all three approaches have strengths and weaknesses, and thus the best studies would employ all three to assess the extent of voter fraud. An excerpt follows:

1. Investigations and Prosecutions of Voter Fraud

Policymakers should develop databases that record all investigations, allegations, charges, trials, convictions, acquittals, and plea bargains regarding voter fraud. Existing studies are incomplete but provide some insight. For example, a statewide survey of each of Ohio's 88 county boards of elections found only four instances of ineligible persons attempting to vote out of a total of 9,078,728 votes cast in the state's 2002 and 2004 general elections. This is a fraud rate of 0.00000045 percent. The Carter-Baker Commission's Report noted that since October 2002, federal officials had charged 89 individuals with casting multiple votes, providing false information about their felon status, buying votes, submitting false voter registration information, and voting improperly as a non-citizen. Examined in the context of the 196,139,871 ballots cast between October 2002 and August 2005, this represents a fraud rate of 0.0000005 percent (note also that not all of the activities charged would have been prevented by a photo identification requirement).

A more comprehensive study should distinguish voter fraud that could be prevented by a photo identification requirement from other types of fraud — such as absentee voting and stuffing ballot boxes — and obtain statistics on the factors that led law enforcement to prosecute fraud. The study would demand significant resources because it would require that researchers interview and pour over the records of local district attorneys and election boards.

Hard data on investigations, allegations, charges, pleas, and prosecutions is important because it quantifies the amount of fraud officials detect. Even if prosecutors vigorously pursue voter fraud, however, the number of fraud cases charged probably does not capture the total amount of voter fraud. Information on official investigations, charges, and prosecutions should be supplemented by surveys of voters and a comparison of voting rolls to death rolls.

Random surveys could give insight about the percentage of votes cast fraudulently. For example, political scientists could contact a statistically representative sampling of 1,000 people who purportedly voted at the polls in the last election, ask them if they actually voted, and confirm the percentage who are valid voters. Researchers should conduct the survey soon after an election to locate as many legitimate voters as possible with fresh memories.

Because many respondents would perceive voting as a social good, some who did not vote might claim that they did, which may underestimate the extent of fraud. A surveyor might mitigate this skew through the framing of the question (“I’ve got a record that you voted. Is that true?”).

Further, some voters will not be located by researchers and others will refuse to talk to researchers. Photo identification proponents might construe these non-respondents as improper registrations that were used to commit voter fraud.

Instead of surveying all voters to determine the amount of fraud, researchers might reduce the margin of error by focusing on a random sampling of voters who signed affidavits in the three states that request photo identification but also allow voters to establish their identity through affidavit—Florida, Louisiana, and South Dakota. In South Dakota, for example, only two percent of voters signed affidavits to establish their identity. If the survey indicates that 95 percent of those who signed affidavits are legitimate voters (and the other 5 percent were shown to be either fraudulent or were non-responsive), this suggests that voter fraud accounts for, at the maximum, 0.1 percent of ballots cast.

The affidavit study, however, is limited to three states, and it is unclear whether this sample is representative of other states (the difficulty may be magnified in Louisiana in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina’s displacement of hundreds of thousands of voters). Further, the affidavit study reveals information about the amount of fraud in a photo identification state with an affidavit exception—more voter fraud may exist in a state that does not request photo identification.

3. Examining Death Rolls

A comparison of death rolls to voting rolls might also provide an estimate of fraud.

Imagine that one million people live in state A, which has no documentary identification requirement. Death records show that 20,000 people passed away in state A in 2003. A cross-referencing of this list to the voter rolls shows that 10,000 of those who died were registered voters, and these names remained on the voter rolls during the November 2004 election. Researchers would look at what percentage of the 10,000 dead-but-registered people who “voted” in the November 2004 election. A researcher should distinguish the votes cast in the name of the dead at the polls from those cast absentee (which a photo identification requirement would not prevent). This number would be extrapolated to the electorate as a whole.

This methodology also has its strengths and weaknesses. If fraudulent voters target the dead, the study might overestimate the fraud that exists among living voters (although a low incidence of fraud among deceased voters might suggest that fraud among all voters is low). The appearance of fraud also might be inflated by false positives produced by a computer match of different people with the same name. Photo identification advocates would likely assert that the rate of voter fraud could be higher among fictitious names registered, and that the death record survey would not capture that type of fraud because fictitious names registered would not show up in the death records. Nevertheless, this study, combined with the other two, would provide important insight into the magnitude of fraud likely to exist in the absence of a photo identification requirement.

October 17, 2006

Ms. Wendy R. Weiser
Deputy Director, Democracy Program
Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law
161 Avenue of the Americas, 12th Floor
New York, NY 10013

Dear Ms. Weiser:

Thank you for your request for information regarding U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) research projects on voter fraud and voter intimidation, provisional ballots and voter identification.

The status report on voter fraud and voter intimidation, prepared by EAC staff, and the draft report on provisional voting, prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics and the Moritz College of Law, are enclosed. EAC personnel are in the process of drafting a report about voter identification. The report will be made available upon completion.

Status documents about voter fraud and voter intimidation and provisional voting were presented to the EAC's Standards Board and Board of Advisors at a public meeting held in May 2006. Neither of these documents were final EAC reports. Per the Help America Vote Act (HAVA), the EAC works with its advisory boards to gather input on activities, including research projects. After discussing the provisional voting research with our advisory boards, they requested further research and clarification and noted that some of information was inaccurate or incomplete. Please see the attached resolutions passed by both entities outlining their concerns. As such, EAC is currently reviewing the draft report on provisional voting to address the concerns of the agency's advisory boards.

As a small agency of only 23 employees, including four commissioners, it is necessary for EAC to contract with third parties and experts to conduct research. The information provided by third parties is used by staff to develop EAC final policy or reports. No documents, drafts or third party recommendations submitted to EAC constitute official EAC policy or opinion and should not be identified or referred to as such.

Please note that our Standards Board and Advisory Board meetings are open to the public and are publicized on the EAC website at www.eac.gov and posted in the Federal Register.

Thank you for your interest, and let us know if we can be of further assistance.

Sincerely,

2 MS. SIMS: We're still missing one.

3 Our chairman and vice-chairman will be coming by 4 and participating for part of the program.

5 Right now, they are trying to finish up their
6 own meeting, a little discussion.

7 My name is Peggy Sims. I have been
8 with the EAC since April, 2004. Prior to that 9 time, I worked for 18 years with the FEC
10 national clearinghouse in election
11 administration, and I am the contracting officer
12 on this project, so that's how I got involved.

13 I would like to just quickly -- this
14 is really our consultants' meeting, but before

15 we get into that, I just wanted to review,
16 review our authority in this area. Obviously,
17 we have no enforcement authority when it comes 18 to voting fraud, but under HAVA, we're charged 19 with developing national statistics on voter
20 fraud, and methods of deterring and 21 investigating vote fraud, which we obviously 22 have to do in consultation with the folks who

1 actually do the enforcement.

2           we also are charged with developing
3 ways of identifying, deterring, and
4 investigating methods of voter intimidation, as 5 many of us feel is really a subset of voting
6 fraud, but it may be something when we get to 7 the definition phrase, we may want to talk a
8 little bit more about what we mean by 9 intimidation because it seems to mean different
10 things to different people.

11           The focus of this project was to do
12 some preliminary research just to get us
13 started. We selected a bipartisan team of 14 consultants to develop a comprehensive drafted
15 description of what constitutes voting fraud and 16 voter intimidation, and to perform some 17 background research, which they will review, to 18 establish a project working group, convene the 19 working group, and basically we're looking for 20 your ideas as we go along.

21           Once the working group is completed,
22 we're going to keep a transcript of this

1 session. We will also keep lots of notes. They
2 are going to take your recommendations and fold
3 those into a final report that goes to our 4 Commissioners. Ultimately, that report, if we 5 have any clarifications or corrections, we will
6 deal with our consultants first, and then it
7 will go to our Standards Board and Board of 8 Advisors for review and comment as well. That's 9 something that we're required to do with all of 10 our research under HAVA.

11                   The purpose of the working group is 12 to collect experts in this area. We have 13 election officials, state and local, we have 14 applicants, and some serve more than one
15 function. And given the preliminary research,
16 and your expertise and EAC authority under HAVA,
17 we would like you to provide ideas as to where 18 is EAC supposed to go from here, and what should 19 we follow up with additional research, other 20 additional efforts that we can mount, given our 21 authority in this area.

22                   we aren't here to debate what other

1 agencies are supposed to do, or what
2 organizations should or should not be doing.
3 We're focusing on what EAC can do. And one of 4 the things EAC can do is offer help to other
5 election officials, states, and other agencies
6 perhaps, but we don't have any enforcement
7 authority and we don't have any authority to

Transcript 051806

8 tell other agencies what to do.

9           Okay. What I'd like to do is just 10 start going around the table and have everybody
11 say a little bit about themselves. Most of you
12 know each other, but I also want to have the 13 ladies back here introduce themselves as well.
14 May I start here?

15           MR. SEREBROV: I don't exist.

16           MS. SIMS: You don't exist?

17           MR. SEREBROV: I'm just here for fun.

18           MS. SIMS: Then we'll have them pick
19 it up from here.

20           MR. SEREBROV: I am Job Serebrov from 21 Arkansas. I have practiced election law for 22 approximately 15 years, both in Arkansas and

1 other southern states, and internationally.
2 I helped review and draft changes to the 3 election code in Libya. I served as an Election
4 Commissioner in Arkansas for six years. I have
5 drafted some election statutes in Arkansas
6 itself, and I was general counsel for the 7 election ballot fraud committee for the 8 Republican Party in Arkansas, appointed by 9 Hutchinson. I had an Arkansas organization
10 called Our Kansas For Fair Elections, which 11 operated for about seven years.

12           How much more do you want?

13           MS. SIMS: If you're comfortable with 14 that, that's fine.

15           MR. SEREBROV: Any other questions

008632

16 can be referred to my secretary -- no.

17 MS. WANG: I am Tova Wang. I am a
18 fellow with the Century Foundation, which is a
19 nonpartisan think tank, based both in New York
20 and here in D.C.. I have been involved in 21 politics since adulthood, but I have been 22 working on these issues since the 2000 election.

1 I have been working on the issues since then and
2 a career was born. With the problems we
3 continue to have, the career will be maintained.
4 I am also a lawyer by training.

5 MR. ROKITA: I am Todd Rokita,
6 Secretary of State of the State of Indiana. I
7 also do a lot of election administration,
8 election reform, and I think I can represent all
9 of the secretaries of states in the nation with 10 this sentence; it has become more and more our 11 career as well, although this secretary will 12 tell you that I don't want it to be.

13 I look for these reforms to be 14 finite, to a certain extent in length, to be 15 read as problem solved. I have other divisions
16 in my office that I would like to put some more
17 attention to, quite honestly, but we definitely 18 see the need for these reforms, at least some of 19 them.

20 MR. BAUER: My name is Bob Bauer, one
21 the partners of a law firm. I have been 22 practicing election law since 1977, and I have

1 experience, largely through political parties,
2 with this issue but also in other ways through
3 other conferences or professional discoveries
4 related to my area of practice.

5 MS. SIMS: Thank you.

6 MR. GREENBAUM: I am Jon Greenbaum,
7 Director of the Voting Rights Project. I am
8 actually here for my executive director. After 9 the 2000 election and problems that occurred,
10 the civil rights community saw the need for a
11 nonpartisan organization or coalition of groups
12 to deal with the problems that were apparent
13 from that election, and so Election Protection
14 was formed. The lawyers committee has
15 essentially been the legal lead of the Election
16 Protection Coalition since it's inception. In 17 2004, we had roughly 8,000 legal volunteers who 18 staffed a hot line that received 110,000 calls
19 on Election Day and 200,000 calls during the 20 election process that had attorneys out in the 21 field, legal volunteers out at the field, at the 22 polls, at legal coordinating committees, and as 10

1 mobile field units.

2 we plan on, in sort of going forward
3 since the 2004 election, we work on both
4 election protection and electoral reform issues.
5 We see those as kind of being interconnected.
6 And as one, we created something within my
7 project called the National Campaign for Fair

8 Elections, which is specifically designed to 9 work on those issues. And I want to thank the 10 EAC for inviting us to take part in this. Oh,
11 and prior to that, I worked at the Department of 12 Justice in the civil rights division in the 13 voting section with Barry, during my time there
14 for seven years, and I enforced basically all
15 the voting rights laws, all the federal voting
16 rights laws there.

17 MR. GINSBERG: I am Ben Ginsberg. I
18 a partner at Patton, Boggs, here in Washington.
19 I have been practicing election law since 1982.

20 MS. ROGERS: My name is Kathy Rogers.
21 I am Director of Elections for the State of 22 Georgia. I am one of the people who did not

11

1 intend to grow up being an election official. I
2 started my career almost three decades ago as a
3 poll worker many, many years ago, and I am very
4 pleased now to be able to, in the position I am
5 in right now, appreciate the opportunity to work
6 on this groups.

7 Those of us who are election
8 officials often enjoy reading things that 9 analysts and esteemed attorneys have put 10 together. And frequently we're the ones who are 11 trying to implement the election while taking 12 everything into account. So I think this group
13 has a great focus.

14 MR. WEINBERG: My name is Barry
15 Weinberg. I was the acting chief and deputy

16 chief of the civil rights division voting
17 section of the U. S. Department of Justice,
18 there for 25 years. I supervised the Justice
19 Department and the Federal Reserve Program, as 20 well as all kind of law enforcement, including 21 national voter registration. I retired in 22 January, 2000. Since then, I have kept some 12

1 contact going. My wife and I have an article in
2 the Temple Law Review called, Problems in 3 America's Polling Places, how They Can Be
4 Stopped," and doing some work internationally,
5 election monitoring, lecturing, seminars,
6 traveling. Before that, we were in Liberia
7 doing seminars on election dispute resolution,
8 and that has formed the basis for a book I have 9 written coming out next month called,
10 "Resolution of Election Disputes." That will be 11 the principles that can be used in election
12 challenges.

13 MR. PEREZ: I am J.R. Perez,
14 Elections Administration for a county in 15 Guadelupe, Texas. Let me give you a little 16 information about an election administrator. I
17 am neutral because the position is hired by 18 three out of five commissioners, and fired four 19 out of five. I have got a lot of autonomy and 20 it makes it easy for me to be independent and 21 implement policy that is not necessarily 22 political and going with the current flow, but

13

Transcript 051806

1 it has allowed me a lot of durability in the
2 trenches. I have been doing it for about four 3 years in the front line. If anybody has been 4 around election like you all have, you know on 5 the front line there's casualties coming and 6 going on a regular basis.

7 I am hoping that I can bring any type
8 of insight to you, in terms of how we handle
9 those incidences of those telephone calls, and 10 how we can hopefully explain the difference 11 between the theoretical concept of election and 12 the actual practicality of election, because 13 there is a great distinction in a lot of 14 people's minds. They don't necessarily 15 understand what we're trying to accomplish, and 16 they have a lot of confusion in terms of how 17 we're doing it, why we're doing it, why it's not 18 living up to the mythical dream that a lot of 19 people put it into.

20 MR. CORTES: Edgardo Cortes. I am an
21 election research specialist here at the EAC. I
22 have been here since July of last year. Prior

14

1 to that, I did some campaign work and also ran a
2 national voter registration campaign focused on 3 the Latino community.

4 MR. DON SANTO: I am Craig Donsanto,
5 with the election branch of the U. S. Department
6 of Justice. I have been practicing election law
7 since 1972. I am responsible for overseeing all
8 investigations and prosecutions brought in the

Transcript 051806

9 United States at the federal level involving 10 voting and the financing of political campaign.
11 I have a member of the EAC's Board of Advisors,
12 and I have also, as Barry alluded to, done quite 13 a bit of work internationally, both with him and 14 occasionally without him, helping emerging
15 democracies write election laws.

16 MS. SIMS: Thank you.

17 I just want to introduce the woman behind me
18 because they really helped us pull this meeting
19 together. Without their support, we wouldn't be 20 where we are right now.

21 we have got Elle Culver, who is a
22 special assistant to Commissioner Davidson. we 15

1 have got Devon Rome, missing who is an intern
2 working on her masters degree in social science,
3 sociology. Thank you.

4 Laiza, I forget where you are.

5 LAIZA: Soon to begin the masters in
6 political science, which I work in the research
7 department, and I'm going to get to know some of 8 the election officials because I will be 9 conducting a 2006 election survey. So you will 10 get to see plenty of e-mails from myself.

11 MR. ROKITA: Surveys, love them.

12 MS. SIMS: I would like you to tell
13 me, I notice you have served as a legal intern.
14 Tell us where you are in that process.

15 TAMAR: I just finished my second 16 year of law school at George Mason, and I have

008638

17 been at the EAC for a year.

18 MS. SIMS: Now, I know on our agenda
19 it mentions we would talk about other EAC
20 projects but it dawned on me that might be more
21 appropriate later on, just before we get to 22 ideas for future EAC action, because then I can

16

1 review things that we're already doing. So we
2 won't spend a lot of time and go on to what we
3 still need to do.

4 MS. WANG: I'm going to try and
5 briefly over go over the work we have already
6 done. You got sent tons of material, and I'm 7 not sure if anybody looked at it, but hopefully,
8 you looked at at least the paper summaries of 9 things.

10 The first thing I really want to 11 emphasize about the work that we did, although 12 we split up some of the work, everything that we 13 produced was signed off on by the other person.
14 Everything that you're seeing here is a product
15 in that sense. We agreed on the steps that we 16 would take to produce these materials.

17 And the second point you should bear
18 in mind is, Job and I pretty much worked on this
19 entirely alone, without any support staff. So 20 if you see typos on things, I apologize for 21 that.

22 Generally, the time period that we

17

1 covered in the research we were doing was
2 January 1 of 2001 to January 1 of 2006, all
3 those, Job's cases, went before that a little
4 bit, the reason being, it would be too unwieldy
5 to try and sort through all the materials that 6 came out of the 2000 election because there is 7 just so much, and there's been so much since
8 then that it seems sort of a natural place to 9 begin. And also the Help America Vote Act had 10 been passed subsequently, so it seems like maybe
11 improvements had been made and we should take it
12 from there.

13           The first thing I think on the 14 agenda, that we should talk about the literature
15 and the reports that we went over. We tried to 16 do a review of all the existing research we 17 could find on this topic. I think you have a
18 list of all the pieces that we looked at. On 19 the CD is the summaries we looked at. We looked 20 at a range of things; Government documents,
21 academic studies, reports from advocacy groups.

22           As to how we chose the pieces that we 18

1 reviewed, to some extent, I already had a lot of
2 them and knew about a lot of them because I had
3 been working on this for a while. Other people
4 suggested them and we did searches for anything
5 that we might have missed after that.

6           So just to maybe go over some of the 7 highlights, I don't want to go into the details
8 of the existing literature too much because they

9 are really sort of all over the place. There
10 are a couple things that I will say about them
11 generally that I talk about in the summary,
12 which is, that they are mostly anecdotal. This 13 is no surprise to any of us sitting here. There
14 is really little research that is scientific or 15 systematic, which is part of the reason this 16 project was undertaken. I saw McDonald work as 17 the most systematic, but those probably don't go
18 far enough. And I talked to a number of 19 researchers about this, and I think one thing --
20 and I will get more into this when we talk about 21 the methodologies that I suggested -- this is a
22 very difficult undertaking, I think we all

19

1 realize this. To do it right in any kind of
2 scientific way would require tremendous
3 researches, mother than any academic or advocacy
4 group, that is. It is my personal believe, and
5 I have been told, there probably will be a
6 second phase to this that will maybe commit the 7 resources that are necessary to do it right.

8           The one other thing that I will say
9 about the existing research that we looked at is 10 that I think, by the nature of them, there is 11 very little follow-up. So you have books and 12 reports that make a number of allegations of 13 things that happened in a particular election,
14 but then you don't have the benefit of then
15 hindsight, to see what actually ended up
16 happening in the case. So you have

17 investigations of acts of something happened,
18 but you don't know if that ended up being an 19 administrative error or it ended up being 20 someone just crying wolf. While literature is 21 helpful, it really only takes you so far.

22 Are there any questions about that or 20

1 anything you want to comment about the
2 literature review that we've done?

3 MR. ROKITA: What's our current
4 budget for this project, and why do we think
5 there is going to be a Phase 2?

6 MS. SIMS: Well, Phase 2 would be
7 subsequent to the fiscal year, after we have 8 gone through the final report, that would 9 include the recommendations for future action.

10 MR. ROKITA: So that would be a vote
11 from the standards board?

12 MS. SIMS: I would have to ask the 13 commissioners that are actually handling the 14 details of that. I'm not sure it actually takes 15 a vote, but generally, it requires some comment
16 by the boards. The boards absolutely have to 17 have input on that.

18 MR. ROKITA: So if I understand, part
19 of our charge here is to give some direction for 20 this phase?

21 MS. SIMS: What we're looking for 22 from the working group is to brainstorm ideas

21

1 for possible future research. We may combine
Page 15

2 them into one or we may have different stages,
3 depending on what ideas come up and what the 4 Commissioners think that we can do, and our
5 Boards of Advisors and our Standards Board.

6 MR. ROKITA: So we're supposed to 7 think of these ideas, unbridled by any fiscal 8 constraints?

9 MS. SIMS: Yes. We'll have to worry
10 about the fiscal aspect when we get to that 11 point.

12 MR. GINSBERG: And our commission is 13 all about research.

14 MS. SIMS: We can provide
15 information. A lot of that is done through 16 research. We do research and provide the 17 results of that research to state legislatures
18 and anybody else who is interested. Now, you
19 have to realize, I came from the FEC where we 20 were hidden away. The office, six of us, that 21 was the whole office. Now, we have much more
22 visibility. So it is easier to get the word

22

1 out, get information out, but a lot of times
2 that information is based on research. We do
3 have to have some kind of research before we can
4 pass the information along, in terms of best
5 practices. It could be things -- well, we may 6 want -- I am jumping ahead of myself, but when 7 we get to the ideas on subsequent research, we 8 can talk about some of the findings that these
9 folks came up with, just in this limited

10 preliminary research, and what we might be able 11 to do with that, or what we might be able to 12 build on that already exists, but yes, we're
13 focusing on research, and that research does end
14 up being distributed via our website or in 15 response to individual inquiries.

16 MS. WANG: Ultimately, it could
17 result in something like guidelines or 18 recommendations or best practices.

19 MS. SIMS: And that all goes up on 20 our website.

21 MR. SEREBROV: We all introduced
22 ourselves. You've got the floor.

23

1 MR. HEARNE: I am Thor Hearne. I am
2 an attorney. I have practiced in the election
3 law area for a number of years now. I have been
4 involved in a number of different litigations,
5 as well as efforts on that front, counsel to the
6 American Center For Voting Rights.

7 MS. WANG: The only thing of 8 substance we have gone over, I was just 9 reviewing the literature that we had reviewed
10 and summarized what you have in your own
11 materials. Also in your materials, you have a 12 list of the people that we interviewed, and on 13 the CD, you have summaries of the interviews
14 themselves. Most of these interviews were 15 extremely informative and very helpful,
16 insightful. We chose the interviewees by coming 17 up with the categories of types of people we

18 wanted to talk to, and filled those categories
19 with equal numbers from each of us.

20 MR. SEREBROV: Unfortunately, not all
21 the people we wanted to talk to talked to us.

22 MS. WANG: Right. But also due to 24

1 time and resource constraints, we came up with
2 an original list, ten miles long, people we
3 would love to talk to.

4 There were certain categories that we
5 had to eliminate. For example, we don't have 6 any local DAS, again which is something for 7 later on that I would definitely advocate that 8 the next phase do. The ultimate category the 9 people we were able to talk to included
10 academics, election officials, lawyers, and 11 judges.

