Subject No Cost Extension Request

Karen - I am attaching a spreadsheet providing the information you have requested (Attachment 1), but I want to highlight a few points which may not be immediately self-evident.

First, the original budget (Attachment 2) we submitted to the EAC, dated March 22nd, did not itemize personnel expenses by each person. In addition, when we actually began work two months after submitting that budget, we decided to reallocate more time to people within Eagleton and hire fewer outside hourlies.

Second, in the figures I sent you in late December we tried to account for all the expenses and projections but overlooked a few things including neglecting to include the honoraria for our peer review team. Hence, the figures we’re now sending are different than what I sent in December.

Lastly, we originally discussed a no-cost extension through February, but since we don’t yet have the EAC comments on our draft Provisional Voting material nor an estimate of when they are likely to be ready, I think it is prudent to extend the no-cost extension through March 31st. We would still like to conclude by the end of February, but if you can approve the extension for another month we could avoid going through this process again if everything is not complete six weeks from now.

It is my understanding that Rutgers will soon be sending our December invoice. At this time, I would also like to request that we combine January and February an invoice the EAC once for that time period.

As you can see, we are currently projecting an ending balance of approximately $10,000. If additional expenses are incurred beyond what is currently projected, we’re confident they will not exceed the original budget of $560,002.

Thanks and I look forward to hearing from you.

EAGLETON INSTITUTE OF POLITICS

Request to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission for a No-Cost Extension and Reallocation of Funds

November 30, 2005

Why we need a no-cost extension

The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting based on our research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication. The draft was complete in August, but the EAC’s schedule did not permit us to brief the commissioners and staff until early September. We did not receive EAC comments until October, making it impossible to complete the work on the original schedule. Taking account of those comments and guidance from EAC required several weeks. The EAC did not receive our final draft report and recommendations for best practices until late November. We are now awaiting the EAC’s comments on that final draft, which we have been told to expect in January.

The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report on that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid January.

Because the EAC has decided to issue recommendations for best practices on these topics, rather than voluntary guidance, we will finish the work within two months of the original completion date since the adoption process will be shorter. Note that meeting this schedule is dependent on the time needed by the EAC to review our work.

This extension will entail additional personnel time but, since no public hearings on “best practices” are required, if the EAC does not object, funds originally allocated for the hearings would be available for transfer to support the additional staff and consultant time necessary to complete the work.

When will work be completed and funds fully expended?

As shown on the attached schedule, work on this contract will be completed in three phases. The EAC will receive our final report and recommendations for best practices in provisional voting during the week of January 23, 2006 (assuming that we receive the EAC’s comments on the draft report submitted on November 28 by January 9).

We will submit our draft report, alternative approaches, and compendium of statutes, regulations, and litigation on Voter Identification Issues during the week of January 16, 2006. If the EAC is able to return comments to us no later than the week of January 30, we will have submit the final report and recommendations for best practices on Voter Identification to the EAC during the week of February 13.

The total project budget is $560,002. As of October 31st, the EAC has been invoiced for $259,081.79; the balance remaining is $399,920.21. We anticipate that the project will be complete and the balance of funds fully expended by February 28, 2006. The final invoice for the contract will be submitted to the EAC within 75 days of the close of the project.

Karen - We are requesting a no-cost extension on the EAC contract to the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University to have the contract’s concluding date move from March 31, 2006 to June 30, 2006. As I indicated earlier, it would be very helpful if we could receive approval of this request no later than April 28th.

This extension is necessary to enable the following activities:

1. The EAC has informed us that it will assemble a panel of researchers the week of May 8th to review the Eagleton/Moritz draft background report on Voter Identification. The EAC wishes to supplement the review of this draft already conducted by the Peer Review Group called for in the contract. The Eagleton/Moritz research team, as well as at least some of the Peer Review Group will participate in the conference call or meeting of the EAC's reviewers;

2. Eagleton/Moritz will revise the draft Voter Identification report based upon comments made by the two sets of reviewers, and distribute the revised report to the EAC and its Advisory Board in mid-May.

3. Eagleton/Moritz will present its draft reports on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification to the EAC Advisory Board at its May 25th meeting in Washington, D.C.;

4. Eagleton/Moritz will revise both draft reports to take into account comments made by the EAC Advisory Board, and submit printed final reports to the EAC before June 23rd. Eagleton/Moritz will also prepare a PowerPoint presentation for both reports.

5. Eagleton/Moritz will present both reports at the EAC public meeting in Washington, D.C. on June 23rd, thus concluding its work under this contract.

Please let me know if you need any additional information.

Thanks,

John

Hi -- nice to meet you in person, finally!

And thanks for inviting me to your gathering, I enjoyed it and hope I was helpful. Of course, any time you want anything, you do know where to track me down.

As to the potential reviewers of the Eagleton Voter ID study, here are my suggestions, in order:

Jonathan Nagler, New York University
Jan Leighley, University of Arizona
Ben Highton, UC-Davis
Adam Berinsky, MIT
Bernard Grofman, UC-Irvine

All have worked with the CPS turnout/registration data, and are very familiar with this research literature.

If these don't work, or you want more recommendations, let me know.

Re: No-Cost Extension to contract number E4014127 with the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University

Background:
Contract E4014127 with the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University ("contractor") was originally scheduled to be concluded on March 31, 2006. The contract's final products include a report on Voter Identification and a report on Provisional Voting. The contractor has vetted the reports with a Peer Review Group, pursuant to the terms of the contract.

Justification for No-Cost Extension:
The EAC wishes to supplement the contractor's Peer Review of the reports by adding another review process with some of the EAC's key stakeholders. The EAC proposes to assemble a panel of researchers during the week of May 8th to conduct the second review.

Following the second review, the contractor will revise its draft reports based on the comments it receives. The contractor will present its draft reports on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification to the EAC Advisory Board at its May 25th meeting in Washington, DC. The contractor will revise both draft reports, taking into account the EAC's Advisory Board's comments and submit the final reports to the EAC toward the end of June.

Recommendation:
The EAC recommends that contract E4014127 be modified at no cost to allow the contractor to complete their work by June 30, 2006.
Tim O'Rourke, Dean of the Fulton School of Liberal Arts at Salisbury University in Maryland, has agreed to serve on the Peer Review Committee.

Karen,

Attached is a report on the status of recruitment of members of the Peer Review Group. We extended 9 invitations. We have four confirmed members, one reluctant turn-down, one who has yet to respond to an initial inquiry, and are awaiting confirmation from 3 others who initially agreed. Please let me know if you need additional information.

Subject July 12 and Peer Review Group

Karen:

The Eagleton project team usually meets on Tuesdays from 9:30 -- 11. At tomorrow's meeting I'll confirm with the group that we will meet on July 12, if that will fit your schedule. If that is a bad time for you, we have moved our meeting time before and can do so again if we can align participants' calendars. This week for the first time, Laura Williams --representing Moritz-- will join the session by telephone. For the meeting on the 12th I'll try to arrange for Ned Foley and Dan Tokaji to participate as well.

On the Peer Review Group
Your request to include the election officials on the group caused us to think anew about its purpose and composition. We agreed that election officials would add a useful dose of real world experience to the research. One of them could be Peter Veniero, who as AG (where he served before appointment to our Supreme Court) was New Jersey's chief election official. We would like Tom Wilkey to suggest a couple of former, senior election officials who could contribute to the PRG's work. While the PRG needs the experience of election administrators, we believe that perspective can be conveyed best by a senior, former official who is not appointed to represent a group of such officials --only to represent him or herself. We believe the group's advice would be most useful if came from people with the perspective provided by now being some distance from the daily fray.

This analysis emerged from a Friday conference call in which Ingrid Reed, Ned Foley, Laura Williams and I rethought the composition of the PRG. We concluded that the group should not, after all, include members from organizations that have taken advocacy positions on the issues we are researching. We agreed that the PRG should focus on methodologies and research findings rather than debate policy outcomes. PRG members should be free to represent themselves, rather than argue from an existing institutional position on policy. The PRG is not an advisory committee or a group of stakeholders to vet and take some ownership of policy recommendations. We'll consult the stakeholders separately, beginning with the list of groups in the proposal.

To replace those from advocacy organizations, we believe it would be preferable to add more members (from academia and the law, such as Pam Karlan, Guy-Uriel Charles, or Dan Lowenstein, whose CVs are summarized on the attachment. Finally, I will draft a mission statement for the PRG. Attached is a revised list of proposed PRG members, showing 2 slots to be filled by senior, former election officials.

Hope you have received the Gantt chart by now and that it fits your needs.

Ingrid Reed and I will attend the meeting in New York on Thursday and look forward to seeing you there.

Tom

I'd like to schedule a conference call among EAC and Eagleton staff for sometime the early part of the week of July 11. Please let me know dates and times on your end and I'll coordinate with staff here.

During the call we can review your monthly report and cover any problems, challenges, needs, etc. that the Eagleton team may have.

I will be back to you early next week with EAC's feedback on this.

Our initial reaction is that the group needs to include some local and/or state-level election officials, who have first-hand experience with these issues.

We will get you additional names and reactions by mid-week next week.

Karen,

As you probably recall, one of the features of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group to look over our findings, conclusions and draft reports before we prepare final drafts for the EAC's review. The EAC asked that before recruiting members of the PRG we submit names for EAC's review. The aim, course, is to assemble a panel that is experienced, informed, and balanced.

Attached is a list of potential PRG members drawn from academia, the law, and non-profit organizations with interests in this area. Please look it over.

We may conclude that the PRG should also include two or three former government officials now in academia or related fields. We have a conference call with our partners at Moritz planned for tomorrow or Friday to decide a) if former officials should be included in the PRG and b) if so, who they should be. I'll keep you informed of our thinking as it develops.

Notification to bidders

You are hereby advised that the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) has competitively awarded a contract to the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey for research assistance to support the development of guidance on the two topics of provisional voting and voter identification procedures. Eagleton is partnering with the Moritz College of Law of Ohio State University for this work effort. The amount of this award is $560,002.

EAC appreciates the interest you have expressed in supporting our research agenda by submitting a proposal for this work. Should you wish to receive a de-brief on this procurement, please contact Carol A. Paquette, Interim Executive Director, by email at cpaquette@eac.gov.

Tim, Tom, John, et.al--

The EAC has identified three academics who are going to serve as peer reviewers of the Eagleton Voter ID paper and research.

They are Jonathan Nagler of New York University, Jan Leighley, University of Arizona, and Adam Berinsky of MIT.
They are ready to review the documents as soon as they are available.

I would like to them one week to review the material and then have a joint conference call on Thursday,
May 11, in which we would all have an opportunity to discuss the research methodology and statistical analysis, along with general comments and suggestions.

If you are able to get to me the paper and the supporting data analysis, I will distribute to the documents
ASAP.
Also let me know, if you would, your availability on May 11 to do this conference all.
I anticipate that it will last approximately 90 minutes.

Karen - At this time, we anticipate reallocating funds primarily from the public hearings line item and spending approximately $35,500 more than originally budgeted on personnel, $23,250 more on the subcontract with Ohio State and $20,250 more on consultants. There are other additional variances but they are not significant (e.g. less on honoraria, less on travel, and more on general operations such as phone expenses). Let me know if you need additional detail or information.

Why we need a no-cost extension

The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting based on our research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication. The draft was complete in August, but the EAC’s schedule did not permit us to brief the commissioners and staff until early September. We did not receive EAC comments until October, making it impossible to complete the work on the original schedule. Taking account of those comments and guidance from EAC required several weeks. The EAC did not receive our final draft report and recommendations for best practices until late November. We are now awaiting the EAC’s comments on that final draft, which we have been told to expect in January.

The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report on that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid January.

Because the EAC has decided to issue recommendations for best practices on these topics, rather than voluntary guidance, we will finish the work within two months of the original completion date since the adoption process will be shorter. Note that meeting this schedule is dependent on the time needed by the EAC to review our work.

This extension will entail additional personnel time but, since no public hearings on “best practices” are required, if the EAC does not object, funds originally allocated for the hearings would be available for transfer to support the additional staff and consultant time necessary to complete the work.

When will work be completed and funds fully expended?

As shown on the attached schedule, work on this contract will be completed in three phases. The EAC will receive our final report and recommendations for best practices in provisional voting during the week of January 23, 2006 (assuming that we receive the EAC’s comments on the draft report submitted on November 28 by January 9).

We will submit our draft report, alternative approaches, and compendium of statutes, regulations, and litigation on Voter Identification Issues during the week of January 16, 2006. If the EAC is able to return comments to us no later than the week of January 30, we will have submit the final report and recommendations for best practices on Voter Identification to the EAC during the week of February 13.

The total project budget is $560,002. As of October 31st, the EAC has been invoiced for $259,081.79; the balance remaining is $300,920.21. We anticipate that the project will be complete and the balance of funds fully expended by February 28, 2006. The final invoice for the contract will be submitted to the EAC within 75 days of the close of the project.

Carol,

After our discussion in New York, you asked me to put in writing our response to the EAC's suggestions for expanding the number and kinds of groups that would review and comment on our work. I hope after your review of this response, we will be able to quickly recruit a balanced Peer Review Group (PRG) and move ahead as the schedule in our work plan indicates. Attached is a revised list of the members we propose for appointment to the PRG. We will probably not be able to persuade all of them to serve, but the number and range of views included on the proposed list should ensure that the resulting group is well-balanced.

Tom

RESPONSE TO EAC RECOMMENDATIONS FOR ADDITIONAL REVIEW GROUPS

EAC's Recommendations for the PRG
Karen Lynn-Dyson reported this response from the EAC commissioners to our proposal for the composition of the PRG.

1. Not sufficient conservative representation on the PRG

2. Create a “tiered process” of review in which:
   A. The PRG will prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions.
   B. PRG’s analysis would be vetted by a defined/select group of local election officials.
   C. A defined/select group of advocacy organizations would review the comments of the local election officials
D. Empanel a final focus group of local election officials, advocates and academics for an overall, interactive reaction to the analysis and recommendations.

Project Team Response
Creating three new committees to the review process to supplement the work of the Peer Review Group (PRG) is possible, but would add at least 8 weeks—and possibly 12 weeks—to our completion of the guidance document on provisional voting. We believe this delay would risk limiting the value of this project for the 2006 election. In addition, the change would add at least $30,000 to the cost of our work. (See the attached table showing the possible effect on our work plan, and note the optimistic assumptions such as the ability to hold a hearing the week after Christmas.) If the same groups were to be engaged in reviewing our work on Voter ID, the time for that work would also have to be stretched at a similar increased cost.

This additional cost and the added time might be worthwhile... if the new layers of review were to produce a consensus on how to strengthen the research, sharpen the analysis, and increase the relevance of the Guidance Document. Our team concluded, however, that additional review groups were unlikely to achieve these results.

PRG focuses on quality of research
We believe that our research would be strengthened by a balanced Peer Review Group that will focus on the design of the research and our conduct of it. Based on the EAC's recommendation, we have revised the composition of the PRG to include additional, well-recognized authorities in the field whose perspective is generally agreed to be conservative.

The PRG will focus on the strength of the research design and the quality of our analysis, not on the politics of our recommendations for the guidance document. The PRG will critique the research design and suggest how to strengthen it. Members of the group will review the quality of our analysis so that we can fill holes and correct errors before we make policy recommendations to the EAC. The PRG may or may not meet as a group. The likelihood is that most comments will come in writing from individual members, most of whose schedules would not permit attendance at meetings. In any case, the PRG members will not gather around a table to come to consensus on the study's recommendations.

While using the PRG as a forum to reach consensus on the knotty issues involved does not appear practical, the EAC can benefit from the work of other groups in this regard. It is not necessary for this project to duplicate the deliberative processes of the Carter-Baker Commission, the Century Foundation and the Election Center. The EAC itself as well as the project team can get the benefit of these reports without duplicating this "policy evaluation board" structure as part of this contract.

Project Team focuses on analysis and recommendations
Karen reported that the Commissioners believed that the PRG would "prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions." As we see it, the PRG will neither analyze data nor draw conclusions, tentative or otherwise. Its members will review and comment on how the Project Team has designed and carried out the research. Analysis, conclusions and recommendations are the responsibility of the Project Team. We have all seen in the preface to books or articles a sentence or two that read something like this, "The author thanks Mr. X, Ms. Y, and Dr. Z for their review and comment on the manuscript. Their analysis has strengthened the work, but they are in no way responsible for errors or for my conclusions.” That is the way we think about the Peer Review Group.

In short, the PRG will help ensure that EAC’s Guidance Document is founded on a solid base of data and analysis. The review and comment on the Preliminary Guidance Document by the EAC’s Board of Advisors and Standards Board will provide participation by important stakeholder groups without the need for the other review committees. This Board is broad-based and represents a key stakeholder group. It also enjoys a significant advantage over a “defined/select” group we might empanel. Any group we define will be open to criticism or charges of bias by representatives of interest groups not represented.

The criticism and charges of bias might be tolerable, but only if we could expect consensus from the “defined/select” group we would appoint. We believe that consensus would be elusive. In empanelling a “defined/select” group, we would naturally look for balance and would appoint members to represent a point of view or an institutional interest. As representatives they would likely feel that they had little choice but to be strong advocates. They would have little incentive to compromise. Our research, as opposed to our policy recommendations, would be better served by the analysis of scholars than by the advocacy of interests.

Policy judgments
We regard the EAC itself as responsible for the policy judgments involved in shaping the Guidance Document. We plan, of course, to respond to the EAC’s comments on our preliminary draft, so that the EAC’s comments will shape the Preliminary Guidance Document before it is released for public comment. And further revision will follow the public hearing and comments. The EAC and individual Commissioners can always seek comment informally on our analysis or recommendations. That course appears to us preferable to the creation of a new, more elaborate review process.

PROPOSED MEMBERSJuly6.doc
Role of the Peer Review Group

Members of the Peer Review Group will review the research design for the project, including the survey of local election officials, the analysis of Voter ID regime on turnout, the state-by-state narrative of developments in provisional voting and voter identification, and the compilation and analysis of statutes, administrative regulations, and case law affecting provisional voting and voter identification. They will also review the report on Analysis and Alternatives. They may review the draft of the Preliminary Guidance Document before it goes to the Board of Advisors for comment.

Members of the group will be respected authorities in their fields and represent a range of opinions and perspectives, although their views on policy will be less important to the study than their views on the quality of the research on which policy recommendations are based.

Ideally, the group would meet once, but even that may not be possible to arrange given the tight time period for the project, the demanding schedules of the members, and their wide dispersal across the county. They will function largely by reviewing written work and making written comments on it. The timing of their involvement is indicated on the work plan.

Hi -- nice to meet you in person, finally!

And thanks for inviting me to your gathering, I enjoyed it and hope I was helpful. Of course, any time you want anything, you do know where to track me down.

As to the potential reviewers of the Eagleton Voter ID study, here are my suggestions, in order:
Jonathan Nagler, New York University
Jan Leighley, University of Arizona
Ben Highton, UC-Davis
Adam Berinsky, MIT
Bernard Grofman, UC-Irvine

All have worked with the CPS turnout/registration data, and are very familiar with this research literature.

If these don't work, or you want more recommendations, let me know.

EAGLETON INSTITUTE OF POLITICS

Request to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission
for a No-Cost Extension and Reallocation of Funds

November 30, 2005

Why we need a no-cost extension

The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting based on our research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication. The draft was complete in August, but the EAC’s schedule did not permit us to brief the commissioners and staff until early September. We did not receive EAC comments until October, making it impossible to complete the work on the original schedule. Taking account of those comments and guidance from EAC required several weeks. The EAC did not receive our final draft report and recommendations for best practices until late November. We are now awaiting the EAC’s comments on that final draft, which we have been told to expect in January.

The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report on that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid January.

Because the EAC has decided to issue recommendations for best practices on these topics, rather than voluntary guidance, we will finish the work within two months of the original completion date since the adoption process will be shorter. Note that meeting this schedule is dependent on the time needed by the EAC to review our work.

This extension will entail additional personnel time but, since no public hearings on “best practices” are required, if the EAC does not object, funds originally allocated for the hearings would be available for transfer to support the additional staff and consultant time necessary to complete the work.

When will work be completed and funds fully expended?

As shown on the attached schedule, work on this contract will be completed in three phases. The EAC will receive our final report and recommendations for best practices in provisional voting during the week of January 23, 2006 (assuming that we receive the EAC’s comments on the draft report submitted on November 28 by January 9).

We will submit our draft report, alternative approaches, and compendium of statutes, regulations, and litigation on Voter Identification Issues during the week of January 16, 2006. If the EAC is able to return comments to us no later than the week of January 30, we will have submit the final report and recommendations for best practices on Voter Identification to the EAC during the week of February 13.

The total project budget is $560,002. As of October 31st, the EAC has been invoiced for $259,081.79; the balance remaining is $399,920.21. We anticipate that the project will be complete and the balance of funds fully expended by February 28, 2006. The final invoice for the contract will be submitted to the EAC within 75 days of the close of the project.

Subject Peer Review Group

Karen,

Attached is a report on the status of recruitment of members of the Peer Review Group. We extended 9 invitations. We have four confirmed members, one reluctant turn-down, one who has yet to respond to an initial inquiry, and are awaiting confirmation from 3 others who initially agreed. Please let me know if you need additional information.

This is an important e-mail (for audit purposes) related to the large survey of election officials which Eagleton did.

By law, the EAC could not do this survey without going through a lengthy OMB approval process. Eagleton was free to do this survey as long as it was for their clarification purposes and they did not seek our advice on the survey.

Tom-

A review of the EAC's Statement of Work for Research Assistance to develop Voluntary Guidance on Provisional Voting and Voting Identification procedures, does not require that a survey of the elections community, regarding their experiences with provisional voting or voter identification be conducted. Therefore, the EAC is not required to review or approve such a survey.

Should Eagleton elect to conduct such a survey to further educate and inform their work on these topics, they may conduct such a survey on their behalf only.

Karen,

Attached are the two documents we just discussed. The cover letter will go to 2800+ election officials around the country. It alerts the recipients that they may be called to participate in a survey as a part of our research for the EAC. The survey will, in fact, interview only 400 of the local election officials, but notifying them all is necessary because the selection of those called will be random, and, if the surveyors cannot reach the first county drawn for the sample, they will move on to the next. The need to have your review of the letter is the most urgent. Unless it goes to SBRI, the survey firm that will make the actual calls, today, we will fall behind an already tight schedule.

The questionnaire would also benefit from your review. As you know, question wording is an art. A good question elicits the information sought without biasing the response. Your review, however, can help ensure that the survey elicits information that EAC will find useful. We will rely on the results to draw conclusions about provisional voting as experienced by county-level election officials. It inquires about the quality and timeliness of information and training they may have received from state-level officials and about the information and training that they, in turn, passed on to poll workers. I don't believe this information is available anywhere else. We are over-sampling officials in states that did not offer provisional ballots before 2004 so that we can draw some inferences about the difference between their experience and the experience of officials for whom provisional voting was more familiar. These inferences may provide helpful in shaping the guidance the EAC offers the states for the 2006 election.
Your comments on the questionnaire are also needed urgently, but I believe we can hold SBRI at bay on this document until tomorrow.

As I mentioned, my computer died on Monday, so I have only sporadic access to email. I will have access until about 2 today and then won't be back on-line until early evening. You can always reach me by phone at [redacted]. If you would like to send a fax, that number is [redacted].

Thanks,

Tom Revised Final cover letter 070607.doc
Dear NAME,

Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey, is conducting a national survey of elections officials’ experiences with provisional voting in the 2004 national election. Through this survey we will learn the perspective of those who administer elections. It will improve our understanding of the process as we complete a broad research project on provisional voting in the context of effective election administration, voter access, and ballot security. The findings of the project will be the basis for recommendations to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) to consider in the development of its guidance to the states in 2006.

The EAC was established by the Help America Vote Act (HAVA) of 2002. It is an independent, bipartisan, federal agency that provides federal funds to states to upgrade voting systems and improve election administration. The EAC publishes voluntary guidelines for the states and serves as a national clearinghouse of information regarding election administration. The EAC is funding the research project.

