

Voter Roll Privacy

All states, except North Dakota, require voter registration before a voter can cast a ballot. Some states require registration to occur in advance, whereas others permit registration to occur at the time of voting, a process known as same-day registration. State voter registration forms and online registration systems collect essential information from each voter, including their name, date of birth, mailing address, and an identifying number (often a driver’s license number or all or part of a social security number). Many states collect significantly more information, including email addresses, phone numbers, party affiliation, gender, and race. There is significant variation between the states as to what information is collected, and which information on the forms is mandatory and which is optional. The National Voter Registration Act (NVRA) and the Help America Vote Act (HAVA) also mandate that states accept a federally created mail registration form which requests a voter’s name, address, date of birth, an ID (either their driver’s license number or the last four digits of their social security number), and in some states, their party affiliation and race. This form can be used to register to vote in every state except North Dakota, New Hampshire, and Wyoming.

What happens when you register?

When a voter registers, election officials input the information collected on their registration form into a database, often referred to as a voter list or voter file. HAVA and the NVRA require voter lists to be centralized within each state and routinely maintained, including removing ineligible voters or duplicate registrations. Because voter registration forms and voter lists are government documents, they are often subject to public records laws, which require their disclosure to some individuals. There are many potential uses for voter lists, including by political parties and candidates for campaign purposes. Some states use voter lists to populate jury pools. Most states prohibit the commercial use of voter file information, but some of this information may be publicly available.

How is voter information protected?

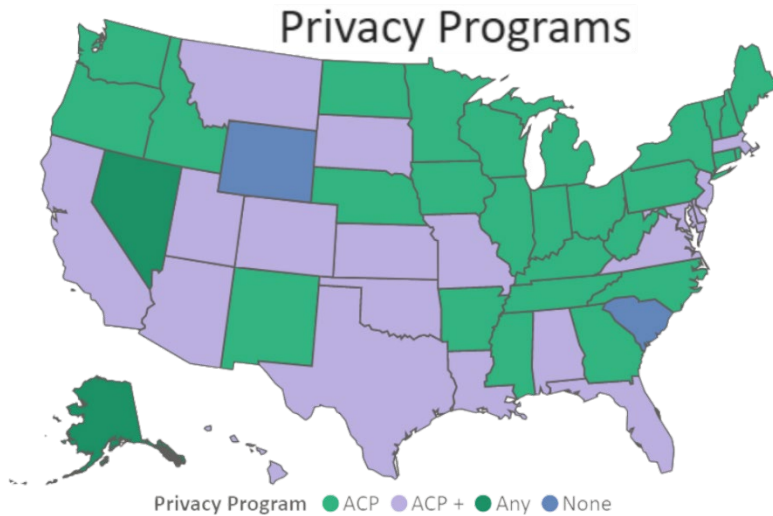

Though the price, availability, and type of data in the voter file varies by state, voter files never include information about who a person voted for in any election. This is because a voter’s decision of who to vote for is private – a “secret ballot”. The voter file may, however, include a voter’s partisan affiliation, which elections the voter participated in, or the voter’s method of voting. The list of which elections a voter participated in is referred to as a “voter history”. For voters who vote by mail, this history is often updated when the ballot is received; for voters who vote in person, this history is often not updated until after the election results are certified.

Most states also have programs where some individuals can have their information hidden from public disclosure because they are victims of crimes such as domestic abuse. These programs are often known as “Address Confidentiality Programs” or “ACP”. Some states have expanded these confidentiality programs to law enforcement officers, certain medical professionals, judges, or other government officials.

The charts on the following pages provide information on state voter file information policies. These charts include:

- Which information in the voter file is publicly available, and which information is kept confidential.
- Who may request data from the voter file.
- How voter file data may, or may not, be used.
- Whether there are any confidentiality or protective status laws that allow a voter to have their information protected from public disclosure.

Voters should contact their state elections office with any questions about their state’s voter file. Contact information for each state’s elections office can be found at www.eac.gov/vote.