12 There were a few people who didn't
13 want to talk to us, mostly judges.

14 MR. SEREBROV: Although one did.

15 MS. WANG: We got one judge. Again,
16 all the interviews were conducted by both of us.
17 We split up the drafting of the summaries, but 18 they were reviewed and approved by the other
19 person, so they represent our impressions of the 20 interviews, both of us.

21 Just to go over quickly some of the 22 highlights from those interviews that I have in 25

1 the summary that you have of the interviews, we

2 did find pretty much, overwhelmingly, that
3 absentee fraud is the biggest problem, and vote
4 fraud would come in behind that. There was
5 widespread polling place fraud. Dead voting,
6 impersonation voting, there were a couple people
7 who thought that was a problem. Most people did
8 not.

9           In terms of intimidation, the whole
10 issue of challengers pre election and election
11 day challengers, decidedly most often as the 12 current concern in terms of intimidation.
13 However, at some of the more what we think of as 14 classic examples were brought up with us,
15 particularly very starkly in Native American
16 communities.

17           There was also the usual poll worker
18 harassing people, people taking pictures of 19 voting, and that kind of thing. With all due
20 respect to the people from the Department of 21 Justice here, the people we interviewed told us
22 that for various reasons, the Department of 26

1 Justice is bringing fewer cases now and is
2 focusing much more on non-citizen voting, felon
3 voting, and double voting, while the civil 4 rights public integrity section is focusing on
5 individuals and isolated instances of fraud
6 issues. And I know you don't agree with that,
7 but that's what across the board, people from 8 all sides of this said to us. That's the 9 perception. As usual, the voting lists were a

10 major concern, although, hopefully, that is 11 being taken care of by the state registration
12 databases.

13           Among the common recommendations,
14 getting back to the point we were just talking
15 about, many of the people we interviewed
16 supported stronger criminal laws, increased
17 enforcement of existing laws. Advocates from 18 across the spectrum expressed frustration with 19 the failure of the Department of Justice to 20 pursue more complaints. Mr. Donsanto told us
21 they were bringing fewer section 2 cases, but 22 fewer were warranted, a lot had been achieved

27

1 and it wasn't as much as problem. Mr. Donsanto
2 told us election fraud cases had not gone up
3 since 2002, but the number of cases the 4 department is investigating and pursuing has 5 gone up dramatically, and that since 2002, the 6 department has brought more cases against alien
7 voters, double voters, than ever before.

8           In terms of more recommendations, a
9 couple of people suggested some kind of new law
10 that would make it easier to criminally
11 prosecute people for intimidation, even when 12 there is not racial interments involved. People
13 were hopeful about the statewide voter
14 registration databases. People advocated for 15 expanded monitoring of the polls, hopefully, by 16 the department or maybe others.

17           There were a number of people who

18 suggested that the challenge laws needed to be 19 revised in some states. I was surprised to 20 learn, in some states, you can challenge a 21 person with little to no basis for doing so, and 22 really sort of bog up the estimation that way.

28

1 There ought to be some serious look at the
2 various challenge laws, and the ones that have
3 that kind of thing going on that shouldn't be
4 happening. People advocated for the deceptive
5 practices bill currently sponsored by Burrock
6 Obama. There was a surprising split whether 7 partisan administration of elections would be
8 helpful. Some people felt it was a good idea
9 and some people thought partisan people, without 10 the partisan tag. Some academics were 11 advocating for going back to for cause only 12 absentee voting, but that didn't seem
13 politically practical right now. Two people
14 advocated a national identification card.

15                   Anything I can answer? The great 16 nexus undertaking adventure. Initially, Job and 17 I came up with enormous search terms that could 18 be used to try and do a nexus search that would 19 come up with every case of fraud and 20 intimidation that happened in the last five 21 years. We determined quickly that would be
22 impossible. We agreed I would do the nexus

29

1 search, trying to be a little more creative,
2 using different combinations of terms that would

Transcript 051806

3 hopefully yield the same kind of result. Job
4 approved all of the search terms as I went
5 along. As I collected them, and you have this 6 on your CD, I have them on Excel spread sheets
7 to try and break down the articles so they can
8 be analyzed for patterns.

9           Each fraud was broken down by where 10 it took place, the date, what the allegation
11 was, the news publication it came from, and 12 where there was a follow-up article, whether 13 there had been any subsequent resolution to the 14 allegations. I am currently working on further
15 refining those, and I don't have it to produce,
16 to try and break it down more carefully, analyze 17 it. I want to include sub categories. So, for 18 example, when you're talking about absentee, you
19 have it broken down whether it was forgery of 20 that person's name or something like that. I am
21 also trying to refine it so you can see from the 22 chart who made the allegation, whether there was □ 30

1 any type of investigation, criminal, civil
2 action taken, whether there ought to be
3 follow-up research to determine what happened in 4 the case. For drawn out, complicated cases, you
5 have a description of the case. South Dakota,
6 Wisconsin, and Washington State.

7           Just to go over the highlights again
8 of the articles, none of this has come as news
9 to you, there are a bunch of ways that absentee
10 ballot fraud is committed. This was one area in

11 news articles, there were a substantial number
12 of official investigations and actual charges
13 filed. In terms of voter registration files,
14 again, you won't be surprised by the variety of 15 ways in which people commit voter registration
16 fraud using fake names, names of dead people.
17 You also have voters being tricked by a
18 particular party under false pretenses and also 19 the description of voter registration forms,
20 depending on your party. There was only one
21 article of a non-citizen registering to vote.
22 And, in general, many of the instances did

31

1 include official investigations and charges
2 filed, but from what I found in the initial
3 search, few actual convictions.

4           On voter intimidation and
5 suppression, this is a very thick chart because
6 there were so many allegations during the 2004
7 election, particularly on the challenge issue.
8 Almost none of these cases of intimidation that
9 were claimed in these articles were investigated
10 criminally or prosecuted criminally. And like I
11 said, with respect to the existing literature
12 and the interviews, challenges, that was the 13 number one topic but there was also, again, the 14 classic examples of photographing people leaving
15 the home, police presence, that kind of thing.
16 And also it wouldn't surprise you to know most 17 of these articles came out of battleground
18 states.

19                   In terms of dead voter, there were a
20 lot of people voting in the name of the dead,
21 big numbers of people committing these
22 frauds, and relatively view of these allegations

32

1 turned out to be accurate, in terms of the
2 verifications by the newspapers themselves,
3 election officials, and criminal investigators.
4 Often the problem turned out to be the result of
5 administrative error, poll workers mismarking
6 lists with the names of the people who voted.
7 There were a few cases of actual charges and 8 convictions of people voting or engaged in these 9 kind of activities. Interestingly, it seemed 10 that most of those cases involved the person
11 voting by absentee and voting again at the 12 polls. There were a handful of instances where 13 people voted early, and voted on Election Day,
14 although some of that seemed to be confusion
15 about what you are allowed to do.

16                   There were a number of vote fraud
17 cases, and these are completely focused in the 18 midwest and the south. And you will see in the 19 vote buying summary that's in there, three or 20 four locations where this seems to be a 21 perennial problem, and it doesn't seem to be 22 that much of a problem in other parts of the 33

1 country.

2                   Deceptive practices, we saw a lot of

3 that come out in 2004. You probably all heard
4 about it the fliers, and the phone calls with 5 miss information about voting procedures. A
6 disproportionate number of them from
7 battleground states, in Florida, Ohio, and 8 Pennsylvania, only one case, and this is just 9 from news articles, was actually investigated.
10 That was the case in Oregon where the FBI did
11 investigate the destruction of voter
12 registration forms that were filled out by 13 people and then destroyed allegedly, according 14 to one party, but there were no other reports of 15 prosecutions on this case or on any of the other
16 deceptive practices cases.

17           There were surprisingly few articles
18 about non-citizen voting, something you heard a 19 lot about, but not something that seems to 20 happen very much.

21           On felon voting, there were only 13
22 actual cases, but they all involved rather large

34

1 numbers of people. You probably know this. A
2 lot of it is coming out of the Washington State
3 situation and the Wisconsin situation.

4           And, finally, with respect to fraud
5 being committed by election officials, I think
6 that's very hard to judge from news reports
7 because it is very difficult to make that 8 distinction between something was in error and 9 when something was done purposely and with 10 malfeasance in an actual crime. So that's

11 probably not the best way to look at that, and 12 that's what I have for that.

13           And, again, I know this is jumping
14 ahead, but I will say it now because I feel the 15 need to. These search terms that we used and 16 what these search terms came up with, and there
17 may be subsequent articles about these that 18 would go further in telling you how the actual 19 allegation was resolved, whether it turned out
20 to be accurate or not. One of my main
21 suggestions that I will talk about more later
22 on, if there is a next phase of this, that using

35

1 the charts that have already been created to
2 follow up nexus research to see if there were 3 further articles about the same cases to see
4 what happened. Because although I have a slot
5 in there, a column in there for subsequent 6 resolution, you will see it's not filled in very 7 often, and that's it.

8           And if there are any questions.

9           MR. ROKITA: Can you just review for 10 me what the purpose of gathering all this was,
11 in relation to our statutory guideline here?

12           MS. WANG: Well, we're trying to just 13 sort of get the lay of the land on this issue.
14 And, obviously, doing the nexus search alone
15 would not have provided that but we felt it
16 would be one useful tool in trying to do an 17 initial gauge of what's going on, also,
18 including the interviews, including the existing 19 research and the cases that Job will be talking

20 about.

21 MR. ROKITA: And the interviews we 22 had, we asked them for their ideas for 36

1 developing nationwide statistics and methods of
2 identifying or developing ways of identifying or 3 deferring, investigating voter intimidation, or 4 did we just try to get color from them as to 5 what the main issue was?

6 MS. WANG: No. We asked every single
7 person we talked to what their thoughts were on 8 how to improve the system, what ought to be done
9 to reform it and solve some of these problems.
10 It was an open-ended question. We didn't say do
11 you favor the development of national statistics
12 or something.

13 MR. ROKITA: Or how you would do it.

14 MS. WANG: That I will talk about
15 later. We limited that aspect of it to talking
16 to people who were basically political
17 scientists, who I think are in the best position
18 to tell us what is a scientifically sound method
19 for trying to get some kind of accurate take on 20 this.

21 MS. WANG: Chandler Davidson, and I
22 have the list with me. It talks about other

37

1 political scientists for the methodology issue.

2 MR. SEREBROV: Aside from DOJ cases,
3 closed DOG cases, which were put in a separate

4 chart initially, I came up with a laundry list
5 of search terms, and then Tova looked at that
6 list and added another list of search terms.
7 So by the time we got it to the Commission to 8 run the electronic search, the terms were
9 probably two pages long. And what, in essence,
10 we came up with was the first hundred cases for 11 each term. The result was about 44,000 cases
12 that I had to go through and ferret out, and 13 these were both federal and state cases, federal 14 where both a felon, and the district cases,
15 state cases were only appellant cases. These 16 were all cases that impact on some aspect of 17 voter fraud or voter intimidation. What emerged
18 from this was almost striking because there were 19 very few cases of the 44,00 cases or so that 20 actually were on point. And the ones that are 21 on point sometimes repeated categories. They 22 are all in these chart forms.

38

1                    what I suggest is done in the next
2 phase is to concentrate on finding cases on the 3 state district court level, because it seems
4 like on a state level, a lot of voter fraud
5 cases are brought there and end there. And you
6 get a lot of information out of those cases, but 7 they are never appealed, so you never get 8 anywhere beyond that.

9                    without having to just go through 10 this and verbatim read, the patterns have 11 definitely shifted from outright stealing of 12 elections in the past to different kinds of 13 problems, voter registration, identification,

14 ballot counting, overseas ballot problems, vote
15 buying, challenges to felon eligibility to vote.
16 And those were really the main categories that 17 went into the charts. And what I was surprised 18 to find is that out of each search term and the 19 cases under it, we had literally dozens and 20 dozens that were inapplicable. Oh, and I need
21 to add a caveat, in general, not all the time,
22 but in general, when we had an election

39

1 challenge case, in other words, someone lost an
2 election and they were challenging, we almost
3 always threw those out, unless they presented a
4 unique situation that directly was impacted by 5 the search term itself. In other words, if it
6 wasn't just -- I won, you lost, but the reason
7 was because there was X fraud done.

8 MR. SEREBROV: Right. So we threw
9 out 99 percent of those cases. What we have are 10 a number of charts with few cases, surprisingly
11 few cases. And my suggestion at the next phase,
12 they do a nationwide sampling of state cases on 13 the district court or circuit court level to 14 find out really what's going on.

15 Any questions?

16 MS. SIMS: No questions from the 17 attorneys?

18 MR. ROKITA: How would the sampling
19 be done.

20 MR. SEREBROV: Good question. What I
21 think you need to do is actually go, pick both
22 large counties and small counties, and you need 40

1 to go to the counties and you actually need to
2 run the records, and you need to go back a
3 certain amount of years and start looking at 4 those files. You're looking at a lot of work, a
5 lot of money going into this, but what we found
6 at that level is inadequate to draw conclusions,
7 unfortunately.

8 And as Tova said, I asked four
9 different Supreme Court Justices to give us
10 interviews. Three of them were afraid because 11 this type of case may come up again.

12 MS. WANG: Although not really too
13 much.

14 MR. SEREBROV: No, but it was very 15 helpful in some other areas.

16 MS. SIMS: We're five minutes ahead
17 of schedule. I don't know if you want to go
18 through this definition or the findings first.
19 Let's do the findings, I guess, first.

20 MS. WANG: So the next thing on the 21 agenda is to hear back from all of you about
22 your perceptions, given the research that we 41

1 did. I know that all of you have tremendous
2 backgrounds in this, and we all come out with
3 different experiences, but I think today it

4 would be helpful to focus -- the first question,
5 I guess, is basically, given the research and
6 the findings that we have, what at this point do
7 you think we can say about how much fraud and
8 intimidation there has been since the 2000
9 election, and how much are certain frauds being 10 committed as opposed to others?

11                   what is your sense of what the 12 landscape is, anybody?

13                   MR. WEINBERG: I have a question to 14 you. Given all this work that you have done, 15 and it's a lot of work, what do you think is 16 missing?

17                   MS. WANG: That's what I need to ask
18 you.

19                   MR. SEREBROV: That comes later, we 20 ask you that. We have talked about this.

21                   MS. WANG: We have talked about steps 22 for further action, but are you thinking of 42

1 something specific?

2                   MR. WEINBERG: Do you feel like
3 there's areas of information that exist that you
4 just didn't get to or do you feel like you, in
5 your breath of what you did, sort of captured
6 the information that's available out there?

7                   MS. WANG: Well, I think we will talk
8 about this when we talk about further steps.
9 They are kind of interrelated, but I feel like 10 in terms of the nexus articles and the 11 literature, I want follow-up on all of them

12 because a lot of them came out of the 2002, 2004
13 elections where there was a lot thrown around.
14 A lot of statements are made.

15           One of the things that we said about 16 the literature is that the books that are 17 written are of the least use because they have 18 written by people with agendas on both sides.
19 Allegations are made of things happening. And 20 even I started to do just like for fun kind of 21 looking at the allegations made at some of the 22 books and reports, and doing my nexus search,

43

1 and Google search, and finding out a month later
2 there was a completely opposite allegation than 3 what was suggested in the book on the report.
4 That's what I feel like is missing because
5 that's how the misinformation that's out there
6 about what's really going on seems to be, is 7 that people make a certain assumption right
8 after Election Day, and I will tell you
9 something, and this is sort of going off point,
10 but I think actually journalists are actually
11 somewhat responsible for this themselves.
12 I know this will amaze you that journalists can
13 be -- I'm trying to work on a separate project
14 and they will write an article. There was X, Y,
15 and Z, happened on Election Day, and then it
16 turns out three weeks later that actually 17 something completely different happened, but 18 they don't report on that. Or it's like this 19 side, the first one was on the front page, not

20 that this is particularly relevant. I am trying 21 to get a grant to do journalist training
22 seminars on these issues to try and solve some

44

1 of the problems, but almost everybody does it.
2 I mean, the stuff that lawyers committee comes 3 out with, great. The ACVR came out with its 4 report, but that's a snapshot in time, so
5 whatever happened did not turn out to be true.

6 MR. SEREBROV: One thing we left out
7 were allegations. We did not handle any 8 particular allegations.

9 MS. WANG: It was too much.

10 MR. SEREBROV: And that's something
11 that in the next phase, we may want done.

12 MR. HEARNE: What's the distinction?

13 MR. SEREBROV: We handled things that
14 have become legal issues that went to trial.

15 MS. WANG: That's not really true.
16 The articles is just everything that came out.

17 MR. HEARNE: It sounds like your
18 search would pick up somebody alleged something,
19 it gets reported in the paper. That would be 20 picked up.

21 MS. WANG: What's in the charts, as 22 you have them in and out. There is a category

45

1 for subsequent resolution. As I am suggesting,
2 what I would love to do actually, if we had the
3 resources today, is now do a new nexus search
4 that would specifically search for those cases

5 and see what the follow-up was. I was limited
6 because we had an agreement on what search terms
7 were. I couldn't go beyond that to look
8 specifically to see if there was in this case
9 some kind of further reporting.

10               So it was an allegation. Obviously,
11 the cases were more official than that.

12               MR. SEREBROV: When we discussed this 13 in the beginning, we were not going to deal with 14 hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of 15 allegations out there, except the nexus
16 articles. That's something that one may or may 17 not want to deal with. It's very tricky. You
18 have to weigh the voracity of those allegations.

19               MS. WANG: And how do you do that.
20 It's a problem we talked about with a lot of 21 people we interviewed, how do you make that line
22 of distinction between what is simply someone

46

1 saying something, and something that at least
2 has a kernel of merits.

3               MR. SEREBROV: For instance, we 4 talked to Sharon Priest. She was Secretary of 5 State from Arkansas. She indicated that the 6 State Board of Election Commissioners had
7 fielded, over a certain amount of years, a
8 number of complaints, and they gave those to us
9 but we didn't go through each individual
10 complaint.

11               Now, that's something that may or may 12 not be a valid thing, but if states keeps those

13 complaints on file, if they are categorized, if 14 there is enough information, that may or may not 15 be something that one wants to do. It's almost 16 an adjusting linkage. The problem is people
17 call in all the time, as Peggy well knows.

18                   When I was an election commissioner,
19 people called in and complained about everything
20 from my dog was stealing votes to --

21                   MS. WANG: Or my dog voted.

22                   MR. SEREBROV: Obviously, the

47

1 machines have been frauded out, and where do you
2 draw the line between a valid one and non-valid
3 one.

4                   MR. PEREZ: I realize I am a resource
5 person but I'd like to make a comment. I was
6 very skeptical before I came to this group
7 because of the issue, but I agree wholeheartedly
8 with your research. I am glad you did it. The 9 summaries, I think, were right on, and your 10 notes here about structural forms of 11 disenfranchisement and internal abuse of the 12 system, you're hitting right on the key here.

13                   Most of the issues are not that 14 somebody is stealing votes. It's just that poll
15 workers are not trained properly. We see this 16 time and time again. I am glad to see that 17 you're coming out with the same conclusions that 18 we have on the front line. It's not so much
19 that there is a conspiracy. You're going to 20 have vote buying. You're going to have some of 21 the things, but generally negligible, not enough

22 to alter things. And if there is, they need to 48

1 be prosecuted and come up with stronger laws.
2 But those of us that do this time and time again
3 can see where people have just missed the boat
4 in preparing either the people, the equipment,
5 the programing or something, and the obligation
6 should be laid squarely on the election
7 official, not on the equipment.

8 MS. WANG: Or the voter.

9 MR. PEREZ: Or some other type of 10 issue. we're playing the process on their 11 shoulder, and not necessarily training them
12 properly. So I am glad to see you're 13 researching.

14 MS. WANG: Actually, I think I
15 skipped over it but I was talking about the 16 interviews. One of the most common things that 17 was said was, generally, poll worker training,
18 that could be the number one key to solving the 19 problems we're talking about, and also longer
20 voting times, and maybe having days other than 21 Election Day that you can vote, not necessarily 22 in terms of early voting, but like weekend 49

1 voting. Maybe combine this with fewer voting
2 locations, because the thought was that you
3 could then have the best and the brightest of 4 the poll workers. That's something for another

5 study.

6 MR. SEREBROV: They are actually
7 doing that in Arkansas. I didn't even know we 8 had Saturday voting. We crossed a poll that was 9 open, so I went in and voted. They have opened
10 several, not a lot, but a few polls for Saturday
11 voting.

12 MR. GREENBAUM: Would it be fair to 13 say that taking up the issue of intimidation
14 that you're finding suggests that most fraud
15 occurs outside of the polling place?

16 MS. WANG: I would say yes, right.
17 It's absentee ballot fraud which is troubling
18 because there is this huge movement to expand
19 that, frankly. And so while I think this is 20 also probably going beyond what we're supposed
21 to be talking about right now but, why not,
22 everyone else is doing it. That is a political

50

1 issue that I think is not going to go away.
2 People seem to be pushing relentlessly for mail
3 voting or more absentee voting, on both sides of 4 the spectrum actually.

5 MR. GREENBAUM: I am including, when
6 I say fraud, I am including all deceptive
7 practices, the fliers, the calls, all of those 8 things that came up during election process in 9 2004.

10 MS. WANG: No. Well, there were 11 people talking about poll workers engaging in 12 fraud. Are you saying taking away the voter

13 intimidation?

14           MR. GREENBAUM: I'm saying take out
15 the voter intimidation issues, in terms of the 16 issue of fraud, in terms of the other things on 17 both sides, whether you're talking about voters
18 committing voter fraud or whether you're talking
19 about actions that are designed to keep voters
20 away, from deceptive practices, tearing up
21 registration forms, those sorts of things. Most 22 of that is happening outside of the polling

51

1 place.

2           MS. WANG: I would agree with that.
3 That's what almost everyone says.

4           MR. ROKITA: Thank you. I'd like to 5 have a little bit of discussion around before we
6 go too far down, subsequent matters, because I
7 may be a little bit confused, figure out what
8 our enabling legislature is here. I am reading
9 the cover letter of my invitation, and I'll read
10 it into the record, if you will bear with me.
11 "Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 12 2002 requires the EAC to conduct research on 13 election administration issues."

14           Yes. Among the tasks listed in the 15 statute is the development of the nationwide
16 statistics and methods of identifying,
17 deterring, investigating, voting fraud in 18 elections for federal office, 241(e)(6), and 19 secondly, ways of identifying, deterring, and 20 investigating methods of voter intimidation,

21 241(b)(7).

22 And this kind of goes to the reason I
52

1 asked the question about the interviews. I'm
2 hearing conclusions here about whether or not
3 the EAC is going to determine whether or not
4 there is voter fraud and where. And the statute
5 seems to point out, it is assuming, whether 6 right or wrong in the statute, Congress will 7 assume voter fraud existed, and it is asking the 8 EAC to develop nationwide statistics and methods
9 of identifying, deterring.

10 MS. WANG: That's what we were going
11 to try to do. We're not making the assumption.
12 We're not saying there isn't fraud. We're 13 trying to get a grasp of where that fraud tends 14 to lie and what types of fraud actually seem to 15 be occurring. I don't think that you can get to 16 the point of identifying these other matters
17 that you referred to in the statute without 18 first doing the research to find out what is 19 going on.

20 MR. ROKITA: It's not a comment on 21 your research, whether it's good or bad, right
22 or wrong, but I am trying to get us focused on 53

1 our mission here. From the preliminary comments
2 I am hearing, it's whether or not there is fraud
3 and where it is. And I think what you mentioned
4 in your opening remarks is that we lack 5 statistics. We lack methods for getting to

6 these statistics. And I would just like some 7 feedback and input from this group as to if they 8 agree or not that that should really be the 9 focus, more developmental ideas how to get the 10 information, rather than opinions of 11 interviewees.