Participants in this study will be selected randomly and asked to share their experiences administering the provisional voting process in the 2004 election. The study will be conducted July 18th through August 5th. During that period a survey researcher may call you if you are, in fact, chosen at random from a national list of election officials. The researcher will ask you questions about your experience with provisional voting, your evaluation of the process, and your recommendations to improve it. The survey will take approximately 10-15 minutes. All of your answers will be completely confidential, and no statement or comment you make will be ascribed to you.

At the conclusion of the research project, we will present a report to the EAC including analysis of provisional voting procedures as well as recommendations for future practices and procedures. The guidance document based on our research will be published by the EAC in the Federal Register for public review and comment, and the EAC will hold a hearing on the guidance document this fall before adopting it.

Your participation in the survey will assure that we understand the views of election officials who have direct experience with provisional voting. We hope you will participate if called. Thank you for your time.

Sincerely,

Subject July 12 and Peer Review Group

Karen:

The Eagleton project team usually meets on Tuesdays from 9:30 -- 11. At tomorrow's meeting I'll confirm with the group that we will meet on July 12, if that will fit your schedule. If that is a bad time for you, we have moved our meeting time before and can do so again if we can align participants' calendars. This week for the first time, Laura Williams --representing Moritz-- will join the session by telephone. For the meeting on the 12th I'll try to arrange for Ned Foley and Dan Tokaji to participate as well.

On the Peer Review Group
Your request to include the election officials on the group caused us to think anew about its purpose and composition. We agreed that election officials would add a useful dose of real world experience to the research. One of them could be Peter Veniero, who as AG (where he served before appointment to our Supreme Court) was New Jersey's chief election official. We would like Tom Wilkey to suggest a couple of former, senior election officials who could contribute to the PRG's work. While the PRG needs the experience of election administrators, we believe that perspective can be conveyed best by a senior, former official who is not appointed to represent a group of such officials --only to represent him or herself. We believe the group's advice would be most useful if came from people with the perspective provided by now being some distance from the daily fray.

This analysis emerged from a Friday conference call in which Ingrid Reed, Ned Foley, Laura Williams and I rethought the composition of the PRG. We concluded that the group should not, after all, include members from organizations that have taken advocacy positions on the issues we are researching. We agreed that the PRG should focus on methodologies and research findings rather than debate policy outcomes. PRG members should be free to represent themselves, rather than argue from an existing institutional position on policy. The PRG is not an advisory committee or a group of stakeholders to vet and take some ownership of policy recommendations. We'll consult the stakeholders separately, beginning with the list of groups in the proposal.

To replace those from advocacy organizations, we believe it would be preferable to add more members from academia and the law, such as Pam Karlan, Guy-Uriel Charles, or Dan Lowenstein, whose CVs are summarized on the attachment. Finally, I will draft a mission statement for the PRG. Attached is a revised list of proposed PRG members, showing 2 slots to be filled by senior, former election officials.

Hope you have received the Gantt chart by now and that it fits your needs.

Ingrid Reed and I will attend the meeting in New York on Thursday and look forward to seeing you there.

Tom

I will be back to you early next week with EAC’s feedback on this.

Our initial reaction is that the group needs to include some local and/or state-level election officials, who have first-hand experience with these issues.

We will get you additional names and reactions by mid-week next week.

Karen,

As you probably recall, one of the features of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group to look over our findings, conclusions and draft reports before we prepare final drafts for the EAC’s review. The EAC asked that before recruiting members of the PRG we submit names for EAC’s review. The aim, course, is to assemble a panel that is experienced, informed, and balanced.

Attached is a list of potential PRG members drawn from academia, the law, and non-profit organizations with interests in this area. Please look it over.

We may conclude that the PRG should also include two or three former government officials now in academia or related fields. We have a conference call with our partners at Moritz planned for tomorrow or Friday to decide a) if former officials should be included in the PRG and b) if so, who they should be. I'll keep you informed of our thinking as it develops.

Commissioners -

We have tentatively scheduled May 26 at 2:30 for a kickoff meeting here with Eagleton Institute. What will happen at this meeting is Eagleton will introduce their key people and make a brief presentation on their approach to performing the provisional voting and voter ID studies. It will be an opportunity to ask questions, raise any concerns, and/or provide guidance as they begin this work. Please advise if you wish to attend this meeting. I expect it will last about an hour.

Subject: Re: Voter ID Paper --Final Draft

Tim, Tom, John, et.al--

The EAC has identified three academics who are going to serve as peer reviewers of the Eagleton Voter ID paper and research.

They are Jonathan Nagler of New York University, Jan Leighley, University of Arizona, and Adam Berinsky of MIT.

They are ready to review the documents as soon as they are available.

I would like to them one week to review the material and then have a joint conference call on Thursday, May 11, in which we would all have an opportunity to discuss the research methodology and statistical analysis, along with general comments and suggestions.

If you are able to get to me the paper and the supporting data analysis, I will distribute to the documents ASAP.

Also let me know, if you would, your availability on May 11 to do this conference all.
I anticipate that it will last approximately 90 minutes.

Thanks, John.

Indeed, with the receipt of the missing monthly reports, I believe we have all of the necessary contract deliverables.

The EAC anticipates receiving your final invoice for this contract prior to the conclusion of the Federal fiscal year which is September 30, 2006.

"John Weingart" <john.weingart@rutgers.edu>

Karen - I am writing to summarize our phone conversation initiated by me yesterday in response to receipt of Tom Wilkey's June 29th letter. To close out the contract, we will do the following:

1. Prepare separate monthly reports for April, May and June which each briefly summarize our activities under the contract during that month. These reports, which will not include financial information, will be sent to you by email no later than July 24th.

2. Submit a final invoice for the project no later than September 16th, which is 75 days from the close of the contract rather than the 30 days specified in the June 29th letter. I am attaching our previously-submitted "December 1, 2005 Request for a No-Cost Extension" which noted, at the bottom of page 1, the need for a 75-day closeout period.

3. In my January 13, 2006 letter regarding our No-Cost Extension through February 28th (also attached), I had indicated that we expected to have a closing balance of approximately $10,000. As we discussed yesterday, you appreciate that, with the subsequent No-Cost Extension through June 30th, we have spent the entire contract amount, and you expect us to submit invoices accordingly that will document our use of all remaining funds from the $560,002 contract award.

Please let me know if I have left out any remaining tasks or you have a different interpretation of them. I trust you have by now received all our final work products that were FedExed to you late last week.

Thanks,

John

EAGLETON INSTITUTE OF POLITICS

Request to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission for a No-Cost Extension and Reallocation of Funds

December 1, 2005

Why we need a no-cost extension

The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting based on our research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication. The draft was complete in August, but the EAC's schedule did not permit us to brief the commissioners and staff until early September. We did not receive EAC comments until October, making it impossible to complete the work on the original schedule. Taking account of those comments and guidance from EAC required several weeks. The EAC did not receive our final draft report and recommendations for best practices until late November. We are now awaiting the EAC's comments on that final draft, which we have been told to expect in January.

The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report on that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid January.

Because the EAC has decided to issue recommendations for best practices on these topics, rather than voluntary guidance, we will finish the work within two months of the original completion date since the adoption process will be shorter. Note that meeting this schedule is dependent on the time needed by the EAC to review our work.

This extension will entail additional personnel time but, since no public hearings on "best practices" are required, if the EAC does not object, funds originally allocated for the hearings would be available for transfer to support the additional staff and consultant time necessary to complete the work.

When will work be completed and funds fully expended?

As shown on the attached schedule, work on this contract will be completed in three phases. The EAC will receive our final report and recommendations for best practices in provisional voting during the week of January 23, 2006 (assuming that we receive the EAC's comments on the draft report submitted on November 28 by January 9).

We will submit our draft report, alternative approaches, and compendium of statutes, regulations, and litigation on Voter Identification Issues during the week of January 16, 2006. If the EAC is able to return comments to us no later than the week of January 30, we will have submit the final report and recommendations for best practices on Voter Identification to the EAC during the week of February 13.

The total project budget is $560,002. As of October 31st, the EAC has been invoiced for $259,081.79; the balance remaining is $300,920.21. We anticipate that the project will be complete and the balance of funds fully expended by February 28, 2006. The final invoice for the contract will be submitted to the EAC within 75 days of the close of the project.

Karen - I am attaching a spreadsheet providing the information you have requested (Attachment 1), but I want to highlight a few points which may not be immediately self-evident.

First, the original budget (Attachment 2) we submitted to the EAC, dated March 22nd, did not itemize personnel expenses by each person. In addition, when we actually began work two months after submitting that budget, we decided to reallocate more time to people within Eagleton and hire fewer outside hourlies.

Second, in the figures I sent you in late December we tried to account for all the expenses and projections but overlooked a few things including neglecting to include the honoraria for our peer review team. Hence, the figures we’re now sending are different than what I sent in December.

Lastly, we originally discussed a no-cost extension through February, but since we don’t yet have the EAC comments on our draft Provisional Voting material nor an estimate of when they are likely to be ready, I think it is prudent to extend the no-cost extension through March 31st. We would still like to conclude by the end of February, but if you can approve the extension for another month we could avoid going through this process again if everything is not complete six weeks from now.

It is my understanding that Rutgers will soon be sending our December invoice. At this time, I would also like to request that we combine January and February an invoice the EAC once for that time period.

As you can see, we are currently projecting an ending balance of approximately $10,000. If additional expenses are incurred beyond what is currently projected, we’re confident they will not exceed the original budget of $560,002.

Thanks and I look forward to hearing from you.

Karen,

Attached is a report on the status of recruitment of members of the Peer Review Group. We extended 9 invitations. We have four confirmed members, one reluctant turn-down, one who has yet to respond to an initial inquiry, and are awaiting confirmation from 3 others who initially agreed. Please let me know if you need additional information.

(Former NJ Attorney General and Supreme Court Justice)
Carol,

After our discussion in New York, you asked me to put in writing our response to the EAC's suggestions for expanding the number and kinds of groups that would review and comment on our work. I hope after your review of this response, we will be able to quickly recruit a balanced Peer Review Group (PRG) and move ahead as the schedule in our work plan indicates. Attached is a revised list of the members we propose for appointment to the PRG. We will probably not be able to persuade all of them to serve, but the number and range of views included on the proposed list should ensure that the resulting group is well-balanced.

Tom

RESPONSE TO EAC RECOMMENDATIONS FOR ADDITIONAL REVIEW GROUPS

EAC's Recommendations for the PRG
Karen Lynn-Dyson reported this response from the EAC commissioners to our proposal for the composition of the PRG.

1. Not sufficient conservative representation on the PRG

2. Create a "tiered process" of review in which:
   A. The PRG will prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions.
   B. PRG's analysis would be vetted by a defined/select group of local election officials.
   C. A defined/select group of advocacy organizations would review the
D. Empanel a final focus group of local election officials, advocates and academics for an overall, interactive reaction to the analysis and recommendations.

Project Team Response
Creating three new committees to the review process to supplement the work of the Peer Review Group (PRG) is possible, but would add at least 8 weeks—and possibly 12 weeks—to our completion of the guidance document on provisional voting. We believe this delay would risk limiting the value of this project for the 2006 election. In addition, the change would add at least $30,000 to the cost of our work. (See the attached table showing the possible effect on our work plan, and note the optimistic assumptions such as the ability to hold a hearing the week after Christmas.). If the same groups were to be engaged in reviewing our work on Voter ID, the time for that work would also have to be stretched at a similar increased cost.

This additional cost and the added time might be worthwhile... if the new layers of review were to produce a consensus on how to strengthen the research, sharpen the analysis, and increase the relevance of the Guidance Document. Our team concluded, however, that additional review groups were unlikely to achieve these results.

PRG focuses on quality of research
We believe that our research would be strengthened by a balanced Peer Review Group that will focus on the design of the research and our conduct of it. Based on the EAC’s recommendation, we have revised the composition of the PRG to include additional, well-recognized authorities in the field whose perspective is generally agreed to be conservative.

The PRG will focus on the strength of the research design and the quality of our analysis, not on the politics of our recommendations for the guidance document. The PRG will critique the research design and suggest how to strengthen it. Members of the group will review the quality of our analysis so that we can fill holes and correct errors before we make policy recommendations to the EAC. The PRG may or may not meet as a group. The likelihood is that most comments will come in writing from individual members, most of whose schedules would not permit attendance at meetings. In any case, the PRG members will not gather around a table to come to consensus on the study’s recommendations.

While using the PRG as a forum to reach consensus on the knotty issues involved does not appear practical, the EAC can benefit from the work of other groups in this regard. It is not necessary for this project to duplicate the deliberative processes of the Carter-Baker Commission, the Century Foundation and the Election Center. The EAC itself as well as the project team can get the benefit of these reports without duplicating this “policy evaluation board” structure as part of this contract.

Karen reported that the Commissioners believed that the PRG would “prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions.” As we see it, the PRG will neither analyze data nor draw conclusions, tentative or otherwise. Its members will review and comment on how the Project Team has designed and carried out the research. Analysis, conclusions and recommendations are the responsibility of the Project Team. We have all seen in the preface to books or articles a sentence or two that read something like this, “The author thanks Mr. X, Ms. Y, and Dr. Z for their review and comment on the manuscript. Their analysis has strengthened the work, but they are in no way responsible for errors or for my conclusions." That is the way we think about the Peer Review Group.

In short, the PRG will help ensure that EAC's Guidance Document is founded on a solid base of data and analysis. The review and comment on the Preliminary Guidance Document by the EAC's Board of Advisors and Standards Board will provide participation by important stakeholder groups without the need for the other review committees. This Board is broad-based and represents a key stakeholder group. It also enjoys a significant advantage over a "defined/select" group we might empanel. Any group we define will be open to criticism or charges of bias by representatives of interest groups not represented.

The criticism and charges of bias might be tolerable, but only if we could expect consensus from the "defined/select" group we would appoint. We believe that consensus would be elusive. In empanelling a "defined/select" group, we would naturally look for balance and would appoint members to represent a point of view or an institutional interest. As representatives they would likely feel that they had little choice but to be strong advocates. They would have little incentive to compromise. Our research, as opposed to our policy recommendations, would be better served by the analysis of scholars than by the advocacy of interests.

Policy judgments
We regard the EAC itself as responsible for the policy judgments involved in shaping the Guidance Document. We plan, of course, to respond to the EAC's comments on our preliminary draft, so that the EAC's comments will shape the Preliminary Guidance Document before it is released for public comment. And further revision will follow the public hearing and comments. The EAC and individual Commissioners can always seek comment informally on our analysis or recommendations. That course appears to us preferable to the creation of a new, more elaborate review process.

PROPOSED MEMBERSJuly6.doc
Role of the Peer Review Group

Members of the Peer Review Group will review the research design for the project, including the survey of local election officials, the analysis of Voter ID regime on turnout, the state-by-state narrative of developments in provisional voting and voter identification, and the compilation and analysis of statutes, administrative regulations, and case law affecting provisional voting and voter identification. They will also review the report on Analysis and Alternatives. They may review the draft of the Preliminary Guidance Document before it goes to the Board of Advisors for comment.

Members of the group will be respected authorities in their fields and represent a range of opinions and perspectives, although their views on policy will be less important to the study than their views on the quality of the research on which policy recommendations are based.

Ideally, the group would meet once, but even that may not be possible to arrange given the tight time period for the project, the demanding schedules of the members, and their wide dispersal across the county. They will function largely by reviewing written work and making written comments on it. The timing of their involvement is indicated on the work plan.

Verniero chairs the firm's Appellate Practice Group. He earned his B.A. at Drew University, Phi Beta Kappa, and his J.D. (with honors) at the Duke University School of Law. In 1999, he was appointed a justice of the New Jersey Supreme Court, where he served for 7 years before re-entering private practice. Before his appointment to the Supreme Court, he served as New Jersey's Attorney General, and in that capacity oversaw the state's election laws. He also served as Chief of Staff and Chief Counsel to Governor Christine Todd Whitman.

Plus one or two former, senior election officials to be suggested by the EAC.
Hi-

Well, I've managed to secure one of the folks on your list- Jan Leighley. As you might imagine, she is very interested in the topic (voter id) and glad to help. Ben Highton is having a baby this week or next so is unavailable. I haven't heard back from the others whom I've called and left detailed messages.

I need to line up at least two others. Perhaps you would be willing to prod your colleagues (I see Nagler is a long-time colleague of yours). Alternatively, do you have a few other names you might offer?

My world has been one of economists and sociologists, not political scientists. So, I'm not able to line up the types of folks you were able to suggest. I think the list you gave me is outstanding, so I'd like folks of this caliber.

The plan is to do the review May 5- May 11 and to do a conference call with Eagleton (including the peer review folks) on or about Friday, May 12.

As always, Mike, I'm grateful for your advice and guidance.

Glad to help. I don't want to step on toes, but I'd recommend that you think about some sort of single-blind peer review, of the sort that is employed by many research journals and other organizations (like the NSF or National Academies of Science). I think that if you offer them a modest honoraria (perhaps $100) I think you'll find that the folks on that list would be likely to provide quick and thorough feedback to you.

I'm also willing to do a review for you myself. The issue is that I feel somewhat conflicted, given that I'm on their "peer review" panel. But on the other hand that does mean that I'm very well aware of the background of this project. I'd leave it up to you as to whether you think that a review from me would be appropriate or not.

Mike

EAC Advisory 2005-006: Provisional Voting and Identification Requirements

The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) has recently received an inquiry regarding whether a state may impose an identification requirement that would limit a potential voter's access to a provisional ballot to which he or she is otherwise entitled under Section 302 of the Help America Vote Act (HAVA) (42 U.S.C. §15482). After consideration of the matter, EAC has concluded that Section 302 of HAVA creates a voter right. Specifically, the section creates the right for a potential voter to utilize a provisional ballot in the event their name does not appear on the registration list or the voter’s eligibility is challenged by an election official. While States may create voter identification standards that exceed those laid out in HAVA and effect whether a provisional ballot is counted, States may not take action that limits a voter’s right to receive and submit a provisional ballot. In explaining this position, this advisory reviews the plain language of HAVA Section 302, examines the differences between traditional and provisional ballots and analyzes the implementation of provisional voting under HAVA Section 303(b). This advisory also addresses the impact of a state’s authority to create stricter standards than prescribed by HAVA upon HAVA’s provisional voting requirements.1

Plain Language of HAVA Section 302. The right to cast a provisional ballot is created in Section 302 of HAVA. Pursuant to HAVA, when an individual declares that he or she is a registered and eligible voter in a federal election, that individual “shall be permitted to cast a provisional ballot” if (1) their name does not appear on the official list of eligible voters or (2) “an election official asserts that the individual is not eligible to vote.” (Section 302(a)). This right to receive a provisional ballot is contingent upon only one thing (per Section 302(a)(2)), the individual’s execution of a written affirmation that he or she is both a registered and eligible voter for the election at issue.2 See also, Sandusky County Democratic Party v. Blackwell, 387 F.3d 565, 574 (6th Cir. 2004). However, notwithstanding the above, HAVA goes on to recognize that the right to submit a provisional ballot constitutes neither a means to avoid State imposed voter eligibility requirements nor a vote. Instead, HAVA requires election officials at a polling place to transmit a provisional ballot (or information associated with the written affirmation) to appropriate election officials for verification. (Section 302(a)(4) of HAVA). These election officials ultimately determine the voter’s eligibility based upon information presented to or gathered by it, in accordance with State law. In this way, the State determines whether any provisional ballot submitted will be counted as a vote. Id.

1 The EAC is the Federal agency charged with the administration of HAVA. While the EAC does not have rulemaking authority in the area of provisional voting, HAVA does require the Commission to draft guidance to assist states in their implementation of HAVA’s provisional voting requirements. Although EAC’s administrative interpretations do not have the force of law associated with legislative rules, the Supreme Court has long held that the interpretations of agencies charged with the administration of a statute are to be given deferential treatment by Courts when faced with issues of statutory construction. York v. Secretary of Treasury, 774 F. 2d 417, 419 – 420 (10th Cir. 1985) (citing Compensation Commission of Alaska v. Aragon, 329 U.S. 143, 153 – 154 (1963)) See also Christian v. Harris County, 529 U.S. 576 (2000); Edelman v. Lynchburg College, 122 S. Ct. 1145 (2002).

In simplest terms, provisional voting represents the right of an individual (whose eligibility to vote has been challenged), to reserve their right to vote and postpone the voter eligibility determination to a time when more perfect or complete information may be provided. See Sandusky County Democratic Party, 387 F.3d at 570 and Florida Democratic Party v. Hood, 342 F.Supp 1073, 1079-1080 (N.D. Fla. 2004). A provisional ballot does not represent a different way to vote, nor does it serve as a bypass to State laws governing voter eligibility. Rather, it is designed to prevent an individual from losing his or her right to vote due to the fact that a poll worker did not have all the information available or needed to accurately assess voter eligibility. Thus, based upon the plain language of Section 302(a) of HAVA, a challenge to an individual’s eligibility to vote (such as a challenge based upon identification requirements) cannot serve as a bar to the receipt of a provisional ballot, because it is the election official’s challenge that triggers the provisional ballot procedure in the first place. To hold otherwise would defeat the purpose of provisional voting. In the end, to understand this concept one must understand the differences between traditional and provisional ballots.

Traditional vs. Provisional Ballots. The nature and procedures associated with a provisional ballot are wholly distinct from those of a traditional ballot. Because of this fact, the two processes must be treated differently. While voter identification requirements may serve as a bar to the casting of a traditional ballot, they may not prevent the submission of a provisional ballot. First, the nature and purpose of traditional and provisional ballots are essentially different. The purpose of a traditional ballot is to allow a confirmed, eligible voter to cast a vote. The purpose of a provisional ballot is to allow individuals whose voter eligibility is challenged to reserve the right to vote by memorializing both their intent to vote and their proposed vote. This is evident by the HAVA processes discussed above. The bottom line is that the casting of a proper, traditional ballot constitutes a vote, while the casting or submission of a provisional ballot does not. A traditional ballot is cast only after voter eligibility has been determined by the State. Hence, the moment it is cast, it becomes an individual’s vote. On the other hand, the submission or casting of a provisional ballot is not a vote. Rather, it is a claim that the potential voter who submitted it has the right to vote and reserves that right. As the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals stated:

[T]he primary purpose of HAVA was to prevent on-the-spot denials of provisional ballots to voters deemed ineligible to vote by poll workers. Under HAVA, the only permissible requirement that may be imposed upon a would-be voter before permitting that voter to cast a provisional ballot is the affirmation contained in [42 U.S.C.] §15482(a): that the voter is a registered voter in the jurisdiction in which he or she desires to vote, and that the voter is eligible to vote in an election for federal office. Sandusky County Democratic Party, 387 F.3d at 574.

This goes to the very heart of provisional voting. If provisional voting is a right triggered by an election official’s determination that an individual has not met a voter eligibility requirement, how can such a requirement also serve as a bar to that right? The concept of provisional voting works only if the right is always available when the application of voter eligibility requirements is in question.

Second, consistent with the differences in purpose between traditional and provisional ballots, the other major distinction between the two lies in the application of voter eligibility requirements. This difference is primarily one of procedural timing. States have the right to create voter eligibility requirements and these requirements must be applied to both traditional and provisional ballots. In casting a traditional ballot, one must meet all eligibility requirements prior to receiving the ballot. However, in the provisional process, the potential voter has already failed to meet these preliminary requirements and the application of State law must occur after the ballot has been received. State voter eligibility requirements should be applied after the provisional ballot and/or supporting affirmation has been transmitted pursuant to Section 302(a)(3) of HAVA. Provisional ballots are counted as votes only after election officials have determined that the individual can meet voter eligibility standards consistent with state law. Again, the purpose of the process is to allow election officials more time, so that they may have more perfect information when making a decision about voter eligibility. Provisional ballots are subject to the full effect of State law regarding the eligibility to vote and the opportunity the law provides provisional voters to supply additional information. Provisional ballots do not escape state or federal voter eligibility requirements, those provisional ballots that do not meet State standards will not be counted.

Provisional Voting Under HAVA Section 303(b). Congress provided an example of how provisional voting works by applying the right to a specific circumstance. Section 303(b)(2)(B) of HAVA, entitled Fail-Safe Voting, provides that when a first-time voter who registered by mail is required by HAVA Section 303(b) to show identification, that person must be given a provisional ballot if he or she fails to provide such identification at the polling place. This section is important as it clarifies Congressional intent regarding how provisional voting should function.

The Fail-Safe Voting provision of Section 303(b)(2)(B) grants clear insight into how provisional voting should be implemented. While Section 303(b) deals with a specific subset of voters (first-time voters who registered by mail), its application of Section 302(a) supports the concept that a provisional ballot must be given to a voter who is determined (at the polling place) not to meet voter identification requirements. A review of the section shows that in the one area where HAVA set a Federal voter identification requirement Congress made clear that an individual’s failure to meet this eligibility requirement triggered the statute’s provisional voting section. Congress saw no difference between an individual’s failure to meet the voter identification requirements it issued in Section 303(b) and the failure to meet eligibility requirements which trigger provisional voting under Section 302. Section 303(b) makes it clear that Congress did not intend voter identification requirements to limit access to provisional voting. Instead, Congress viewed provisional voting as a right, or more specifically, as a fail-safe. The EAC strongly believes that HAVA provisions must be interpreted to bring about consistent and evenly applied results. In this case, if individuals who fail to meet Federal identification standards have the right to a provisional ballot, so must individuals who fail to meet similar State standards.
Stricter Eligibility Standards and Provisional Voting. HAVA specifically provides that States may create stricter voter eligibility standards than provided in HAVA. Arizona’s “Proposition 200” identification requirements are a prime example of this authority. However, the HAVA authority to create stricter eligibility standards does not grant the state authority to create standards that bar access to a provisional ballot. To interpret HAVA otherwise (i.e. allowing stricter state identification standards to bar access to provisional ballots) would render HAVA’s provisional voting mandate (Section 302) void and meaningless. HAVA cannot be read to grant both (1) the right to a provisional ballot if an individual’s voting eligibility is challenged by a State and, (2) the right of that State to deny an individual a provisional ballot if they do not meet voter eligibility standards. These concepts are mutually exclusive. HAVA cannot be interpreted to allow a State to create voter eligibility standards that bar the Section 302 right to cast a provisional ballot without nullifying the effect and intent of that provision. Any such interpretation of HAVA would run afoul of both HAVA Section 304 and longstanding principles of statutory construction.

First, HAVA notes in Section 304 that while States may create standards that are stricter that those established under HAVA, this authority is limited to the extent “such State requirements are not inconsistent with the Federal requirements under [HAVA].” Clearly, provisional voting is a requirement under HAVA. Section 302(a) notes that qualified individuals “shall be permitted to cast a provisional ballot.” (Emphasis added). In this way, States may not create standards that are inconsistent or interfere with the provisional voting mandate.

Furthermore, long established principles of statutory construction further prohibit an interpretation of HAVA that would render any of its provisions meaningless. It is “a cardinal principle of statutory construction’ that ‘a statute ought, upon the whole, to be so construed that, if it can be prevented, no clause, sentence, or word shall be superfluous, void, or insignificant.” TRW Inc. v. Andrews, 534 U.S. 19, 31, 122 S.Ct. 441, 151 L.Ed.2d 339 (2001), (quoting Duncan v. Walker, 533 U.S. 167, 174, 121 S.Ct. 2120, 150 L.Ed.2d 251 (2001)).

A Stricter Provisional Voting Standard. As discussed above, States’ have the right to impose stricter requirements than those laid out in HAVA. The EAC has already made it clear, above, that a stricter voter eligibility requirement cannot be read to bar an individual’s right to a provisional ballot. However, could a stricter requirement regarding provisional voting serve to limit access to such ballots? No. A stricter State requirement for provisional voting would be a standard that enhances a person’s access to a provisional ballot. As the Sixth Circuit noted, “HAVA is quintessentially about being able to cast a provisional ballot.” Sandusky County Democratic Party, 387 F.3d at 576. “HAVA’s requirements ‘are minimum requirements’ permitting deviation from its provisions provided that such deviation is ‘more strict than the requirements established under’ HAVA (in terms of encouraging provisional voting)....” Id., (quoting 42 U.S.C. §15484, emphasis added). Thus, in terms of provisional voting, a stricter standard is one that serves to further encourage provisional voting. When passing laws affecting provisional voting, States must ensure that their provisions are consistent with HAVA or otherwise serve to further an individual’s access to a provisional ballot. EAC concludes that any policy asserting that States may pass laws limiting access to provisional ballots conflicts with HAVA.

3 See 42 U.S.C. §§15485 – 15485, entitled Minimum Requirements and Methods of Implementation Left to Discretion of State, respectively.
Conclusion. A state may not impose an identification requirement that would limit a potential voter’s access to and submission of a provisional ballot. However, such requirements (when coupled with a state’s provisional ballot procedures) may prevent a provisional ballot from being counted.

Karen,

Here are our changes....it might seem a little hard to understand since Eagleton gave us a pdf instead of a word doc. It's a little convoluted in parts and the formatting is totally off. But if there is any trouble, I can go over the copy that we marked up and get it onto the most recent copy.

Let me know what you think...

On September 13, 2005 the U.S. Election Assistance Commission issued an advisory (2005-006) and, after consideration of the matter, EAC concluded that Section 302 of HAVA creates a voter right. Specifically, the section creates the right for a potential voter to utilize a provisional ballot in the event his or her name does not appear on the registration list or the voter’s eligibility is challenged by an election official. While States may create voter identification standards that exceed those laid out in HAVA and effect whether a provisional ballot is counted, States may not take action that limits a voter’s right to receive and submit a provisional ballot.

The right to cast a provisional ballot is created in Section 302 of HAVA. Pursuant to HAVA, when an individual declares that he or she is a registered and eligible voter in a federal election, that individual “shall be permitted to cast a provisional ballot” if (1) their name does not appear on the official list of eligible voters or (2) “an election official asserts that the individual is not eligible to vote.” (Section 302(a)). This right to receive a provisional ballot is contingent upon only one thing (per Section 302(a)(2)), the individual’s execution of a written affirmation that he or she is both a registered and eligible voter for the election at issue.

In simplest terms, provisional voting represents the right of an individual (whose eligibility to vote has been challenged), to reserve his or her right to vote and postpone the voter eligibility determination to a time when more perfect or complete information may be provided. A provisional ballot does not represent a different way to vote, nor does it serve as a bypass to State laws governing voter eligibility. Rather, it is designed to prevent an individual from losing his or her right to vote due to the fact that a poll worker did not have all the information available or needed to accurately assess voter eligibility. Thus, based upon the plain language of Section 302(a) of HAVA, a challenge to an individual’s eligibility to vote (such as a challenge based upon identification requirements) cannot serve as a bar to the receipt of a provisional ballot, because it is the election official’s challenge that triggers the provisional ballot procedure in the first place. To hold otherwise would defeat the purpose of provisional voting. In the end, to understand this concept one must understand the differences between traditional and provisional ballots.

The nature and procedures associated with a provisional ballot are wholly distinct from those of a traditional ballot. Because of this fact, the two processes must be treated differently. While voter identification requirements may serve as a bar to the casting of a traditional ballot, they may not prevent the submission of a provisional ballot.

First, the nature and purpose of traditional and provisional ballots are essentially different. The purpose of a traditional ballot is to allow a confirmed, eligible voter to cast a vote. The purpose of a provisional ballot is to allow individuals whose voter eligibility is challenged to reserve the right to vote by memorializing both their intent to vote and their proposed vote. This is evident by the HAVA processes discussed above. The bottom line is that the casting of a proper, traditional ballot constitutes a vote, while the casting or submission of a provisional ballot does not. A traditional ballot is cast only after voter eligibility has been determined by the State. Hence, the moment it is cast, it becomes an individual’s vote. On the other hand, the submission or casting of a provisional ballot is not a vote. Rather, it is a claim that the potential voter who submitted it has the right to vote and reserves that right.

This goes to the very heart of provisional voting. If provisional voting is a right triggered by an election official’s determination that an individual has not met a voter eligibility requirement, how can such a requirement also serve as a bar to that right? The concept of provisional voting works only if the right is always available when the application of voter eligibility requirements is in question.

Section 303(b)(2)(B) of HAVA, entitled Fail-Safe Voting, provides that when a first-time voter who registered by mail is required by HAVA Section 303(b) to show identification, that person must be given a provisional ballot if he or she fails to provide such identification at the polling place. This section is important as it clarifies Congressional intent regarding how provisional voting should function.

The Fail-Safe Voting provision of Section 303(b)(2)(B) grants clear insight into how provisional voting should be implemented. While Section 303(b) deals with a specific subset of voters (first-time voters who registered by mail), its application of Section 302(a) supports the concept that a provisional ballot must be given to a voter who is determined (at the polling place) not to meet voter identification requirements. Congress saw no difference between an individual’s failure to meet the voter identification requirements it issued in Section 303(b) and the failure to meet eligibility requirements which trigger provisional voting under Section 302. Section 303(b) makes it clear that Congress did not intend voter identification requirements to limit access to provisional voting. Instead, Congress viewed provisional voting as a right, or more specifically, as a fail-safe. The EAC strongly believes that HAVA provisions must be interpreted to bring about consistent and evenly applied results. In this case, if individuals who fail to meet Federal identification standards have the right to a provisional ballot, so must individuals who fail to meet similar State standards.

HAVA notes in Section 304 that while States may create standards that are stricter than those established under HAVA, this authority is limited to the extent “such State requirements are not inconsistent with the Federal requirements under [HAVA].” Clearly, provisional voting is a requirement under HAVA. Section 302(a) notes that qualified individuals “shall be permitted to cast a provisional ballot.” (Emphasis added). In this way, States may not create standards that are inconsistent or interfere with the provisional voting mandate.

States have the right to impose stricter requirements than those laid out in HAVA. The EAC has made it clear, that a stricter voter eligibility requirement cannot be read to bar an individual’s right to a provisional ballot. However, could a stricter requirement regarding provisional voting serve to limit access to such ballots? No. A stricter State requirement for provisional voting would be a standard that enhances a person’s access to a provisional ballot. A state may not impose an identification requirement that would limit a potential voter’s access to and submission of a provisional ballot. However, such requirements (when coupled with a state’s provisional ballot procedures) may prevent a provisional ballot from being counted.
OVERVIEW OF RECOMMENDATIONS FOR SUCCESSFUL PRACTICES

The wide variation in the implementation of provisional voting among and particularly within states suggests that EAC can help states strengthen their processes. Research-based recommendations for best, or at least better, practices based on the experience gained in the 2004 election can be useful in states' efforts to achieve greater consistency in the administration of provisional voting.

Self-evaluation of Provisional Voting - 4 Key Questions

The first step to achieving greater consistency within each state is to think about provisional voting systematically. As legislators, election officials, and citizens in the states prepare for the 2006 election, they should ask themselves these questions about their provisional voting systems.

1. Does the provisional voting system distribute, collect, record, and tally provisional ballots with sufficient accuracy to be seen as procedurally legitimate by both supporters and opponents of the winning candidate? Does the tally include all votes cast by properly registered voters who correctly completed the steps required?
2. Is the provisional voting system sufficiently robust to perform well under the pressure of a close election when ballot evaluation will be under scrutiny and litigation looms?
3. Do the procedural requirements of the system permit cost-efficient operation? Are the administrative demands of the system reasonably related to the staff and other resource requirements available?
4. How great is the variation in the use of provisional voting in counties or equivalent levels of voting jurisdiction within the state? Is the variation great enough to cause concern that the system may not be administered uniformly across the state?

If the answers to these questions leave room for doubt about the effectiveness of the system or some of its parts, the EAC's recommendation of sound practices should provide the starting point for a state's effort to improve its provisional voting system.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS FOR Sound PRACTICES

State efforts to improve the provisional voting process have been underway since the 2004 election. By recommending best practices, the EAC will offer informed advice while respecting diversity among the states.

Take a Quality-improvement approach

Defining what constitutes a successful provisional voting system is difficult. Defining quality requires a broad perspective about how well the system works, how open it is to error recognition and correction, and how well provisional voting processes are connected to the registration and voter identification regimes. A first step is for states to recognize that improving quality begins with seeing the provisional voting process as a system and taking a systems approach to regular evaluation through standardized metrics with explicit goals for performance. EAC can facilitate action by the states by recommending as a best practice that:

- Each state collect data systematically on the provisional voting process to permit evaluation of its voting system and assess changes from one election to the next. The data collected should include: provisional votes cast and counted by county; reasons why provisional ballots were not counted; measures of variance among jurisdictions, and time required to evaluate ballots by jurisdiction.

Emphasize the importance of clarity

Above all else, the EAC should emphasize the importance of clarity in the rules by which each state governs provisional voting. As state legislators and election officials prepare for the 2006 election, answers to the questions listed in the recommendations section of this report could be helpful. Among those questions are:
eional voting system distribute, collect, record, and tally provisional ticient accuracy to be seen as procedurally legitimate by both supporters of the winning candidate?
ral requirements of the system permit cost-efficient operation?
variation in the use of provisional voting in counties or equivalent levels of ion within the state? Is the variation great enough to cause concern that the be administered uniformly across the state?
\[\text{suggest areas for action}\]

While the best practice might be for poll workers to direct the voter to correct precinct poll workers' advice is not always correct, and the voter should be protected against ministerial error.

- Officials should follow a written procedure, and perhaps a checklist, to identify the reason why a provisional ballot is rejected. Colorado's election rules offer particularly clear guidance to the official evaluating a provisional ballot.

In verifying provisional ballots, the time by which election officials must make their eligibility determinations is particularly important in presidential elections because of the need to certify electors to the Electoral College. Our research did not identify an optimum division of the five weeks available.

- The best practice here is for states to consider the issue and make a careful decision about how to complete all steps in the evaluation of ballots and challenges to those determinations within the five weeks available.

After the election, timely information to voters about the disposition of their provisional ballot can enable voters to determine if they are registered for future elections and, if not, what they need to do to become registered.

- Best practice for the states is to establish mechanisms to ensure that voters casting provisional ballots are informed whether they are now registered for future elections and, if not, what they need to do to become registered.

Final observation

The detailed examination of each stage in the provisional voting process can lay the foundation each state needs to improve its system. Efforts to improve provisional voting may be most effective as part of a broader effort by state and local election officials to strengthen their systems. Collecting and analyzing data about those systems will enable states to identify which aspects of the registration and electoral system are most important in shunting voters into the provisional ballot process. Responsible officials can then look to their registration system, identification requirements or poll worker training as ways to reduce the need for voters to cast their ballots provisionally.
Best Practices For Each Step In The Process
We examined each step of the provisional voting process to identify specific areas where the states should focus their attention to reduce the inconsistencies noted in our analysis.
We offer recommendations in each area appropriate to the responsibilities that HAVA assigns the EAC for the proper functioning of the provisional voting process.

The Importance of Clarity
The EAC should emphasize above all else the importance of clarity in the rules governing every stage of provisional voting. As the Century Foundation's recent report observed, "Close elections increasingly may be settled in part by the evaluating and counting of provisional ballots ... To avoid post election disputes over provisional ballots-disputes that will diminish public confidence in the accuracy and legitimacy of the result-- well in advance of the election, states should establish, announce, and publicize clear statewide standards for every aspect of the provisional ballot process, from who is entitled to receive a provisional ballot to which ones are counted."26

Litigation surrounding the 2004 election resulted in decisions that, if reflected in state statutes or regulations and disseminated in effective training for poll workers, can increase the clarity of provisional ballot procedures, increase predictability, and bolster confidence in the system. By taking the following steps, states can incorporate those court rulings into their procedures.

- Promulgate, ideally by legislation, clear standards for evaluating provisional ballots, and provide training for the officials who will apply those standards. For example, in Washington State, the court determined that an election official's failure in evaluating ballots to do a complete check against all signature records is an error serious enough to warrant re-canvassing.27 Clear direction by regulation or statute on what records to use in evaluating ballots could have saved precious time and effort and increased the reliability of the provisional voting system.

- States should provide standard information resources for the training of poll workers by local jurisdictions. Training materials might include, for example, maps or databases with instruction on how to locate polling places for potential voters who show up at the wrong place. Usable and useful information in the hands of poll workers can protect voters from being penalized by ministerial errors at the polling place.

- State training materials provided to local jurisdictions should make clear that the only permissible requirement to obtain a provisional ballot is an affirmation that the voter is registered in the jurisdiction and eligible to vote in an election for federal office. 29 Recent legislation in Arizona indicates that recommendations should emphasize HAVA's requirement that persons appearing at the polling place claiming to be registered voters cannot be denied a ballot because they do not have identification with them. Poll

26 The Century Foundation, Balancing Access and Integrity, Report of the Working 27 See Washington State Republican Party v. King County Division of Records, 103 P3d While rejecting the notion that all ballots cast in the wrong precinct should be counted, the court ruled that provisional votes cast in the wrong precinct should be thrown out provided that the voter had been directed to the correct precinct. This meant that provisional votes cast in the wrong precinct (and even the wrong polling place) would count if there were no evidence that the voter had been directed to a different polling place. The court placed a duty upon election officials to make sure the voters were in the correct locations. Note that this question would not arise in a state that counted ballots cast in the wrong polling place but within the correct county.
On September 13, 2005 the U.S. Election Assistance Commission issued an advisory (2005-006) and, after consideration of the matter EAC concluded that Section 302 of HAVA creates a voter right. Specifically, the section creates the right for a potential voter to utilize a provisional ballot in the event his or her name does not appear on the registration list or the voter's eligibility is challenged by an election official. While States may create voter identification standards that exceed those laid out in HAVA and effect whether a provisional ballot is counted, States may not take action that limits a voter's right to receive and submit a provisional ballot.

The right to cast a provisional ballot is created in Section 302 of HAVA. Pursuant to HAVA, when an individual declares that he or she is a registered and eligible voter in a federal election, that individual "shall be permitted to cast a provisional ballot" if (1) their name does not appear on the official list of eligible voters or (2) "an election official asserts that the individual is not eligible to vote." (Section 302(a)). This right to receive a provisional ballot is contingent upon only one thing (per Section 302(a)(2)), the individual’s execution of a written affirmation that he or she is both a registered and eligible voter for the election at issue.¹

In simplest terms, provisional voting represents the right of an individual (whose eligibility to vote has been challenged), to reserve their right to vote and postpone the voter eligibility determination to a time when more perfect or complete information may be provided. A provisional ballot does not represent a different way to vote, nor does it serve as a bypass to State laws governing voter eligibility. Rather, it is designed to prevent an individual from losing his or her right to vote due to the fact that a poll worker did not have all the information available or needed to accurately assess voter eligibility. Thus, based upon the plain language of Section 302(a) of HAVA, a challenge to an individual’s eligibility to vote (such as a challenge based upon identification requirements) cannot serve as a bar to the receipt of a provisional ballot, because it is the election official’s challenge that triggers the provisional ballot procedure in the first place. To hold otherwise would defeat the purpose of provisional voting. In the end, to understand this concept one must understand the differences between traditional and provisional ballots.

The nature and procedures associated with a provisional ballot are wholly distinct from those of a traditional ballot. Because of this fact, the two processes must be treated differently. While voter identification requirements may serve as a bar to the casting of a traditional ballot, they may not prevent the submission of a provisional ballot.

First, the nature and purpose of traditional and provisional ballots are essentially different. The purpose of a traditional ballot is to allow a confirmed, eligible voter to cast a vote. The purpose of a provisional ballot is to allow individuals whose voter eligibility is challenged to reserve the right to vote by memorializing both their intent to vote and their proposed vote. This is evident by the HAVA processes discussed above. The bottom line is that the casting of a proper, traditional ballot constitutes a vote, while the casting or submission of a provisional ballot does not. A traditional ballot is cast only after voter eligibility has been determined by the State. Hence, the moment it is cast, it becomes an individual's vote. On the other hand, the submission or casting of a provisional ballot is not a vote. Rather, it is a claim that the potential voter who submitted it has the right to vote and reserves that right.

This goes to the very heart of provisional voting. If provisional voting is a right triggered by an election official's determination that an individual has not met a voter eligibility requirement, how can such a requirement also serve as a bar to that right? The concept of provisional voting works only if the right is always available when the application of voter eligibility requirements is in question.

Section 303(b)(2)(B) of HAVA, entitled Fail-Safe Voting, provides that when a first-time voter who registered by mail is required by HAVA Section 303(b) to show identification, that person must be given a provisional ballot if he or she fails to provide such identification at the polling place. This section is important as it clarifies Congressional intent regarding how provisional voting should function.

The Fail-Safe Voting provision of Section 303(b)(2)(B) grants clear insight into how provisional voting should be implemented. While Section 303(b) deals with a specific subset of voters (first-time voters who registered by mail), its application of Section 302(a) supports the concept that a provisional ballot must be given to a voter who is determined (at the polling place) not to meet voter identification requirements. Congress saw no difference between an individual's failure to meet the voter identification requirements it issued in Section 303(b) and the failure to meet eligibility requirements which trigger provisional voting under Section 302. Section 303(b) makes it clear that Congress did not intend voter identification requirements to limit access to provisional voting. Instead, Congress viewed provisional voting as a right, or more specifically, as a fail-safe. The EAC strongly believes that HAVA provisions must be interpreted to bring about consistent and evenly applied results. In this case, if individuals who fail to meet Federal identification standards have the right to a provisional ballot, so must individuals who fail to meet similar State standards.

First, HAVA notes in Section 304 that while States may create standards that are stricter than those established under HAVA, this authority is limited to the extent "such State requirements are not inconsistent with the Federal requirements under [HAVA]." Clearly, provisional voting is a requirement under HAVA. Section 302(a) notes that qualified individuals "shall be permitted to cast a provisional ballot." (Emphasis added). In this way, States may not create standards that are inconsistent or interfere with the provisional voting mandate.

States' have the right to impose stricter requirements than those laid out in HAVA. The EAC has already made it clear, above, that a stricter voter eligibility requirement cannot be read to bar an individual's right to a provisional ballot. However, could a stricter requirement regarding provisional voting serve to limit access to such ballots? No. A stricter State requirement for provisional voting would be a standard that enhances a person's access to a provisional ballot. A state may not impose an identification requirement that would limit a potential voter's access to and submission of a provisional ballot. However, such requirements (when coupled with a state's provisional ballot procedures) may prevent a provisional ballot from being counted.
Karen - I am attaching a spreadsheet providing the information you have requested (Attachment 1), but I want to highlight a few points which may not be immediately self-evident.

First, the original budget (Attachment 2) we submitted to the EAC, dated March 22nd, did not itemize personnel expenses by each person. In addition, when we actually began work two months after submitting that budget, we decided to reallocate more time to people within Eagleton and hire fewer outside hourlies.

Second, in the figures I sent you in late December we tried to account for all the expenses and projections but overlooked a few things including neglecting to include the honoraria for our peer review team. Hence, the figures we’re now sending are different than what I sent in December.

Lastly, we originally discussed a no-cost extension through February, but since we don’t yet have the EAC comments on our draft Provisional Voting material nor an estimate of when they are likely to be ready, I think it is prudent to extend the no-cost extension through March 31st. We would still like to conclude by the end of February, but if you can approve the extension for another month we could avoid going through this process again if everything is not complete six weeks from now.

It is my understanding that Rutgers will soon be sending our December invoice. At this time, I would also like to request that we combine January and February an invoice the EAC once for that time period.

As you can see, we are currently projecting an ending balance of approximately $10,000. If additional expenses are incurred beyond what is currently projected, we’re confident they will not exceed the original budget of $560,002.

Thanks and I look forward to hearing from you.