12 MS. WANG: This is an initial
13 methodology. This combination of not just 14 interviews but nexus of the cases is an initial 15 step in a methodology. Later on, I will be 16 going through with I found with the political 17 scientists, further findings from more
18 scientists with the methodology that can be 19 added on to what we have already done. That is 20 the next layer up.

21 MR. SEREBROV: The other thing you
22 have to understand is we were limited in both

54

1 time and funds. So what we were able to
2 delivery is just a peek at what's going on.

3 MS. SIMS: It is only intended a
4 preliminary research so we can decide how might
5 we get to the next step, and that's why we need
6 you in here to help us.

7 MR. SEREBROV: One area that we
8 didn't touch that we were told don't touch is 9 complaints or potential fraud having to do with 10 computer voting with the machines themselves.

11 MS. WANG: Thank God.

12 MR. SEREBROV: That's true. That's a
13 can of worms.

14 MR. HEARNE: I wasn't here the first
15 15 minutes. My cab driver was somewhat lost,
16 but that being said, so I didn't get the 17 opportunity to hear exactly what the discussion
18 was about the work product. At the end of the 19 day, we have an objective of producing 20 something.

21 I understood todd to be saying what
22 we're supposed to be producing is given what

55

1 information we have and the consensus within
2 this group, what is a methodology for tracking,
3 quantifying, and reporting these kinds of 4 incidences going forward.

5 MS. SIMS: Well, you may not even
6 have to come up with a methodology. What we're 7 looking for, how do we meet this requirement.
8 Or as I said, we also serve as a national 9 clearinghouse for the administration of federal 10 elections. There may be things that relate to 11 this that we should be looking at, that relate
12 to the issue of voting fraud. There may be best 13 practices in certain areas that we maybe should 14 be looking at that we haven't already started to 15 look at.

16 MR. HEARNE: So the EAC is coming in,
17 the working group says, give us some ideas.

18 MS. SIMS: Where we need to go.

19 MR. HEARNE: Tracking as we go
20 through.

21 MS. SIMS: Please don't use a
Page 41

22 four-letter word when you say where we need to 56

1 go.

2 MR. BAUER: You made a comment. Did
3 you have a concern about consulting experts?
4 You were concerned we were talking to experts,
5 getting opinions from experts, or you thought it
6 was a methodological approach.

7 MR. ROKITA: I'm just trying to
8 determine what our mission here is at the core
9 level and whether it should be making a
10 conclusory report as to whether or not something
11 exists, or is our mission more plain language,
12 the development of the methodologies that would 13 lead to something like statistics and
14 methodologies, not an amalgamation of opinions
15 as to whether or not voter fraud exists and 16 where it is. Because we could keep adding to 17 that, then we're putting the EAC -- or EAC is 18 going to be in a position of saying -- of adding 19 to the universe of opinions.

20 MS. WANG: These are actually not 21 just opinions. If you look at the people we 22 spoke to, there were election officials.

57

1 MR. ROKITA: All of whom have
2 opinions. Yes, I understand.

3 MS. WANG: Well, opinions based on
4 actual experience.

5 MR. BAUER: That's what my question

6 was.

7 MR. SEREBROV: But it is a method of
8 identifying election fraud.

9 MS. WANG: Any political scientist.
10 And if you look at the methodologies that were 11 suggested to me, every single one of them talks 12 about interviewing a range of people involved in 13 the process.

14 MR. ROKITA: These might be
15 experiences.

16 MR. SEREBROV: We originally had a
17 political scientist on this group, a third
18 person who had to withdraw, and that is Steve,
19 who we actually interviewed after.

20 MS. SIMS: He can speak for the EAC
21 that we're not expecting the group to say there
22 is or there is not fraud. We're not expecting

58

1 that. I think we know there are instances of
2 it.

3 At this point in time, what we're
4 trying to do is get a handle on how we can
5 develop nationwide statistics, and investigating
6 voter fraud and voter intimidation.

7 MS. WANG: To know how to investigate
8 and deter fraud and intimidation, you have to 9 first get some sort of a grasp as to what the 10 actual problems were, and where your energy and 11 resources ought to be focused.

12 MR. ROKITA: Yes, you have to do
13 that. I am not basing things after our

14 experience, but we don't know that this
15 experience is a fair sampling of what's out
16 there. And as I read those interviews and what 17 I heard you say at the beginning is we don't 18 have statistics. So, in essence, even these 19 experiences are based on non-quantifiable
20 experiences and things that might have happened,
21 and opinions.

22 MS. WANG: That's a major question of <sup>59</sup>

1 this project, is any of this quantifiable. I
2 don't think you're ever going to come up with a
3 number, so how do you get at it?

4 MR. ROKITA: That's a fair agenda
5 item for this discussion. Maybe at the end of 6 day, we decide we stop spending taxpayer money
7 or it's going to be too much to spend to find
8 that kind of data.

9 MR. SEREBROV: I think we're going to 10 find that's the answer.

11 MR. ROKITA: Otherwise, we will stop
12 it here and recognize there is a huge difference
13 of opinion on that issue of fraud when it occurs
14 is obtainable, and that would possibly be a
15 conclusion of the EAC.

16 MS. SIMS: I don't know if the EAC
17 would come to a conclusion like that. Again,
18 it's all going to have to go back to the 19 Commissioners and they are going to have 20 discussions about, what they can pursue in this
21 area, but here are a couple things that I am

22 looking at. This is just from being in this 60

1 field a long time. It may be difficult to -- I
2 don't think it's going to be impossible to get
3 exact statistics on voting fraud.

4 Can we take another step and get
5 better statistics on voting fraud, that is one
6 question. The other question is, is there a way
7 of identifying at this point certain parts in 8 the election process that are more vulnerable,
9 that we should be addressing.

10 MS. WANG: That's what I am trying to 11 say.

12 MR. GINSBERG: I guess I am curious
13 about why there is some academic work being done
14 about this when, in fact, in six months, you
15 have got the ultimate laboratory. Why would you
16 not come out with some sort of methodology to go
17 into all the polling places where there may be 18 an issue, with what amounts to a bipartisan
19 team, and take a look at it.

20 MS. WANG: That was actually in a
21 couple at least of the suggestions of 22 methodologies from the political scientist, but

61

1 imagine the resources that it would take to get.

2 MR. GINSBERG: Truthfully, minimum.
3 I admit that my background and prejudices are
4 probably not where the political scientist's
5 are, as an academic matter.

6 MR. BAUER: Ben is a former

008672

7 journalist.

8           MR. GINSBERG: In the last election,
9 for example, in the Republican Party and the 10 Democratic Party, there were pretty good
11 samplings of precincts that had a Republican and 12 Democrat, probably 10,000 precincts around the 13 country more or less. Why would you not have a
14 Republican and a Democrat in each one of those?
15 With all due respect to the voters, a lot of 16 those groups are going to be perceived as 17 partisan, but I mean --

18           MR. GINSBERG: Maybe perceived but to 19 make it valid, you need to have representatives
20 of the parties conducting this and taking a look 21 at precincts, any precinct anybody wants in the 22 country where you're thinking there may be

62

1 intimidation, where there may be fraud. And
2 instead of turning it into some sort of 3 political charge pre election, actually have 4 observers from both parties in the places where
5 this is most likely to occur, and see if it
6 occurs and how it occurs.

7           MS. WANG: The problem with having it
8 limited to those jurisdictions where you suspect
9 that it's very likely bad things will happen is 10 then you have a skewed result.

11           MR. GINSBERG: Well, I think you I
12 said any precinct anybody wanted to put people.

13           MR. GREENBAUM: Which sometimes you
14 don't know there's going to be problems. Who
Page 46

15 knew that Dilluth, Minnesota. We certainly had 16 no awareness that Dilluth, Minnesota was going 17 to be an area where Indian voters were going to 18 get intimidated at the polls.

19 My other concern is, a lot of times,
20 that is things outside of what either party
21 cares about. Sometimes there are maybe in 22 places where you have partisan elections that

63

1 are going to be very close. Sometimes the
2 issues involve nonpartisan elections.

3 MR. GINSBERG: I don't disagree with
4 that. It can be any place where anybody
5 perceives a problem.

6 MR. SEREBROV: But one of the 7 questions was absentee ballots, how do you deal
8 with absentee ballots at a polling place.

9 MR. HEARNE: I think Ben's discussion
10 is a good one. The point he is saying, we have 11 a great laboratory coming up in terms of an 12 election. We can go back through next Tuesday,
13 that is all variable. I'm not saying it's not 14 at all, but the concept of being able to say
15 here's an election upcoming we're developing.
16 If you're going to need to develop some 17 methodology to study it, you can develop the 18 methodology looking forward to the event.

19 MR. SEREBROV: wouldn't it be better
20 to wait for 2008?

21 MR. HEARNE: If you look forward to 22 that, and take the two stakeholders in the

1 election, which are going to be the party -- the 2 two parties, and figure out a way where you find
3 your hottest, most concerned polling places, we 4 will find the ones. You could do some 5 statistical analysis, find out ones that have 6 the greatest aberration, and try to identify
7 them, whatever way you want to do it.

8           MR. BAUER: If I may, this is 9 probably not the first time I have made an 10 unwise suggestion. I think from a whole host of 11 respects, it is very, very difficult to sell.
12 First of all, I don't think the American public
13 is going to want an election system where two 14 parties are involved in the election system.
15 Secondly, anybody who's served the parties would 16 know how quickly they will arrive at 17 understanding workers in polling places.

18           I tend to get along with Republicans,
19 but I doubt this would be anything other than 20 attractive and efficient controversial effort.

21           And the last point I would make is,
22 you're introducing a variable into the very

65

1 thing you want to study. If you announce
2 political parties are going out into the field,
3 you're going to affect behavior and you're going
4 to end up changing the subject you are
5 undertaking to study. It is not scientific,
6 will have zero credibility, and it is not what a

7 U.S. Government enterprise should go through.

8 MR. GINSBERG: The point was, you're
9 not looking to monitor the sanctity of American
10 elections. What you're looking for is valid
11 data to collect. And part of the problem that I
12 think you've got with the data you're collecting
13 is you're not sure how true it is. You are not 14 sure how much is political charges. You are not 15 sure, as you said, it is the charge that is made
16 one day all over the front page but straightened
17 out three weeks later. This is for data
18 collection purposes. This isn't about
19 monitoring the sanctity of the election.

20 MR. BAUER: The data collectors don't
21 have any credibility. The two major party
22 organizations in this country are not neutral

66

1 collectors of data. Everything they are going
2 to collect is going to be collected in a
3 partisan way. That is true on your side. We're 4 not going to be able to persuade anybody that
5 this is anything different.

6 MS. WANG: We already have -- the
7 Department of Justice has a major observer
8 program.

9 MR. WEINBERG: The article lays out
10 exactly how the justice department finds the 11 polling places to put observers in. And it also 12 collects examples of the observer report fields.
13 So this -- and internationally, those of us who 14 have done international stuff know we do pretty

15 much the same thing, and they use pretty much
16 the same kind of forms. The fact of the matter
17 is that I think you can get a lot of data, you
18 can get it on a form. And the fact that people
19 are two different political parties doesn't mean
20 they are going to try to lie on forms. If it
21 does, things are pretty sad.

22                   The other thing is that you do affect 67

1 the election, and that's not bad. One of the
2 great, great saving graces of the observer
3 function is it opens everything up. You have
4 transparency. First time you don't have people
5 wondering what's going on in the polling places.
6 You have people knowing what is going on in the 7 polling places. And there's ways to control
8 them. They can sit in particular places. If 9 they have complaints, they can complaint to the 10 precinct chair.

11                   There are things that you can do and 12 there are ways to organize it, and you can
13 figure out which polling places, what goal
14 you're trying to achieve that you can get
15 information. If you get it every election,
16 every year for the 25 years, I have seen and 17 it's doable. Will it take a lot of people,
18 sure. Take organizing, yes, but you know,
19 organizing is what you want, if you're going to 20 get data. Is it going to be scientifically
21 reliable, I don't know. I don't know if there
22 is anything that can be done, having read all

68

1 that, that is going to end up scientifically
2 reliable.

3           But what impressed me in reading
4 through all this is that these problems are not
5 -- you don't have the one solution fits all. If 6 you've got things happening inside polling
7 places, that's one thing. If you have things
8 happening on absentee ballots, you're going to 9 have a different approach. If you have 10 intimidation of voters, polling signs put up,
11 you're going to get deported if you vote, that's 12 a different problem. And I don't think you're 13 going to find a solution to either get data on 14 or resolve any of those problems with the same
15 solution.

16           MS. WANG: So you need multiple 17 studies.

18           MR. DON SANTO: I will tend to agree
19 with my friend Barry, and add to that a couple
20 caveats. Number one, the program Barry
21 honorably oversaw for a large part of his life
22 is based on a federal statute that gives the

69

1 Federal Government statutory authority to put
2 federal observers in polling places when certain
3 conditions are certified to exist by the 4 Attorney General. Only a few states, I haven't
5 done a count, not all states allow election
6 monitors to be in the polls.

7           So you start out with the problem of
Page 51

Transcript 051806

8 access in the polling place. This is a problem
9 for us in law enforcement. We can know that 10 something is going to go on. If we were told
11 something was going to go on in Polling Place 3
12 in Ward 4 in Chicago, we could send somebody in 13 there. I guess we could. Bad example.

14 MS. WANG: That's the recommendation
15 that we come out to change or encourage states
16 to change that.

17 MR. DONSANTO: But in terms of your
18 ability to employ something now, it's an 19 obstacle you have to overcome.

20 Secondly, and I think Barry touched
21 on this --

22 MR. SEREBROV: Maybe we'd overcome it
70

1 if you get a candidate to appoint you as a poll
2 worker.

3 MR. DONSANTO: Then you get into a
4 position where you're skewing data. That's 5 where you're politicizing more so than just a
6 party watcher.

7 MR. SEREBROV: You can get the
8 parties to authorize you.

9 MR. DONSANTO: In Virginia, they
10 don't have poll watchers in Virginia. If a 11 candidate were to try to put a poll cashier in 12 Virginia, he would be kicked out, and most 13 states follow that rule, whatever.

14 The other thing is that I think it
15 was brought up early on in what you all

16 presented here, the types of things that go
17 wrong inside polling places are really not
18 representative of the uniform of things that go
19 wrong. The types of things -- there used to be 20 a time when election fraud was committed by poll
21 officers who just stole elections, but during
22 the past 30 or 40 years that I've been watching 71

1 this stuff, the election administration business
2 has become more professionalized. And when you
3 have a professional sort of approach to the job
4 of administering elections, although there may
5 be something there that is representing a
6 political party, your loyalty goes beyond that 7 to the process. And it's becoming extremely
8 rare, extremely rare today, to find polling
9 officials that are complacent in election fraud,
10 whereas 30, 40 years ago, it was not unusual at 11 all.

12               So you know the kind of methodologies
13 that you've been talking about are not, for 14 example, going to allow you to capture
15 information on things that take place at the 16 polling place. It is not going to allow to you
17 capture information on intimidating voters,
18 absentee ballots. The situation is very hard to 19 measure.

20               MR. WEINBERG: It will give you
21 information on the difference in treatment of 22 voters that happens frequently, and it will give 72

1 you other information about what happens as far
2 as the process, and whether the process is being
3 followed.

4           Professional balloting is a huge
5 question that's come up. Nobody knows how that 6 works anywhere, and whatever happens to those 7 ballots, I mean, come on. There are things that 8 you can learn about problems that contribute to 9 the distrust of the election process, even 10 though you probably wouldn't see a whole lot of 11 direct fraud.

12           MS. WANG: Again, the provisional
13 ballot is an interesting issue to raise.
14 Michael McDonald, who worked on the election day
15 study, he and I have talk about this a lot.
16 Section 203 covered jurisdictions, there was 17 more use of provisional ballots than in any kind
18 of jurisdiction. Can you start to draw
19 conclusions from that? So that's another thing
20 that you can look at.

21           MR. WEINBERG: I'll just interject
22 one more thing. There is the re-authorization

73

1 of the Voting Rights act, that what we ought to
2 do is cut loose the observing from the 3 technically special covered jurisdictions and 4 have them be able to be assigned nationwide with 5 specific criteria, and that would help a lot of 6 the problems.

7           MR. BAUER: Our mandate here is to

8 look at the research. I disagree with the 9 secretary. I think some of the preliminary work
10 is absolutely essential to the credibility, to 11 the thoughtfulness and integrity of the effort,
12 but I don't think that, as I read this, this 13 means that our judgement is that we leave the 14 work that's been done today and create a hybrid 15 project which has as its aim to function as 16 improvement on current observing programs.
17 That's just not our mandate.

18 MR. GINSBERG: So our goal is to have
19 bad elections so we can get good data?

20 MS. WANG: You may be familiar with 21 this work by a woman named Susan Hyde,
22 University of San Diego, doing a comparison

74

1 where there are observers as compared to where
2 there are not observers.

3 MS. ROGERS: I'd like to suggest, in 4 addition to party observing, states put their 5 own observing on the ground. When you come into 6 a state, unless you immerse yourself in that
7 state's laws and that state's procedures, often
8 you don't know what you're observing. You don't 9 know if what you're seeing is legal or illegal.

10 we did work with lawyers committee
11 and election protection, and reviewed a lot of 12 their information, sent back edits. We audited
13 some of their training classes and gave feedback
14 to those training classes. We had a lot of 15 community hotline communication on Election Day

16 where they called to tell us what they received.
17 Not everyone does that, but we're unable to 18 quantify what is observed or what is alleged as 19 fraud because the complaint doesn't come to us.
20 It may go to either party and they not share
21 that information with the local jurisdiction or 22 with the state election official.

75

1                   We've put 80 to 100 observing from
2 the Secretary of State's Office on the ground
3 since 2002. We provide them with radios set up
4 like a little war room. They call us when there
5 is a problem and we immediately have someone
6 there to find out what that problem is. They 7 write up reports, and they are able to take
8 those reports, and we know where we need to go
9 and what areas need to be shored up. This 10 allows us to have the ability to change the 11 process, if something needs to be changed.

12                   Another thing, as far as parties in 13 our state, now the parties, rather than having 14 to be appointed as a poll watcher by a
15 candidate, each party is allowed to appoint up
16 to 25 statewide poll watchers. These people can 17 go anywhere they want to go. It seems to work
18 very well.

19                   MR. SEREBROV: I wanted to make two 20 points. One was a reaction to some of the 21 comments before. I know Arkansas and lot of 22 southern states, both the parties and the

76

1 candidates are allowed to have watchers in every
2 poll. The other thing is, in Arkansas, the
3 Secretary of State doesn't have the statutory
4 authority to do what you're doing in Georgia. I
5 wish they did. It would make my life a lot
6 easier, especially in the past, and it would
7 make Tim Humphrey's life a lot easier, if you
8 knew Tim. But really it's a state by state
9 problem. I don't have a gist -- and this is 10 something we talked about, there was also a
11 sampling of state law in the next phase to see
12 where the bugs are in that system.

13 MS. ROGERS: In Georgia, some of you
14 may know we have a state election board who has 15 authority. I actually yesterday pulled a list
16 of cases that we investigated in 2004. I don't 17 have the 2005 ones on here, but I can tell you
18 right now, of all of these cases right here, the 19 state election board investigated the majority
20 of these were absentee ballots.

21 MS. WANG: Well, I wish that every
22 state did what you did, then we could just add

77

1 them all up. One thing we found, of course,
2 almost no states do that. Also, we spoke to
3 your successor, John Tanner. And the Federal
4 Government, the Department of Justice keeps a
5 database of what comes in but they will not
6 release that information to us. And they also 7 would not release to us any more than a few
8 dozen of the observer reports, which we also
Page 57

9 think might be useful.

10 MS. ROGERS: We've seen a high
11 success rate, not in deferring fraud, but in 12 deferring the actions of election officials and 13 poll workers. Those actions where you talked 14 about you can't determine if they are fraud but 15 yet they appear to be a lack of attention to 16 detail. We bring these people up regularly.
17 And when you bring them up in front of their 18 peers, it is a huge deterrence. And you're 19 correct, every case we have brought forward, it
20 has not been an instance of fraud.

21 MS. SIMS: Well, I was wondering,
22 before we continue on, because we're already

78

1 getting some ideas for possible areas and it
2 might be worthwhile just to put these ideas
3 down, even though I am certainly not looking at 4 this as all one project. Some of these things
5 are not going to be one project, and some things
6 will be more problematic and may not be
7 something we can do right away.

8 For example, for a number of reasons,
9 we couldn't do observers in this fall's
10 election, not the least of which is financial.
11 We probably won't have a budget, '07 budget, by 12 then. But actually, before we go on to this,
13 would it be okay if we talked about the 14 definition of voting fraud. Particularly, I'd 15 like to get into intimidation and suppression
16 areas.

17                   If you don't have copies of that, we 18 can quickly run off some copies. One of the 19 reasons why I think this is of concern,
20 obviously, it would be helpful if we all knew
21 what we meant when we were talking about voter 22 fraud or voter intimidation. As we progress in

□ 79

1 terms of what we want to research or how we want
2 to identify it or develop projects to identify
3 and deter and investigate, we have some common
4 ground.

5                   MS. WANG: Did people get a chance to 6 look at the definition, and were there
7 objections?

8                   MR. DONSANTO: Comments. The 9 definition in the opening paragraph of this is,
10 I think, taken from something that's kind of the 11 operational way that we articulate what voter
12 fraud is as distinguished from the types of 13 things that go on in the process. So that's how 14 we define vote fraud.

15                   MS. WANG: It is the sincerest form
16 of flattery.

17                   MR. DONSANTO: Well, whatever.
18 However, since half of this program is not 19 directed so much at fraud but focuses on 20 intimidation, I think we need to define the term
21 intimidation. Intimidation is a term that in 22 the context of elections, in my experience, has

□ 80

1 no meaning at all. It can mean anything that
2 happens to you in connection with voting that
3 you don't like or that happens to somebody that 4 supports you that you don't like to. And the 5 other extreme, somebody who gets killed or a
6 cross burned on his yard to retaliate against
7 them for having exercised a franchise.

8           The word fraud is a word that 9 connotes criminal. Criminal connotes that the 10 remedy for doing it is to put somebody in jail,
11 to afford that person all the procedural rights
12 given to someone in a criminal trial, including 13 the right to counsel, and obligation of the 14 prosecutor to prove the case beyond a reasonable
15 doubt.

16           When applied to the word
17 intimidation, our research on the laws that 18 exist at the federal level has been that the 19 word intimidate in the criminal statutes means
20 to apply physical or economic duress upon a 21 victim in connection with a voting act. And if 22 you're going to use the word intimidate as you

81

1 have in the fourth and fifth bullet from the
2 bottom on your page, I think accuracy would
3 require that you limit it to that.

4           MS. WANG: well, that is to me
5 personally -- I don't speak for Job. See if he
6 agrees with me on this. This is a major matter
7 of concern to me. One of the things that I have 8 been exploring in my own head is the idea of 9 changing that so that you can broaden the 10 criminal intimidation laws on the civil side.

11 MR. DONSANTO: That's a civil side,
12 that's a different issue. That's not fraud.
13 Fraud equals crime.

14 MS. WANG: well, the question --

15 MR. DONSANTO: Intimidation, there
16 are a universe of activities that can be
17 directed at people in a category of voter
18 suppression which are not fraud, which are 19 directed in the political process. Signs are a 20 good example of that.

21 MS. WANG: I think they are not under 22 the criminal law fraud, but if you think of 82

1 fraud, and this is how we perceive fraud,
2 anything that distorts the system, the process,
3 then certainly, keeping people from voting has
4 the same distorting impact.