Karen - At this time, we anticipate reallocating funds primarily from the public hearings line item and spending approximately $35,500 more than originally budgeted on personnel, $23,250 more on the subcontract with Ohio State and $20,250 more on consultants. There are other additional variances but they are not significant (e.g. less on honoraria, less on travel, and more on general operations such as phone expenses). Let me know if you need additional detail or information.

Extension Justification.doc
Karen,

Allow me to provide you some guidance (I am just that kind of guy).

First, go to FAR Part 43 (it is short and provides you an outline of the process. Given the lack of FAR clauses in the original contract, you will want to perform a bilateral modification (must be agreed to and signed by both parties). This is the most conservative way to proceed. You can find the FAR on-line.

You will use Standard Form 30 (you will find it in the FAR). I have a hard copy with some notes on it that I will provide you. It will have to be signed by both parties. The CO will have to sign for the EAC (chair?)

The form will require you to describe the modification. There are instructions to guide you.

I also recommend a memo for record signed by you and the chair (I concur). Memorializing some facts and findings. The memo should address:

- background regarding the action, a description of the action and authority (FAR 43.103 (a)(3)).
- Clearly identify the benefit this action provides the government.
- Notes/explains (presumably) that this action is within the scope of the original agreement.
- State (presumably) that there is no cost for the modification.
- recommend modification
- place document in file.

Folks-

I'm not certain what process must be followed in order for a contractor to request a no-cost extension.

Eagleton Institute is requesting one to extend their contract beyond the December 31 deadline. It's my understanding that EAC did one for the National Academy of Sciences, although I wasn't a part of that process and therefore not aware of how that one was handled.
Thanks for your guidance.

EAC contract staff indicate that the reallocation you propose can occur and that all other such reallocations that are made from your project budget for this contract budget can be done at your own discretion.

From a contractual standpoint, EAC's only concern is that Eagleton is able to accomplish all of the activities and provide all of the deliverables that have been set forth in your contract.

As we discussed on Tuesday morning in the teleconference, we would like to reallocate within the current budget $9,500 to the survey of local election officials. This will raise the budget for the survey to $24,500 from $15,000.

The additional funding will permit us to double the sample of local election officials from 200 to 400. The larger sample will allow more detailed comparisons between the experience of local election officials in states that offered some form of provisional ballot before HAVA and those that did not. This comparison is a topic of special interest identified in the contract.

The increase of $9,500 is based on an estimate made by SRBI, the contractor that will actually administer the interviews. I can furnish you with a copy of the estimate if you like. We believe the additional funds will improve significantly our ability to provide relevant analysis to EAC on this important issue.

If we release every single thing that comes in the door every contractor will have a platform to shop their "research" as they see fit at taxpayers expense. Further, I see no need for a Commission, there would only be a need for a research director to dole out government contracts. I am amazed that a "respected" academic institution would behave in this manner.

Subject: FYI--Letter from Serrano

All,

Today we received a faxed copy of a letter signed by Jose Serrano as Chair of the Financial Services and General Government Appropriations Subcommittee. The Chairman urges the EAC to publicly release the full draft version of the Provisional Voting report prepared by Eagleton. The letter states that the Congressman was pleased with our decision to engage our Inspector General and to release the draft version of the Voter ID study (though he was disappointed that we did not adopt it).

Chairman stated in his letter that if we do not decide to release the draft report, he would like an update regarding the study's status, time line for release and a statement regarding why the EAC would deviate from the "precedent" it has now set in releasing draft studies.

It is my understanding that this report was made public at the Board of Advisor and Standards Board meetings in May 2006. I do not know if any changes were made to the document after that time. Perhaps Karen can provide additional information regarding this concern. It is also my understanding that this document has been released to third parties upon request under FOIA. Additionally, I believe a best practices document was created by the EAC based on the research. That document is on our website. Also, Stephanie informed me (and Karen confirmed) that the study is posted on Eagleton's website.

A copy of Serrano's letter is attached.

Karen,
June 15, 2006

Mr. John Weingart, Associate Director
Eagleton Institute of Politics
Rutgers University
191 Ryders Lane
New Brunswick NJ 08901-8557

Dear Mr. Weingart:

During a recent briefing by staff, the EAC discussed and reviewed possible next steps with the provisional voting and voter identification studies as well as the Eagleton contract which is scheduled to conclude on June 30, 2006.

We were in agreement that Eagleton's work on the EAC contract should conclude, as scheduled, by June 30, 2006. In preparation for this conclusion, the EAC requests that the comments and suggestions which were noted during the EAC's recent Board of Advisors and Standards Boards meeting (and were described in Mr. O'Neil's June 8, 2006 letter to Chairman DeGregorio) be included in the final draft report on provisional voting which Eagleton will deliver to the EAC on or about June 30, 2006. The Commissioners have determined that they will take this final draft report and, from it, may develop guidance and best practice recommendations that will be presented to the Board of Advisors and Standards Boards for further review.

The EAC Commissioners have also reviewed and considered next steps with the voter identification draft report which Eagleton has prepared. While the final disposition of the results and findings of this study, on the part of the EAC, are still unclear, the Commissioners have asked that the final draft report of this study also be prepared and submitted to the EAC not later than June 30, 2006.

We look forward to receiving these reports. On behalf of the EAC thank you for the considerable time and energy which the Eagleton/Moritz team has devoted to these critical election issues.

Sincerely,

Thomas R. Wilkey
I have not heard from Tom Wilkey. If he signed the letter you drafted for him last Tuesday, could you email me a copy while we await the arrival of the hard copy by mail. I probably don't need to remind you that we have only 11 days left on this contract and need to know how we should move ahead to complete it.

Karen,

Could you please give me your reading of the status of a response to our letter last week that raised some issues for resolution by the Commission on the completion of our work during the final few weeks of the contract period. The Team needs to know how to proceed during the remaining 2 weeks of the project.

Thanks,
Karen,

Karen - We are requesting a no-cost extension on the EAC contract to the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University to have the contract's concluding date move from March 31, 2006 to June 30, 2006. As I indicated earlier, it would be very helpful if we could receive approval of this request no later than April 28th. This extension is necessary to enable the following activities:

1. The EAC has informed us that it will assemble a panel of researchers the week of May 8th to review the Eagleton/Moritz draft background report on Voter Identification. The EAC wishes to supplement the review of this draft already conducted by the Peer Review Group called for in the contract. The Eagleton/Moritz research team, as well as at least some of the Peer Review Group will participate in the conference call or meeting of the EAC's reviewers;

2. Eagleton/Moritz will revise the draft Voter Identification report based upon comments made by the two sets of reviewers, and distribute the revised report to the EAC and its Advisory Board in mid-May.

3. Eagleton/Moritz will present its draft reports on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification to the EAC Advisory Board at its May 25th meeting in Washington, D.C.;

4. Eagleton/Moritz will revise both draft reports to take into account comments made by the EAC Advisory Board, and submit printed final reports to the EAC before June 23rd. Eagleton/Moritz will also prepare PowerPoint presentation for both reports.

5. Eagleton/Moritz will present both reports at the EAC public meeting in Washington, D.C. on June 23rd, thus concluding its work under this contract.

Please let me know if you need any additional information.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD

On May 24, 2005 the U.S. Election Assistance Commission awarded an eight month contract (December 30, 2005) in the amount of $560,002.00 to the Eagleton Institute of Politics (Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey) to provide research assistance to support development of guidelines on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification procedures.

On November 15, 2005, John Weingart, Associate Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics, requested via e-mail, a no-cost extension on this contract (E4014127). Mr. Weingart has requested an extension to complete the work of this contract to February 28, 2006.

In subsequent correspondence, Mr. Weingart notes the following as the reason for the request:

“The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October, voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting, based on Eagleton’s research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication..... The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report of that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid-January”.

He further notes:

“The total project budget is $560,002. As of October 31st, the EAC has been invoiced for $259,081.79; the balance remaining is $300,920.21. We anticipate that the project will be complete and the balance of funds fully expended by February 28, 2006. The final invoice for the contract will be submitted to the EAC within 75 days of the close of the project”.

Karen Lynn-Dyson, the EAC’s Contracting Officer Representative assigned to this contract has reviewed this request, the rationale and authority for it (FAR 43.103(a)(3)) and finds it to be appropriate. To-date the Eagleton Institute has consistently met its deadlines for major project deliverables and stayed within the project budget. To grant the Eagleton Institute a two month extension on this contract in order to obtain the necessary feedback on major documents it has produced will be within the best interests of the Election Assistance Commission, and thus, the federal government.

EAC’s Contracting Officer Representative finds that to grant the Eagleton Institute a no-cost extension for the modification of its contract with the EAC is within the scope of the original agreement and is recommending that this modification to the contract be made.

Karen,
I am assuming that there original proposal included an estimate for public hearing proposals and that they want to shift money from this expense to labor.

Thus I am assuming that you have determined that there will be no public hearing and therefore this shift is appropriate.

Are these assumption correct? Perhaps a quick explanation regarding this processes would be helpful.

Subject Re: Request for No-Cost Extension-corrected

Karen - At this time, we anticipate reallocating funds primarily from the public hearings line item and spending approximately $35,500 more than originally budgeted on personnel, $23,250 more on the subcontract with Ohio State and $20,250 more on consultants. There are other additional variances but they are not significant (e.g. less on honoraria, less on travel, and more on general operations such as phone expenses). Let me know if you need additional detail or information.

Thanks, John

Gavin -

Just spoke with John Weingart - he explains that it will be the same work and tasks (no new or additional products) and merely work that will now extend for an additional two months rather than ending December 31.

John -

I just had a more detailed conversation with our Deputy General Counsel about Eagleton's no-cost extension.

He indicates that we need a bit more information that will accompany the material we will send to the Commissioners for a vote (hopefully next week).

We need to know the number of labor hours, the labor costs and a brief description of the tasks to be performed by each of the staff who will be working on the EAC contract until its completion.

Since we have eliminated the public hearing (a major contract deliverable) it is unclear why staff labor hours and costs will continue at the same level and rate.

As always, thanks for your patience and prompt response.

Karen - Our request for a no-cost, reallocation of resources is based on (a) the fact that our personnel costs have already been higher than we anticipated and (b) the reality that keeping the project operating for at least nine months, instead of seven as planned, will require the participants to devote more time than anticipated. While we are not producing more product than originally promised, the time involved in our work continues to increase. Both Provisional Voting and Voter ID have proved to be very dynamic topics requiring us to continually monitor developments and update our data, analysis and evolving work products as we learn of new or revised information. As a result, despite the extension of the schedule, the staff and consultants on this project have had no "down" time. We anticipate this research, monitoring and revising to continue for the months added to the project, necessitating significantly more hours by all members of the project team than anticipated.

Our request asks for changes to three line items which I will address below on the assumption that the EAC response to our already-submitted Provisional Voting draft and to-be-submitted Voter ID draft will be sufficiently timely to enable us to complete our work on both topics by the end of February.

1. Eagleton Institute of Politics personnel: We originally budgeted $110,695 ($15,813 average per month) for Eagleton faculty, staff and graduate student assistants for the seven-month project from May 24,
2005-December 31, 2005. Our actual costs have been approximately $14,500 more than that. In addition, we are anticipating needing another $21,000 for personnel costs in January and February, calculated on the basis of 2/3 of the original monthly estimate. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $110,695 to approximately $146,000.

2. Consultant Services: We originally budgeted $79,500 ($11,357 average per month) for consultant services which we have used to engage Tom O’Neill as the project manager. We anticipate no additional cost for the original contract period of May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005, but do anticipate needing his services during January and February at a slightly reduced rate of $10,125 per month or $20,250 total additional. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $79,500 to $99,750.

3. Moritz School of Law: We originally budgeted $84,744 ($12,106 average per month) for staff and overhead for the May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005 period. We anticipate needing an additional $23,171 ($11,585 average per month) to support their time on this project in January and February. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $84,744 to $107,915.

With these revisions, approximately $22,000 of the EAC contract award to Eagleton would remain not yet allocated, primarily because the cost for the public hearings would have incurred Rutgers University overhead whereas the additional expenditures for consultants and the subcontract with Moritz do not.

I hope this provides you the information you need. While Rutgers is shutting down until January 3rd, I will be checking email at least every day or two.

Happy New Year, John-

Connie needs to provide the breakdown of staff costs starting with the November invoice which was submitted. She will need to re-submit this invoice.

For the purposes of the no-cost extension document I need the information from January forward.

I'm told that EAC senior management will be turning their attention to the Provisional Voting Best Practices document this week.

To clarify your phone message, do you need us to provide the number of hours for each staff person and consultant going forward from January 1st onward or going back to the start of the project?

Thanks.

Attached please find a copy of a portion of the memo that is part of the paperwork related to the no-cost extension.

While I am the Contracting Officer Representative on this project, I never received your project's cost proposal, and am unable to locate a copy. Otherwise, I would have completed more of the chart.

Please, take a moment to fill in the information on the attached chart, and, if you could, have one of the Eagleton staff send me the cost proposal which originally accompanied the technical proposal.

Thanks so much.

As we speak- I'm writing up the final memo for the Chairman's signature. Things got a bit complicated since your original proposal did not provide labor hours and costs for the project staff.

Am working through this issue, however. Will keep you posted.
Commissioner Hillman has asked a follow-up question regarding the sharing of EAC’s information, on the Eagleton study on Voter ID requirements, with Tom Hicks.

I have given Sheila the following appendices for possible distribution to Tom Hicks:

1. Summary of Voter ID Requirements by State
2. Court Decisions and Literature on Voter Identification and Related Issues Court decisions
3. Annotated bibliography on Voter Identification Issues

I have not given Sheila, for distribution, these Appendices or parts of the report:

1. Analysis of Effects of Voter ID Requirements on Turnout
2. The Executive Summary and Recommendations
3. Summary of Research
4. State Statutes and Regulations Affecting Voter Identification (electronic version only)

You'll also recall that I'm awaiting Tom's approval to send to Mike McDonald, various appendices from the Eagleton Provisional Voting report

MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD

On May 24, 2005 the U.S. Election Assistance Commission awarded an eight month contract (December 30, 2005) in the amount of $560,002.00 to the Eagleton Institute of Politics (Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey) to provide research assistance to support development of guidelines on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification procedures.

On November 15, 2005, John Weingart, Associate Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics, requested via e-mail, a no-cost extension on this contract (E4014127). Mr. Weingart has requested an extension to complete the work of this contract to February 28, 2006.

In subsequent correspondence, Mr. Weingart notes the following as the reason for the request:

"The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October, voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting, based on Eagleton's research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication.... The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report of that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid-January".

He further notes:

"If EAC does not object, funds originally allocated for the hearings would be available for transfer to support the additional staff and consultant time necessary to complete the work....

"The total project budget is $560,002. As of October 31st, the EAC has been invoiced for $259,081.79; the balance remaining is $300,920.21. We anticipate that the project will be complete and the balance of funds fully expended by February 28, 2006. The final invoice for the contract will be submitted to the EAC within 75 days of the close of the project".
Karen Lynn-Dyson, the EAC’s Contracting Officer Representative assigned to this contract has reviewed this request, the rationale and authority for it (FAR 43.103(a)(3)) and finds it to be appropriate. To-date the Eagleton Institute has consistently met its deadlines for major project deliverables and stayed within the project budget. To grant the Eagleton Institute a two month extension on this contract in order to obtain the necessary feedback on major documents it has produced will be within the best interests of the Election Assistance Commission, and thus, the federal government.

EAC’s Contracting Officer Representative finds that to grant the Eagleton Institute a no-cost extension for the modification of its contract with the EAC is within the scope of the original agreement and is recommending that this modification to the contract be made.

Karen - I am writing to summarize our phone conversation initiated by me yesterday in response to receipt of Tom Wilkey's June 29th letter. To close out the contract, we will do the following:

1. Prepare separate monthly reports for April, May and June which each briefly summarize our activities under the contract during that month. These reports, which will not include financial information, will be sent to you by email no later than July 24th.

2. Submit a final invoice for the project no later than September 16th, which is 75 days from the close of the contract rather than the 30 days specified in the June 29th letter. I am attaching our previously-submitted "December 1, 2005 Request for a No-Cost Extension" which noted, at the bottom of page 1, the need for a 75-day closeout period.

3. In my January 13, 2006 letter regarding our No-Cost Extension through February 28th (also attached), I had indicated that we expected to have a closing balance of approximately $10,000. As we discussed yesterday, you appreciate that, with the subsequent No-Cost Extension through June 30th, we have spent the entire contract amount, and you expect us to submit invoices accordingly that will document our use of all remaining funds from the $560,002 contract award.

Please let me know if I have left out any remaining tasks or you have a different interpretation of them. I trust you have by now received all our final work products that were FedExed to you late last week.

Thanks,

John

INTRODUCTION

This report summarizes our progress from May 1, 2006 through May 31, 2006. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks and progress made.

This Monthly Progress Report is divided into 3 sections: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, and Project Management. Each section references specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract. The Financial Report will be sent separately by the Rutgers Division of Grant and Contract Accounting. Please direct questions or comments about this report to john.weingart@rutgers.edu or by telephone at (732) 932-9384, ext. 290.

PROVISIONAL VOTING

We prepared and delivered a briefing on provisional voting to EAC Advisory Boards on May 23 and 24. We continued revising the provisional voting analysis based on comments made by the Advisory Boards.

VOTER IDENTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

We continued to review and revise the voter identification requirement analysis. We also completed a new statistical analysis in response to Peer Review Group comments.

PROJECT MANAGEMENT

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and an internal website for easy access to drafts and reports.
INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law is being merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding Provisional Voting and voter identification.

Projections: The entire project team continues to use the Information System which contains the above referenced research, in working toward the preparation for our final reports to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: All project team members have signed on to the Intranet site, and regularly post drafts, completed materials and spreadsheets online for internal review. The Intranet facilitates the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. The contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (973) 353-6466, dbornhe@rutgers.edu. A combined final invoice will be submitted by September 15, 2006.
Here, I hope, is the April Progress Report that I gather was not attached to my previous email. I will send the May report shortly. - John

PROVISIONAL VOTING

We completed preparing a briefing on Provisional Voting for presentation to EAC on April 3. Comments made by the Peer Review Group were taken into account in the briefing development.

VOTER IDENTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

We briefed the EAC in Washington on April 3 regarding our Provisional Voting report and the analysis of Voter Identification Requirements. Subsequent to this briefing and to a meeting with Peer Review Group, we have made revisions to the Voter Identification analysis.

This Monthly Progress Report is divided into 3 sections: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, and Project Management. Each section references specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract. The Financial Report will be sent separately by the Rutgers Division of Grant and Contract Accounting. Please direct questions or comments about this report to john.weingart@rutgers.edu or by telephone at

Revision of Provisional Voting report continued. We participated in a teleconference on June 6 with EAC on Provisional Voting and Voter ID issues. The final Provisional Voting report was completed. It was submitted to EAC with appendices and supplementary materials on June 28, 2006. This concluded our contract with EAC.

VOTER IDENTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

We completed the final Voter ID report and submitted it to EAC with appendices and supplementary materials on June 28, 2006. This was our final work product required under our contract with the EAC.

PROJECT MANAGEMENT

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

As we have completed and submitted our final work products to the EAC, the project team has continued to communicate via frequent conference calls and group emails.
INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law was merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which includes a compendium of case law and statutes regarding Provisional Voting and voter identification.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. The contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, A combined final invoice will be submitted by September 15, 2006.
Guess we better agree on the contents of the letter to Eagleton SOON

Subject Data request from provisional ballot report

Tom and Adam,

Attached are two papers from Rutgers that appear to use data drawn from the EAC's grant to Rutgers and Ohio State for reports on provisional balloting (from a paper presented at the Midwest Political Science Association Conference in April) and voter identification (from a paper to be presented at the upcoming American Political Science Association Conference this week). My check of the EAC's website this morning shows that these EAC commissioned reports have not been publicly released.

My requests for the basic legal data contained in these reports' appendices have been refused. It is unfair that Rutgers researchers are allowed to publish scholarly work from this data while it is being held-by the EAC. When I worked on the Election Day Survey; at the EAC's direction, Kim Brace and I did not publish or make these data publicly available until our report was publicly released. Either the same standard must apply to all persons working under EAC grants or, if a new policy is in place, I would request again that these data be released to me for my research on provisional balloting. If not, it gives the appearance and has the effect that the data are being withheld so that Rutgers scholars can publish their EAC subsidized research in scholarly outlets before others like myself have a chance to do so.

Best regards,

-Mike

Hincheny Statement on U.S. Election Assistance Commission's Release of Report on Voter Identification Issues

Washington, DC - Congressman Maurice Hincheny (D-NY) today released the following report in response to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission's (EAC) release of a report on voter identification issues that was submitted to them by Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey, through its Eagleton Institute of Politics, and Ohio State University's Moritz College of Law. Hincheny directly requested the release of the report when EAC Chairwoman Donetta Davidson appeared earlier this month before the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Financial Services, of which the congressman is a member. Davidson told Hincheny at the hearing that she would provide the subcommittee with the report that is being released to the public today. Hincheny also requested the release of a separate report on voter fraud and intimidation. The Help America Vote Act (HAVA) requires the EAC to conduct and make available to the public studies regarding certain voting issues.

"I am very pleased that following Chairwoman Davidson's appearances before Congress the EAC decided to do the right thing and make public the Eagleton Institute of Politics study on voter identification issues. I hope that this decision signals a new day of transparency and sets a precedent for all future and previous studies and reports submitted to the EAC.

"When Chairwoman Davidson came before our subcommittee a few weeks ago, I also requested that the EAC make public another report about voter fraud and voter intimidation submitted to them by two outside consultants. It is my hope they will release this report to the public as well. The EAC has the responsibility to keep the public informed on any findings it has with regards to voter fraud, intimidation, and any other electoral issues.

"As we work to increase voter turnout and make our democracy function more effectively, it is imperative that potential voters are assured that they will be able to cast their votes fairly and in an environment free of intimidation. To achieve that goal, the EAC must be open with the information it receives in order to help identify voting problems and make recommendations on fixing them."
Dear all,

I wonder how many more requests like this are waiting in the wings? Is there any way we can anticipate these requests? How many reports are completed and outstanding? May I request a briefing?

Thanks.

Subject: FYI--Letter from Serrano

All,

Today we received a faxed copy of a letter signed by Jose Serrano as Chair of the Financial Services and General Government Appropriations Subcommittee. The Chairman urges the EAC to publicly release the full draft version of the Provisional Voting report prepared by Eagleton. The letter states that the Congressman was pleased with our decision to engage our Inspector General and to release the draft version of the Voter ID study (though he was disappointed that we did not adopt it).

Chairman stated in his letter that if we do not decide to release the draft report, he would like an update regarding the study’s status, time line for release and a statement regarding why the EAC would deviate from the “precedent” it has now set in releasing draft studies.

It is my understanding that this report was made public at the Board of Advisor and Standards Board meetings in May 2006. I do not know if any changes were made to the document after that time. Perhaps Karen can provide additional information regarding this concern. It is also my understanding that this document has been released to third parties upon request under FOIA. Additionally, I believe a best practices document was created by the EAC based on the research. That document is on our website. Also, Stephanie informed me (and Karen confirmed) that the study is posted on Eagleton’s website.

A copy of Serrano’s letter is attached.

Hi,

I'm trying to access the conference call but the system says it's full. I will keep trying for a few minutes.

Perhaps this is a problem because I was given two different times for conference calls?

I am currently at [censored] and [censored] if anyone is able to respond.

That's fine--but I spoke to Aletha a couple hours ago and she said it was at 11.
I will go with 11:30 unless I hear otherwise.

VoterIDAnalysis VerCRev0504.doc
Karen,

Attached is Tim Vercellotti's Voter ID analysis revised to use Citizen Voting Age population as the base for turnout calculations and to take account of comments or issues raised by the EAC and our Peer Review Group. This draft is for distribution to the reviewers who will meet by teleconference on May 11, at, we understand, 11:30 a.m.

You are receiving this at the same time that it is being distributed to the Eagleton-Moritz team so that the new reviewers will have a week to prepare for our conversation on the 11th. Early next week you will receive a revised summary paper on Voter ID that incorporates the new data and findings in Tim's revised analysis. That too will be for distribution to the new reviewers.

Good afternoon everyone,

This is to inform you of a time set-up for the conference call on May 11, 2006 regarding Eagleton Institute/Voter Identification Research Project: it will be at 11:30 am, if everyone is available for this time then its a go, if not please contact me at your earliest convenience.

I just got your phone message. I will still do the review, but I should note that I won't be able to do a full 90 minute phone call on the 11th -- perhaps we could schedule 30 minutes or so for me to be on the phone call.

Dr. Berinsky-

On behalf of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), thank you in advance for agreeing to assist us with the review of research conducted by the Eagleton Institute of Politics on voter identification. By Friday, May 5, 2006, you will receive, in electronic form, the research paper and relevant data analysis which supports the paper's findings. Through this independent review by a small group of experts familiar with elections data and research we are seeking feedback on:

- The research methodology which was used to support the paper's conclusions
- The specific statistical applications which were used to analyze the data and arrive at various conclusions

If there are alternate methodological and statistical approaches to analyzing the data on voter identification, and if there is other data on voter identification that you think should have been included in the analysis, please be certain to note this in your comments.

On May 11, 2006 EAC will conduct a 60-90 minute phone call with key Eagleton Institute staff responsible for the research, members of Eagleton's peer review group and the EAC-identified reviewers who have been asked to consider the research. Through this dialogue EAC hopes to gather varying perspectives and insights on the research strategies and methods that were employed by Eagleton. As a result of this conversation, EAC anticipates that some revisions will be made to the Eagleton research paper. This paper is scheduled to be presented to EAC's Board of Advisors and Standards Boards in late May.

While we are unable to offer financial compensation for your review of this research we greatly appreciate your willingness to assist us with this important task. We believe that the research findings we will provide on voter identification are important and will most certainly be enhanced by your insights and expertise.

Hi -- nice to meet you in person, finally!

And thanks for inviting me to your gathering, I enjoyed it and hope I was helpful. Of course, any time you want anything, you do know where to track me down.

As to the potential reviewers of the Eagleton Voter ID study, here are my suggestions, in order:
Jonathan Nagler, New York University
Jan Leighley, University of Arizona
Ben Highton, UC-Davis
Adam Berinsky, MIT
Bernard Grofman, UC-Irvine

All have worked with the CPS turnout/registration data, and are very familiar with this research literature.

If these don't work, or you want more recommendations, let me know.

Karen,

Glad the paper arrived. Sorry it was a bit later than promised, but we reworked the statistical analysis on the basis of some insightful suggestions by the Peer Review Group...that took a few extra days (and nights). Looking back at my email to you, I realize the full statistical analysis was not attached as it should have been. It is appendix to the paper that will be of interest to those who want the details of our methodology. It is attached to this email.

I will be away, without access to email, until late Monday afternoon, but if you need to, you can reach me by cell phone at...

Karen,

I haven't received the fax about the potential new recruit for the Peer Review Group that you mentioned to me yesterday.

We have now completed the materials to be distributed to those attending the meeting at the EAC on September 6. You will receive a hard copy of all the material by express delivery tomorrow. The most important material to get to those attending in advance is the document with the answers to the 6 questions about topics of special interest on provisional voting outlined in our contract. The bulk of the material is backup to this summary report.

Tom O'Neill
Karen,

I have reviewed the Eagleton Peer Review Group recruitment list that you recently provided. Based on what I or Arnie can determine from the bio's provided or an Internet search, it appears that at least 4 of the 7 people who have said yes to be on the group seem to have a liberal perspective, or have had a history of working on that side of the political spectrum. I could only identify one as being a Republican, and a moderate one at that (Verniero). Mike Alvarez has conducted a lot of research into election issues and generally seems to do it in a neutral way. I have been unable to obtain a bio or background information on Tim Storey, who is not an academic. The only person that I could identify on their list as being conservative was Brad Clark, who has declined to participate.

Therefore, based on this information regarding the Peer Review Group, I am not satisfied that they will provide Eagleton with the balanced review that I thought they would receive from such a group. I would urge you to ask them to seek the input of more conservative academics so that whatever study we receive from them will have the benefit of a balanced review. I am going to have Arnie provide you with the background sheet on Professor Tim O'Rourke of Salisbury University in Maryland, whom they may want to consider for this panel. We have some calls into others who could suggest some conservative academics for this review panel.

Thanks.

Subject: Eagleton

In his note regarding the Eagleton contract, Hans has raised some of the same concerns I raised from the beginning of any discussions I had regarding this contract with our staff, and at our first formal meeting with Eagleton. In reviewing their work product from time to time, I continue to have concerns about a lack of balanced input and have repeatedly voiced them with staff and with Eagleton. I did this when the initial peer review group was proposed and again during their presentation at our meeting in Pasadena (the outreach slide in their public presentation showed outreach to seven groups, of which only one could be considered conservative-leaning). Now, as I have just had the opportunity to read their July progress report, it appears that Eagleton seems to be going into a larger analysis of the voter fraud issue than was authorized in the contract. My suspicion is that Dan Tokaji is injecting his views into this to dismiss or diminish the concerns some people may have about voter fraud. I could be wrong, but his previous writings lead me to believe otherwise.

I only found one mention of voter fraud in the contract with Eagleton. It is in Section 3.5 regarding provisional voting, where it discusses "minimizing opportunity for voter fraud." Yet, on page 4 of the July progress report from Eagleton, in describing their work plan for the next month it states: "we will expand upon vote fraud research and examine further the relationship between instances of vote fraud and ensuing election reforms." This clearly seems to be going beyond the mandate we gave them as I thought they were going to be looking at voter fraud relating to provisional voting (as the contract calls for), not voter fraud as it relates to election reforms. While voter fraud was never mentioned in the contract regarding the voter ID issue, page 5 of their July report indicates that their narratives "will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud." In addition to this, page 6 describes a look into the "relationship between voter ID regime and vote fraud."

Voter fraud is clearly an issue that is perceived differently from the Right and from the Left. I have struggled with determining what a clear definition of voter fraud is myself, and therefore want to obtain various perspectives and good analysis on this issue before I formulate a solid conclusion in my mind. It has been my understanding all along that the whole voter fraud/voter intimidation issue is going to studied by the EAC using a balanced group of consultants—not Eagleton and Moritz, who are likely to focus on just on the number of prosecutions of voter fraud, rather than the complaints made or the fact that many election officials are frustrated that some prosecutors don't take their complaints about voter fraud seriously. I am not convinced at this point that we will get a balanced and objective study from Eagleton/Moritz on voter fraud. I am puzzled on why they seem to be expending a significant portion of their time on this and would want to know if we somehow authorized them to do more research into the voter fraud issue.

Group "were not clear or timely." I would like to know what this refers to. Also, I may have missed it, but I do not recall seeing the final list of who is serving as the Peer Review group.

The August 15th copy of the July report that I received from Karen did not include the attachment of the financial report of expenses incurred. I would like to see that attachment.

Outside of our NIST work, this contract represents our largest single outside expenditure of our operational funds. Any single expenditure of $500,000+ needs to be closely monitored. I, for one, am not going to sign off on any report that appears to have been written from a biased viewpoint, especially one that doesn't appear to be interested in hearing from conservative organizations or right-leaning researchers, or seems to minimize any input from them. I've already had questions from congressional staff and others on why we picked Eagleton and Moritz, as they are perceived by some as biased against Republicans. I assured the critics that we have insisted all along on an objective study from Eagleton. An unbalanced or biased study from them will not only hurt my credibility, but also that of the EAC. I'm not suggesting that we stop their work, but I do want Tom and Julie to inform them in no uncertain terms that we will not accept a report that does not seriously consider all viewpoints on provisional voting and the voter ID issue, and that any study or interpretations they present to us reflect a diversity of opinions on these subjects. We also need for staff to determine whether their considerable work into the voter fraud area is authorized in the contract. We should not be paying for and receiving work we did not authorize.

The contract clearly calls for "alternative approaches" on voter ID requirements and "alternatives" on provisional voting. I agreed to support this contract to Eagleton because I was assured that we would receive a variety of approaches from their work, and not just those from a liberal perspective.

Karen:

As we discussed on Tuesday morning in the teleconference, we would like to reallocate within the current budget $9,500 to the survey of local election officials. This will raise the budget for the survey to $24,500 from $15,000.

The additional funding will permit us to double the sample of local election officials from 200 to 400. The larger sample will allow more detailed comparisons between the experience of local election officials in states that offered some form of provisional ballot before HAVA and those that did not. This comparison is a topic of special interest identified in the contract.

The increase of $9,500 is based on an estimate made by SRBI, the contractor that will actually administer the interviews. I can furnish you with a copy of the estimate if you like. We believe the additional funds will improve significantly our ability to provide relevant analysis to EAC on this important issue.

Tom O’Neill
Tom-

I will be back to you early next week with EAC's feedback on this.

Our initial reaction is that the group needs to include some local and/or state-level election officials, who have first-hand experience with these issues.

We will get you additional names and reactions by mid-week next week.

Thanks

Karen,

As you probably recall, one of the features of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group to look over our findings, conclusions and draft reports before we prepare final drafts for the EAC's review. The EAC asked that before recruiting members of the PRG we submit names for EAC's review. The aim, course, is to assemble a panel that is experienced, informed, and balanced.

Attached is a list of potential PRG members drawn from academia, the law, and non-profit organizations with interests in this area. Please look it over.
Thank you, Karen.

Carol,

I sent you the email on the Peer Review Group because you asked me to. When we discussed the issue in New York, you told me to send to you in writing our response to the Commission's suggestions for a new, more elaborate review process. I believe I copied Karen on that email.

Learning now, almost a week later, that you have taken no action is disheartening. As you know, our schedule is tight, and we need the counsel the Peer Review Group can provide. I hope, therefore, that Karen will take immediate action to resolve the situation so we can begin to recruit the review group in time to assure the quality of the resource design.

Tom O'Neill
Karen, Tom -

I am not taking any action on the email Tom sent a few days ago regarding the Peer Review Group because the Eagleton project is not my responsibility. As I indicated earlier to Karen, I didn't know why this was sent to me since Karen is the Project Manager. I endorse her comment below regarding the need for including her in all correspondence with anyone at the EAC regarding the project.

When I was the Interim Executive Director it was part of my job to stay on top of all EAC project work. I now have other responsibilities at the EAC, and while I am happy to continue involvement in other projects for continuity and transition purposes as needed, that needs to be very limited. My involvement with the Eagleton work has only been from the contracting perspective, and that is the only continuing role I have. Any substantive project activities have to be taken up with Karen.

Subject: Peer Review Group

Carol,

After our discussion in New York, you asked me to put in writing our response to the EAC's suggestions for expanding the number and kinds of groups that would review and comment on our work. I hope after your review of this response, we will be able to quickly recruit a balanced Peer Review Group (PRG) and move ahead as the schedule in our work plan indicates. Attached is a revised list of the members we propose for appointment to the PRG. We will probably not be able to persuade all of them to serve, but the number and range of views included on the
RESPONSE TO EAC RECOMMENDATIONS FOR ADDITIONAL REVIEW GROUPS

EAC’s Recommendations for the PRG
Karen Lynn-Dyson reported this response from the EAC commissioners to our proposal for the composition of the PRG.

1. Not sufficient conservative representation on the PRG

2. Create a “tiered process” of review in which:
   A. The PRG will prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions.
   B. PRG’s analysis would be vetted by a defined/select group of local election officials.
   C. A defined/select group of advocacy organizations would review the comments of the local election officials.
   D. Empanel a final focus group of local election officials, advocates and academics for an overall, interactive reaction to the analysis and recommendations.

Project Team Response
Creating three new committees to the review process to supplement the work of the Peer Review Group (PRG) is possible, but would add at least 8 weeks—and possibly 12 weeks—to our completion of the guidance document on provisional voting. We believe this delay would risk limiting the value of this project for the 2006 election. In addition, the change would add at least $30,000 to the cost of our work. (See the attached table showing the possible effect on our work plan, and note the optimistic assumptions such as the ability to hold a hearing the week after Christmas.). If the same groups were to be engaged in reviewing our work on Voter ID, the time for that work would also have to be stretched at a similar increased cost.

This additional cost and the added time might be worthwhile... if the new layers of review were to produce a consensus on how to strengthen the research, sharpen the analysis, and increase the relevance of the Guidance Document. Our team concluded, however, that additional review groups were unlikely to achieve these results.

PRG focuses on quality of research
We believe that our research would be strengthened by a balanced Peer Review Group that will focus on the design of the research and our conduct of it. Based on the EAC’s recommendation, we have revised the composition of the PRG to include additional, well-recognized authorities in the field whose perspective is generally agreed to be conservative.

The PRG will focus on the strength of the research design and the quality of our analysis, not on the politics of our recommendations for the guidance document. The PRG will critique the research design and suggest how to strengthen it. Members of the group will review the quality of our analysis so that we can fill holes and correct errors before we make policy recommendations to the EAC. The PRG may or may not meet as a group. The likelihood is that most comments will come in writing from individual members, most of whose schedules would not permit attendance at meetings. In any case, the PRG members will not gather around a table to come to consensus on the study’s recommendations.

While using the PRG as a forum to reach consensus on the knotty issues involved does not appear practical, the EAC can benefit from the work of other groups in this regard. It is not necessary for this project to duplicate the deliberative processes of the Carter-Baker Commission, the Century Foundation and the Election Center. The EAC itself as well as the project team can get the benefit of these reports without duplicating this "policy evaluation board" structure as part of this contract.

Karen reported that the Commissioners believed that the PRG would "prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions." As we see it, the PRG will neither analyze data nor draw conclusions, tentative or otherwise. Its members will review and comment on how the Project Team has designed and carried out the research. Analysis, conclusions and recommendations are the responsibility of the Project Team. We have all seen in the preface to books or articles a sentence or two that read something like this, "The author thanks Mr. X, Ms. Y, and Dr. Z for their review and comment on the manuscript. Their analysis has strengthened the work, but they are in no way responsible for errors or for my conclusions." That is the way we think about the Peer Review Group.

In short, the PRG will help ensure that EAC’s Guidance Document is founded on a solid base of data and analysis. The review and comment on the Preliminary Guidance Document by the EAC’s Board of Advisors and Standards Board will provide participation by important stakeholder groups without the need for the other review committees. This Board is broad-based and represents a key stakeholder group. It also enjoys a significant advantage over a “defined/select” group we might empanel. Any group we define will be open to criticism or charges of bias by representatives of interest groups not represented.

The criticism and charges of bias might be tolerable, but only if we could expect consensus from the “defined/select” group we would appoint. We believe that consensus would be elusive. In empanelling a “defined/select” group, we would naturally look for balance and would appoint members to represent a point of view or an institutional interest. As representatives they would likely feel that they had little choice but to be strong advocates. They would have little incentive to compromise. Our research, as opposed to our policy recommendations, would be better served by the analysis of scholars than by the advocacy of interests.

Policy judgments

We regard the EAC itself as responsible for the policy judgments involved in shaping the Guidance Document. We plan, of course, to respond to the EAC’s comments on our preliminary draft, so that the EAC’s comments will shape the Preliminary Guidance Document before it is released for public comment. And further revision will follow the public hearing and comments. The EAC and individual Commissioners can always seek comment informally on our analysis or recommendations. That course appears to us preferable to the creation of a new, more elaborate review process.

Tom-

I trust you are in contact with Carol and Julie regarding the information on the Peer Review Group and the July 28 hearing at Cal/Tech that you have requested of them, respectively.

While the EAC is a small agency with relatively few reporting layers, I suggest that for all future items requiring feedback and decisions from the EAC, that you are certain to carbon copy me on all e-mails.

This will ensure, that as your primary point of contact, I have a record of all communication that has taken place between the contractor and the agency.

Thanks

Carol,

After our discussion in New York, you asked me to put in writing our response to the EAC's suggestions for expanding the number and kinds of groups that would review and comment on our work. I hope after your review of this response, we will be able to quickly recruit a balanced Peer Review Group (PRG) and move ahead as the schedule in our work plan indicates. Attached is a revised list of the members we propose for appointment to the PRG. We will probably not be able to persuade all of them to serve, but the number and range of views included on the proposed list should ensure that the resulting group is well-balanced.

RESPONSE TO EAC RECOMMENDATIONS FOR ADDITIONAL REVIEW GROUPS

EAC's Recommendations for the PRG
Karen Lynn-Dyson reported this response from the EAC commissioners to our proposal for the composition of the PRG.

1. Not sufficient conservative representation on the PRG

2. Create a "tiered process" of review in which:
   A. The PRG will prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions.
B. PRG's analysis would be vetted by a defined/select group of local election officials.
C. A defined/select group of advocacy organizations would review the comments of the local election officials
D. Empanel a final focus group of local election officials, advocates and academics for an overall, interactive reaction to the analysis and recommendations.

Project Team Response
Creating three new committees to the review process to supplement the work of the Peer Review Group (PRG) is possible, but would add at least 8 weeks—and possibly 12 weeks—to our completion of the guidance document on provisional voting. We believe this delay would risk limiting the value of this project for the 2006 election. In addition, the change would add at least $30,000 to the cost of our work. (See the attached table showing the possible effect on our work plan, and note the optimistic assumptions such as the ability to hold a hearing the week after Christmas.). If the same groups were to be engaged in reviewing our work on Voter ID, the time for that work would also have to be stretched at a similar increased cost.

This additional cost and the added time might be worthwhile... if the new layers of review were to produce a consensus on how to strengthen the research, sharpen the analysis, and increase the relevance of the Guidance Document. Our team concluded, however, that additional review groups were unlikely to achieve these results.

PRG focuses on quality of research
We believe that our research would be strengthened by a balanced Peer Review Group that will focus on the design of the research and our conduct of it. Based on the EAC's recommendation, we have revised the composition of the PRG to include additional, well-recognized authorities in the field whose perspective is generally agreed to be conservative.

The PRG will focus on the strength of the research design and the quality of our analysis, not on the politics of our recommendations for the guidance document. The PRG will critique the research design and suggest how to strengthen it. Members of the group will review the quality of our analysis so that we can fill holes and correct errors before we make policy recommendations to the EAC. The PRG may or may not meet as a group. The likelihood is that most comments will come in writing from individual members, most of whose schedules would not permit attendance at meetings. In any case, the PRG members will not gather around a table to come to consensus on the study's recommendations.

While using the PRG as a forum to reach consensus on the knotty issues involved does not appear practical, the EAC can benefit from the work of other groups in this regard. It is not necessary for this project to duplicate the deliberative processes of the Carter-Baker Commission, the Century Foundation and the Election Center. The EAC itself as well as the project team can get the benefit of these reports without duplicating this "policy evaluation board" structure as part of this contract.

Project Team focuses on analysis and recommendations
Karen reported that the Commissioners believed that the PRG would "prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions." As we see it, the PRG will neither analyze data nor draw conclusions, tentative or otherwise. Its members will review and comment on how the Project Team has designed and carried out the research. Analysis, conclusions and recommendations are the responsibility of the Project Team. We have all seen in the preface to books or articles a sentence or two that read something like this, "The author thanks Mr. X, Ms. Y, and Dr. Z for their review and comment on the manuscript. Their analysis has strengthened the work, but they are in no way responsible for errors or for my conclusions." That is the way we think about the Peer Review Group.

In short, the PRG will help ensure that EAC's Guidance Document is founded on a solid base of data and analysis. The review and comment on the Preliminary Guidance Document by the EAC's Board of Advisors and Standards Board will provide participation by important stakeholder groups without the need for the other review committees. This Board is broad-based and represents a key stakeholder group. It also enjoys a significant advantage over a "defined/select" group we might empanel. Any group we define will be open to criticism or charges of bias by representatives of interest groups not represented.

The criticism and charges of bias might be tolerable, but only if we could expect consensus from the "defined/select" group we would appoint. We believe that consensus would be elusive. In empanelling a "defined/select" group, we would naturally look for balance and would appoint members to represent a point of view or an institutional interest. As representatives they would likely feel that they had little choice but to be strong advocates. They would have little incentive to compromise. Our research, as opposed to our policy recommendations, would be better served by the analysis of scholars than by the advocacy of interests.

Policy judgments
We regard the EAC itself as responsible for the policy judgments involved in shaping the Guidance Document. We plan, of course, to respond to the EAC's comments on our preliminary draft, so that the EAC's comments will shape the Preliminary Guidance Document before it is released for public comment. And further revision will follow the public hearing and comments. The EAC and individual Commissioners can always seek comment informally on our analysis or recommendations. That course appears to us preferable to the creation of a new, more elaborate review process.
Karen, Tom -

I am not taking any action on the email Tom sent a few days ago regarding the Peer Review Group because the Eagleton project is not my responsibility. As I indicated earlier to Karen, I didn't know why this was sent to me since Karen is the Project Manager. I endorse her comment below regarding the need for including her in all correspondence with anyone at the EAC regarding the project.

When I was the Interim Executive Director it was part of my job to stay on top of all EAC project work. I now have other responsibilities at the EAC, and while I am happy to continue involvement in other projects for continuity and transition purposes as needed, that needs to be very limited. My involvement with the Eagleton work has only been from the contracting perspective, and that is the only continuing role I have. Any substantive project activities have to be taken up with Karen.

PROPOSED MEMBERS:July6.doc
Thanks, Karen. I received both your emails and also had a telephone conversation with Aletha Barrington to fill me in on the details.

Also participating in the conference call on Thursday will be 3 members of our Peer Review Group: Mike Alvarez, Martha Kropf, and Tim O'Rourke.

The Eagleton-Moritz team on the call will include: John Weingart, Dan Tokaji, Tim Vercellotti, Ingrid Reed, and me.

I'm assuming you will guide the conversation and keep us all on time and topic.

Thanks for the schedule with the details of the EAC's review of our work.

Thanks, Tom.

Assume you just got the e-mail I sent to the EAC review team that included the paper, the analysis and the call-in information

Thursday at 11:30

A few items on timelines and materials for May 23-24 meetings:

The Commissioners will review the final Eagleton Voter ID and Provisional Voting reports at their Tuesday, May 16 meeting. At this meeting they will decide how they wish to present these reports to the EAC Board of Advisors and Standards Boards.

Your materials that will be distributed to the EAC Board of Advisors and Standards Boards must be finalized and ready for our Xeroxing process by Thursday, May 18. I will be in touch along the way to provide input/guidance on what these materials should be, based on the Commissioner's review and decisions.

hello:

I just got your message by phone:

It would be best to send it to my home address:

Also, in your original phone message you said that there would be an honorarium associated with the review process, but this e-mail states that there will be no compensation for the review. I of course did not expect to be compensated at my market rate for consulting jobs (which is $225 an hour) but I was led to believe that I would be compensated in some manner for my time.

On behalf of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), thank you in advance for agreeing to assist us with the review of research conducted by the Eagleton Institute of Politics on voter identification. By Friday, May 5, 2006, you will receive, in electronic form, the research paper and relevant data analysis which supports the paper’s findings. Through this independent review by a small group of experts familiar with elections data and research we are seeking feedback on:

- The research methodology which was used to support the paper’s conclusions
- The specific statistical applications which were used to analyze the data and arrive at various conclusions

If there are alternate methodological and statistical approaches to analyzing the data on voter identification, and if there is other data on voter identification that you think should have been included in the analysis, please be certain to note this in your comments.
On May 11, 2006 EAC will conduct a 60-90 minute phone call with key Eagleton Institute staff responsible for the research, members of Eagleton's peer review group and the EAC-identified reviewers who have been asked to consider the research. Through this dialogue EAC hopes to gather varying perspectives and insights on the research strategies and methods that were employed by Eagleton. As a result of this conversation, EAC anticipates that some revisions will be made to the Eagleton research paper. This paper is scheduled to be presented to EAC's Board of Advisors and Standards Boards in late May.