5 MR. DONSANTO: Yes, I agree with you.
6 The thing that you're leaving out is the word
7 corrupted, to affect an election campaign or 8 affects activities at the poll. Everything that 9 affects activities at the polls is encompassed
10 within your definition, and that encompasses 11 everything that occurs from the nominating 12 process on, criminal activity which is so
13 anti-social in that it warrants the ultimate
14 societal punishment, incarceration.

15 Now, I'm not going to tell you -- the 16 word I am focusing on here is intimidation.

17 There is an entirely another area having to do
18 with voter suppression which we're just
19 beginning to explore. And I give you an example
20 of how we're exploring this is the Tobin case
21 was sentenced yesterday. It was in The Post
22 yesterday. We're trying at justice to find ways

83

1 to get at using the statutes, which we have to
2 get at aggravated forms of voter suppression. A
3 maliciously designed denial of service directed
4 at a get-out-to-vote telephone bank sufficiently
5 possessed criminal malfeasance that the person
6 who does something like that should go to jail.
7 Mr. Tobin, who is the executive director of the 8 New England Region of the Republican Party, is 9 facing ten months as a guest of the Attorney
10 General of the United States. Somebody who puts 11 -- maliciously circulates posters that contain,
12 "Republicans vote on Tuesday, Democrats vote on 13 Wednesday."

14               If we could find the people who do
15 that sort of thing, that isn't voter
16 intimidation. That is voter suppression. And,
17 yes, that kind of conduct, if done for the 18 design of deterring someone from voting, ought 19 to be a crime. And I assure you we have 20 investigated every single instance that has been 21 brought to our attention, and every single 22 instance, when we did an investigation, we were

84

1 unable to find who did it.

2 MR. BAUER: I'd like to ask a
3 question. I'm not sure about the distinction
4 between suppression and intimidation.
5 Intimidation is a vehicle for achieving
6 suppression.

7 MR. DONSANTO: You're right.

8 MR. BAUER: In one sense, there may 9 not be any difference in intent or effect.

10 MR. DONSANTO: Right.

11 MR. BAUER: The second question I
12 wanted to ask you, if you deal with this 13 definitional change, if you talk about physical 14 or --

15 MR. DONSANTO: In the context of the 16 term of intimidation, I would limit it that way.

17 MR. BAUER: But intimidation is
18 related to suppression, in terms of Mr. Tobin.

19 MR. DONSANTO: No, his is not an
20 intimidation. That's corrupt suppression.

21 MR. BAUER: Here's my question.
22 Intimidation conducted on a systematic scale for □ 85

1 the purpose of driving people away from the
2 polls has a suppressive nature.

3 MR. DONSANTO: I don't disagree, but
4 the question becomes what methodology they are 5 using to achieve that result.

6 MR. BAUER: The point you made about
7 capping off the physical and economic portion.

8 MR. DONSANTO: As far as intimidation
9 is concerned. Suppression is a broader term.

10 MR. BAUER: Let's talk about that 11 part of intimidation because I think, quite 12 frankly, intimidation isn't done for the 13 psychological joy of the intimidator. It is to 14 drive people away from the polls.

15 Granted, the justice department will
16 be looking to converting it to criminally liable
17 behavior. It has the feel, tone, color, of 18 maliciously interfering with people's lives.

19 MR. DON SANTO: Corrupt. I think I
20 see where you're going.

21 MR. BAUER: What if you have a party
22 that dresses up people in para military so they 86

1 look like military soldiers, and sends them into
2 targeted polling places to yell at voters as 3 they walk in, that they need to produce their 4 IDs, showing it to these people. If you had 5 that on a widespread, organized basis, and it is 6 clearly an intimidating behavior, it is clearly
7 malicious, you wouldn't say that that's outside
8 the range of conduct you would be concerned
9 about.

10 MR. DON SANTO: Under the laws we have
11 to work with today, Bob, that's not corrupt.

12 MR. BAUER: But you think the laws
13 you work with are supple enough?

14 MR. DON SANTO: We're trying to bend
15 the ones we've got to address aggravated cases
16 of voter suppression, and the Tobin case is an 17 example of that. And you know how we do this,

18 if we won Tobin and we get a District Court
19 opinion, although he was acquitted on the 241
20 Count, if we got an opinion from the Court
21 saying the statute applies to this conduct,
22 that's the goal. You can bet the next time we

87

1 have a denying of service attack, we're going to
2 attack it the same way. Whether we can then
3 take that case and make it apply to different
4 facts, we'll try.

5 MR. BAUER: That's what I wanted to
6 not.

7 MR. DONSANTO: But this is a work in
8 progress.

9 MS. WANG: Does this argue for a new 10 law?

11 MR. DONSANTO: I don't know that is a
12 policy question.

13 MR. HEARNE: Let me ask a question to 14 clarify that, to see where we are right now.

15 You mentioned the Tobin situation. The 16 allegation was often made and sometimes occurs
17 that an organization makes phone calls
18 intentionally misdirecting a voter to the wrong
19 poll, saying you have to bring eight forms of 20 identification, voting is on Wednesday.

21 MR. DONSANTO: That's false.
22 We would investigate that.

88

1 MR. GREENBAUM: Craig, can I call you

2 directly?

3 MR. DONSANTO: FBI.

4 MR. GREENBAUM: We did that twice in
5 2004. We had other instances we could have done
6 it. And the FBI, they did not want to 7 follow-up. We had the complainant.

8 MR. DONSANTO: which field division?

9 MR. GREENBAUM: In Arizona, in 10 Florida. Florida, I think it was Palm Beach.

11 MR. DONSANTO: I'll tell you what
12 I'll do, I am not here to protest or intake
13 cases, but I write an awful FD 302.

14 MR. GREENBAUM: In Arizona --

15 MR. DONSANTO: If you can send me a
16 paragraph on these, I will send it to the 17 district election officer in that district and 18 ask what happened. I won't be able to tell you
19 what they responded to, but I will in fact
20 query. Because what I said is true, if we can 21 find out who does that sort of thing, I am eager 22 to.

89

1 MR. HEARNE: Craig, in your opinion,
2 someone making those kind of false statements,
3 is that within what you understand to be
4 intimidation?

5 MR. DONSANTO: If it occurs within a
6 federal election. That is the unique way the 7 laws were written about, if it occurs in a
8 federal election, that sort of behavior is a
9 conspiracy to deprive the victim of their right

10 to vote for federal office.

11 MS. WANG: I have to say, in some of 12 the interviews, we have heard similar complaints
13 from the people from the advocacy organizations,
14 that they have sent reams of documentation to 15 the DOJ and not gotten a response.

16 MR. GREENBAUM: We did something to 17 Tanner or to Alex Costa. Alex called back and 18 said, "Talk to the FBI." With two of the 19 instances, we talked to the FBI, and it was 20 clear that they just had no intention of doing
21 anything with it. Frankly, it turned us off
22 after that.

90

1 MR. DONSANTO: In Arizona, I am not
2 entirely surprised, but that may be a personnel
3 problem. And it also may be a problem with 4 respect to how your facts fell insofar as the 5 law. It may be the fact that your facts did not
6 produce sufficient leads. These are all things.

7 MR. GREENBAUM: In one case we
8 actually had -- the person actually had the 9 number, because of caller ID and actually called 10 the number back, and someone answered the phone
11 and identified who they were affiliated with.

12 MR. DONSANTO: Right. This occurred
13 in the 2004 general election?

14 MR. GREENBAUM: Yes, it did.

15 MR. HEARNE: I can give you another
16 example that was presented to Congress, and it
17 was not followed up. That was a phone call to a *

18 sitting retired Ohio judge in Marion County,
19 Ohio.

20 MR. DON SANTO: We did follow-up on 21 that one.

22 MR. SEREBROV: Yes. There was the 91

1 case I gave you.

2 MS. WANG: You might want to look at
3 the summaries of the interviews, because a
4 number of people have said they have given all
5 this information to the Department of Justice,
6 and they haven't done anything. I am just the 7 bearer of the news.

8 MR. DON SANTO: And the other thing
9 that bears in mind, we cannot prosecute
10 everything. We try to, based on the degree of 11 severity of the event and the need for 12 deterrence.

13 MR. HEARNE: Craig, not to belabor
14 the point but to make sure, in terms of the 15 intimidation, that I think it's very important
16 that we all understand, every election I ever
17 remember hearing about, we have these 18 allegations. And we always hear them and 19 everybody says, well, hey, no one did anything.
20 We're talking about calls to voters, like the 21 Tobin situation. We just talked about the other 22 situation, calls directed to voters trying to 92

1 give them misinformation.

2 what about calls to other people
Page 68

008695

3 involved in the election, somebody calling and
4 saying, if you participate as an observer, as a
5 volunteer in an election, that we're going to 6 sue you for doing that, not voting, just
7 participating in the election process.

8 MR. DONSANTO: I'm not going to 9 comment on whether that's a crime or not.
10 That's probably more a statement of fact. The 11 underlying thing is that is communicated, it has 12 to be false. I understand why come people will 13 be appalled of the fact that you intend to put 14 poll observers in their precinct, and say want
15 to sue you.

16 MS. WANG: My understanding is you
17 don't think the way we have intimidation here is 18 comports with what the legal definition is.

19 MR. DONSANTO: I think out of the 20 exchange that I had, I think I have changed my 21 thinking a little bit. Can I run it out a
22 second time, see if it comes out better.

93

1 The word intimidate is a word of art
2 that connotes physical or economic duress in
3 terms of criminal behavior, okay.

4 The word suppression is a work in
5 progress. I can tell you it addresses denial of 6 services, actions directed at get-out-to-vote
7 drives. I can tell you it is directed at 8 situations where maliciously false information
9 is communicated to voters to prevent them from 10 voting in election federal elections. Change
Page 69

11 poll places, hiding the poll place, that's an 12 old type of thing.

13                   So the point is the extent to which 14 the word suppression can be translated into 15 crime is a work in progress, with certain
16 aspects of it that I have just summarized here
17 being clearly within the definition but not 18 necessarily having those being exclusive.

19                   MS. WANG: So is there some 20 particular language that you might suggest?

21                   MR. DON SANTO: I think the word
22 corruptly.

94

1                   MS. SIMS: So the fifth bullet from
2 the bottom.

3                   MR. DON SANTO: Intimidating practices
4 involving the use of economic, physical duress
5 to prevent or deter voting activity, and then a
6 separate bullet having to do with suppression,
7 corrupt activities or activities aimed at 8 corruptly suppressing. Corruptly with a word
9 that connotes specific intent. It's kind of 10 like you know it when you see it.

11                   MS. WANG: Are we limited to the 12 Department of Justice definition of
13 intimidation?

14                   MR. DON SANTO: You can do anything
15 that you want to do.

16                   MS. WANG: Because I would rather not 17 have it be limited to economic or physical 18 deprivation.

Transcript 051806

19 MR. DONSANTO: This is what I am
20 trying to avoid, is that there are some things
21 that happen in the political process that aren't 22 pleasant, and the rent-a-cop scenario is one of

95

1 those, the poll watcher who aggressively pursues
2 his mandate and poll watches.

3 MS. WANG: That's what I'm talking
4 about.

5 MR. DONSANTO: That's not a crime
6 Fraud is a word that connotes crime.

7 MR. GINSBERG: You can't tune your
8 definitions to create a political resolve,
9 unless you want to make a political statement,
10 which is fine, but then let's label it that way.
11 And I hope that if you're going to manufacture a
12 definition like that, you would have precise 13 examples of what you're trying to bring in to 14 this new term you're coming up with.

15 MR. GREENBAUM: Sure. In terms of 16 this type of intimidation, actually the example
17 that Craig gave, the over aggressive poll
18 watcher, there are cases out there where those 19 poll watchers have been thrown out, not 20 necessarily because they committed a crime, but 21 they may have violated a statute.

22 MR. DONSANTO: And that is the 96

1 appropriate remedy for that kind of offense.

2 MR. GREENBAUM: But that's part of

3 intimidation though.

4 MR. GINSBERG: Poll watchers who are
5 being more aggressive than the local people in 6 the polls think that should be intimidating, and 7 that the poll watcher should leave.

8 Where does that fit into your definition?

9 Let's deal with that example.

10 MR. BAUER: Well, I want to go to 11 something you earlier said, which is, we 12 shouldn't be concerned with anything that isn't 13 criminal, that couldn't be established to be 14 criminal. Well, you just said -- Craig said
15 they are -- it is a work in progress to begin
16 with. That is not a boundary that is easily set
17 here.

18 And the second thing, I don't believe
19 that the EAC should announce that it's only
20 dealing with criminal forms of illegal conduct.

21 MR. GINSBERG: You can't stretch
22 definitions to achieve a political result here. 97

1 I was referring to the way she was trying to
2 change it.

3 MS. ROGERS: Does the definition
4 include conspiring to do any of these?

5 MS. WANG: That can certainly be
6 added.

7 MR. HEARNE: Let me ask a question.
8 When you use the word intimidation, a lot of 9 people have come to me in different contexts and 10 say, "I find it intimidating when I go in and

11 people with signs are sticking something in 12 front of me."

13 MS. WANG: Well, how did you make the 14 distinction in the report that you wrote?

15 MR. HEARNE: Well, the report would 16 be somebody trying to prevent somebody from 17 exercising their right. That's a component
18 point. You work into it.

19 MS. WANG: Intimidating practices.

20 MR. HEARNE: I want to bring out the 21 point, it is not just a perception that some 22 hypothetical voter found it intimidating to go

98

1 through the process, but it was intended by the
2 person engaging in that act to deny that person
3 their right to participate in the election.

4 MS. WANG: I had specifically wanted
5 and I guess there had been some objection to 6 having violations of the Voting Rights Act part 7 of this definition, but I think Craig said what
8 was the problem. I think there are some Section
9 2 violations and there was an objection to that.

10 MR. DONSANTO: The problem that I've
11 got with their definition is that the word fraud
12 appears in the labelling definition, and I don't 13 know what the Congress meant when it put that 14 word in there.

15 I have been a prosecutor my whole
16 life. To me, fraud is a crime. There is no
17 such thing to me. Fraud connotes, yes, there is 18 civil fraud, but civil fraud, I have always been

19 a believer in the fact that most civil frauds
20 could be criminal fraud. Fraud is obtaining 21 property from another through lying.

22 MS. WANG: Defining elect fraud and

99

1 defining voter intimidation.

2 MR. GINSBERG: Let me go back to my
3 hypothetical. Does the definition of a poll
4 watcher in an unfriendly precinct, who gets 5 intimidated, who goes about his duties under the 6 statute to challenge voters that he or she 7 thinks may be improper, and is intimidated out of 8 that polling place from doing the poll watcher's
9 job, does that fit in your definition?

10 MS. WANG: well, that goes back to 11 the problem of where do you draw the line
12 between allegations and something that would 13 indicate that there was some merit to it, some 14 sort of investigation or official action, which 15 is a problem that you have in all of these
16 examples, so I can't say this is where you draw
17 the line in this particular instance the same
18 way. I'm not sure how you draw the line when 19 someone alleges that a felon has voted and they 20 should be prosecuted and thrown in jail and it
21 is the case that they did not know where they 22 were not allowed to vote. There is line drawing

100

1 that has to be done that isn't easy.

2 MR. DONSANTO: Couldn't you possibly
3 address this by putting before the preface

Transcript 051806

4 something to the effect that the definition that
5 we're providing here is a definition that we're
6 going to be using to define the scope of this
7 project? Most of the activities described here
8 are crimes, but that is not necessarily the case
9 with all of them.

10 MS. WANG: I'm fine with that.

11 MR. DONSANTO: Something like that.

12 MR. HEARNE: Tova, let me make sure
13 your point is one that I agree with, is to say
14 let's look at we're not saying somebody finds it
15 intimidating, but something intimidating enough
16 to prevent somebody lawfully participating in 17 the election process. Do we include just the 18 voter or other people, volunteers, people
19 participating, people driving them to the poll?
20 If somebody wants to drive somebody to the polls
21 and slashes their tires, does that count as a
22 suppression or intimidation?

101

1 MS. WANG: well, you know, we had
2 that case already.

3 MR. HEARNE: when we look at that
4 definition, what are we looking at?

5 MS. WANG: well, they are in jail
6 now.

7 MR. DONSANTO: That's a Wisconsin
8 case.

9 MR. GINSBERG: what's the distinction
10 between that case and the phone case?

11 MR. DONSANTO: None. We wanted both

008702

12 of them. We were prepared to take both of them,
13 but we only had enough resources to pursue one,
14 and the District Attorney in Milwaukee agreed to 15 take operation elephant flat foot. That's what 16 it was called. The name of it was called 17 elephant flat foot. Instead of jamming the 18 phone lines of the get-out-to-vote drive, they 19 took the vans that were going to be used to 20 deliver voters to the polls and wrecked them.

21 MR. GINSBERG: Is that intimidation?

22 MS. WANG: It probably doesn't count
102

1 because it does distort the ability to vote, so
2 I would guess so.

3 MR. SEREBROV: Well, it's an
4 intentional action, so it's included.

5 MR. DONSANTO: There is corrupt voter
6 suppression, and those guys are all in jail.

7 MR. GINSBERG: And you don't have the 8 federal precedent.

9 MR. DONSANTO: The same thing, the
10 object of the scheme was to deprive the victim
11 of their right to vote in a federal election,
12 the right to vote for federal office. That was 13 the object of it, same way as at the poll.

14 MS. WANG: Are there other comments
15 or suggestions to the definition that we have,
16 other than Craig's?

17 Is this a good time to take a break?

18 MS. SIMS: I wanted to mention that 19 Secretary Todd ROKita had asked about

20 legislative history in connection with these two 21 things. I had done some initial research and 22 hadn't found it to be helpful. As I recall to a
103

1 certain extent, these were, I believe,
2 amendments added on the floor of the House, and
3 I don't know there was a lot of discussion
4 associated with them.

5 MR. ROKITA: Was there any?

6 MS. SIMS: Other than I knew that the 7 voter intimidation was a direct reaction to the 8 voting fraud amendment. What a surprise. That 9 was pretty clear, but there wasn't a lot in here
10 that I could see. The meat of this bill, the 11 discussions took place outside of public venue.

12 MR. ROKITA: If there is some way we 13 can run a quick search on 241 and print off some 14 legislative history.

15 MR. DONSANTO: 241 was enacted in 16 1886.

17 MR. ROKITA: Help America Vote Act.

18 MS. SIMS: We have a volunteer ready
19 to do that, but it may be a good time to do a 20 break.

21 MR. HEARNE: Before we conclude that 22 point, my sense was, is somebody going to 104

1 re-work it, are we going to break it into two?

2 MS. WANG: We're going to put this
3 little preface. She got all this down.

4 MR. HEARNE: Is that transcript going
5 to be available to us?

6 MS. SIMS: We can make it available
7 to you, probably 15 days.

8 (Short Recess.)

9 MS. SIMS: As you notice, we have
10 been joined by Paul DeGregorio and our Executive 11 Director, Tom Wilkey, and Julie Thompson
12 Hodgkins.

13 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: Let me, first
14 of all, thank you on behalf of the Commission
15 for coming today and participating in this 16 important working group. We know that Job and 17 Tova have worked for many months now on this 18 project, and some of you together, to discuss
19 this important issue of voter fraud and voter
20 intimidation that is required under HAVA for the 21 EAC to take a look at. And we have taken our 22 role very seriously to do, and believe they have

□ 105

1 brought together some of the best people in the
2 country to take a look at these issues and to
3 come forth with some ideas for the EAC.

4 Vice-Chairman Martinez wanted to be
5 with us today, but his father is fairly sick in 6 Austin, so he had to fly back yesterday evening
7 to be with his father and so he couldn't be
8 here, but I've asked our executive director, Tom
9 Wilkey, raise your hand, and our legal counsel,
10 Julie Hodgkins, to join us this afternoon.

11 I know that you all have had some

12 discussions already and we're really just going
13 to listen, not to participate, because we know
14 you are at the point where you're going to be 15 talking about some recommendations and talking 16 about some things that you want to direct to the 17 EAC.

18                   So we thought it would be important
19 just for us to sit back and to listen to the 20 discussion so it can help us, as the consultant,
21 to then move forward with recommendations to us
22 in future months. Thank you, again, for 106

1 participating. I don't know if you're going to
2 have future working groups of this group, but 3 certainly --

4                   MS. SIMS: Not for this phase, but if
5 we have subsequent research, I'm sure that we'll 6 need working groups to help us with that.

7                   CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: Peggy Sims and 8 I go back twenty years when I was the director
9 of elections in St. Louis County, and Thor was 10 pretty young and maybe still in law school. I
11 remember those days. I used to call Peggy when 12 she worked for the Federal Election Commission
13 in Franklin. Donsanto also goes back many, many 14 years to IACREAT seminars when I used to hear
15 him talk about voter fraud issues throughout the 16 country. We have got some other people in our 17 own staff who are participating in helping this 18 along. Thank you, Peggy, for your work. I will 19 let you go ahead and continue.

20 MS. SIMS: Okay. I just wanted to 21 say as we get into ideas, because remember,
22 we're not just talking about statistics, we're

107

1 talking about identifying, deterring, and
2 investigating voter fraud and voter
3 intimidation. Some of that, in my mind, and 4 this is, again, from my experience at FEC, will
5 involve the process and how election officials
6 run the process.

7 we're also working on management
8 guidelines for voting systems. As you may know,
9 the EAC recently released its voluntary voting
10 system guidelines which are used to test voting
11 equipment. Now, we're also focusing -- we're 12 also working on updating those guidelines. That 13 is going to be a constant process, but the 14 companion piece, one that I know Tom Wilkey has 15 urged us to do for a long time, is to develop 16 management guidelines for the management of 17 these voting systems. We're working on that 18 right now.

19 Also, we have a project looking at 20 state vote counting and recounting laws in 21 contested elections. And the effort will also 22 pick up best practices that apply to these

108

1 areas.

2 we also have a report that is being
3 -- I guess it is still in the draft stage for 4 provisional voting, and one on voter ID that

5 might relate to some of these problems that we 6 saw, that may actually relate more to how the 7 process is administered rather than actual
8 voting fraud. But if these processes are 9 administered badly, they can leave open the 10 opportunity for voting fraud.

11                   So I wanted to make sure you had that 12 information available before we got into this 13 discussion.

14                   MS. WANG: Okay. Well, as I kept 15 referring to earlier, I did talk to a bunch of 16 political scientists and other expert types in 17 the field. You have in your materials sort of 18 summaries of the recommendations that they made.
19 As I said, if ever there was something everyone
20 agreed to, this would be a complex undertaking.
21 I am not a political scientist so I am sort of 22 reluctant to myself recommend any one of these

109

1 methodologies over another, which is why I think
2 in Phase 2 it will be necessary to have someone
3 of the nature of the people I interviewed
4 involved in the process, someone who really
5 knows how to do statistical work and do these
6 kind of studies. And there are people out there
7 like that, and I can make some recommendations
8 in that regard.

9                   I would note that several of the 10 recommended methodologies, sort of a
11 multi-pronged approach we were getting at 12 earlier, many of them include the elements of 13 conducting more interviews, doing a survey,

14 which I know brings up issues for the EAC, but 15 doing a survey of voters or administrators or 16 both, and finally, analyzing and doing voting
17 list comparisons.

18               So I'm happy to talk further about 19 any of the particular methodologies that were 20 suggested to me but I think I don't feel that I
21 am necessarily in the position to judge which of 22 these is best, and I would be open to any

110

1 thoughts you have as to what seemed like they
2 make the most sense.