While we are unable to offer financial compensation for your review of this research we greatly appreciate your willingness to assist us with this important task. We believe that the research findings we will provide on voter identification are important and will most certainly be enhanced by your insights and expertise.

Tom-

You'll recall that we discussed the fact that the peer review group who Eagleton has assembled do not have the sufficient technical expertise to give us the expert/technical advice we need on the statistical analysis of the Voter ID piece. Only two persons on Eagleton's peer review group have a requisite research and statistical background and knowledge.

You may also remember that Mike told me that he thought that the paper needed an additional set of eyes and review by academics with a background and expertise in election statistics and analysis. When I initially proposed a review panel of six you said that was too many; we agreed that I would find three persons to do the review and that we would pay them a small honoraria for doing the review.

The EAC has identified three academics who are going to serve as peer reviewers of the Eagleton Voter ID paper and research.

They are Jonathan Nagler of New York University, Jan Leighley, University of Arizona, and Adam Berinsky of MIT.

They are ready to review the documents as soon as they are available.

I would like to them one week to review the material and then have a joint conference call on Thursday, May 11, in which we would all have an opportunity to discuss the research methodology and statistical analysis, along with general comments and suggestions.

If you are able to get to me the paper and the supporting data analysis, I will distribute to the documents ASAP.

Also let me know, if you would, your availability on May 11 to do this conference all.

I anticipate that it will last approximately 90 minutes.

Glad to help. I don't want to step on toes, but I'd recommend that you think about some sort of single-blind peer review, of the sort that is employed by many research journals and other organizations (like the NSF or National Academies of Science). I think that if you offer them a modest honoraria (perhaps $100) I think you'll find that the folks on that list would be likely to provide quick and thorough feedback to you.

Again, let me know if there is more that I can do to help.

I'm also willing to do a review for you myself. The issue is that I feel somewhat conflicted, given that I'm on their "peer review" panel. But on the other hand that does mean that I'm very well aware of the background of this project. I'd leave it up to you as to whether you think that a review from me would be appropriate or not.

Hi -- nice to meet you in person, finally!

And thanks for inviting me to your gathering, I enjoyed it and hope I was helpful. Of course, any time you want anything, you do know where to track me down.

As to the potential reviewers of the Eagleton Voter ID study, here are my suggestions, in order:

- Jonathan Nagler, New York University
- Jan Leighley, University of Arizona
- Ben Highton, UC-Davis
- Adam Berinsky, MIT
- Bernard Grofman, UC-Irvine

All have worked with the CPS turnout/registration data, and are very familiar with this research literature.

If these don't work, or you want more recommendations, let me know.

Thank you for sharing this list of your Peer Review Group members, to-date. I will share this list with the Commissioners and will be certain to let you know of their feedback, if any.

I will also be back in touch regarding Eagleton’s research around voter fraud and the research project EAC will be undertaking, this fall, around voting fraud and voter intimidation. The EAC is presently in the process of finalizing a work and staff plan for this project and once it is completed, I will be certain to brief you on it.

In the meantime, EAC staff and several of the Commissioners looks forward to meeting with the Eagleton/Moritz team on September 6 at 1:30 PM.

Karen,

Attached is a report on the status of recruitment of members of the Peer Review Group. We extended 9 invitations. We have four confirmed members, one reluctant turn-down, one who has yet to respond to an initial inquiry, and are awaiting confirmation from 3 others who initially agreed. Please let me know if you need additional information.

Our legal department has been inundated with legal requests in the last two weeks, so please pardon our delay in getting our written comments on the draft document back to you.

Julie informs me that you should have these in the next several days.

Hope that the work of the Peer Review Group and work on Voter Id is continuing to progress.

Karen,

Thanks. We are aiming to complete drafting the recommendations for Guidance and Best Practice for Provisional Voting in the next 10 days, so the written comments will be most helpful if they arrive in that time. And, of course, we will be revising the analysis documents in line with the comments from the EAC and the PRG during that time period as well.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD

On May 24, 2005 the U.S. Election Assistance Commission awarded an eight month contract (December 30, 2005) in the amount of $560,002.00 to the Eagleton Institute of Politics (Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey) to provide research assistance to support development of guidelines on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification procedures.

On November 15, 2005, John Weingart, Associate Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics, requested via e-mail, a no–cost extension on this contract (E4014127). Mr. Weingart has requested an extension to complete the work of this contract to February 28, 2006.

In subsequent correspondence, Mr. Weingart notes the following as the reason for the request:

“The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October, voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting, based on Eagleton’s research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication…. The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report of that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid-January”.

He further notes:

“The total project budget is $560,002. As of October 31st, the EAC has been invoiced for $259,081.79; the balance remaining is $300,920.21. We anticipate that the project will be complete and the balance of funds fully expended by February 28, 2006. The final invoice for the contract will be submitted to the EAC within 75 days of the close of the project”.

Karen,

I am assuming that there original proposal included an estimate for public hearing proposals and that they want to shift money from this expense to labor.

Thus I am assuming that you have determined that there will be no public hearing and therefore this shift is appropriate.

Are these assumption correct? Perhaps a quick explanation regarding this processes would be helpful.

Karen - At this time, we anticipate reallocating funds primarily from the public hearings line item and spending approximately $35,500 more than originally budgeted on personnel, $23,250 more on the subcontract with Ohio State and $20,250 more on consultants. There are other additional variances but they are not significant (e.g. less on honoraria, less on travel, and more on general operations such as phone expenses). I just had a more detailed conversation with our Deputy General Counsel about Eagleton's no-cost extension.

He indicates that we need a bit more information that will accompany the material we will send to the Commissioners for a vote (hopefully next week)

We need to know the number of labor hours, the labor costs and a brief description of the tasks to be performed by each of the staff who will be working on the EAC contract until its completion.

Since we have eliminated the public hearing (a major contract deliverable) it is unclear why staff labor hours and costs will continue at the same level and rate.

As always, thanks for your patience and prompt response.

"John Weingart" <john.weingart@rutgers.edu>

Karen - Our request for a no-cost, reallocation of resources is based on (a) the fact that our personnel costs have already been higher than we anticipated and (b) the reality that keeping the project operating for at least nine months, instead of seven as planned, will require the participants to devote more time than anticipated. While we are not producing more product than originally promised, the time involved in our work continues to increase. Both Provisional Voting and Voter ID have proved to be very dynamic topics requiring us to continually monitor developments and update our data, analysis and evolving work products as we learn of new or revised information. As a result, despite the extension of the schedule, the staff and consultants on this project have had no "down" time. We anticipate this research, monitoring and revising to continue for the months added to the project, necessitating significantly more hours by all members of the project team than anticipated.

Our request asks for changes to three line items which I will address below on the assumption that the EAC response to our already-submitted Provisional Voting draft and to-be-submitted Voter ID draft will be sufficiently timely to enable us to complete our work on both topics by the end of February.

1. Eagleton Institute of Politics personnel: We originally budgeted $110,695 ($15,813 average per month) for Eagleton faculty, staff and graduate student assistants for the seven-month project from May 24
2005-December 31, 2005. Our actual costs have been approximately $14,500 more than that. In addition, we are anticipating needing another $21,000 for personnel costs in January and February, calculated on the basis of 2/3 of the original monthly estimate. Therefore, we are asking this line item from $110,695 to approximately $146,000.

2. Consultant Services: We originally budgeted $79,500 ($11,357 average per month) for consultant services which we have used to engage Tom O'Neill as the project manager. We anticipate no additional cost for the original contract period of May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005, but do anticipate needing his services during January and February at a slightly reduced rate of $10,125 per month or $20,250 total additional. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $79,500 to $99,750.

3. Moritz School of Law: We originally budgeted $84,744 ($12,106 average per month) for staff and overhead for the May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005 period. We anticipate needing an additional $23,171 ($11,585 average per month) to support their time on this project in January and February. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $84,744 to $107,915.

With these revisions, approximately $22,000 of the EAC contract award to Eagleton would remain not yet allocated, primarily because the cost for the public hearings would have incurred Rutgers University overhead whereas the additional expenditures for consultants and the subcontract with Moritz do not.

I hope this provides you the information you need. While Rutgers is shutting down until January 3rd, I will be checking email at least every day or two.

Subject Peer Review Group

Karen,

As you probably recall, one of the features of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group to look over our findings, conclusions and draft reports before we prepare final drafts for the EAC's review. The EAC asked that before recruiting members of the PRG we submit names for EAC's review. The aim, course, is to assemble a panel that is experienced, informed, and balanced.

Attached is a list of potential PRG members drawn from academia, the law, and non-profit organizations with interests in this area. Please look it over.

We may conclude that the PRG should also include two or three former government officials now in academia or related fields. We have a conference call with our partners at Moritz planned for tomorrow or Friday to decide a) if former officials should be included in the PRG and b) if so, who they should be. I'll keep you informed of our thinking as it develops.

Commissioners-

Enclosed please find a preliminary list of Peer Review Group members, whom Eagleton is considering for their Peer Review Group. Tom Wilkey will be bringing this item to you for discussion and input at Monday's Commissioner's meeting.

Eagleton envisions this Peer Review Group as the body that will review the draft analysis that it will prepare on provisional voting and on voter identification. The Group would also provide comment on the development of alternative approaches to provisional voting and voter identification which Eagleton will develop for the EAC.

I have included the e-mail from the Eagleton Project Director, Tom O'Neil, so that you could get a feel for his approach/philosophy to assembling the Group.

Tom-

Had a very good review and discussion of the PRG at this morning's Commissioner meeting.

Also, the Commissioners have marked their calendars for a conference call with the Eagleton/Moritz team on July 12 at 9:30 AM.

Several concerns were raised about the composition of the PRG and, after some discussion, I indicated that Eagleton will provide the EAC with a revised participant list, and with a more detailed description of the PRG's mission, goals, objectives, workplan and timelines for accomplishing its work.

The Vice Chair is concerned that there is not sufficient conservative representation on the PRG. I would suggest the team do more research to identify well-recognized conservative academics to put on the Group.

Further, the Commissioners recommend a tiered process in which the PRG will prepare a "dispassionate" analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions. This analysis and these conclusions will then be vetted with a defined/select group of local election officials, and then, with a defined/select group of advocacy organizations.

It was also suggested that a final round of focus group meetings be held with a cross-section of these election officials, advocates and academics for an overall interactive reaction to the analysis and recommendations.

Hope this helps clarify concerns; I look forward to sharing your revisions to the PRG with them.

I don't remember saying much of anything but a few pleasantries to Tom in New York. Did you talk to him about this topic? I'm really at a loss on this. (Maybe I'm having an extended senior moment.)
Carol,

After our discussion in New York, you asked me to put in writing our response to the EAC’s suggestions for expanding the number and kinds of groups that would review and comment on our work. I hope after your review of this response, we will be able to quickly recruit a balanced Peer Review Group (PRG) and move ahead as the schedule in our work plan indicates.

Attached is a revised list of the members we propose for appointment to the PRG. We will probably not be able to persuade all of them to serve, but the number and range of views included on the proposed list should ensure that the resulting group is well-balanced.

RESPONSE TO EAC RECOMMENDATIONS FOR ADDITIONAL REVIEW GROUPS

EAC’s Recommendations for the PRG
Karen Lynn-Dyson reported this response from the EAC commissioners to our proposal for the composition of the PRG.

1. Not sufficient conservative representation on the PRG
2. Create a “tiered process” of review in which:
   A. The PRG will prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions.
   B. PRG’s analysis would be vetted by a defined/select group of local election officials.
   C. A defined/select group of advocacy organizations would review the comments of the local election officials
   D. Empanel a final focus group of local election officials, advocates and academics for an overall, interactive reaction to the analysis and recommendations.

Project Team Response
Creating three new committees to the review process to supplement the work of the Peer Review Group (PRG) is possible, but would add at least 8 weeks—and possibly 12 weeks—to our completion of the guidance document on provisional voting. We believe this delay would risk limiting the value of this project for the 2006 election. In addition, the change would add at least $30,000 to the cost of our work. (See the attached table showing the possible effect on our work plan, and note the optimistic assumptions such as the ability to hold a hearing the week after Christmas.). If the same groups were to be engaged in reviewing our work on Voter ID, the time for that work would also have to be stretched at a similar increased cost.

This additional cost and the added time might be worthwhile... if the new layers of review were to produce a consensus on how to strengthen the research, sharpen the analysis, and increase the relevance of the Guidance Document. Our team concluded, however, that additional review groups were unlikely to achieve these results.

PRG focuses on quality of research
We believe that our research would be strengthened by a balanced Peer Review Group that will focus on the design of the research and our conduct of it. Based on the EAC's recommendation, we have revised the composition of the PRG to include additional, well-recognized authorities in the field whose perspective is generally agreed to be conservative.

The PRG will focus on the strength of the research design and the quality of our analysis, not on the politics of our recommendations for the guidance document. The PRG will critique the research design and suggest how to strengthen it. Members of the group will review the quality of our analysis so that we can fill holes and correct errors before we make policy recommendations to the EAC. The PRG may or may not meet as a group. The likelihood is that most comments will come in writing from individual members, most of whose schedules would not permit attendance at meetings. In any case, the PRG members will not gather around a table to come to consensus on the study's recommendations.

While using the PRG as a forum to reach consensus on the knotty issues involved does not appear practical, the EAC can benefit from the work of other groups in this regard. It is not necessary for this project to duplicate the deliberative processes of the Carter-Baker Commission, the Century Foundation and the Election Center. The EAC itself as well as the project team can get the benefit of these reports without duplicating this "policy evaluation board" structure as part of this contract.

Karen reported that the Commissioners believed that the PRG would "prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions." As we see it, the PRG will neither analyze data nor draw conclusions, tentative or otherwise. Its members will review and comment on how the Project Team has designed and carried out the research. Analysis, conclusions and recommendations are the responsibility of the Project Team. We have all seen in the preface to books or articles a sentence or two that read something like this, "The author thanks Mr. X, Ms. Y, and Dr. Z for their review and comment on the manuscript. Their analysis has strengthened the work, but they are in no way responsible for errors or for my conclusions." That is the way we think about the Peer Review Group.

In short, the PRG will help ensure that EAC's Guidance Document is founded on a solid base of data and analysis. The review and comment on the Preliminary Guidance Document by the EAC's Board of Advisors and Standards Board will provide participation by important stakeholder groups without the need for the other review committees. This Board is broad-based and represents a key stakeholder group. It also enjoys a significant advantage over a "defined/select" group we might empanel. Any group we define will be open to criticism or charges of bias by representatives of interest groups not represented.

The criticism and charges of bias might be tolerable, but only if we could expect consensus from the "defined/select" group we would appoint. We believe that consensus would be elusive. In empanelling a "defined/select" group, we would naturally look for balance and would appoint members to represent a point of view or an institutional interest. As representatives they would likely feel that they had little choice but to be strong advocates. They would have little incentive to compromise. Our research, as opposed to our policy recommendations, would be better served by the analysis of scholars than by the advocacy of interests.

Policy judgments

We regard the EAC itself as responsible for the policy judgments involved in shaping the Guidance Document. We plan, of course, to respond to the EAC's comments on our preliminary draft, so that the EAC's comments will shape the Preliminary Guidance Document before it is released for public comment. And further revision will follow the public hearing and comments.
The EAC and individual Commissioners can always seek comment informally on our analysis or recommendations. That course appears to us preferable to the creation of a new, more elaborate review process.

The criticism and charges of bias might be tolerable, but only if we could expect consensus from the “defined/select” group we would appoint. We believe that consensus would be elusive. In empanelling a “defined/select” group, we would naturally look for balance and would appoint members to represent a point of view or an institutional interest. As representatives they would likely feel that they had little choice but to be strong advocates. They would have little incentive to compromise. Our research, as opposed to our policy recommendations, would be better served by the analysis of scholars than by the advocacy of interests.

Policy judgments
We regard the EAC itself as responsible for the policy judgments involved in shaping the Guidance Document. We plan, of course, to respond to the EAC’s comments on our preliminary draft, so that the EAC’s comments will shape the Preliminary Guidance Document before it is released for public comment. And further revision will follow the public hearing and comments. The EAC and individual Commissioners can always seek comment informally on our analysis or recommendations. That course appears to us preferable to the creation of a new, more elaborate review process.
Role of the Peer Review Group

Members of the Peer Review Group will review the research design for the project, including the survey of local election officials, the analysis of Voter ID regime on turnout, the state-by-state narrative of developments in provisional voting and voter identification, and the compilation and analysis of statutes, administrative regulations, and case law affecting provisional voting and voter identification. They will also review the report on Analysis and Alternatives. They may review the draft of the Preliminary Guidance Document before it goes to the Board of Advisors for comment.

Members of the group will be respected authorities in their fields and represent a range of opinions and perspectives, although their views on policy will be less important to the study than their views on the quality of the research on which policy recommendations are based.

Ideally, the group would meet once, but even that may not be possible to arrange given the tight time period for the project, the demanding schedules of the members, and their wide dispersal across the county. They will function largely by reviewing written work and making written comments on it. The timing of their involvement is indicated on the work plan.

Carol,

I sent you the email on the Peer Review Group because you asked me to. When we discussed the issue in New York, you told me to send to you in writing our response to the Commission's suggestions for a new, more elaborate review process. I believe I copied Karen on that email.

Learning now, almost a week later, that you have taken no action is disheartening. As you know, our schedule is tight, and we need the counsel the Peer Review Group can provide. I hope, therefore, that Karen will take immediate action to resolve the situation so we can begin to recruit the review group in time to assure the quality of the resource design.
Karen, Tom -

I am not taking any action on the email Tom sent a few days ago regarding the Peer Review Group because the Eagleton project is not my responsibility. As I indicated earlier to Karen, I didn't know why this was sent to me since Karen is the Project Manager. I endorse her comment below regarding the need for including her in all correspondence with anyone at the EAC regarding the project.

When I was the Interim Executive Director it was part of my job to stay on top of all EAC project work. I now have other responsibilities at the EAC, and while I am happy to continue involvement in other projects for continuity and transition purposes as needed, that needs to be very limited. My involvement with the Eagleton work has only been from the contracting perspective, and that is the only continuing role I have. Any substantive project activities have to be taken up with Karen.

Carol,

After our discussion in New York, you asked me to put in writing our response to the EAC's suggestions for expanding the number and kinds of groups that would review and comment on our work. I hope after your review of this response, we will be able to quickly recruit a balanced Peer Review Group (PRG) and move ahead as the schedule in our work plan indicates. Attached is a revised list of the members we propose for appointment to the PRG. We will probably not be able to persuade all of them to serve, but the number and range of views included on the proposed list should ensure that the resulting group is well-balanced.

Tom

RESPONSE TO EAC RECOMMENDATIONS FOR ADDITIONAL REVIEW GROUPS

EAC's Recommendations for the PRG
Karen Lynn-Dyson reported this response from the EAC commissioners to our proposal for the composition of the PRG.

1. Not sufficient conservative representation on the PRG

2. Create a “tiered process” of review in which:
   A. The PRG will prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions.
   B. PRG’s analysis would be vetted by a defined/select group of local election officials.
   C. A defined/select group of advocacy organizations would review the comments of the local election officials
   D. Empanel a final focus group of local election officials, advocates and academics for an overall, interactive reaction to the analysis and recommendations.

Project Team Response
Creating three new committees to the review process to supplement the work of the Peer Review Group (PRG) is possible, but would add at least 8 weeks—and possibly 12 weeks—to our completion of the guidance document on provisional voting. We believe this delay would risk limiting the value of this project for the 2006 election. In addition, the change would add at least $30,000 to the cost of our work. (See the attached table showing the possible effect on our work plan, and note the optimistic assumptions such as the ability to hold a hearing the week after Christmas.). If the same groups were to be engaged in reviewing our work on Voter ID, the time for that work would also have to be stretched at a similar increased cost.

This additional cost and the added time might be worthwhile... if the new layers of review were to produce a consensus on how to strengthen the research, sharpen the analysis, and increase the relevance of the Guidance Document. Our team concluded, however, that additional review groups were unlikely to achieve these results.

PRG focuses on quality of research
We believe that our research would be strengthened by a balanced Peer Review Group that will focus on the design of the research and our conduct of it. Based on the EAC's recommendation, we have revised the composition of the PRG to include additional, well-recognized authorities in the field whose perspective is generally agreed to be conservative.

The PRG will focus on the strength of the research design and the quality of our analysis, not on the politics of our recommendations for the guidance document. The PRG will critique the research design and suggest how to strengthen it. Members of the group will review the quality of our analysis so that we can fill holes and correct errors before we make policy recommendations to the EAC. The PRG may or may not meet as a group. The likelihood is that most comments will come in writing from individual members, most of whose schedules would not permit attendance.
at meetings. In any case, the PRG members will not gather around a table to come to consensus on the study's recommendations.

While using the PRG as a forum to reach consensus on the knotty issues involved does not appear practical, the EAC can benefit from the work of other groups in this regard. It is not necessary for this project to duplicate the deliberative processes of the Carter-Baker Commission, the Century Foundation and the Election Center. The EAC itself as well as the project team can get the benefit of these reports without duplicating this "policy evaluation board" structure as part of this contract.

Karen reported that the Commissioners believed that the PRG would "prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions." As we see it, the PRG will neither analyze data nor draw conclusions, tentative or otherwise. Its members will review and comment on how the Project Team has designed and carried out the research. Analysis, conclusions and recommendations are the responsibility of the Project Team. We have all seen in the preface to books or articles a sentence or two that read something like this, "The author thanks Mr. X, Ms. Y, and Dr. Z for their review and comment on the manuscript. Their analysis has strengthened the work, but they are in no way responsible for errors or for my conclusions." That is the way we think about the Peer Review Group.

In short, the PRG will help ensure that EAC's Guidance Document is founded on a solid base of data and analysis. The review and comment on the Preliminary Guidance Document by the EAC's Board of Advisors and Standards Board will provide participation by important stakeholder groups without the need for the other review committees. This Board is broad-based and represents a key stakeholder group. It also enjoys a significant advantage over a "defined/select" group we might empanel. Any group we define will be open to criticism or charges of bias by representatives of interest groups not represented.

The criticism and charges of bias might be tolerable, but only if we could expect consensus from the "defined/select" group we would appoint. We believe that consensus would be elusive. In empaneling a "defined/select" group, we would naturally look for balance and would appoint members to represent a point of view or an institutional interest. As representatives they would likely feel that they had little choice but to be strong advocates. They would have little incentive to compromise. Our research, as opposed to our policy recommendations, would be better served by the analysis of scholars than by the advocacy of interests.

Policy judgments

We regard the EAC itself as responsible for the policy judgments involved in shaping the Guidance Document. We plan, of course, to respond to the EAC's comments on our preliminary draft, so that the EAC's comments will shape the Preliminary Guidance Document before it is released for public comment. And further revision will follow the public hearing and comments. The EAC and individual Commissioners can always seek comment informally on our analysis or recommendations. That course appears to us preferable to the creation of a new, more elaborate review process.

Karen:

As we discussed on Tuesday morning in the teleconference, we would like to reallocate within the current budget $9,500 to the survey of local election officials. This will raise the budget for the survey to $24,500 from $15,000.

The additional funding will permit us to double the sample of local election officials from 200 to 400. The larger sample will allow more detailed comparisons between the experience of local election officials in states that offered some form of provisional ballot before HAVA and those that did not. This comparison is a topic of special interest identified in the contract.

The increase of $9,500 is based on an estimate made by SRBI, the contractor that will actually administer the interviews. I can furnish you with a copy of the estimate if you like. We believe the additional funds will... improve significantly our ability to provide relevant analysis to EAC on this important issue.

Tom-

This e-mail will reiterate our conversation of this morning.

After a close review of your e-mail of July 12th, EAC staff determined that it is appropriate for the Eagleton/Moritz team to proceed with the composition of its Peer Review Group as it deems suitable and necessary. EAC staff will assume that your team is satisfied that it has created a politically and ideologically balanced group to review your work.

EAC staff, the Commissioners, the Advisory and Standards Boards will, we are certain, have opportunities to review the findings and analyses that your team creates, at critical junctures during the process.

Enjoy your weekend.

Subject: Re: Invitation to Tom Wilkey

Karen,

For your information, Ruth Mandel, Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics, sent the letter below to Tom Wilkey this afternoon. It is an invitation for him to meet with the project team in August at Rutgers.

Have a good weekend.

Tom O'Neill

I'm writing on behalf of my colleagues at the Eagleton Institute of Politics to send congratulations on your appointment as Executive Director of the Election Assistance Commission and to extend a warm invitation for you to visit the Institute to meet our research team. The Eagleton Institute and our partners at the Moritz College of Law are delighted to have been selected to provide research services to the EAC for developing guidance to the states on provisional voting and voter identification requirements.

The Eagleton and Moritz team conducting the research and analysis would appreciate an opportunity to discuss the project with you so that we can gain a full understanding of your perspective on this work and make our research as useful as possible for you, the EAC, the states, and eventually the voters.

I understand that you continue to travel between New York and Washington, which would make a visit to Eagleton simple to arrange. Since the Rutgers campus in New Brunswick is not far from the Metropark Amtrak station, we could easily pick you up at Metropark and return you at the end of the visit. Our Moritz partners would also attend.

The agenda for such a meeting could include a briefing on our progress, discussion of challenges to be met, and a conversation about your goals for this research. We believe that the earlier in the research process we can arrange to meet, the better for the project.

I hope you agree that a meeting in the near future would be useful, and that you like the idea of a visit to the research site. If so, we can search for convenient dates in the next few weeks, perhaps starting with the possibility that you would be available on August 12, 15, or 16.

We all look forward to continuing our work together on this worthwhile project.

EAC contract staff indicate that the reallocation you propose can occur and that all other such reallocations that are made from your project budget for this contract budget can be done at your own discretion.

From a contractual standpoint, EAC's only concern is that Eagleton is able to accomplish all of the activities and provide all of the deliverables that have been set forth in your contract.

Karen, I’ll survey the group about the best time for a conference call. The 24th does not look like a good time. We have a teleconference with the Peer Review Group on the Voter ID paper scheduled for Feb. 22, and therefore would be hard-pressed to review the précis of your comments in time for a discussion on the 24th. The next week would be more promising, perhaps Tuesday, Feb 28 in the afternoon.

We still plan to deliver the Voter ID paper to you the first week in March.

Tom O'Neill
Commissioner Hillman has asked a follow-up question regarding the sharing of EAC's information, on the Eagleton study on Voter ID requirements, with Tom Hicks.

I have given Sheila the following appendices for possible distribution to Tom Hicks:

1. Summary of Voter ID Requirements by State
2. Court Decisions and Literature on Voter Identification and Related Issues Court decisions
3. Annotated bibliography on Voter Identification Issues

I have not given Sheila, for distribution, these Appendices or parts of the report:

2. The Executive Summary and Recommendations
3. Summary of Research
4. State Statutes and Regulations Affecting Voter Identification (electronic version only)

I'm checking to see if you can contact your finance department to determine if EAC has received its final invoice on the Eagleton/Moritz study.

Our financial records show a balance on the contract of $2,910.77

RESPONSE TO EAC RECOMMENDATIONS FOR ADDITIONAL REVIEW GROUPS

EAC's Recommendations for the PRG
Karen Lynn-Dyson reported this response from the EAC commissioners to our proposal for the composition of the PRG.

1. Not sufficient conservative representation on the PRG

2. Create a "tiered process" of review in which:
   A. The PRG will prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions.
   B. PRG's analysis would be vetted by a defined/select group of local election officials.
   C. A defined/select group of advocacy organizations would review the comments of the local election officials
D. Empanel a final focus group of local election officials, advocates and academics for an overall, interactive reaction to the analysis and recommendations.

Project Team Response

Creating three new committees to the review process to supplement the work of the Peer Review Group (PRG) is possible, but would add at least 8 weeks—and possibly 12 weeks—to our completion of the guidance document on provisional voting. We believe this delay would risk limiting the value of this project for the 2006 election. In addition, the change would add at least $30,000 to the cost of our work. (See the attached table showing the possible effect on our work plan, and note the optimistic assumptions such as the ability to hold a hearing the week after Christmas.) If the same groups were to be engaged in reviewing our work on Voter ID, the time for that work would also have to be stretched at a similar increased cost.

This additional cost and the added time might be worthwhile... if the new layers of review were to produce a consensus on how to strengthen the research, sharpen the analysis, and increase the relevance of the Guidance Document. Our team concluded, however, that additional review groups were unlikely to achieve these results.

PRG focuses on quality of research

We believe that our research would be strengthened by a balanced Peer Review Group that will focus on the design of the research and our conduct of it. Based on the EAC's recommendation, we have revised the composition of the PRG to include additional, well-recognized authorities in the field whose perspective is generally agreed to be conservative.

The PRG will focus on the strength of the research design and the quality of our analysis, not on the politics of our recommendations for the guidance document. The PRG will critique the research design and suggest how to strengthen it. Members of the group will review the quality of our analysis so that we can fill holes and correct errors before we make policy recommendations to the EAC. The PRG may or may not meet as a group. The likelihood is that most comments will come in writing from individual members, most of whose schedules would not permit attendance at meetings. In any case, the PRG members will not gather around a table to come to consensus on the study's recommendations.

While using the PRG as a forum to reach consensus on the knotty issues involved does not appear practical, the EAC can benefit from the work of other groups in this regard. It is not necessary for this project to duplicate the deliberative processes of the Carter-Baker Commission, the Century Foundation and the Election Center. The EAC itself as well as the project team can get the benefit of these reports without duplicating this "policy evaluation board" structure as part of this contract.

Karen reported that the Commissioners believed that the PRG would "prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions." As we see it, the PRG will neither analyze data nor draw conclusions, tentative or otherwise. Its members will review and comment on how the Project Team has designed and carried out the research. Analysis, conclusions and recommendations are the responsibility of the Project Team. We have all seen in the preface to books or articles a sentence or two that read something like this, "The author thanks Mr. X, Ms. Y, and Dr. Z for their review and comment on the manuscript. Their analysis has strengthened the work, but they are in no way responsible for errors or for my conclusions." That is the way we think about the Peer Review Group.

In short, the PRG will help ensure that EAC's Guidance Document is founded on a solid base of... data and analysis. The review and comment on the Preliminary Guidance Document by the EAC's Board of Advisors and Standards Board will provide participation by important stakeholder groups without the need for the other review committees. This Board is broad-based and represents a key stakeholder group. It also enjoys a significant advantage over a "defined/select" group we might empanel. Any group we define will be open to criticism or charges of bias by representatives of interest groups not represented.

The criticism and charges of bias might be tolerable, but only if we could expect consensus from the "defined/select" group we would appoint. We believe that consensus would be elusive. In empanelling a "defined/select" group, we would naturally look for balance and would appoint members to represent a point of view or an institutional interest. As representatives they would likely feel that they had little choice but to be strong advocates. They would have little incentive to compromise. Our research, as opposed to our policy recommendations, would be better served by the analysis of scholars than by the advocacy of interests.

We regard the EAC itself as responsible for the policy judgments involved in shaping the Guidance Document. We plan, of course, to respond to the EAC's comments on our preliminary draft, so that the EAC's comments will shape the Preliminary Guidance Document before it is released for public comment. And further revision will follow the public hearing and comments. The EAC and individual Commissioners can always seek comment informally on our analysis or recommendations. That course appears to us preferable to the creation of a new, more elaborate review process.

I don't remember saying much of anything but a few pleasantries to Tom in New York. Did you talk to him about this topic? I'm really at a loss on this. (Maybe I'm having an extended senior moment.)

Carol,

After our discussion in New York, you asked me to put in writing our response to the EAC's suggestions for expanding the number and kinds of groups that would review and comment on our work. I hope after your review of this response, we will be able to quickly recruit a balanced Peer Review Group (PRG) and move ahead as the schedule in our work plan indicates. Attached is a revised list of the members we propose for appointment to the PRG. We will probably not be able to persuade all of them to serve, but the number and range of views included on the proposed list should ensure that the resulting group is well-balanced.

RESPONSE TO EAC RECOMMENDATIONS FOR ADDITIONAL REVIEW GROUPS

EAC's Recommendations for the PRG
Karen Lynn-Dyson reported this response from the EAC commissioners to our proposal for the composition of the PRG.

1. Not sufficient conservative representation on the PRG

2. Create a "tiered process" of review in which:
   A. The PRG will prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions.
B. PRG's analysis would be vetted by a defined/select group of local election officials.
C. A defined/select group of advocacy organizations would review the comments of the local election officials
D. Empanel a final focus group of local election officials, advocates and academics for an overall, interactive reaction to the analysis and recommendations.

Project Team Response
Creating three new committees to the review process to supplement the work of the Peer Review Group (PRG) is possible, but would add at least 8 weeks --and possibly 12 weeks-- to our completion of the guidance document on provisional voting. We believe this delay would risk limiting the value of this project for the 2006 election. In addition, the change would add at least $30,000 to the cost of our work. (See the attached table showing the possible effect on our work plan, and note the optimistic assumptions such as the ability to hold a hearing the week after Christmas.). If the same groups were to be engaged in reviewing our work on Voter ID, the time for that work would also have to be stretched at a similar increased cost.

REVISED PROPOSED MEMBERS OF PEER REVIEW GROUP
July 6, 2005

Role of the Peer Review Group
Members of the Peer Review Group will review the research design for the project, including the survey of local election officials, the analysis of Voter ID regime on turnout, the state-by-state narrative of developments in provisional voting and voter identification, and the compilation and analysis of statutes, administrative regulations, and case law affecting provisional voting and voter identification. They will also review the report on Analysis and Alternatives. They may review the draft of the Preliminary Guidance Document before it goes to the Board of Advisors for comment.

Members of the group will be respected authorities in their fields and represent a range of opinions and perspectives, although their views on policy will be less important to the study than their views on the quality of the research on which policy recommendations are based.

Ideally, the group would meet once, but even that may not be possible to arrange given the tight time period for the project, the demanding schedules of the members, and their wide dispersal across the county. They will function largely by reviewing written work and making written comments on it. The timing of their involvement is indicated on the work plan.

Good morning Tanisha,

To my understanding Dr. Nagler is out of the office today and I been informed to contact you with any information for him. I am attaching a copy of the Revised Voter ID Analysis. Will you please see that he receives it today? If you have any questions regarding this document feel free to contact me.

Karen,

John and I reviewed your recent email today, and he asked me to respond.

Important to us is a clear commitment now by the EAC to schedule a presentation of our Voter ID research at the May meeting of the Advisory Board, if its review is required before the paper is published and presented at the EAC’s public meeting in June. Your email made no mention of that June public meeting. Our schedule (submitted with the request for the no-cost extension) –and our previous discussion with you—treats that meeting as the key event that will conclude our research under this contract. Therefore, we also look for an explicit understanding that a presentation of our reports will be included in the agenda for that public meeting.

We can deliver a final report on Provisional Voting by May 5 and will be prepared for whatever role we might play at the May 24 meeting of the Advisory Board.

The team is looking forward to a discussion of Tim Vercellotti’s revised statistical analysis of Voter ID with the academic reviewers you are in the process of identifying during the week of May 8. Knowing the specific date and time of that discussion in the next day or so would facilitate the participation of appropriate members of our Peer Review Group in that conversation.

John and Tom-

A couple of items related to timing over the next several weeks:

1. Is it possible to get your final report on Provisional Voting by COB May 5? If so, I can get this to the four Commissioners for final review and approval. It will then be ready to present to the EAC Board of Advisors and Standards Board at the May 24 meeting.
2. As we discussed I have been working to identify a small group of academics (three or so) who will be available to review the Voter ID paper the week of May 8. The focus of the review will be on Tim's research methodology and statistical analysis. I am fairly certain that this review can be done via conference call, preferably on May 11 or May 12. This would assume each of the reviewers will have spent time reviewing the paper, taking extensive notes and summarizing his or her comments. I expect that you all, Tim, Mike Alvarez and any others from your peer review panel, who have an expertise in research and statistics, will be available for the conference call, as well?

3. While I expect you will be able to have your final Voter ID paper to me sometime during the week of May 15, it is not clear whether or not the paper will be presented to the EAC Standards and Advisory Boards the following week. As you know, the paper contains some controversial information, so the Commissioners may elect to spend additional time reviewing the findings among themselves, and before it is formally presented to our Boards.

Let me know if this schedule works for you all.

Karen,

Tim Vercellotti and I have a proposal to meet your schedule for a conference call on May 11 with Jonathan Nagler, Jan Leighley, and Adam Berinsky, as well as a few members of our Peer Review Group.

Tim’s revision will not be complete until May 4. We propose to send this new analysis immediately to you for distribution to the reviewers that day. I will need several days more to incorporate Tim’s new data in our summary report.

Since the reviewers will be focused on our methodology, they will need several days to digest the new statistical analysis. In the meantime, I will plug the new statistical conclusions into our report. We will send the revised summary report to you for distribution to the reviewers on May 9, after our team has looked it over to ensure that it reflects Tim’s work accurately and that its policy conclusions and recommendations are well supported by the statistical analysis.

The reviewers will then have a couple of days to satisfy themselves about those same issues, and we can meet the tight time schedule.

This schedule is demanding, but meeting it is important to us so that our report is ready to be discussed with the Advisory Board at its meeting on May 24.

Please let me know if this timetable works for you.

Tom O’Neill
How about if we ask Eagleton for an estimate of the percent of costs they would attribute to the Voter ID portion of the study?

That way we can say the Voter ID study cost approximately X dollars. (And deductively, the Prov Vote study cost X dollars.)

Commissioner,
Per your question about how much of the contract was actually spent on voter ID research vs provisional voting... I have yet to find the answer. I have reviewed the RFP and the invoices, but so far, it does not appear that these tasks were tracked separately. Karen and I continue to look into this, but I wanted to let you know what we've found so far.

No, that has not been said publically. But in anticipation of it being asked, I want to make sure we have the facts straight.

Well, I certainly wouldn't want us to do anything inappropriate. And I don't know the regs and rules on what we can and cannot ask.

What do you suppose the problem might be with our asking that question?

We received 2 distinct products and we find that it would be helpful for us to know what we spent on each effort. We aren't questioning their record keeping, we aren't asking them to reconstruct or research their records, we aren't asking them for an itemization, just an estimate.

The problem is that EAC is saying we spent 500 thou on the Voter ID study. That is wrong info. We need to stop saying that and I hope that has not been said publically, otherwise we need to correct the record ASAP.

And we also did not spend 500 thou on the Provisional Voting study. So, I guess we just have to say we spent 500 thou for both and when asked what we spent for one, we say we don't know. ??

After having read the Eagleton draft report, I have some thoughts and questions:

I am troubled by the concept that Eagleton compared states as if they were equal. They assume that, all factors being equal, that the voter turn out in each state would be equal. I am not at all certain that this is the case. Further, there is no evidence that the statisticians actually compared previous years' turnout in the same state to determine whether 2004 was some sort of anomaly for that state (high or low). Long story short, I am very skeptical of the data that they used to draw conclusions. We should ask questions about what data they used, how they parsed it, why they used the data, what other data could have been used to provide better, more reliable results.

My second concern is how they (statistically speaking) differentiate between a minimum requirement (i.e. state name, photo i.d., etc) and a maximum requirement (i.e., state name, photo i.d., etc.). It makes no sense to me how they could possibly arrive at a different percentage for these requirement levels.

My third issue is the persistent use of the phrases "ballot access" and "ballot integrity" without some definition or some explanation of what those concepts are.

The EAC has identified three academics who are going to serve as peer reviewers of the Eagleton Voter ID paper and research.

They are Jonathan Nagler of New York University, Jan Leighley, University of Arizona, and Adam Berinsky of MIT.
They are ready to review the documents as soon as they are available.

I would like to them one week to review the material and then have a joint conference call on Thursday, May 11, in which we would all have an opportunity to discuss the research methodology and statistical analysis, along with general comments and suggestions.

If you are able to get to me the paper and the supporting data analysis, I will distribute to the documents ASAP.
Also let me know, if you would, your availability on May 11 to do this conference all.

I anticipate that it will last approximately 90 minutes.

Tom-

You'll recall that we discussed the fact that the peer review group who Eagleton has assembled do not have the sufficient technical expertise to give us the expert/technical advice we need on the statistical analysis of the Voter ID piece. Only two persons on Eagleton's peer review group have a requisite research and statistical background and knowledge.

You may also remember that Mike told me that he thought that the paper needed an additional set of eyes and review by academics with a background and expertise in election statistics and analysis. When I initially proposed a review panel of six you said that was too many; we agreed that I would find three persons to do the review and that we would pay them a small honoraria for doing the review.

Would like to get this out ASAP- appreciate your feedback..

Dear Jonathan Nagler
Dear Jan Leighley
Dear Adam Berinsky

On behalf of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), thank you in advance for agreeing to assist us with the review of research conducted by the Eagleton Institute of Politics on voter identification. By Friday, May 5, 2006, you will receive, in electronic form, the research paper and relevant data analysis which supports the paper’s findings. Through this independent review by a small group of experts familiar with elections data and research we are seeking feedback on:

- The research methodology which was used to support the paper’s conclusions
- The specific statistical applications which were used to analyze the data and arrive at various conclusions

If there are alternate methodological and statistical approaches to analyzing the data on voter identification, and if there is other data on voter identification that you think should have been included in the analysis, please be certain to note this in your comments.

On May 11, 2006 EAC will conduct a 60-90 minute phone call with key Eagleton Institute staff responsible for the research, members of Eagleton’s peer review group and the EAC-identified reviewers who have been asked to consider the research. Through this dialogue EAC hopes to gather varying perspectives and insights on the research strategies and methods that were employed by Eagleton. As a result of this conversation, EAC anticipates that some revisions will be made to the Eagleton research paper. This paper is scheduled to be presented to EAC’s Board of Advisors and Standards Boards in late May.

While EAC agency policy does not allow us to provide you with financial compensation for your review of this research we greatly appreciate your willingness to assist us with this important task. We believe that the research findings we will provide on voter identification are important and will most certainly be enhanced by your insights and expertise.
Sincerely,

Colleagues-

Attached please find the data analysis on voter identification requirements which the Eagleton Institute of Politics has prepared for the U.S. Election Assistance Commission.

As you will note from Eagleton's Project Manager, Tom O'Neill, the voter id paper which incorporates this analysis, and will be presented to the public in June, is forthcoming early next week.

EAC's Contract's Assistant, Aletha Barrington, will be in touch with each of you to provide specifics regarding the May 11, 11:30 am conference call, in which we will discuss the papers.

In the meantime, many thanks again for agreeing, on such short notice, to lend your expertise to this effort.

Karen,

Attached is Tim Vercellotti's Voter ID analysis revised to use Citizen Voting Age population as the base for turnout calculations and to take account of comments or issues raised by the EAC and our Peer Review Group. This draft is for distribution to the reviewers who will meet by teleconference on May 11, at, we understand, 11:30 a.m.

You are receiving this at the same time that it is being distributed to the Eagleton-Moritz team so that the new reviewers will have a week to prepare for our conversation on the 11th. Early next week you will receive a revised summary paper on Voter ID that incorporates the new data and findings in Tim's revised analysis. That too will be for distribution to the new reviewers.

Tom O'Neill

VoterIDAnalysis_VercRev0504.doc
Introduction

A key area of disagreement in the policy debate over voter identification requirements concerns whether such requirements dampen voter turnout. Opponents of voter identification laws argue that they constitute an institutional barrier to voting, particularly among the poor, African-Americans, Hispanics, the elderly and people with disabilities (Baxter and Galloway 2005, Electionline.org 2002, Jacobs 2005, Young 2006). This argument holds that voter identification requirements create an extra demand on voters, and thus may discourage some of them from participating in elections. Further, critics of voter identification requirements contend that the effect is greater for some specific types of requirements. For example, critics argue that requiring voters to produce government-issued photo identification on Election Day is more demanding than, say, requiring that they state their names at the polling place. Supporters of voter identification requirements, on the other hand, argue that the requirements are necessary to combat voter fraud, safeguard the integrity of the electoral process, and engender faith in the electoral process among citizens (Young 2006).

This report examines the potential variation in turnout rates based on the type of voter identification requirement in place in each state on Election Day 2004. It draws on two sets of data – aggregate turnout data at the county level for each state, as compiled by the Eagleton Institute of Politics, and individual-level survey data included in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau. Classification of voter identification requirements comes from a review of state statutes conducted by the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University.

Types of voter identification requirements

Based on research performed for this study by the Moritz College of Law, states had one of five types of requirements in place on Election Day 2004. Upon arrival at polling places, voters had to: state their names (nine states); sign their names (13 states and the District of Columbia); match their signature to a signature on file with the local election board (eight states); provide a form of identification that did not necessarily include a photo (15 states); or provide a photo identification (five states). It was then possible to code the states according to these requirements, and test the assumption that voter identification requirements would pose an increasingly demanding requirement in this order: stating one's name, signing one's name, matching one's signature to a signature on file, providing a form of identification, and providing a form of photo identification.

1 Oregon conducts elections entirely by mail. Voters sign their mail-in ballots, and election officials match the signatures to signatures on file. For the purposes of this analysis, Oregon is classified as a state that requires a signature match.
But election laws in numerous states offer exceptions to these requirements if individuals lack the necessary form of identification, and laws in those states set a minimum standard that a voter must meet in order to vote using a regular ballot (as opposed to a provisional ballot). Thus it is also possible to categorize states based on the minimum requirement for voting with a regular ballot. In 2004 the categories were somewhat different compared to the maximum requirement, in that none of the states required photo identification as a minimum standard for voting with a regular ballot. Four states, however, required voters to swear an affidavit as to their identity (Florida, Indiana, Louisiana, and North Dakota). The five categories for minimum requirements were: state name (12 states), sign name (14 states and the District of Columbia), match one’s signature to a signature on file (six states), provide a non-photo identification (14 states), or swear an affidavit (four states). For the purposes of this analysis I treated the array of minimum identification requirements also in terms of increasing demand on the voter: state name, sign name, match signature, provide non-photo identification, and, given the potential legal consequences for providing false information, swearing an affidavit.

This report examines turnout among U.S. citizens of voting age in both the aggregate-and the individual-level data. Determining citizenship status in the individual-level data simply involved restricting the analyses to individuals who identified themselves as citizens in the November 2004 Current Population Survey. (Those who said they were not citizens did not have the opportunity to answer the supplemental voting questions contained in the Current Population Survey.)

In the aggregate data, determining the percentage of the voting-age population that has U.S. citizenship posed a methodological challenge. The Census Bureau gathers information on the citizenship status of adults ages 18 and older only during the decennial census. While the Census Bureau provides annual estimates of the population to account for changes between decennial censuses, the bureau does not offer estimates for the proportion of the adult population who are citizens as part of the annual estimates. To address this issue I estimated the 2004 citizen voting-age population for each county using a method reported in the analysis of the 2004 Election Day Survey conducted for the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (U.S. Election Assistance Commission, 2005). I calculated the percentage of the 2000 voting-age population who were citizens in 2000, and applied that percentage to the July 1, 2004 estimates for voting-age population in each county. In other words, I assumed that the percentage of the voting-age population that had U.S. citizenship in 2004 was similar to the percentage of the voting-age population who were citizens in 2000.2

2 McDonald and Popkin (2001) recommend an even more stringent approach to voter turnout calculations. They point out that voting-age population estimates include adults who are ineligible to vote (such as convicted felons), and the estimates overlook eligible citizens living overseas. While estimates of the voting-eligible population are available at the state level, I was unable to find such estimates for individual counties, which provide the unit of analysis for the aggregate data analyzed here.
Analysis of aggregate data

If one treats maximum voter identification requirements as an ordinal variable, with photo identification as the most demanding requirement, one finds some statistical support for the premise that as the level of required proof increases, turnout declines. Averaging across counties in each state, statewide turnout is negatively correlated with maximum voter identification requirements ($r = -.30, p < .0001$). In considering the array of minimum requirements, with affidavit as the most demanding requirement, voter identification also is negatively correlated with turnout ($r = -.20, p < .0001$). Breaking down the turnout rates by type of requirement reveals in greater detail the relationship between voter identification requirements and voter turnout.