3               MS. SIMS: The difficulties we have
4 with surveys is because this agency, unlike FEC,
5 is under the Paperwork Reduction Act
6 requirement, which means we have to go through a
7 process which Julie could tell you, if you need
8 to know. But what it does is delays our ability
9 to be able to do surveys quickly because we have 10 to go through this process before we're allowed
11 to conduct surveys.

12               MR. DONSANTO: Paperwork Reduction
13 Act requires you to --

14               MS. SIMS: Make paperwork, yes. The 15 only reason why I bring that up then is if we're
16 going to have surveys as part of a research
17 process, we have to build in time to be able to 18 go through this process to get our surveys
19 approved and ready to go.

20               I know people were already talking

21 about some ideas earlier. I will just go ahead
22 and put them up. I know we had a discussion

111

1 about observers, using observers or poll
2 watchers. I'm not making any judgements on the 3 cost of these or our ability to do this. I just 4 want to make sure we put up our ideas.

5 MR. CORTES: In terms of that, could
6 we define when we're talking about observers,
7 what those people actually do in the polling
8 place? I think there's different states have 9 allowed different types of access to people and 10 what they can do there. I believe you mentioned
11 earlier that in Virginia there aren't observers
12 allowed, but they do have people in the parties
13 in there that keep track of who comes into the 14 polling place.

15 So in terms of making those
16 distinctions, if we could get some definitions
17 for these, I think it would be helpful.

18 MS. SIMS: Would we be able to do the 19 definitions or would these be defined by the 20 states?

21 MR. SEREBROV: Part of our suggestion
22 was a survey state wise.

112

1 MR. HEARNE: In terms of what I think
2 Ben was suggesting, I think Barry had a concept.
3 what you were talking about, Barry, was sort of 4 the rigorous questionnaire kind of thing that is

5 a uniform observation form that observers were 6 given, with very quantifiable data, that they go
7 in and observe the conduct of the election and 8 report anything based on that sort of standard.
9 That is what you're conceiving. So somebody
10 would say, how many people are registered to 11 vote here, how many machines are in this polling
12 place, how long a wait, how many people came 13 through the line, check off those objective
14 factors, is that what you're thinking of?

15 MR. WEINBERG: Right, whatever else,
16 comments observers want to make on the forms.

17 MR. GREENBAUM: At this point, we're
18 just putting ideas on the table. We're not 19 discussing how we feel about them.

20 MS. SIMS: That's correct. We know
21 we don't have universal support.

22 MS. ROGERS: On the subject of 113

1 observers, there seems to be two prongs; one,
2 observers used in the collection of data, but
3 two, observers used as a methodology in 4 deterring fraud, which seems to me to be two
5 different uses of observers, and I wanted to 6 record that.

7 MS. WANG: Let's just talk about the 8 methodology first because I have a list of 9 things that we should do going forward.
10 I am focusing on the methodologies first.

11 what do you all think about doing a
12 survey?

13 MR. DONSANTO: Survey of what?
14 MS. WANG: Well, you could do it a
15 couple different ways. Some of them actually
16 are described here.
17 MR. BAUER: Voter surveys?
18 MS. WANG: Voter surveys, what did
19 you experience at the poll.
20 MR. DONSANTO: Who are the people
21 that would get the survey?
22 MS. WANG: Well, it would be to have

114

1 some sort of random survey that a political
2 scientist would know how to devise.
3 The other thing is having observers
4 who either survey voters as they come out of the 5 poll.

6 MR. WEINBERG: But is this a survey
7 to determine fraud or to determine what happened
8 in the poll? What's to come out of this, what 9 is the survey supposed to tell us?

10 MS. WANG: Whether the person
11 participated in -- or who knows how much they 12 will self report, or observed some kind of 13 practice, fraud, or intimidation practice.

14 MR. BAUER: Is this based on the 15 Overton?

16 MS. WANG: Several of the experts
17 interviewed that I spoke to suggested a survey.
18 There was also a suggestion of a more massive 19 survey of administrators that would be much more
20 comprehensive than just trying to do interviews

21 of these people.

22 MR. GINSBERG: How many voters were 115

1 they willing to --

2 MS. WANG: No one was willing to come
3 up with a number. They just said it would have 4 to be big.

5 MR. DON SANTO: It would have to be 6 huge.

7 MS. SIMS: When they referenced
8 election officials, they were talking about
9 local and state election officials.

10 MS. WANG: Well, at this point, local 11 because the state election officials have been 12 easy to have conversations with.

13 MR. BAUER: There is one kind of 14 survey intended to determine whether or not the 15 voters we talked to who say they were registered
16 were, in fact, registered. As Overton
17 described, this is a statistically
18 representative sample of people who purported to 19 report how they voted. And the other one,
20 somewhere, you are basically converting them
21 into eyewitnesses.

22 There are very different kinds of surveys for 116

1 very different purposes.

2 MR. GINSBERG: Did you commit fraud
3 at the polling place?

4 MR. BAUER: Trying to transcend the
5 anecdotal nature of what we do about frauds, it

Transcript 051806

6 seems to me -- I am not an expert on polling
7 methodology, but the potential for
8 interpretation of an awful lot of data collected
9 for marginal potential value, it doesn't tell
10 you very much.

11 MR. GREENBAUM: Let me agree with 12 Bob.

13 MS. WANG: Just for the record.

14 MR. WEINBERG: I think a better
15 question would be whether anybody thinks the 16 survey would be useful.

17 MR. DONSANTO: It is for the 18 practical. It might be useful. It is just not 19 practical.

20 MR. GREENBAUM: Except to the extent
21 I am aware of all the things we have on there.
22 How do we capture where most of the fraud's

117

1 taking place, which is not in the polls.

2 MR. DONSANTO: Right.

3 MR. GREENBAUM: For the initial, I
4 will state that it's my opinion.

5 MR. GINSBERG: But come up with a
6 list about where you think the fraud is being
7 committed, see if you can come up with a
8 methodology.

9 MS. WANG: There was this bunch of 10 people who independently came up with the idea
11 of picking ten places where you know there have 12 been a lot of problems, and some people where 13 there haven't, make them match geographically,

14 demographically, and try to see where the 15 differences are.

16 MR. GREENBAUM: It's tricky. I know
17 this in terms of some of the stuff I have done,
18 but sometimes you think that places are doing
19 better than they really are, and sometimes you
20 think that places are doing worse.

21 MR. HEARNE: Let me suggest an 22 objective criteria that you might get in the

118

1 first gathering. In Ohio, a lot of allegations
2 were made that voters were intimidated or
3 suppressed, the voter buys, taking older ones
4 and not putting them in others. There was a
5 U.S. House administration hearing, and officials
6 in charge said, no, we had quality distribution
7 based on number of voters. The lines were long
8 in certain areas, as they were in others.

9 MS. WANG: We don't want to get into 10 that particular example.

11 MR. HEARNE: That's the kind of 12 objective observation to be quantified. If you
13 had an observer in the polling place that would 14 be -- ben had suggested a Republican and 15 Democrat in interest. If you had an appropriate
16 sampling of why it was taking this long to vote
17 in this precinct, this long in this precinct.

18 MR. GREENBAUM: That's not even a
19 fraud issue, I mean, not in my mind. And 20 believe me, we have studied the Ohio elections
21 administration very closely, given that we sued

22 the Secretary of State. That goes more to 119

1 election administration as opposed to a fraud
2 issue.

3 MR. ROKITA: So it doesn't fit under
4 your definition of fraud.

5 MS. WANG: It depends on whether 6 there was some reason to believe it was 7 intention, in my personal opinion.

8 MR. GREENBAUM: Well, the problem in
9 Franklin, Ohio, was determined how the machines
10 were going to be allocated.

11 MR. HEARNE: Let me take that as an
12 example. That is something that undermines a
13 lot of people's confidence in the election
14 process, when somebody is going into the process
15 and saying, we're only going to put one polling
16 machine for every thousand people in this
17 polling place, and fifty of them for 500 people
18 out here. That would be the kind of thing you
19 can quantify. You can find out directly what is 20 the data, what you think you can do that now.
21 We know that now.

22 MR. HEARNE: And that would be

120

1 helpful.

2 MS. SIMS: Maybe the question is how
3 do we find out about that now. Right now, we 4 find out through --

5 MR. ROKITA: The states and the 6 counties.

7 MS. SIMS: The states and the
8 counties, and also calls made to the justice
9 department.

10 MR. HEARNE: Or about the lines. You
11 always get this allegation about long lines.
12 Every voter is going to come out with a 13 different perception, and you're always going to 14 have these competing stories about long lines in 15 different areas. If you had some teams in there
16 watching this and timing it, you would get some 17 objective criteria to evaluate those 18 allegations.

19 MR. GREENBAUM: From my point of 20 view, why would you want a Republican and 21 Democrat, why won't you want a college student
22 or someone else that people can agree doesn't go
121

1 in there with any sort of biases?

2 MR. SEREBROV: You can't necessarily
3 get a college student in the polls.

4 MR. GREENBAUM: Right. The state
5 laws are an impediment in a lot of places.

6 MS. SIMS: Well, some of these
7 things, like the machine placement, that's just 8 an example. A lot of things I personally see in 9 the press before I see anywhere else. That gets 10 to your following up on some of the press
11 reports to find out whether or not something
12 really happened, but that again is not a hundred
13 percent reliable because we're only getting a

14 bit of the picture. And if you follow-up on 15 those press reports, we may find out that an 16 allegation of fraud was not fraud at all, it was 17 a mistake.

18 MS. WANG: Well, that's the case. I
19 don't know if we can come up with a methodology
20 in here. None of us are political scientists at 21 all either. So I just put these in front of you
22 as the types of things that people came up with.

122

1 I think, as we have talked about, it
2 is going to be a combination of approaches which
3 the work that we have already done will be one
4 of those ingredients supplemented by something
5 that political scientists would do.

6 We can get some more ideas flowing.
7 Job and I talked about what we have thought
8 about as being additional steps that could be 9 taken. They are not methodologies but things
10 that we think still need to be done, even just 11 based on what we have already done. Should we 12 move into that or stay on this?

13 MS. SIMS: We can certainly go on
14 because we can come back to this too. One thing
15 I would like to ask folks to consider again,
16 even though we don't have complete data because 17 this is a preliminary study, we do know of areas
18 in the process itself that are more subject to 19 attacks by voting fraud and are the studies EAC
20 can do in those areas.

21 MR. GREENBAUM: Absentee.

22

MS. ROGERS: We haven't talked much

123

1 about absentee ballot. We have talked about
2 observers in the polling place, but the
3 empirical data shows it is absentee balloting
4 fraud, we're poised to see a tremendous amount
5 of that grow.

6 Example, in Georgia, that's happening all
7 over the nation which is now a no-excuse by mail
8 absentee state. In addition to that, it was 9 stuck in our law, it was a caveat that said that 10 political parties could not attach campaign
11 material to an absentee ballot application.
12 That was taken out. It was also ruled that a 13 postage stamp is not a thing of value. So if 14 you put all of those together, we're going to 15 see both parties flooding mail ballots with 16 absentee ballot applications.

17 MS. WANG: Sarah Ball Johnson, who is 18 in charge of elections in Kentucky, we
19 interviewed, talked about the churches gathering
20 people together to collectively fill out their 21 absentee ballot, and being told if they don't 22 vote in a certain way, they were going to hell.

124

1 MR. DONSANTO: That's probably true.

2 MR. ROKITA: There is an example of 3 something you can follow-up on.

4 MS. ROGERS: We have already seen a
5 huge increase in -- I won't say fraud, but in 6 complaints. This law was in place last year and

Transcript 051806

7 we only had municipal elections in November.

8 Not everyone has really wised up to this but a
9 few candidates did, and there was one particular
10 election in Richmond County where going into the 11 run off, the winner was clearly ahead by a lot
12 of votes, and the losing candidate that was 13 down, before he went to the run off, he found
14 out about this little caveat, and he went 15 knocking on every door with an absentee ballot
16 application, and by George, he won, and won big.
17 That's the area.

18                   And the problem is that you're trying 19 not to make it harder on those who are disabled.
20 At the same time, you don't want to keep adding
21 levels and layers of security that prevents them
22 from getting the access that they need, but as

125

1 you take away those levels of security, it
2 follows on the other side as well. I know we
3 haven't really addressed that, but observers
4 don't take care of that process.

5                   MR. HEARNE: You mentioned something
6 that might be helpful in the sense of,
7 statistically, you can look at an election and 8 you can find results that you can look at and 9 say, this doesn't make any sense, how you would 10 get this kind of vote performance out of a
11 particular vocational place or group of absentee
12 ballots.

13                   MS. ROGERS: Well, some of the cases
14 we have looked at, they said, look at these

Transcript 051806

15 numbers, they don't look good to us. We go in 16 and look at them, and what we find is one
17 candidate pounded the pavement with the absentee 18 ballots maybe didn't commit fraud literally. In 19 Georgia, the candidate did fill out the top part
20 of the form. You can check the box and say I
21 don't need excuse, and you can sign it.

22 MR. DONSANTO: Voter has to sign it. 126

1 You can pre print them.

2 MR. HEARNE: You can pre print it
3 with the vote on it.

4 MR. DONSANTO: No, the application.
5 That was a big thing in Florida. Both parties
6 pre printed applications for absentee ballots
7 and mailed them.

8 MS. ROGERS: And one of the biggest 9 problems we see is the fraud is not occurring at 10 the federal candidates. DOJ is not as 11 interested in this.

12 MS. WANG: well, actually, that is 13 not true.

14 MR. DONSANTO: That's not necessarily 15 the case.

16 MS. ROGERS: I'm not saying you are 17 not interesting.

18 MR. DONSANTO: If it happens in a
19 non-federal election, we don't have the statutes
20 to do anything about it.

21 MR. GREENBAUM: It doesn't have to be
22 a federal candidate.

1 MS. WANG: From the news articles,
2 this is the one type of fraud that is more often
3 investigated, and there are indictments, and
4 prosecutions, and convictions, and guilty pleas,
5 and stuff.

6 So you actually can take a look at 7 actual cases to see how it's being done, and try
8 and come up with better measures to prevent it
9 and catch it. You have Oregon, and they claim 10 that they have no problem. That is disputed on 11 a lot of levels but the one thing we can't know
12 about Oregon is the extent of which the coercion
13 problem happens.

14 MR. ROKITA: You can't know?

15 MS. WANG: Right.

16 MR. DONSANTO: Public voting, every
17 ballot, public vote.

18 MS. ROGERS: Unfortunately, it takes 19 so long to bring these cases to a resolution, we 20 find, time after time, by the time the case goes
21 to an actual court, a lot of these folks no
22 longer tell the same story. A year or two goes

128

1 by, and those people who were coerced, they are
2 just not saying that anymore. They change their
3 tune, and then again, many of them are very old
4 and very elderly, and not a hundred percent have
5 all their faculties to begin with, so two years
6 makes a huge difference.

7 I think we see a lot of cases closed
8 simply because you are unable to have the data
9 that you need to follow through.

10 MR. ROKITA: Maybe the EAC should 11 study the methodology of for cause absentee
12 voting as a way to cure it.

13 MS. WANG: That is where you wind up
14 against the politics of it, which seems like a
15 train that's left the station.

16 MR. HEARNE: Your point, if I
17 understand, was in looking at the data where you
18 did find broader, documented evidence of fraud
19 was in the concept of absentee ballots, is that 20 correct?

21 MS. WANG: Yes.

22 MR. HEARNE: So the sense would be is 129

1 there a way to study it. And the question for
2 us now is, how do we study that phenomenon.

3 MS. WANG: Given that it's something
4 that is spreading rapidly, are there measures we
5 can come up with to make the ballots more
6 secure. The coercion issue is difficult to get 7 at, but in terms of the forgeries and those 8 types of things, and even actually with the 9 coercion, are there measures that can be taken
10 to make absentee ballots and mail-in ballots
11 more secure?

12 MR. BAUER: One thing I want to go
13 to, what we were just discussing, some of the
14 recommendations.

15 MS. WANG: Bob, you raised your
16 point.

17 MR. BAUER: One of the interesting
18 proposals or suggestions made by the 19 interviewees, his name is Weisner.

20 MS. WANG: Weisner. Wendy Weisner.

21 MR. BAUER: We though that
22 establishing any degree of concreteness on voter
130

1 fraud would be difficult to establish. We
2 suggest that an effort be made to simply -- I am
3 not quite sure exactly what the methodology name
4 is.

5 MS. WANG: Risk analysis.

6 MR. BAUER: Risk analysis, and
7 determine based on the assumption that people
8 act rationally in this area, what we would most 9 expect to see, what kinds of fraud is most
10 potentially likely, and then just rank it. You
11 are not making a judgement there at that point
12 that's, in fact, what is happening. It is just 13 a very interesting way of trying to sort of 14 order your thoughts about what you might be 15 looking for, and it can be marked up with other
16 numbers to bolster their significance.

17 MR. GINSBERG: How could you figure
18 out how you do the risk analysis.

19 MR. BAUER: I don't know, and I don't
20 have any expertise.

21 MS. WANG: I started to get books on 22 risk analysis but I didn't want to read about
131

Transcript 051806

1 the diseases and environmental calamities.

2 MR. BAUER: Just from a standpoint of 3 debate, what we had in perspective, we find
4 using it to help ask questions was something
5 concrete you can do. I don't think it's a bad
6 thing to do. It is affirmatively a good thing.

7 MR. WEINBERG: I thought that was
8 interesting, although I didn't understand what 9 it said.

10 MR. PEREZ: You're a county clerk,
11 and you are in the ballot. You have got 12 something to gain right away. If you're not on 13 the ballot and you don't work for somebody on 14 the ballot, where is the risk analysis involved,
15 the direct relationship?

16 MS. WANG: Let me try to explain it
17 from the little I understand about it. You
18 take, for example, in the environmental field,
19 if a corporation is trying to decide what 20 measures to takes, how much is that worth, how 21 likely is it that some bad outcome is going to 22 happen versus the cost of preventing it. So you

132

1 would sort of do a cost benefit analysis of each
2 type of voter fraud that we have listed. So
3 what's the risk of filling out a fraudulent
4 absentee ballot versus the risk of getting
5 caught, or the penalty involved, the cost
6 involved of doing so.

7 And by going through that method,

8 determining what are the types of fraud that are 9 most likely to be committed, because as Bob
10 says, people are presumed to be rational actors
11 and to engage in those types of activities that 12 they think they can get away it.

13 MR. PEREZ: You're talking about the 14 actual voter. I'm talking about the actual 15 groups trying to get something passed.

16 MR. GREENBAUM: It could be either.
17 You could do it at the level of the voter or the 18 level of an organization.

19 MR. PEREZ: The voter is going to be 20 intimidated, but the organization has an agenda.

21 MR. GREENBAUM: But I think some 22 people here would say that a portion of the 133

1 fraud is being committed by individual voters,
2 without necessarily being part of a greater
3 agenda. I think you would have to analyze it
4 both ways.

5 MR. SEREBROV: We found very little
6 though.

7 MS. WANG: There is only very little
8 who found there was anything conspiratorial
9 going on, one which was actually theories that 10 indicated that there was anything conspiratorial
11 happening.

12 MR. BAUER: A cross the board?

13 MS. WANG: Right. The ACVR report
14 allude to some coordination of voter
15 registration fraud among some of the voter

16 registration groups.

17 MR. SEREBROV: What was stated was 18 groups versus individual. That's what I was 19 saying, was we found very little individual
20 activity as opposed to organizational activity.

21 MR. BAUER: I'm sorry. Just so we
22 can define these terms, and I apologize, very 134

1 little individual voters committing fraud.

2 MR. BAUER: Just because they wanted
3 to.

4 MS. WANG: Well, actually, in the
5 articles, you do find individuals on the 6 absentee vote just submitting an absentee ballot
7 in the name of somebody else or in the name of 8 somebody who died.

9 MR. GREENBAUM: Like some of the 10 stuff in Texas.

11 MR. DONSANTO: Somebody committing
12 voter fraud is not going to make as big a splash
13 in the newspaper as some organization.

14 MR. HEARNE: Some organization that 15 is paying somebody to do something that they 16 know is fraudulent, then that's different than 17 the individual engaging in that activity.

18 So if somebody is paying for fraudulently
19 submitted voter registration forms and they 20 understand those are fraudulent, that would be 21 then that type of activity.

22 MR. DONSANTO: Paying for piece work 135

1 and getting fraudulent documents, but that is
2 not the intent.

3           MR. GREENBAUM: I would say another
4 thing you want to measure in terms of doing a
5 risk analysis is the conditions of the elections
6 in which it tends to happen.

7           MS. WANG: Right.

8           MR. GREENBAUM: Like I think a lot of 9 people believe that voter fraud, no matter who 10 it's committed by, tends to happen most often
11 when you have very competitive elections.
12 Because people, the winner -- the fraud may 13 actually make a difference in terms of who wins
14 or who loses the election.

15           MR. ROKITA: I'd like to follow-up on 16 that to say that this risk analysis, I think,
17 might fit very well in a corporation that was 18 trying to figure out what jobs they were having 19 people do, to see if OSHA would be violated or 20 something like that. When you pour on top of 21 that the serum like you're saying of any
22 election that has its emotions in candidates'

136

1 political parties tied to it, I think that risk
2 analysis is less useful.

3           MS. WANG: We can't presume people
4 are rational.

5           MR. HEARNE: With elections.

6           MR. ROKITA: And, too, you want to be 7 careful of the impression you leave. If you're

8 doing a risk analysis, you are weighing, and 9 that's something that might be acceptable.

10 MS. WANG: No, not acceptable, you
11 look for ways to address it. It's a more
12 practical way of getting at solutions rather 13 than trying to gauge with a number.

14 MR. ROKITA: You said a ranking.

15 MS. WANG: Not more important,
16 easier.

17 MR. SEREBROV: Todd, can't we presume
18 that they act rationally as to the means, not 19 necessarily the motive?

20 MS. WANG: I mean, people don't want
21 to go to jail.

22 MR. BAUER: I think the public

137

1 presents itself with amalgamation, but when
2 people try to win elections, targeting, I think
3 it's all about going to great length. I think,
4 in close analysis, I don't think at the end of
5 the day you're quite right, it has the same
6 application here as it might in other field but 7 I think it might be illuminated.

8 MS. WANG: We could get someone who
9 is actually an expert in risk analysis here
10 rather than someone who is a political scientist
11 who focuses on elections. That would give an 12 even better neutrality color to it.

13 MR. PEREZ: If you're trying to find
14 out a point where you want to review who is 15 going to be doing something, the only instances

16 I have with this has been in early voting where 17 they used the mail ballot in a particular
18 instance, where trying to get a particular 19 candidate or pass something that is going to 20 avoid money. When they do the particular issue,
21 some company's going to come into town and gain
22 a big contract. That's when I have seen the 138

1 mail ballot application trying to be defrauded
2 because they are trying to pass a particular
3 issue that was very obvious to us before we went 4 into it. What he did was tried to make sure we 5 did not let them do anything illegal. They
6 tried to put people in the polls. We ran them
7 out. They tried to put applications in. We
8 looked at the applications, the same
9 handwriting, anything that we could gauge.
10 Luckily, we have a lot better laws in terms of 11 what applications we have to take. We have gone
12 through with two years legislation to improve 13 the mail application process, and we have almost 14 got it down.

15 MS. ROGERS: It still can change.

16 MR. BAUER: Do you think you see more
17 fraud for initiative elections?

18 MS. WANG: You're talking about
19 money.

20 MR. PEREZ: It's like a business, who 21 is going to get money and how much money are 22 they going to get. Nobody can come to me and 139

Transcript 051806

1 say, hey, Jerry, are you going to throw that
2 election. I'm not going to get any money, why
3 should I care who gets elected.

4 MS. WANG: The conditions under which
5 somebody is trying to get elected. It's also 6 the smaller elections.

7 MR. PEREZ: Where you can throw it
8 much easier.

9 MR. GINSBERG: But you can have 10 people paying people to register where the 11 stakes are higher, and therefore, have an higher
12 incidence of false registrations.

13 MR. PEREZ: The risk analysis is it
14 costs too much money, whereas if you have a
15 small election, you can spend $10,000 and throw
16 the election, whereas on a national election, it
17 would cost.

18 MS. ROGERS: The people who are doing
19 this to be paid are simply taking a phone book
20 or making up names and making up -- used to be 21 able to collect social security numbers, making
22 up social security numbers. They didn't do it

140

1 for the purpose of trying to defraud the
2 election. They did it for the purpose of 3 putting money in their pocket.

4 MR. GINSBERG: Isn't that also the
5 incubator where you get false voters coming in?

6 MR. DON SANTO: No, no. I haven't
7 seen it.

8 MR. HEARNE: One situation we had a

9 tandem effort where there was a petition for a 10 recall. They were trying a recall petition but 11 to do that you had to be a registered voter.
12 They were forcing the recall petition as well as 13 turning in the registration. This was, in 14 effect, using that same process, certainly 15 affecting the election process through that 16 petition effort.

17 MS. ROGERS: The ones that we saw
18 mailed out something and it came back
19 undeliverable, these people did not exist.

20 MS. WANG: In the ones that we
21 interviewed, almost nobody that has phoney
22 registration forms led to illegal votes. It's 141

1 not to say it's not a problem, but messing up
2 the voting rolls creates a problem of 3 confidence.

4 MR. PEREZ: That's hard to do now
5 because you have to have a drivers license,
6 social security number, a lot of data. We watch
7 three criteria. If it's not good, they kick it
8 out. That person is in limbo until we can 9 verify something.

10 MS. WANG: Exactly.

11 MR. DONSANTO: We have had several
12 investigations involving these sort of bogus
13 registrations generated through the bounty
14 hunting system of paying people. In most of 15 these cases, complainants were election
16 registrars. The reason it came to our attention
Page 105

Transcript 051806

17 was because the people did not get on the rolls.

18 It's still a crime.

19 MS. WANG: Right.

20 MR. DONSANTO: But the system worked.

21 MS. WANG: The biggest problem is it

22 drives administrators crazy.

142

1 MR. HEARNE: Well, if they go to the
2 phone books, they are taking sometimes names of 3 legitimate registered voters.

4 MS. WANG: with the statewide
5 database, now it's going to get knocked out.

6 MS. ROGERS: They were making up the 7 social security number, but a lot of them took 8 phone books and they started saying, Apartment
9 1, Apartment 2.

10 MR. DONSANTO: Turn them in, get the 11 two dollars.

12 MR. BAUER: It answers an interesting
13 question. 150 years ago, it wasn't a question.
14 High intensity, high party electoral process,
15 intense, passionate people would march through
16 the street with passion, widespread cheating,
17 you name it, there was a belief in the outcome.
18 Now, we're in a high stake press, low, weak
19 party process. Voter applicant is such that he 20 really actually wouldn't expect an enormous
21 amount of voter fraud because benefits are not 22 seen.

143

1 MS. WANG: If you read Laura Minete's
2 report, she comes to that conclusion, that the 3 structural conditions that led to such fraud in 4 earlier times in our history are no longer
5 present, especially weakening of the party
6 system that so organized these efforts. It is 7 pretty interesting.

8 Should we try to move on to the next
9 steps?

10 MS. SIMS: A lot of the public record
11 doesn't have a lot of information on what they 12 meant by voting fraud. Secretary Rokita had 13 asked us to take a look at the legislative 14 history on that.

15 LAIZA: I have the conference reports
16 and I highlight where they use the word fraud.
17 You're welcome to take a look at it. What I can
18 do is e-mail them to you. I can make copies
19 right now or e-mail them to you.

20 MR. HEARNE: You don't need to 21 highlight, just e-mail it.

22 MR. SEREBROV: Actually, can you

144

1 e-mail that to everyone?

2 MS. SIMS: You will see fraud crops
3 up in a lot of other sections, and it's equally
4 unlikely just because they use it in terms of 5 the NIS support to help us prevent fraud, the 6 report that we have already done on the uniform
7 overseas voters issues best practices to avoid
8 fraud there, that sort of thing pops up in a lot

9 of different places.

10 MR. DON SANTO: We have never seen a
11 problem having to do with anything having to do
12 with fraud of any kind. It is not structurally
13 set up that way, put that low on your list. All 14 we have is a criminal statute that deals with 15 fraud.

16 MS. WANG: Its been such a
17 deterrence. These are just my own thoughts
18 about things that I'd like to see done, that we 19 build upon the research that we've done. As I
20 mentioned, and I have mentioned a lot of these 21 already, I would greatly broaden the scope of 22 the type of interviews that we've done to the 145

1 local people, and also to include the federal
2 district election officers and district
3 attorneys like we have discussed a lot, the 4 follow-up on the nexus research to see if there
5 had been some further resolution, follow-up on 6 the reports and books written to see, again,
7 whatever happened to those instances that were 8 cited.

9 I also wanted to talk about both the 10 election protection materials and also the 1800
11 my vote analysis. I don't know how many of you
12 are familiar with this but they took, in 2004,
13 200,000 phone calls and they have created a
14 database in which they have separated out the 15 types of complaints, whether it be a
16 registration problem, intimidation, improperly

17 asking for ID. They have them all systematized
18 from all across the country. They also have 19 over 50,000 audio phone messages that were left
20 that they have also culled through and assigned
21 categories for what type of complaint or 22 allegation was made. And I had thought that

146

1 looking at that data further might be useful.
2 And I have spoken to the people who ran that
3 project, who are willing to share that with me.
4 I also would love to be able to get more and 5 analyze more data and information from the 6 Department of Justice, such as information from 7 the database what's called the interactive case
8 management system that they have on complaints
9 received and how they were dealt with, which I
10 referred to earlier they did not feel
11 comfortable sharing with us. The election data
12 which we also were not able to get, and also 13 reports done by the district election officers
14 who are in every jurisdiction.

15 I also think it would be great to 16 attend the next session of the ballot accessing 17 symposium.

18 MR. DONSANTO: No, that is not
19 possible. That is classified. I didn't set up
20 the rules for this. Believe me, there is no
21 chance.

22 MS. WANG: I think it would be useful
147

1 to do a complete analysis of the federal

008736

2 observer errors from 2002, 2004 and 2006.

3           MR. GREENBAUM: Let me give you a
4 little warning about that. Assuming that you
5 have got them.

6           MS. WANG: That were millions of
7 them, I know, but there might be some way to do
8 a sampling or something.

9           MR. GREENBAUM: You would have to 10 have -- I mean, we did -- for our report on the 11 Voting Rights Act, we did have people go through 12 the ones that we had, and it was a lot of people
13 and a few reports, a few different elections,
14 let's put it that way.

15           MS. WANG: I know. And also, again,
16 as I mentioned before, I think it's important
17 that we have an academic institution or 18 individual that focuses on statistical methods
19 for political science research. And I certainly 20 know a bunch of people like that, and would be 21 very interested in working with someone like
22 that in the second phase.

148

1           Those are my suggestions.

2           MR. SEREBROV: Yes. And I had three
3 suggestions. I think two may have gotten up
4 there. One was a survey of state laws.

5           MS. SIMS: I've got that.

6           MR. SEREBROV: One was a survey of 7 district court cases, which I think you may have 8 gotten, survey of district court cases not in 9 specific states. And then the other thing is

10 looking at local newspapers in various states
11 and running searches on election issues. I
12 think right now what we need to do is bear down
13 on the local level. Sometimes those are missed
14 in the nexus search. I think we need to plug
15 the holes.

16 MR. HEARNE: One thing that was 17 mentioned here was working with the database to 18 compare, I think it was referenced in the dead
19 voters, just doing a statistical match. Being 20 able to run the voter role versus the dead,
21 divorces, those that did cast ballots,
22 essentially, three data fields, and see where 149

1 you get an overlap.

2 MS. WANG: That is part of the second
3 to the last page.

4 MS. SIMS: So we're looking -- I know
5 we covered some of that over at the FEC, but
6 looking at list maintenance procedures.

7 MR. HEARNE: I mean, you hear the 8 allegation and there's been reports in the 9 Detroit News where they went through and did
10 this process where they marked and found a bunch
11 of votes in the name of those who were dead, and 12 they found the people.

13 MS. ROGERS: That's not going to work
14 unless you actually go back to wherever the 15 voter filled it out because the election
16 official may have actually tagged that dead
17 voter by mistake, instead of the other voter,

18 even though the dead voter didn't show up.
19 You have to go to the documentation at the 20 polling place to determine whether they gave 21 credit to the right or wrong voter. There is a
22 huge opportunity for error.

150

1 MR. HEARNE: But if you did that and
2 said, let's take the list of everyone who is a
3 registered voter in whatever area we're looking,
4 whatever state, let's say Texas, then I take
5 that and run it against the social security
6 death list, and get those.

7 MR. PEREZ: Following along, it might
8 be easier, NVRA requires us to put it in 9 suspense because we have to keep them for four 10 years. People can go through and pick out those 11 people and then commit voter fraud based on the 12 fact that those people aren't there any more.
13 That data can be quantitatively checked
14 throughout the state. You can say how many 15 suspense voters did you have in the last 16 election.

17 MR. HEARNE: Then you print that out.

18 MR. PEREZ: But you have such a large
19 number. How many of them were really updating 20 their record and how many of them were not.
21 That would be harder to prove. That's a big 22 hole that we've got.

151

1 MS. WANG: I would want to talk to a

2 political scientist about that. They can figure
3 out ways of doing it, margins of error.

4 MS. ROGERS: I would feel comfortable
5 doing that after this year. We're implementing 6 poll books instead of a manual credit. So the 7 person who actually voted will get the credit
8 for voting. It won't be something going through 9 slips of paper, trying to do that manually for 10 four million voters, but until everyone had an 11 automated process of that sort --

12 MS. WANG: Well, none of that is 13 going to happen any time soon.

14 MR. GREENBAUM: What percentage come
15 out to the polls?

16 MS. ROGERS: In the presidential
17 election, you get a large number of inactive
18 voters.

19 MR. PEREZ: They become inactive, yet
20 they show up to vote, so it would be hard to 21 tell which ones were not legitimate voters.

22 MR. HEARNE: You can run that against 152

1 the social security death list.

2 MR. PEREZ: Well, the state does that
3 automatically.

4 MS. SIMS: I know Kentucky was one of
5 the first big states that did that statewide,
6 and they did have one instance that the mother
7 of a state legislator was listed as dead and she 8 wasn't.

9 MR. HEARNE: I assume you would have

10 some errors.

11 MS. SIMS: It gives you something to 12 start with, and that's subject to confirmation,
13 helps you target.

14 MS. ROGERS: I think you might get
15 better data if you match data state to state,
16 try to determine who the double voting and dead
17 voters are.

18 MS. WANG: I'm sorry. We have a side
19 bar going on. Anyway, I'm sorry about that.
20 So those are our suggestions for next steps that 21 the second phase could undertake.

22 Anything else that we can think of?
153

1 MR. GREENBAUM: I am still worried
2 about -- one of our big areas of concern is
3 deceptive practices. And I am struggling with 4 how to measure that, how to define it. It's not
5 something that you're going to find in the cases
6 so far, for various reasons.

7 MS. WANG: You do find it in the
8 news.

9 MR. GREENBAUM: You do find it in the 10 news.

11 MR. DONSANTO: There is also a range
12 of different types. These things range from 13 relatively innocuous communications to ones that 14 are a terribly pernicious.

15 MR. GREENBAUM: Kind of how you sort
16 that. I don't know if you have any ideas.

17 MR. DONSANTO: A series of letters

18 that are circulated saying something stupid like
19 Republican are not allowed to vote in this 20 election, which is idiotic. Another on the 21 other end would be something that suggests to 22 people that the polling places in one fact when,

154

1 in fact, it is another, or Republicans vote on
2 one day and Democrats vote on another.

3 MR. GREENBAUM: You saw it all but
4 how do you measure that?

5 MR. DONSANTO: In terms of their
6 damage.

7 MS. WANG: Although that is the kind
8 of things that organizations could provide more
9 eyes and ears on. Well, actually there you have 10 real evidence. You have phone calls.

11 MR. GREENBAUM: I brought some of the 12 fliers with me, if anyone wants to look at it.

13 MR. DONSANTO: We have some on board
14 of elections stationary. Somebody got a hold of 15 board of elections stationary.

16 MR. GREENBAUM: Unfortunately.

17 MS. SIMS: We have got the idea of 18 looking at some of the phone calls because we 19 have phone logs here that we keep for calls
20 related to election.

21 MR. GREENBAUM: Can I get a stapler?

22 MS. SIMS: I don't know if we have 155

1 access to groups' outside phone logs. I know we
2 have had problems with that before, phone logs

3 for other groups.

4 MS. WANG: Well, you guys would share
5 your stuff with us, right?

6 MR. GREENBAUM: Yes, except for the 7 identifying information of the individual who 8 called in.

9 MS. SIMS: So we could at least get
10 an indication.

11 MR. GREENBAUM: That stuff is
12 available. I can give you the website.
13 The one that I think that I will say is that we 14 will do the -- the quality of the data will be 15 better in the future than it was in 2004.

16 MS. WANG: Deceptive practices is one
17 area where you have some piece of evidence. So
18 you are not necessarily having that problem,
19 allegation versus reality, whereas we actually
20 made the decision not to go through election
21 protections data during this phase because of 22 the problem of trying to weed out allegation

156

1 from reality. I think deceptive practices is
2 one area where we can use the data from various
3 organizations out there monitoring the situation
4 without any controversy.

5 MR. SEREBROV: You also might be able
6 to get some from the either the secretary of the 7 states office or state board of election
8 commissions.

9 MS. SIMS: That was a question I have 10 since we have two state officials here.

Transcript 051806

11 should we look at the feasibility of getting 12 reports? You already put reports together, and 13 I know that's not the case in all states.

14 MR. SEREBROV: Arkansas does.

15 MS. WANG: It could be part of the 16 Election Day survey.

17 MS. SIMS: Well, that's something we
18 could explore.

19 MS. HODGKINS: There are several 20 states that have voter fraud units to 21 investigate these matters where there is at 22 least an opportunity for people to report, at

157

1 least. We did keep reports on what would then
2 be transmitted to the District Attorneys Office
3 for prosecution.

4 MR. SEREBROV: Arkansas didn't have
5 that. I assume Louisiana did. Do you know
6 which states have it or which states don't?

7 MS. HODGKINS: I don't.

8 MR. SEREBROV: Is there any way you
9 can get a list?

10 MS. HODGKINS: I'm sure there is.

11 MR. DONSANTO: Do a survey.

12 MS. WANG: I also think there is 13 unity in getting a case management system for 14 the voting system.

15 MS. ROGERS: In terms of state law,
16 what does each secretary of state or state
17 election board -- how do they handle complaints
18 at the time it hits the door; who makes the

19 determination of whether that is a valid
20 complaint or invalid complaint. I think we 21 found that varied.

22 MS. ROGERS: It varies. We have even 158

1 changed our own internal policies since I became
2 director. The former director actually sort of 3 looked at some of these, and you just don't
4 always have enough information to do that.

5 MR. SEREBROV: I think you have to 6 start with the foundational question is, does
7 the secretary of state or the state board have 8 the authority to handle complaints at all.

9 MS. ROGERS: Right. And at some
10 point, I realize that in any event, the question
11 would be, what do you do when the complaint
12 comes, period.

13 MS. WANG: We asked that of all the 14 administrators that we interviewed, and we got a
15 different answer from everybody.

16 MR. WEINBERG: I actually asked the 17 state election directors that through NASAD a 18 few years back, and they distributed the 19 question to the state election directors. And 20 it turned out that hardly any state election
21 directors, at least in 2001, I think, had much
22 authority at all to do anything about anything.
159

1 MS. WANG: They don't have authority.
2 What we heard is they will get complaint but

3 then they will throw them out to whoever does
4 have authority.

5 MR. WEINBERG: By the way, I don't
6 know what Department of Justice case management
7 system you're referring to, but if it's as good
8 as the one they have had for the last 40 years,
9 I wouldn't suggest you waste time on it.

10 MR. SEREBROV: John Tanner didn't say
11 a lot of anything.

12 MS. WANG: No. He didn't want to 13 share a lot.

14 MR. PEREZ: Peggy, are you sure this
15 wasn't a typo?

16 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: Each state,
17 under HAVA, is required to post complaints.
18 Every polling place in the country in federal 19 elections is to post its administrative
20 complaint procedures. I look for that when I go
21 out to places all over the country. The chief
22 election authority is the one who sends it out. 160

1 MS. WANG: I would be curious to know
2 the extent states are implementing
3 administrative complaint procedures under HAVA,
4 because I don't think they all are.

5 MS. ROGERS: I can tell you we have
6 it, and it's just sitting out there.

7 MS. WANG: Even if they informed
8 HAVA, I don't think people even know about it to 9 use it, and I think maybe that's something else
10 that's not my bailiwick, but something ought to 11 be looked at.

12 MR. PEREZ: State of Texas made
13 posters four feet by three feet. They go to 14 each poll, red, white, and black, and they do
15 call, because I have got several calls and they 16 ask me what happened.

17 MS. SIMS: That is another research
18 project we have somebody working on. We have a
19 Design For Democracy group to try to help
20 election officials make them simple and clear so
21 people can see this information a lot better
22 than what we do now.

161

1 MS. WANG: Also, it might be wise for
2 the EAC to undertake as another project to
3 investigate or do a survey of whether the states
4 are actually implementing the administrative
5 complaint procedure and whether that can be used
6 as another tool for quantifying or deferring or 7 investigating these types of activities.

8 MR. PEREZ: You could query the law,
9 see how many complaints.

10 MS. WANG: If they were actually
11 using the complaint procedure.

12 MR. PEREZ: But that would give you
13 something to look at.

14 MS. ROGERS: It's not that we don't 15 get complaints. It's just that not too many 16 fall under administrative complaints under HAVA.
17 There is a narrow window there.

18 MS. WANG: Right, but at least you

19 would know of the complaints, whether you refer 20 them out to another entity, at least you could 21 have that much information.

22 MR. GREENBAUM: How many complaints 162

1 do you get from a major election?

2 MS. ROGERS: We get -- gosh, without
3 having the form in front of me. We could get
4 anywhere from a hundred or more questions,
5 complaints. They could range from a hundred to 6 200. What we do now, we have started this since 7 2004, we have so many people taking calls on 8 Election Day, and when you can't get through to 9 say our office or a county office, then even the 10 calls are spilling over from elections agencies
11 into other divisions of the Secretary of State's 12 Office. It's like whoever they can get a call
13 to on that day. We have actually provided forms
14 to everyone that may take a call, and then we go
15 through after the fact and they have to 16 identify, does this person need a call back,
17 were they satisfied, was there anything here
18 that needs immediate action or that needs to be 19 forwarded to us immediately. And we follow up
20 on every single complaint that we can not find 21 out right then was unjustified. And some of 22 them maybe couldn't find the polling place. 163

1 They moved it. I just didn't know.

2 But we take all of those complaints and then
3 follow through. It is time-consuming and it is

4 taking up more time and energy than we have ever
5 put to it in the past.

6 MR. SEREBROV: Does anyone in your
7 office have the authority to do something about
8 complaints?

9 MS. ROGERS: Well, we probably take
10 more authority than we really have under the 11 law, if you want to get right down to it. We 12 have monitors and observers out there. They 13 contact us immediately, and we do apply some 14 immediate pressure if we think something's
15 happened. We act like we have it.

16 MR. SEREBROV: One thing we asked the 17 interviewees, I think that is the way it is in a 18 lot of states -- should there be some kind of 19 administrative judges or anyone specifically
20 trained in this area who would quickly dispose 21 of these things, what do you all think about 22 that?

164

1 MS. WANG: I think they say in
2 Pennsylvania they have special courts.

3 MR. HEARNE: Election courts, it is
4 mostly Philadelphia. It may be mostly there
5 that they get used but they have special
6 election courts set up, an election court.

7 MR. SEREBROV: Are they the same
8 judges that sit as normal?

9 MR. HEARNE: Most states, they would
10 have a separate procedure for designating when 11 it gets to that level. What Philadelphia has is 12 they have this whole host of election -- they 13 call them judges. They are not a full court

14 judge, but they act in that capacity.

15 MR. SEREBROV: See, here's where the 16 system's bogged down in at least any state that 17 there are election judges. In Arkansas, you get 18 a complaint, right, someone files suit. It goes
19 to the circuit court judge. Circuit court judge
20 is elected. Now, up to three years ago, the 21 circuit court judge was elected on a ballot.
22 So the circuit court judge never rules the way

165

1 just a completely neutral judge should rule. It
2 just doesn't happen, so all those cases get
3 appealed to the Supreme Court of Arkansas.
4 Supreme Court of Arkansas is elected. Then you
5 get have very strange things go every which way
6 when it comes to election cases.

7 MS. WANG: Do you have any sense
8 maybe this is one more thing to investigate
9 further, whether the Pennsylvania system works.

10 MR. HEARNE: I have the general sense
11 I guess it sort of works and it sort of doesn't,
12 and there is not a whole lot of confidence in 13 it.

14 MS. WANG: Maybe it is something to 15 look at though. I know they certainly have that 16 system. Maybe you and Craig would know better.
17 They have election courts in other countries.

18 MR. HEARNE: The biggest problem is 19 having real clear rules beforehand so that

20 whoever is making that decision, it is not 21 perceived of as a biased perception, but that 22 it's just, hi, here it is. We have a procedure.

166

1 I don't care what party you are.

2 MR. WEINBERG: In most countries
3 where you have an election procedure, it is 4 centralized, and so they get immediate
5 responses. They do have courts, but on Election
6 Day, it is whoever is running the election tells
7 the people the polling stations' precinct people
8 to get it right.

9 MS. WANG: So election courts aren't
10 used on Election Day.

11 MR. WEINBERG: No, not much.

12 MS. ROGERS: Each county has to sit
13 until the election has closed out for the day
14 for the purposes of hearing something like a 15 polling place should remain open, but any 16 allegation of fraud would not necessarily be 17 there that day. It would be more to mitigate,
18 and we need to hold that polling place open.

19 MR. SEREBROV: See, in Arkansas, 99
20 percent of the problems used to occur on the day
21 of election that they were sued over.

22 And the problem is the Supreme Court of 167

1 Arkansas, in its infinite wisdom, has decided
2 that election law is discretionary after the
3 election. So if a violation occurs on the day

4 of the election and you file the day after the 5 election, they don't have to apply the law.

6 MR. WEINBERG: Everybody does that,
7 that's throughout the whole country, mandatory
8 before, discretionary after. But, you know, I
9 always thought that it would be good for the 10 state supervisor of elections office to have the 11 authority to get the word down to the polling
12 place to stop doing it wrong and start doing it
13 right, I have always thought.

14 MS. WANG: They informally do that.

15 MR. WEINBERG: Hardly anybody has any 16 authority.

17 MS. ROGERS: Don't tell them that.

18 MR. WEINBERG: But I have always
19 thought that if everybody did in the polling
20 place what state law said they should do, you
21 wouldn't have any problem.

22 MR. PEREZ: Secretaries of states are 168

1 going in reviewing the situation. It is up to
2 the local mission.

3 MS. ROGERS: To take them before the
4 state election board. If we find an infraction
5 at the poll worker level, then we bring it to 6 the state investigation board. It goes forward
7 for administrative hearing.

8 MR. SEREBROV: The legislature won't
9 permit them to have an attorney.

10 MS. ROGERS: We call them
11 policymakers.

12 MR. GREENBAUM: We're seeing in some
13 states consolidation for giving the head
14 secretary of state or whatever statewide
15 election official more authority, so it is 16 moving towards that direction.

17 MS. WANG: In other directions.

18 MS. SIMS: We should be able to get
19 into that, if we do a survey of state laws
20 and/or regulations.

21 MS. ROGERS: Like Georgia, there are
22 little counties that won't comply with absentee
169

1 battling deadlines. We were the ones that
2 entered into the consent order with the DOJ. So
3 states should need more authority.

4 MR. PEREZ: Looking at voting fraud,
5 a type command structure from the top down would
6 wrinkle it out real fast. I'm not sure that's 7 the problem. At the lower level, it is more of 8 a dysfunctional structure thing more than voter
9 fraud. Voter fraud is going to be committed by 10 parties outside. We need a tighter command but 11 that's not going to be in you all's recommend 12 because that is not really voter fraud.

13 MR. HEARNE: Where it goes to voter
14 fraud would be for the statewide half, for the 15 agent of the state to keep that clean, current
16 and accurate, that is the biggest reason
17 somebody shows up at the poll. So if you have a
18 clean, current, accurate, statewide list.

19 MR. PEREZ: In that respect, you're

20 right, but the rest of it is still not there for 21 the state of Texas, so they cannot fix a bad
22 problem. San Antonio had problems for decades. 170

1 The secretary of state knew about them, could
2 not do anything about them.

3 MR. ROKITA: One methodology that you
4 might want to investigate is to determine across
5 the states what kind of data facilitation there
6 is from a county level to the state level.

7 MS. WANG: None.

8 MR. ROKITA: Actually, that is not
9 accurate because Indiana --

10 MS. WANG: Well, not many states.
11 We had to ask a lot of people. No. Go ahead.

12 MR. ROKITA: We just passed a law
13 that is going to require county clerks, any 14 voter challenge that is made, any precincts in 15 their county, a record has to be transmitted to 16 the state level. Anything can be passed on to a
17 prosecutor. We have the statewide voter files
18 as vehicles to quickly pass that information.
19 So you may want to investigate.

20 MR. SEREBROV: Well, I think what are 21 you suggesting that there should be -- I almost 22 don't want to use this word. Are you suggesting 171

1 that there should be some uniform laws?

2 MR. ROKITA: No, no, no -- whoever
3 the reporter is.

4 MR. HEARNE: I think he said it three
Page 127

5 times, for the record.

6 MR. ROKITA: Paul knows from whence I
7 come in other meetings, but I guess, again, to 8 identify methodologies, this may be where you
9 can get that kind of data, then have 10 quantitative analysis to use, something that we 11 as a state all by our lonesome figured out we 12 can do.

13 MR. CORTES: Perhaps not a uniform
14 law, but perhaps for us to look at some model
15 statutes in different states, because I don't 16 think all states are at the point where they are 17 taking the initiative to do that. And so if 18 they have some model statutes to look at, they 19 can say, oh, this might fit our situation or 20 this might not fit, and we can adjust
21 accordingly.

22 MS. WANG: We're talking about for 172

1 the purposes of data collection and doing
2 research, I am curious if anyone knows which
3 states are the ones that already are collecting
4 data, county level data, at the state level,
5 because my impression has been that they are not
6 doing that, but you're telling me something
7 else.

8 MR. GREENBAUM: Of voter fraud?

9 MS. WANG: Complaints.

10 MR. HEARNE: There's been particular
11 investigations after different elections that I
12 am aware of, but not as a practice

13 institutionally in that category.

14 MS. ROGERS: I don't go through and 15 put it all in a spread sheet, but we do maintain 16 the complaints.

17 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: In the state
18 plans that were filed with us, did any detail
19 complaint procedures?

20 MS. SIMS: Reporting back to the 21 state, that I don't know.

22 MR. CORTES: I think in terms of 173

1 going back a second to the administrative
2 complaint procedure, that being a tool for this,
3 I think part of the problem that we run into is 4 that HAVA only requires that those complaints
5 procedure be for complaints and implementation
6 of Title 3 requirements. Some states have 7 though taken it a step further, and in creating 8 the administrative complaints procedure that 9 they need to under HAVA, have expanded it and 10 made that their standard complaint procedure for 11 anything that goes on dealing with any 12 complaints dealing with elections.

13 MS. SIMS: California has a combo
14 form, a form for Title 3 complaints and other
15 things that might go voting rights.

16 MS. WANG: I would love to see the 17 forms.

18 MR. CORTES: So there are some states
19 that combine that, and have one procedure, and 20 use one form that's available for all sorts of

21 complaints.

22 MS. WANG: Do they keep records? 174

1 MR. CORTES: I'm just telling you the
2 administrative complaint procedure, some states
3 have done that. Some states will only take the 4 very specific thing that HAVA asked them do and
5 have other procedures that they use for state
6 specifically complaints.

7 MS. SIMS: No more ideas, we're all
8 worn out?

9 MR. ROKITA: I have some thematic
10 thoughts, if I can share them, what we haven't 11 talked about today yet, but I did see some up in 12 some of the interviews, is the idea of some of 13 these deterrents or perceived deterrents to 14 fraud being confidence builders for the entire 15 prospect of going to the polls and having your 16 vote count but only once. I think that should 17 be a significant part or central to the work
18 certainly of the EAC and of this report.

19 Just like to give a statement against
20 interest, having a paper audit trail to machines
21 is less based on empirical data that electronic 22 machines are wrong and more based on a 175

1 confidence builder.

2 MS. WANG: Although I would say that
3 we're trying to stick with empirical data and
4 not feel-good measures. So I would feel it a

5 little risky of making a recommendation purely 6 so people would feel better.

7 MR. ROKITA: Again, I am having a
8 very difficult time articulating today.

9 MS. WANG: Maybe I am not
10 understanding.

11 MR. ROKITA: Well, let me finish, and
12 that is to say that, let's take, for example,
13 the risk analysis, if you rank something like
14 that as to what's easier, what is harder to do,
15 we have it look at it from a wholistic approach
16 as well. And that is, every methodology, if it
17 is valid, that could help deter fraud needs to 18 be looked at from the goal of building
19 confidence in our elections, where that 20 confidence is deserved. And I would hope that 21 that gets into some of the thoughts and the 22 language and the semantics of this report.

176

1 MR. GREENBAUM: I think what I would
2 say in response to that is if you're going to
3 look at that, I would also want to look at to 4 what degree certain measures might also impact
5 access to the ballot. Because if you take a
6 certain measure where there is no empirical data
7 saying this is something that needs to be done
8 but it may add to voter confidence, but on the 9 flip side, that particular measure may impair or 10 prevent access to the ballot for certain people,
11 that need to be looked at as well.

12 MS. WANG: That's what I was trying

13 to get at. Once you start doing something
14 purely on what the general public perceives to 15 be the biggest problems, rather than trying to 16 take an empirical approach and find out what the 17 problems really are, and addressing what the 18 problems really are, you start not expending
19 your resources in the most efficiency way.

20 MR. ROKITA: Well, we have already
21 decided at the beginning and throughout this 22 discussion that it is very difficult to get

177

1 empirical data, especially on this particular
2 issue, which has the syrup on top of it that
3 doesn't include dispassionate actors.

4 Having said that, the point here is,
5 whether you have an actual conviction of voter
6 fraud or whether you have someone who was in 7 line at the polling place who thinks they saw
8 voter fraud, it is the same effect. It is 9 equal, and that is, they don't come back to 10 participate in the process. So you can't ignore
11 that fact and just focus on the data that you
12 might have, and that's part of the human 13 involvement interaction in the electoral
14 process.

15 And as long as humans are involved in 16 the process, you're going to have a dichotomy
17 there. Again, the effect is exactly the same.
18 No convictions for in person fraud at the poll,
19 no relation to whether or not its happened.
20 Your interviews even say that it's very hard to 21 detect, so you have got to incorporate that 22 reality into this report, if it's going to have

178

1 validity to the public and to election
2 officials.

3 MR. PEREZ: Brings up the semantics
4 because you're saying no system should go out
5 having a voter verifiable paper trail.
6 Every system in Texas has a paper trail.

7 The large part of perception and real
8 fraud is the perception of a paper trail or not.
9 The same thing semantics can be possibly
10 incorporated in there to educate them.

11 MS. WANG: That is the approach I
12 would prefer to take, is to educate people as to 13 what the problems really are, rather than you
14 trying to address problems that they think only
15 exist but may not in reality.

16 MR. ROKITA: I'm not asking you to 17 make up a fix. I'm asking you to realize that 18 there is a very real issue out there. Whether 19 fraud is perceived or you have a real
20 conviction, the effect is the same.

21 MR. GINSBERG: The problem that I
22 think you have with this is fraud and

179

1 intimidation become two sides of the same coin
2 and they are used for political purposes. They 3 are used for get-out-to-vote purposes.

4 So the notion of agreeing on what the
5 problem is, is going to be really, really tough,

6 which to me goes back to the issue of having 7 people, where the fraud or intimidation takes
8 place from both parties, since they are the ones
9 that are starting all the problems that 10 challenge the legitimacy of the election.

11                   MR. GREENBAUM: Our counterpart's not 12 here anymore.

13                   MR. GINSBERG: I waited for just that 14 moment.

15                   MR. HEARNE: The point's coming up
16 and I think it's one when I was an advisor to 17 Carter Baker, the underlying point of this 18 effort is to increase voter confidential. It is 19 also to convince the winner of an election that 20 he won. The trick is to make the loser knows
21 that it was a fair election, so long as you come 22 out after every election process saying it was 180

1 stolen or they intimated my base, whatever it
2 is, is an erosive charge.

3                   I understand the EAC's charge is to 4 come up with a way to look at that process,
5 quantify it, develop a process to say it does or 6 don't exist to this degree, here's what 7 happened, and here's ideas on places to go to 8 address it so the next election and the one
9 after and the one after, we're going to say it
10 may or may not have been the one I wanted, but I
11 at least felt the voters decided, not some 12 special group, or lawyers, or judges
13 manipulating. I think that's the objective we
Page 134

14 want overall.

15                   Perception is important, and the 16 empirical information we're starting with is to 17 say, how did we find out, where do we hear about 18 to go to find it. I like Ben's suggestion of 19 why don't we look at the next election as a
20 model, whatever way we can come up with a
21 statistically -- have people going to the 22 polling places, to look at that as a way to try

181

1 to quantify and identify those issues.

2                   MS. WANG: I guess I would reiterate
3 John's point about making sure that when you try
4 and engage in confidence building measures that
5 you aren't at the same time disenfranchising
6 more people than you're giving confidence too.

7                   MR. GINSBERG: There are a whole
8 bunch of assumptions built into that statement
9 that demonstrate why you may have difficulty
10 getting any sort of agreement on what you're 11 saying.

12                   MR. GREENBAUM: If you want to go
13 back to what the language earlier before we had 14 a recitation of what the language is that the 15 EAC is supposed to be doing. If it's methods of 16 identifying, deterring, and investigating, voter
17 fraud, I just don't see where people's 18 perceptions come into that.

19                   MR. ROKITA: I am looking at 20
20 interviews worth of perceptions.

21                   MR. GINSBERG: If people's
  Page 135

22 perceptions of this don't matter, then why are 182

1 we doing this. You want to have confidence in 2 the system.

3 MR. WANG: You want a system that's
4 actually fair and accurate.

5 MR. GINSBERG: Listen, what you just
6 said means that your definition of what is fair
7 and accurate is not going to be universally
8 accepted. It's still two sides of the coin of 9 the issue, and your perception of that is not 10 going to be shared.

11 MR. PEREZ: What if we put a third
12 person in that, Republican, Democrat,
13 independent?

14 MR. GREENBAUM: Not even independent,
15 nonpartisan.

16 MR. ROKITA: That animal doesn't
17 exist in this business.

18 MR. GREENBAUM: Doesn't exist in your
19 business.

20 MR. ROKITA: No, this business.

21 MS. ROGERS: I tend to look at the
22 logistics of the things instead of the lofty 183

1 ideas. You talk about the observers, that's not
2 a bad thing. We work, at the lawyers committee,
3 we work with them on that but elections within 4 the next decade are not going to occur on
5 election day. Elections are already now

6 occurring in the week or two weeks leading up to
7 Election Day. They are occurring by mail. So
8 putting all your resources in Election Day is
9 not going to be an answer for very much longer.
10 Then how many resources do you have to extend
11 that out to two-week period to insure that you
12 have all these monitors. In addition to that,
13 you have got to be so careful that -- how do you
14 determine who gets to observe and who doesn't.
15 Obviously, Democrats and Republicans want a
16 place at the table. Well, in our state, the 17 green carding and libertarians want a place at
18 the table as well.

19 Parties are allowed to appoint two
20 poll watchers and then the independent
21 candidates, one. We have got a lot of other
22 voter verifiable and paper audit trail folks who

184

1 want to send in observers as well. We get
2 questions from overseas. Very quickly, you can
3 overwhelm a polling place where they are going
4 to feel intimidated or suppressed when they walk
5 in the door.

6 It can work, but in order for there
7 to be any support from my peers, there would
8 have to be a lot of caveats that went with it,
9 as far as the training, who got to observe, who
10 they notified of what they see on Election Day,
11 do they notify their party, the national party,
12 and then you get a fax that says we just found
13 out blah, blah, blah and we're putting you on

6 occurring in the week or two weeks leading up to
7 Election Day. They are occurring by mail. So
8 putting all your resources in Election Day is
9 not going to be an answer for very much longer.
10 Then how many resources do you have to extend
11 that out to two-week period to insure that you
12 have all these monitors. In addition to that,
13 you have got to be so careful that -- how do you
14 determine who gets to observe and who doesn't.
15 Obviously, Democrats and Republicans want a
16 place at the table. Well, in our state, the
17 green carding and libertarians want a place at
18 the table as well.

19 Parties are allowed to appoint two
20 poll watchers and then the independent
21 candidates, one. We have got a lot of other
22 voter verifiable and paper audit trail folks who

184

1 want to send in observers as well. We get
2 questions from overseas. Very quickly, you can
3 overwhelm a polling place where they are going
4 to feel intimidated or suppressed when they walk
5 in the door.

6 It can work, but in order for there
7 to be any support from my peers, there would
8 have to be a lot of caveats that went with it,
9 as far as the training, who got to observe, who
10 they notified of what they see on Election Day,
11 do they notify their party, the national party,
12 and then you get a fax that says we just found
13 out blah, blah, blah and we're putting you on

14 notice. Just random thoughts.

15 MR. GINSBERG: All of that's correct.
16 We all agree that there is a problem with fraud
17 and intimidation taking place in elections. The 18 question is how many prosecutions are there on a
19 regular basis that show that there is either
20 fraud or intimidation.

21 MR. DONSANTO: I don't think that is
22 a measure of anything. There is a hell of a lot
185

1 more out there than we ever find, and there is a
2 hell of a lot more, we don't have the resources.

3 MR. GINSBERG: And rumors about it
4 are greater than the actuality.

5 MR. DONSANTO: There is a lot more
6 out there than we ever catch, and the rumors are 7 even more.

8 MR. GINSBERG: Exactly. So if you
9 want to deal with the problem of the electors
10 having confidence in their elections, you have 11 got to deal with all the rumors that are out
12 there. And I love academic studies and surveys,
13 but you've got to have people on the ground in 14 the polling places or watching the two-week
15 process that takes place, and verifying that.
16 And all the academic studies in the world are 17 not going to get at that public perception
18 issue.

19 MS. WANG: Definitely, a lot of the 20 people we talked to recommended more monitoring,
21 including Joe Rich, who was a big proponent of 22 that.

186

1 MR. HEARNE: I think the point was
2 made increasingly and the trend is there, we're
3 going into more and more absentee balloting, and 4 the one point is a pretty broad consensus here,
5 where vote fraud does go on, that there is a lot
6 of it in absentee balloting, an area that merits
7 scrutiny, and understanding, involvement, and 8 that's going to be an area that increases in 9 terms of availability of those kinds of avenues.

10 MR. ROKITA: My other point to that 11 would be just because we identify or focus on 12 absentee fraud as an area where there are 13 problems, and I certainly agree, we, I think,
14 have to be careful of leaving the impression of 15 that means it is not occurring in other areas
16 because we just don't know.

17 MR. DONSANTO: Right, it does occur
18 in other areas. Absentee ballots happens to be 19 the methodology of the moment.

20 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: You know,
21 Craig, you have served as an observer, and I
22 know you have. It just so happens this morning

187

1 from 8 to 9:30, I met with the head of OSC, who
2 was here because they had a little team here.
3 They are going to send a team to observe in
4 November. They have a method they have used
5 when you go observe an election. You have a
6 form you fill out. They have people, long-term

7 observers, who go six weeks before the election,
8 and short-term, who go for a week, and all this
9 material is brought in election night. All
10 night long they calculate it, then they issue a 11 statement at 1:00 the next day saying whether 12 the elections were free and fair, whether you
13 have can confidence/no confidence in the winner.
14 And in Ukraine, they didn't have confidence in 15 the winner, brought down the Government.
16 They had another election six weeks later but 17 they use that method of observation because of 18 perception that people have whether the 19 elections are free and fair.

20 Jimmy Carter has done similar things
21 in Central America. The Carter Center does that 22 too, but they have a method to do that. You

188

1 have been part of it and I have been part of it,
2 to try to make that judgement call, and they are
3 all independent people from different countries
4 that go to do it.

5 MS. WANG: Maybe that's what we need
6 is international observers.

7 MR. GREENBAUM: It's a problem
8 because they can't get in the polling place in a
9 lot of the states. They even said that as part
10 of their report.

11 MR. ROKITA: Don't we add value to 12 this entire process, if you go and look at what
13 Paul just described and analyze it and present
14 it as an idea, isn't that what this is?

Transcript 051806

15 MS. SIMS: That would be in the next
16 phase.

17 MS. WANG: All of this is in the next
18 phase.

19 MS. SIMS: Looking at the project
20 that the Commission decides to pursue and the 21 boards are happy with that idea.

22 MR. HEARNE: What is the next step 189

1 from here?

2 MS. SIMS: If we're all done with
3 ideas.

4 MR. ROKITA: I just wanted to get a
5 couple more things done to finish up my last
6 point. We're not sure that fraud at the polling
7 place doesn't exist. We can't conclude that.
8 That is my last point.

9 There has been a discussion about a
10 political science professor being utilized. I
11 think the EAC needs to be very careful in who 12 they select, because all the time and effort and 13 money that's been spent up to date and would be 14 spent in the future could be invalidated by a
15 wrong selection in the eyes of some group. So
16 whether you have two folks, political science
17 professors, however you decide to work it,
18 please research, you, as a taxpayer, to be 19 careful who you pick.

20 I thank you.

21 MR. PEREZ: I'd like to make a
22 statement. I am not a lawyer so I don't know

1 how far this would fly. If you're trying to
2 query on developing statistical data, why don't
3 you put a question on the ballot? Everybody
4 walk in, I believe this election was fair. No,
5 I believe there was fraud here. Just ask them.

6 MR. DON SANTO: How are they supposed
7 to know that until the election has been run?

8 MR. PEREZ: They have already been
9 intimidated while they are casting their ballot.

10 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: How about if
11 there is a none of the above on the ballots?

12 MR. GINSBERG: It would be really
13 good for business.

14 MR. PEREZ: If they come in, I would
15 want to vote for that one. Really, you're 16 trying to get statistics from the voters, trying
17 to get them outside, trying to catch them
18 inside, catch them on the ballot.

19 MS. SIMS: well, the next step is 20 that our two consultants would be consolidating
21 the preliminary research that they have and also 22 the working group's deliberation in his order to 191

1 present a report to our Commissioners. And our
2 Commissioners will, obviously, take a look at
3 that.

4 And then when you deem it's ready,
5 we'll have it sent out to our Board of Advisors
6 and our Standards Board for their review and

7 comment. HAVA does mandate that our research
8 efforts are supposed to be reviewed by our 9 boards. Depending on what we get back, and what 10 the Commissioners decide to do, and what kind of 11 budget we get, then we may be able to prioritize 12 some of the ideas or determine which ones we can 13 do. Inevitably, they are going to have to be 14 below a certain dollar limit. And so we would 15 put the project out, put an RFP up.

16 In terms of people who would lean one
17 way or another, we would take a look at that 18 when we're writing the RFP to determine that the 19 team has different points of views.

20 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: We have also 21 set some peer review groups for many of our 22 studies that have a balance of folks, academics

192

1 particularly, to take a look at the work that's
2 being done by folks to make sure we're being
3 looked at by people who have different
4 philosophies, different viewpoints.

5 MS. SIMS: And depending on what
6 we're able to do, we may or may not get a
7 working group to work with us on that.
8 Generally, speaking it is wiser to get the 9 working group further in on the beginning.
10 We're bringing you in as the tail group, is a
11 little bit different than I am used to doing at 12 FEC. So we may take a look at that on whatever
13 we decide to do next on bringing the working
14 group together in the earlier phase to offer

15 their advice in an earlier stage.

16                   Any questions about that? well, I
17 want to thank you all very much for coming. I
18 know our consultants have really -- I'm sure
19 they have gotten a lot out of it. I have.

20                   CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: I also want to 21 thank you too on behalf of the Commissioners who 22 couldn't be here today, to Tova and Job for your 193

1 work thus far. This is an important item for
2 the Commissioners, and the we'll move on it
3 quickly. I suspect -- I don't know that we have
4 anything budgeted for 2006 for this but October
5 1 starts, we will have some funds, and we can do
6 some of the things that you all suggested we
7 should do to come up with further detailed study
8 of this. But this has been helpful just sitting
9 through here the last hour-and-a-half.

10                   I was director of elections in St.
11 Louis County. Craig, we had some federal 12 prosecutions. We had plenty of nursing home
13 absentee fraud. I was in St. Louis County, but 14 a lot of it came at the local level. When 15 you're running for police chief in the city,
16 that's where we saw a lot of the election fraud
17 too, but it occurred in the federal elections.
18 We had people voting in 1988. So those things
19 happened, so I have seen it myself.

20                   I am also aware of things that you
21 pointed out here, these kinds of things. This 22 is awful for people to try to trick people in 194

1 ways like this, to keep them from participating
2 in our democracy. That's just not right. It's 3 wrong.

4 MR. DONSANTO: I am aware of this
5 one.

6 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: We don't want
7 that to happen.

8 MR. DONSANTO: We're unable to find
9 out who did it.

10 CHAIRMAN DEGREGORIO: We appreciate
11 your work, hope this will continue in some 12 fashion, that you all can be participants in 13 what we do next. Thank you for your time today.

14 MS. SIMS: I also want to know for 15 those who are traveling out of town, Devon put 16 an information package for you on how you turn
17 over the receipts that we need, so we can make 18 sure you get money. And if you have any 19 questions, please contact her about that.

20 MS. WANG: Thank you so much.

21 (Whereupon, at approximately 5:00 o'clock,
22 p.m., the meeting adjourned.)

Re: Preliminary Work Plan
Date: September 7, 2005

The following is a preliminary work plan and division of labor for the project on voter fraud and voter intimidation:

MONTH ONE (beginning the date contracts are finalized):

- I. Defining Fraud/Intimidation
  - a. In person meeting and discussion among consultants to:
    - i. Determine what we believe the parameters of the terms fraud and intimidation should be for our research purposes. (All)
    - ii. Create a list of state and local officials, third party representatives, attorneys, scholars, etc. to interview and/or survey to assist in this process of definition (All)
  - b. Interviews of individuals identified as having expertise (Job and Tova)
  - c. Analysis of existing research (Job and Tova)
- II. Obtaining research assistance (e.g. interns, law clerks) (All)

MONTH TWO:

- III. Examining the Feasibility of Quantifying the Level of Incidence of Different Types of Fraud
  - a. Looking at how we can develop a statistically sound research instrument
    - i. Discussion with political and social scientists, legal scholars in the field (Tova and Steve)
  - b. Determination as to information that would be required for a potential survey; identification of potential survey states to ensure a fair representation of different systems (All)
  - c. Preliminary survey of case law of recent prosecutions for fraud/intimidation (Job)
  - d. Interviews with state and local officials, third party groups, election lawyers to assess what they believe are the most prevalent problems (All)

MONTH THREE:

- IV. Preliminary assessment of the federal, state and local legal capacity to handle fraud and intimidation cases
  - a. Case law research (Job)
  - b. Survey of current state election codes (Tova and Job)
  - c. Analysis of Department of Justice Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions work in this area (Tova)

Deliberative Process
Privilege

- d. Survey and assessment of who has enforcement responsibility and accountability in each state and the extent to which that entity exercises that authority (All)

MONTH FOUR:

- V. Report of Preliminary Findings (Tova and Job)
- VI. Assembling the Working Group
  - a. Developing a list of potential members (All)
  - b. Development of a work plan and set of issues for examination for the working group (All)

Potential Working Group Members – Initial Suggestions:

Lori Minnite, Barnard College
Allan Lichtman, American University
David Orr, Cook County Clerk (Chicago)
Judith Browne, The Advancement Project
Cathy Cox, Secretary of State, Georgia
Jonah Goldman, Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights
Christopher Edley, Dean, Berkeley School of Law
Daniel Tokaji, Moritz College of Law, The Ohio State University
Spencer Overton, George Washington School of Law

The following is a work plan and division of labor for the project on voter fraud and voter intimidation:

MONTH ONE (beginning the date contracts are finalized):

- I. Draft project work plan
- II. Develop list of potential members of the working group; have EAC vet and approve names (Tova, Job, EAC)
- III. Define Fraud/Intimidation (Tova and Job)
  - a. Discussion among consultants to:
    - i. Determine what we believe the parameters of the terms fraud and intimidation should be for our research purposes.
    - ii. Create a list of state and local officials, third party representatives, attorneys, scholars, etc. to interview and/or survey to assist in this process of definition
  - b. Analysis of existing research (Tova and Job)
- IV. Obtain research assistance (e.g. interns, law clerks) (EAC)

MONTH TWO:

- V. Interview individuals identified in month one about the scope of fraud and intimidation (Job and Tova);
- VI. Create working written description of what fraud and intimidation means, includes/does not include (Job and Tova)
- VII. Examine the Feasibility of Quantifying the Level of Incidence of Different Types of Fraud
  - a. Look at how we can develop a statistically sound research instrument
    - i. Discussion with political and social scientists, legal scholars in the field (Tova)
  - b. Preliminary survey of case law of recent prosecutions for fraud/intimidation (Job/law clerk)
  - c. Interviews with state and local officials, third party groups, election lawyers to assess what they believe are the most prevalent problems (Job and Tova)

  - a. Case law research (Job)
  - b. Survey of current state election codes (Tova and Job)
  - c. Analysis of Department of Justice Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions work in this area (Tova)

MONTH FOUR:

- IX. Written summary of background research on voting fraud and intimidation (Tova and Job)
- X. Development of a work plan and set of issues for examination for the working group (Tova and Job)
- XI. Finalize working group membership and set meeting dates

MONTH FIVE:

- XII. Initial working group meetings

MONTH SIX:

- XIII. Develop project scope of work and project work plan
- XIV. Draft summary report describing key findings of this preliminary study of voting fraud and voter intimidation

Tova Andrea Wang, Co-Author of the Voter Fraud and Voter Intimidation Report for the Election Assistance Commission, Calls for an End to the Censorship

Over the last few weeks, there has been a developing controversy in the press and in the Congress over a report on voter fraud and voter intimidation I co-authored for the Election Assistance Commission (“EAC”). It has been my desire to participate in this discussion and share my experience as a researcher, expert and co-author of the report. Unfortunately, the EAC has barred me from speaking. Early last week, through my attorney, I sent a letter to the Commission requesting that they release me from this gag order. Despite repeated follow-up, the EAC has failed to respond to this simple request. In the meantime, not only can I not speak to the press or public -- it is unclear under the terms of my contract with the EAC whether I can even answer questions from members of Congress.

My co-author and I submitted our report in July 2006; the EAC finally released its version of the report in December 2006. As numerous press reports indicate, the conclusions that we found in our research and included in our report were revised by the EAC, without explanation or discussion with me, my co-author or the general public. From the beginning of the project to this moment, my co-author and I have been bound in our contracts with the EAC to silence regarding our work, subject to law suits and civil liability if we violate the EAC-imposed gag order. Moreover, from July to December, no member of the EAC Commission or staff contacted me or my co-author to raise any concerns about the substance of our research. Indeed, after I learned that the EAC was revising our report before its public release, I contacted the EAC, and they refused to discuss with me the revisions, or the reasons such revisions were necessary.

Stifling discussion and debate over this report and the critical issues it addresses is contrary to the mission and goals of the EAC and to the goal of ensuring honest and fair elections in this country. Commissioner Hillman stated in her defense of the EAC’s actions that the EAC seeks to “ensure improvements in the administration of federal elections so that all eligible voters will be able to vote and have that vote recorded and counted accurately.” I share this aspiration. But I believe that the best way to achieve that end is not by suppressing or stifling debate and discussion, but by engaging in a thoughtful process of research and dialogue that ultimately arrives at the truth about the problems our voting system currently confronts.

INTRODUCTION

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

In September 2005, the Commission hired two consultants with expertise in this subject matter, Job Serebrov and Tova Wang, to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;
- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

As of the date of this report, the consultants have drafted a definition of election fraud, reviewed relevant literature and reports, interviewed persons from government and private sectors with subject matter expertise, analyzed news reports of alleged election fraud, reviewed case law, and established a project working group.

DEFINITION OF ELECTION FRAUD

The consultants drafted a definition of election fraud that includes numerous aspects of voting fraud (including voter intimidation, which is considered a subset of voting fraud) and voter registration fraud, but excludes campaign finance violations and election administration mistakes. This draft will be discussed and probably refined by the project working group, which is scheduled to convene on May 18, 2006.

LITERATURE REVIEW

The consultants found many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. They found little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud appears to be the report written by Lori Minnite, entitled "Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud". The most systematic look at voter intimidation appears to be the report by Laughlin McDonald, entitled "The New Poll Tax". The consultants found that books written about this subject all seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Moreover, the consultants found that reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund's frequently cited book, "Stealing Elections".

Consultants found that researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate; but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.

- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.
- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Recommendations

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research include a follow up study of allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles. They also suggest that the research should focus on filling the gap between the lack of reports based on methodical studies by social or political scientists and the numerous, but less scientific, reports published by advocacy groups.

INTERVIEWS

The consultants jointly selected experts from the public and private sector for interviews. The consultants' analysis of their discussions with these members of the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities follows.

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.
- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, "dead" voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud,

although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.

- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.
- Several people indicate that, for various reasons, DOJ is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. Interviews with DOJ personnel indicate that the Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance in this area. While the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, continues to maintain an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process (including voter suppression), it also has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting.
- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed.
- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.

- With respect to DOJ's Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one's definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and his office has not pursued any such cases.
- Craig Donsanto of DOJ's Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases DOJ is investigating and the number of indictments his office is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, in addition to pursuing systematic election corruption schemes, DOJ has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so that his agency can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.
- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment.
- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama's "deceptive practices" bill.
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected as non partisan officials, they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas are a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states' office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.

- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots "for cause" only if it were politically feasible.
- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the proposal in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.
- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

NEWS ARTICLES

Consultants conducted a Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006. A systematic, numerical analysis of the data collected during this review is currently being prepared. What follows is an overview of these articles provided by the consultants.

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.
- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.
- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms;
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with.

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles, in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;

- Poll watchers harassing voters;
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;
- Disproportionate police presence;
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate; and
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from "battleground" states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

"Dead Voters and Multiple Voting"

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials, and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found five such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia). There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of completed voter registration applications. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case, charges were filed against ten individuals. In another case, a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this Nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem was the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Recommendation

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research should include a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

CASE LAW RESEARCH

After reviewing over 40,000 cases from 2000 to the present, the majority of which came from appeals courts, the consultants found comparatively few applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, the consultants found that no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it appears to them that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

Recommendation

Because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, consultants suggest that subsequent EAC research include a review of state trial-level decisions.

PROJECT WORKING GROUP

Consultants and EAC worked together to select members for the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group that included election officials and representatives of advocacy groups and the legal community who have an interest and expertise in the subject matter. (See Attachment A for a list of members.) The working group is scheduled to convene at EAC offices on May 18, 2006 to consider the results of the preliminary research and to offer ideas for future EAC activities concerning this subject.

FINAL REPORT

After convening the project working group, the consultants will draft a final report summarizing the results of their research and the working group deliberations. This report will include recommendations for future EAC research related to this subject matter. The draft report will be reviewed by EAC and, after obtaining any clarifications or corrections deemed necessary, will be made available to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors for review and comment. Following this, a final report will be prepared.

Status Report

Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research STATUTORY AUTHORITY

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research

CURRENT RESEARCH FOCUS

2 consultants (bipartisan) focused on:

- Drafting a definition of election fraud;
- Conducting background research (literature, news stories, case law, interviews of knowledgeable persons from the public and private sector); and
- Convening a working group of bipartisan and nonpartisan representatives of election officials, advocates, and the legal community to review preliminary research and brainstorm ideas for future EAC activities.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research LITERATURE FINDINGS

- Little of the research is truly systematic or scientific.
- Many documents make allegations but have little follow up.
- Books written about this subject seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that make them somewhat less valuable.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research LITERATURE FINDINGS

- There is substantial concern about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud (e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting) is a serious problem.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research LITERATURE FINDINGS

- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although one report mentions schemes against a major political party.
- Deceptive practices (e.g.: targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation) were reported to be a major problem in 2004.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research LITERATURE FINDINGS

- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex; yet may be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research INTERVIEWS

Consultants interviewed numerous individuals from the public and private sector who have some experience in researching, investigating and prosecuting, or observing incidents.

They included experts from the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research INTERVIEW FINDINGS

- Virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem.
- Vote buying and voter registration fraud are considered the next most common problems
- Some disagreement over prevalence of polling place voting fraud.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research INTERVIEW FINDINGS

Intimidation/Suppression –

- Biggest intimidation/suppression concerns: abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers.
- Some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities, and of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters.
- Other concerns: polling places being moved at the last moment; videotaping of voters at the polls; and targeted misinformation campaigns.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research INTERVIEW FINDINGS

- Common problems: badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off.
- A few people also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLES

- Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006.
- Downside: often could not verify the truthfulness of the reports or how often actual convictions result from activities reported.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

The most common allegations of voter registration fraud were:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration applications;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms, depending on the party with which the voter registered.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Absentee ballots reportedly were abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerced the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.
- Workers for groups and individuals attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.
- Workers for groups, campaign workers, and individuals attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Activities most commonly reported as voter suppression included:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;
- Poll watchers harassing voters;
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;
- Disproportionate police presence;
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate; and
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Dead Voters and Multiple Voting

- High number of articles.
- Often the problem resulted from administrative error: poll workers mismarking or failing to mark voter lists; flawed voter registration lists; and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Multiple Voting

- Most cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person.
- A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists.
- In many instances, person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose.
- Small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county, and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Dead Voters –

Problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained (i.e.; the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that).

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Vote Buying

- More official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas reported in this area.
- Numerous of articles, a few of which involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia).

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Deceptive Practices

- Numerous reports in 2004 of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote.

- Misinformation came in the form of
  - flyers,
  - phone calls,
  - letters, and
  - people going door to door.

- Many of the efforts reportedly targeted at minority communities.

- Disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research NEWS ARTICLE FINDINGS

Non-citizen Voter Registration & Voting

Few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting
– just 7 cases in 7 different states across the country:

- 1 case - charges were filed against 10 individuals.

INTRODUCTION

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

In September 2005, the Commission hired two consultants with expertise in this subject matter, Job Serebrov and Tova Wang, to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;
- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

As of the date of this report, the consultants have drafted a definition of election fraud, reviewed relevant literature and reports, interviewed persons from government and private sectors with subject matter expertise, analyzed news reports of alleged election fraud, reviewed case law, and established a project working group.

DEFINITION OF ELECTION FRAUD

The consultants drafted a definition of election fraud that includes numerous aspects of voting fraud (including voter intimidation, which is considered a subset of voting fraud) and voter registration fraud, but excludes campaign finance violations and election administration mistakes. This draft will be discussed and probably refined by the project working group, which is scheduled to convene on May 18, 2006.

LITERATURE REVIEW

The consultants found many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. They found little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud appears to be the report written by Lori Minnite, entitled "Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud". The most systematic look at voter intimidation appears to be the report by Laughlin McDonald, entitled "The New Poll Tax". The consultants found that books written about this subject all seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Moreover, the consultants found that reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund's frequently cited book, "Stealing Elections".

Consultants found that researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate; but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.

- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.
- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Recommendations

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research include a follow up study of allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles. They also suggest that the research should focus on filling the gap between the lack of reports based on methodical studies by social or political scientists and the numerous, but less scientific, reports published by advocacy groups.

INTERVIEWS

The consultants jointly selected experts from the public and private sector for interviews. The consultants' analysis of their discussions with these members of the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities follows.

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.
- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, "dead" voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud,

although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.

- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.
- Several people indicate that, for various reasons, DOJ is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. Interviews with DOJ personnel indicate that the Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance in this area. While the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, continues to maintain an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process (including voter suppression), it also has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting.
- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed.
- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.

- With respect to DOJ's Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one's definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and his office has not pursued any such cases.
- Craig Donsanto of DOJ's Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases DOJ is investigating and the number of indictments his office is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, in addition to pursuing systematic election corruption schemes, DOJ has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so that his agency can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.
- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment.
- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama's "deceptive practices" bill.
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected as non partisan officials, they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas are a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states' office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.

- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots “for cause” only if it were politically feasible.
- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the proposal in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.
- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

NEWS ARTICLES

Consultants conducted a Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006. A systematic, numerical analysis of the data collected during this review is currently being prepared. What follows is an overview of these articles provided by the consultants.

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.
- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.
- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms;
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with.

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles, in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;

- Poll watchers harassing voters;
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;
- Disproportionate police presence;
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate; and
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from “battleground” states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

“Dead Voters and Multiple Voting”

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials, and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found five such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia). There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of completed voter registration applications. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case, charges were filed against ten individuals. In another case, a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this Nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem was the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Recommendation

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research should include a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

CASE LAW RESEARCH

After reviewing over 40,000 cases from 2000 to the present, the majority of which came from appeals courts, the consultants found comparatively few applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, the consultants found that no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it appears to them that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

Recommendation

Because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, consultants suggest that subsequent EAC research include a review of state trial-level decisions.

PROJECT WORKING GROUP

Consultants and EAC worked together to select members for the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group that included election officials and representatives of advocacy groups and the legal community who have an interest and expertise in the subject matter. (See Attachment A for a list of members.) The working group is scheduled to convene at EAC offices on May 18, 2006 to consider the results of the preliminary research and to offer ideas for future EAC activities concerning this subject.

FINAL REPORT

After convening the project working group, the consultants will draft a final report summarizing the results of their research and the working group deliberations. This report will include recommendations for future EAC research related to this subject matter. The draft report will be reviewed by EAC and, after obtaining any clarifications or corrections deemed necessary, will be made available to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors for review and comment. Following this, a final report will be prepared.

p 5. 2d bullet ..DOJ is bringing fewer intimidation and suppression cases now...

This clearly is a myth. The Department has brought two 11(b) cases, one of the two in this Administration. The focus of DOJ activity has shifted, in fact, to voter suppression as there are fewer cases over voter dilution (challenges to at-large election systems, etc.) being brought by anyone as the number of jurisdictions with at-large election systems has shrunk dramatically. This Administration has, in fact, brought far more voter-suppression cases in this Administration than ever in the past, including a majority of all cases under Sections 203 and 208 of the Act, and such key recent Section 2 cases as US v. City of Boston and US v. Long County, Georgia.

The Voting Section brings cases involving “systemic” discrimination because federal voting statutes focus on discriminatory action by local governments. It is criminal statutes that involve malfeasance by individuals. The difference is fundamental and key to understanding law enforcement

3d bullet.

The Voting Section of DOJ has taken action to address badly kept voter lists with recent lawsuits in Missouri and Indiana.

4th bullet

The Voting Section of DOJ has, by a large margin, included mandatory training of poll workers in avoiding discriminatory practices in more cases in this Administration than in its entire previous history.

This is not true. Ms. Wang repeatedly declined to define intimidation, so that her questions were vague and unhelpful in defining or identifying problems. The facts:

The Voting Section is bringing more cases involving discrimination and violation of minority voters rights at the polls on election day than ever in its history - than in its entire history combined. That is indisputable.

The credibility of allegations depends on their specificity and corroboration. Questions as to intimidation and vote suppression are meaningless in the absence of a definition of discrimination.

Prior enforcement has indeed changed the landscape, especially in the Southeast; however, the fact that we are bringing record numbers of cases clearly shows that discrimination is not rare.

Challenges based on race and unequal implementation of ID rules are indeed actionable and we have brought lawsuits, such as in Boston and Long County; we have not identified instances of such discrimination in which we have not taken action..

Voting Fraud – Voter Intimidation Working Group Meeting Summary

Overview of Current Research Project

- Current research performed Tova Wang and Job Serebrov
  - the current research has been a challenge because of the need for the information to be collected and analyzed in a scientific manner
    - especially when working the “perception” of intimidation
- Both consultants cross-checked each others work in order to maintain a bipartisan balance
- Literature was anecdotal, not much follow-up on the articles
- No interviews with DA’s and only one interview with a judge
- Absentee ballots seemed to be the biggest problem
- The articles found that most of reported vote buying is concentrated in the Midwest and the South
- Very little non-citizen voting, dead voting and impersonation was reported

Purpose of Current Working Group

- To provide background information for current research
- To brainstorm for potential research ideas

Talking Points of Working Group

- Discussion of value of research because of the language of section 241 of HAVA; where is the methodology?
- History of the definition of “fraud”
- Most voter fraud happens outside of the polling centers
- Research must address existing problems, not perceived problems
- Intimidation is a subset of suppression, and considered to be physical or economic threat and/or coercion
- Suppression that is not a form of intimidation is intended to interfere with voting rights and the election process without physical or economic threat and/or coercion
- Department of Justice primarily investigated individual cases of voter fraud
- Risk analysis can be used as an indicator of legitimacy for the need to allocate funding to research in the area of voter fraud
- Current statewide database list will be useful in the deterrence of voter fraud

Ideas for Future EAC Activities

- Bipartisan observers/poll watchers
  - Used in the collection of data
  - Used to deter fraud
- Surveys
  - Survey of state laws
    - Specific states
  - Survey of local election officials
  - Voter surveys (this suggestion was rejected by the panel)
  - Survey state election offices
  - Survey use of administrative complaint procedures
- Follow up on initial reports of fraud/intimidation from the survey of news articles
- Better poll worker training
- Longer hours for polling centers
  - Including hours on weekends
- Fewer polling center locations
  - More qualified poll workers
- Absentee balloting process
  - Methodology of “for cause” absentee voting
- Risk-analysis for voting fraud
  - Who?
  - What part of process?
    - ease of use
  - Which elections?
- Broaden scope of interviews to local officials and district attorneys
- Analysis
  - Phone logs from toll-free lines for election concerns
  - Federal observer reports
  - Local newspapers
  - State District Court Cases
  - Determination of challenging a voter at the polls (in some states there is little or no cause required to challenge a voters eligibility)
- Academic statistical research
- Search and match procedures for voter registration list maintenance and voter fraud identification (subject to confirmation)
- Election courts
- Model statutes

Dear Mr. Perez:

Thank you for agreeing to participate in the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group Meeting. This meeting will take place from 1:00 PM to 5:30 PM on Thursday, May 18th, 2006 at the offices of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), 1225 New York Avenue, NW, 11th Floor, Washington, DC.

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority. Subsequently, the Commission contracted with two consultants (Job Serebrov and Tova Wang) to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;

MEMORANDUM

TO: EAC Commissioners

FROM: Peggy Sims, Election Research Specialist

SUBJECT: Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group Meeting

The first meeting of the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group will take place from 1:00 PM to 5:30 PM on Thursday, May 18th, 2006 at the offices of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), 1225 New York Avenue, NW, 11th Floor, Washington, DC.

As you know, Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority. Consequently, in September 2005, EAC contracted with two consultants (Job Serebrov and Tova Wang) to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;

008853

- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

For your information, the folder accompanying this letter includes a number of items related to our consultants' preliminary research and the upcoming meeting:

- a meeting agenda;
- a list of Working Group members;
- a draft definition of election fraud;
- a list of reports and literature reviewed;
- a summary of interviews conducted and a list of experts interviewed;
- a list of experts interviewed;
- an analysis of news articles researched through Nexis;
- a summary of Department of Justice, Public Integrity Section cases, October 2002-January 2006;
- an analysis of case law review;
- a summary of research methodology recommendations from political scientists and experts in the field; and
- a CD with summaries of individual reports and literature reviewed, summaries of individual interviews, charts and summaries of news articles, and case law summary charts.

Please let me know if you have any questions.

Barbara Arnwine
Executive Director
Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law
1401 New York Avenue, NW, Suite 400
Washington, DC 20005

Dear Ms. Arnwine:

Thank you for agreeing to participate in the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group Meeting. This meeting will take place from 1:00 PM to 5:30 PM on Thursday, May 18th, 2006 at the offices of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), 1225 New York Avenue, NW, 11th Floor, Washington, DC.

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority. Subsequently, the Commission contracted with two consultants (Job Serebrov and Tova Wang) to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;

Director
Election Crimes Branch
U.S. Department of Justice
Bond Building
1400 New York Avenue, NW, 12th Floor
Washington, DC 20005

Dear Mr. Donsanto:

The U.S. Election Assistance Commission's (EAC) requests your assistance in our preliminary research on voting fraud and voter intimidation. You are recognized for your expertise in the prosecution of election crimes. The project requires the information and insights that you can offer.

EAC is a federal agency established in accordance with section 201 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA), Public Law 107-252. Among the duties that HAVA requires EAC to perform is the conduct of studies regarding election administration issues. The election administration issues itemized in the statute include:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

The EAC Board of Advisors, established in accordance with HAVA section 211, recommended that EAC place a high priority on these topics when initiating our research projects. Subsequently, EAC obtained the services of two consultants (Tova Wang and Job Serebrov) to:

- Define Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation - develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;

008858

- Research Available Resources - perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;
- Establish a Project Working Group - in consultation with EAC, establish a Working Group composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation, provide a description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the background research to the group, and convene the group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic;
- Produce a Report - Provide a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and Working Group deliberations that includes recommendations for future EAC research, if any;
- Assist EAC in Initiating Future Research - if EAC decides to pursue one or more recommendations for future research, draft the project scope and Statement of Work for the Request for Proposals to be released on this research.

If you are available, our team of consultants and the EAC project manager, Peggy Sims, will contact you to set up an initial interview. This interview will focus on the identification and prosecution of offenses involving voting fraud and voter intimidations, as well as possible resources on these subjects for our consultants' review. Our consultants and project manager may have follow up questions as the research proceeds. It also would be helpful if you could participate in the meeting of the project Working Group and contribute to their discussion.

If you have any questions about the research or this request, please contact Peggy Sims by email at psims@eac.gov or by phone at 202-566-3120.

Sincerely yours,

Gracia Hillman
Chair