The aggregate data show that 60.9 percent of the estimated citizen voting age population voted in 2004. Differences in voter turnout at the state level in 2004 varied based on voter identification requirements. Taking into account the maximum requirements, an average of 64.6 percent of the voting age population turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 58.1 percent in states that required photo identification. A similar trend emerged when considering minimum requirements. Sixty-three percent of the voting age population turned out in states requiring voters to state their names, compared to 60.1 percent in states that required an affidavit from voters.

Voter identification requirements alone, however, do not determine voter turnout. Multivariate models that take into account other predictors of turnout can paint a more complete picture of the relationship between voter identification requirements and turnout. I estimated the effects of voter identification requirements in multivariate models that also took into account the electoral context in 2004 and demographic characteristics of the population in each county. I coded the voter identification requirements on a scale of one to five, with one representing the least demanding form of identification and five representing the most demanding form of identification. To capture electoral context I included whether the county was in a presidential battleground state (any state in which the margin of victory for the winning candidate was five percent or less), and whether the county was in a state with a competitive race for governor and/or the U.S. Senate (also using the threshold of a margin of victory of five percent or less). Drawing from U.S. Census projections for 2003, I included the percentage of the voting-age population in each county that was Hispanic or African-American to control for ethnicity and race. I controlled for age using the 2003 Census projection for the percentage of county residents age 65 and older, and I controlled for socioeconomic status by including the percentage of individuals who fell below the poverty line in each county in the 2000 Census.

I estimated a series of random intercept models to account for the likelihood that data from counties were correlated within each state (for further explanation of random intercept and other multilevel models, see Bryk and Raudenbush 1992, Luke 2004, Singer 1998). The

3 The data analyses provided evidence that there was, indeed, a clustering of data within each state. The intraclass correlation, bounded by 0 and 1, measures the variation between the states. A random intercept model using only the dependent variable in each model was voter turnout at the county level, with turnout calculated as the percentage of the estimated citizen voting-age population that voted in the 2004 election.

Turning first to an analysis using the maximum identification requirements, those requirements had a small and negative effect on turnout in 2004 controlling for electoral context and demographic factors. Both contextual factors (whether the county was in a state that was a battleground state and whether that state had a competitive race for governor and/or U.S. Senate) increased voter turnout. As the percentage of senior citizens in the county increased, so did turnout. The percentage of African-Americans in the county exerted a positive effect on voter turnout, and the percentage of individuals living below the poverty line had a negative effect. The effect of the percentage of Hispanic adults in the county on turnout fell just short of statistical significance (p = .05).

I then sought to test the hypothesis that voter identification requirements dampen turnout among minorities and the poor, a claim voiced by some critics of the requirements. To test this idea I incorporated a series of interactions between the maximum voter identification requirements and the percentage of African-Americans, Hispanics, and poor individuals in the counties. The interaction involving African-Americans was not significant, but those involving Hispanics and poor individuals were significant. In addition, adding the interactions to the model resulted in the percentage of Hispanics in the population having a direct and negative effect on turnout. The interactions suggest that voter identification requirements have a greater effect for Hispanics and those living below the poverty line. A chi-square test of the difference in the deviance for each model (represented by -2 log likelihood in Table 2), shows that the model with interactions provides a better fit to the data (p < 0.005).

The effects of the minimum requirements fell short of statistical significance (p = 0.08). The battleground state variable continued to exert a positive influence on turnout, while the presence of a competitive race for governor and/or U.S. Senate had no statistically significant effect. As in the maximum identification requirement model, as the percentage of the population that is poor increased, turnout declined. As the percentage of elderly increased, so did turnout. The proportion of African-Americans in the population had a positive effect on turnout, while the percentage of Hispanics did not affect turnout.

The interactions are labeled in Tables 2 and 3 as VID*African-American, VID*Hispanic, and VID*Poverty. To calculate the effects of voter identification requirements for a specific group, one must add the estimates for voter identification, the group, and the interaction. Doing so for Hispanic adults results in an estimate of -0.13 [-0.03 (voter id) - 0.13 (Hispanic) + 0.03 (voter id X Hispanic)].
Adding interactive effects to the model resulted in a statistically significant and negative effect of minimum voter identification requirements on turnout. The percentage of Hispanic adults in the county had a significant and negative effect on turnout, and the percentage of individuals below the poverty line continued to have a negative effect. Interactions between the percentages of Hispanics and those below the poverty line and minimum voter identification requirements also were significant. The percentage of African-Americans in the county and the interaction between African-Americans and voter identification requirements were not significant. A chi-square test for the difference in fit between the two models showed that the model with interactions provides a better fit to the data (p < .025).

Analysis of the aggregate data at the county level generates some support for the hypothesis that as the demands of voter identification requirements increase, turnout declines. This is particularly so for counties with concentrations of Hispanic residents or individuals who live below the poverty line. But aggregate data cannot fully capture the individual demographic factors that may figure into the decision to turn out to vote. For example, previous research has found that education is a powerful determinant of turnout (Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980, but see also Nagler 1991). Married individuals also are more likely to vote than those who are not married (Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002; Alvarez, Nagler and Wilson 2004; Fisher, Kenny, and Morton 1993). To fully explore the effects of voter identification requirements on turnout, it is important to examine individual-level data as well.

Individual-level turnout data exists in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau. The Census Bureau conducts the CPS monthly to measure unemployment and other workforce data, but the bureau adds a battery of voter participation questions to the November survey in even-numbered years to coincide with either a presidential or midterm Congressional election.

One of the advantages of the CPS is the sheer size of the sample. The survey’s Voting and Registration Supplement consisted of interviews, either by telephone or in person, with 96,452 respondents. The large sample size permits analyses of smaller groups, such as Black or Hispanic voters or voters with less than a high school education. The analyses reported here are based on reports from self-described registered voters. I omitted those who said they were not registered to vote. I also excluded those who said they cast absentee ballots because the identification requirements for absentee ballots may differ from those required when one votes in person. In addition, I eliminated from the sample respondents who said they were not U.S.

5 A reviewer for an earlier version of this paper recommended adding an education variable to the aggregate model. One version of the aggregate model not reported here included the percentage of adults in the county who had at least a college degree. The measure was highly collinear with the percentage of residents living below the poverty line, necessitating removal of the college degree variable from the model.

6 It is important to note that the Census Bureau allows respondents to answer on behalf of themselves and others in the household during the interview. While proxy reporting of voter turnout raises the possibility of inaccurate reports concerning whether another member of the household voted, follow-up interviews with those for whom a proxy report had been given in the November 1984 CPS showed 99 percent agreement between the proxy report and the information given by the follow-up respondent (U.S. Census Bureau 1990).

The dependent variable in these analyses is whether a respondent said he or she voted in the November 2004 election. As in the analysis of aggregate data, I coded voter identification requirements for each respondent’s state of residence on a scale of one to five, with one representing the least demanding requirement (stating one’s name) and five representing the most demanding requirement (photo identification or affidavit).

In addition to the voter identification requirements, the models include two other state-level factors that might have influenced turnout in 2004: whether the state was considered a battleground state in the presidential election, and whether there was a gubernatorial and/or U.S. Senate race in the state (see Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002, Alvarez et al. 2004, and Kenny et al. 1993 for similar approaches). As in the aggregate data analysis, the threshold that determined whether the state was a battleground state or had a competitive statewide race was a margin of victory of five percent or less. At the individual level, I controlled for gender, age in years, education, household income, and dummy variables representing whether a voter was Black/non-Hispanic, Hispanic, or another non-white race (with white/non-Hispanic voters as the omitted category for reference purposes). Drawing on previous research on voting behavior, I also controlled for whether an individual was employed, or at least a member of the workforce (as opposed to being a full-time student, a homemaker, or retired). Both employment and workforce membership have been shown to be positive predictors of turnout (see Mitchell and Wlezien 1995). Marital status, whether one is a native-born citizen and residential mobility also have emerged as significant predictors of turnout (Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002, Alvarez et al. 2004, Kenney et al. 1993, Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980). I included in the model variables for whether a respondent was married (coded 1 if yes, 0 otherwise), and whether one was a native-born citizen (coded 1 if yes, 0 otherwise). I measured residential mobility by coding for whether the respondent had moved to a new address in the six months prior to the interview (coded 1 if yes, 0 otherwise).

Results

The dependent variable is whether a respondent said he or she voted in the November 2004 election (coded 1 for yes, 0 for no). I estimated models using probit analysis, which

7 The U.S. Census Bureau reported, based on the November 2004 CPS, that 89 percent of those who identified themselves as registered voters said they voted in 2004 (U.S. Census Bureau 2005). Previous research has shown that, generally speaking, some survey respondents overstate their incidence of voting. Researchers speculate that over-reports may be due to the social desirability that accompanies saying one has done his or her civic duty, or a reluctance to appear outside the mainstream of American political culture (U.S. Census Bureau 1990). It is also possible that voting is an indication of civic engagement that predisposes voters to agree to complete surveys at a higher rate than non-voters (Flanigan and Zingale 2002). Hence the voter turnout rates reported in the CPS tend to be up to 10 percentage points higher than the actual turnout rate for the nation (Flanigan and Zingale 2002). Even with this caveat, however, the CPS serves as a widely accepted source of data on voting behavior.

8 Asian-Americans are included in the “other non-white races” category. In response to a request from officials at the U.S. Election Assistance Commission who had read an earlier version of this paper and were curious about the experiences of Asian-Americans, I ran models using Asian-Americans as a separate category in addition to the models presented here. Voter identification requirements did not have a statistically significant effect on whether Asian-American voters said they turned out in the 2004 election.
calculates the effects of independent variables on the probability that an event occurred – in this case whether a respondent said he or she voted. I estimated the models using robust standard errors to control for correlated error terms for observations from within the same state.

The two models in Table 4 use either the maximum or minimum voter identification requirements in each state. The two models generate virtually identical results. Voter identification requirements exert a statistically significant, negative effect on whether survey respondents said they had voted in 2004. Of the other state factors, only the competitiveness of the presidential race had a significant effect on turnout. In terms of demographic influences, African-American voters were more likely than white voters to say they had cast a ballot, while those of other non-white races were less likely than white voters to say they had turned out. Hispanic voters were not statistically different from white voters in terms of reported turnout. Consistent with previous research, age, education, income, and marital status all were positive predictors of voting. Women also were more likely to say they voted than men. Those who had moved within six months before the interview were less likely to say they had voted.

While the probit models provide statistical support for the influence of voter identification requirements and other variables on turnout, probit coefficients do not lend themselves to intuitive interpretation. Another common approach in studies of election requirements is to examine how the predicted probability of voter turnout would vary as election requirements vary. I used the probit coefficients to calculate the predicted probability of voting at each level of voter identification requirements while holding all other independent variables in the models at their means. I calculated the probabilities taking into account both maximum and minimum requirements, with photo identification serving as the most demanding of the maximum requirements and affidavits as the most demanding minimum requirement.

Allowing the voter identification requirement to vary while holding constant all other variables in the model showed that the predicted probability of turnout ranged from 0.912 for stating one’s name to 0.887 for photo identification under the maximum requirements. In other words, the probability of voting dropped with each level of voter identification requirement, with a total drop of .025, or 2.5 percent, across the five types of identification. When taking into account the minimum requirement for identification, the probability showed a similar decline, with a slightly larger total drop of 3.3 percent.

Among the key variables of interest in the debate over voter identification requirements are race, age, income, and education. Given the large sample size (54,973 registered voters), it

10 The voter turnout percentages may seem disproportionately high compared to the turnout rates reported in the aggregate data analysis. It is important to consider that the turnout rates in the aggregate data were a proportion of all citizens of voting-age population, while the turnout rates for the individual-level data are the proportion of only registered voters who said they voted.
was possible to break the sample into sub-samples along those demographic lines to explore variation in predicted probability by group. I disaggregated the sample by the variable of interest, omitting that variable while I re-ran the probit model with the remaining predictors of voter turnout, including the voter identification requirements. If the analysis showed that the voter identification requirements had a statistically significant effect on turnout, I used the probit coefficients from the model to calculate the predicted probability of voting for each group across the five requirements while holding the other variables in the model constant.

Both the maximum and minimum identification requirements had negative and statistically significant effects for White/Non-Hispanic voters. Allowing the requirements to vary from stating one's name to providing photo identification or an affidavit showed drops of 2.5 percent and 3.2 percent respectively in the predicted probability of voting. The identification requirements had no effect on the probability of Black/Non-Hispanics voting, but the minimum identification requirements had a comparatively sizable effect on voter turnout among Hispanics. The predicted probability of Hispanics voting ranged from 87 percent if stating one's name was the required form of identification to 77.3 percent if a voter would have to provide an affidavit in order to vote, a difference of 9.7 percent.

The effects of voter identification requirements also varied by age, with the greatest variation occurring among voters ages 18 to 24.

Voters in that age group had a predicted probability of 83.9 percent when the maximum requirement was stating one's name, and the probability dropped 8.9 percentage points if voters would have to provide photo identification. The range was from 83.1 percent to 75.4 percent under the minimum requirements. The gap in probability narrowed in older age groups (4.8 percent for the maximum requirements and 5.8 percent for the minimum requirements for those ages 25 to 44; 1.8 percent for the minimum requirements for those ages 45 to 64, and 2.4 percent for the minimum requirements for those ages 65 and older).

Breaking down the 18- to 24-year-old age group by race shed additional light on the effects of voter identification requirements on specific groups.

The gap in predicted probability that White/Non-Hispanic voters in the 18- to 24-year-old category would turn out was 9.2 percent when the identification requirements varied from stating one's name to providing photo identification. The gap was 7.8 percent when taking into account the minimum requirements. The effects of maximum voter identification requirements also were statistically significant for African-Americans in the 18- to 24-year-old age group, with a gap in the predicted probability of voting of 10.6 percent. Maximum and minimum voter identification requirements were not a significant predictor of voting among Hispanics ages 18 to 24.

Variation also emerged along the lines of income, with the effects of voter identification requirements varying to a greater extent for voters in households below the poverty line compared to those living above the poverty line.\textsuperscript{12}

While the maximum set of requirements did not have a statistically significant effect for voters living below the poverty line, the minimum set of requirements had a significant and negative effect. The probability of voting was .784 for poor voters if they would have to identify themselves by giving their name, and the probability declined to .731 if they would have to provide an affidavit attesting to their identity. Both the maximum and minimum sets of requirements had a significant and negative effect on voters living above the poverty line, but the difference in probability across the effects was narrower (2.3 percent for the maximum requirements and 3.1 percent for the minimum requirements). Given that political discourse about voter identification requirements includes concerns about the effects of the requirements on poor and minority voters, I also ran probit analyses for sub-samples of white and minority voters who fell below the poverty line. The voter identification requirements did not exert statistically significant effects on turnout among poor White/Non-Hispanic and Hispanic voters, but did have a significant effect on Black/Non-Hispanic voters who were below the poverty line.\textsuperscript{13} Allowing the maximum voting requirement to vary from the least to the most demanding, the probability that African-American voters below the poverty line said they had voted dropped by 7.5 percent.

Registered voters who had less than a high school education had a 77.5 percent probability of voting if the maximum requirement would be stating one's name, and a 70.8 percent probability if they would have to provide photo identification under the maximum requirement, a difference of 6.7 percent. The difference from the lowest to the highest requirement among the minimum requirements was 7.4 percent. The difference in probabilities ranged from 3.3 percent for the maximum requirements to 4.5 percent for the minimum requirements for voters with a high school diploma. The range of effects of voter identification requirements was smaller among those with higher levels of education (and non-existent for one category – voters with some college education).

\textsuperscript{12} I coded respondents as being above or below the U.S. Census Bureau's 2004 poverty line based on respondents' reported annual household income and size of the household.

\textsuperscript{13} The lack of significant effects for poor Hispanic voters is in contrast to the results from the aggregate data analysis. The sub-sample of poor Hispanic voters was small (n = 491), which may have contributed to the lack of statistical significance.
Discussion and conclusion

The results presented here provide evidence that as the level of demand associated with voter identification requirements increases, voter turnout declines. This point emerged from both the aggregate data and the individual-level data, although not always for both the maximum and minimum sets of requirements. The overall effect for all registered voters was fairly small, but still statistically significant.

The effects of voter identification requirements were more pronounced for specific subgroups. Hispanic voters and the poor appeared to be less likely to vote as the level of required identification became more demanding, according to both the aggregate and the individual-level data. In the individual-level data, for Hispanic voters, the probability of voting dropped by 9.7 percent across the various levels of minimum identification requirements. Survey respondents living in poor households were 5.3 percent less likely to vote as the requirements varied from stating one’s name to attesting to one’s identity in an affidavit. African-American voters from households below the poverty line were 7.5 percent less likely to vote as the maximum requirements varied from stating one’s name to providing photo identification.

Effects of voter requirements also varied with education. Registered voters who had not graduated from high school were 6.7 percent less likely to say they voted as the maximum requirements ranged from stating one’s name to providing photo identification. When considering the minimum requirements, those with less than a high school education were 7.4 percent less likely to say they voted if the requirement was an affidavit as opposed to stating one’s name. Age was also a key factor, with voters ages 18 to 24 being 7.7 percent to 8.9 percent less likely to vote as the requirements ranged from stating one’s name to providing a photo identification or affidavit. Breaking down the age group by race, the effects were significant for young White/Non-Hispanic and Black/Non-Hispanic voters.

The results shed additional light on the effects of voter identification requirements on two groups often projected as being particularly sensitive to such requirements: African-American voters and elderly voters. The effects on African-American voters were pronounced for two specific sub-samples: African-American voters living below the poverty line and those in the 18- to 24-year-old age group. Also, the elderly, while they would be slightly less likely to vote as requirements ranged from least to most demanding, would not necessarily be affected in the dramatic manner predicted by some opposed to photo identification requirements in particular.

In examining the effects of voter identification requirements on turnout, there is still much to learn. The data examined in this project could not capture the dynamics of how identification requirements might lower turnout. If these requirements dampen turnout, is it because individuals are aware of the requirements and stay away from the polls because they cannot or do not want to meet the requirements?14 Or, do the requirements result in some voters

14 The individual-level data offer some insight here. If advance knowledge of the voter identification requirements were to dampen turnout, it is reasonable to expect that advance knowledge of those requirements also could discourage some individuals from registering to vote. I ran the same probit models using voter registration as the dependent variable (coded 1 if the respondent said he or she was registered, and 0 if the respondent was not being turned away when they cannot meet the requirements on Election Day? The CPS data do not include measures that can answer this question. Knowing more about the “on the ground” experiences of voters concerning identification requirements could guide policy-makers at the state and local level in determining whether and at what point in the electoral cycle a concerted public information campaign might be most effective in helping voters to meet identification requirements. Such knowledge also could help in designing training for election judges to handle questions about, and potential disputes over, voter identification requirements.

registered). Neither the maximum nor minimum array of voter identification requirements had a statistically significant effect on the probability that a survey respondent was registered to vote.

Figures represent the predicted probability of registered voters saying they voted as the identification requirement varies from the lowest to the highest point in the scale, with all other variables held constant. Maximum and minimum voter identification requirements were not a significant predictor of voting for those with some college education.

Karen,
I plan to send you late today or early tomorrow the revised Voter ID report that will be included in our teleconference on Thursday. Once that is in your hands, I will turn my attention to the Provisional Voting report, and will have that to you before the end of the week.

Has 11:30 been confirmed as the time for the teleconference?

Attached please find the complete packet of materials that will serve as the basis for our conference call on Thursday. You have already received the statistical analysis; the voter ID report was submitted this morning.

The Eagleton staff have noted that you may find the material contained in Appendix A useful to your review; the other appendices are likely to be less germane.

The call in information for Thursday:

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS TO THE EAC
VOTER IDENTIFICATION ISSUES

Report Background
This report to the United States Election Assistance Commission (EAC) analyzes the effects of voter identification requirements on turnout in the 2004 election and makes recommendations for best practices to evaluate proposals for voter ID requirements. It is based on research conducted by the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey, and the Moritz College of Law at Ohio State University under a contract to the EAC, dated May 24, 2005. The research included a review and legal analysis of state statutes, regulations and litigation concerning voter identification and provisional voting, and a statistical analysis of the effects of various requirements for voter identification on turnout in the 2004 election. This report is a companion to a draft report on Provisional Voting submitted to the EAC on November 28, 2005 under the same contract.

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) (Public Law 107-252) authorizes the EAC (Sec. 241, 42 USC 15381) to conduct periodic studies of election administration issues. The purpose of these studies is to promote methods for voting and administering elections, including provisional voting, that are convenient, accessible and easy to use; that yield accurate, secure and expeditious voting systems; that afford each registered and eligible voter an equal opportunity to vote and to have that vote counted; and that are efficient.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Methods
To explore the effects of voter ID requirements on electoral participation in 2004, as measured by turnout, we gathered information on the requirements in effect in the 50 states and the District of Columbia in that year. We assigned each state to one of five categories based on its ID requirements. They are progressively more rigorous based on the demands they make on voters.1 The categories range from "Stating Name" which we judge to be somewhat less demanding than "Signing Name." "Signature Match" requires poll workers to examine the signature and compare it to a sample, which is slightly more demanding that the voter simply signing. "Present ID" requires voters to offer some documentary evidence of their identity.

1 Even the most relaxed provisions for identification at the polls —anything stricter than the honor system used in North Dakota—will impose some burden on particular voters. Harvard Law Review 119:1151 ranging from a utility bill to a passport. It is more demanding than the previous three categories because it requires that the voter remember to bring this documentation to the polls. (Even a simple ID, such as a utility bill, may not be available to some renters or, say, those in group housing.) We regard a government “Photo ID” as the most rigorous requirement. Such identity documents may not be uniformly and conveniently available to all voters.

To examine the potential variation on turnout rates associated with each type of voter ID requirements in effect on Election Day 2004, we drew on two sets of data. These were, first, aggregate turnout data at the county level for each state and, second, the reports of individual voters collected in the November 2004 Current Population Survey by the U. S. Census Bureau. Using two different data sets makes it possible to check the validity of one analysis against the other. It also provides insights not possible using only one of the data sets. The aggregate analysis cannot provide valid estimates on the effects of different ID requirements on particular demographic groups (e.g., the old, the young, African-Americans, the poor, or high school graduates). The Current Population Survey data does permit that kind of analysis, although it has the disadvantage of relying on self-reports by respondents about their registration status and experience in the polling place.

To understand legal issues that have been raised in recent litigation over voter ID requirements, we collected and analyzed the few major cases that have been decided on this issue. The decisions so far suggest the constitutional and other constraints on voter ID requirements.

Findings

Our analysis of data from the 2004 election indicates that the form of identification required of voters affects turnout. Lack of ID can keep voters from the polls or prevent them from casting a regular ballot if they go to the polling place. This finding emerged from both the analysis of aggregate, county-level data and the individual-level data of the Current Population Survey. The overall effect for all registered voters was fairly small, but statistically significant.

Voter turnout in 2004 was lower in states where voter identification requirements were more demanding. The data show a general movement toward lower turnout as voters are required to present levels of proof of their identity.

2 It also seems reasonable to conclude that in states that require an identity document to vote, more voters—those lacking the required ID—will cast provisional ballots. This conclusion is a conjecture because we lack precise information on why voters must cast their ballots provisionally.
The aggregate data show that 60.9 percent of the estimated citizen voting age population turned out in 2004. An average of 64.6 percent turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 58.1 percent in states that required photo identification, a reduction of 6.5 percentage points. That figure, however, probably overstates the effect of voter ID requirements since the inclusion of other factors in the analysis diminishes the extent of influence of voter ID on turnout. After taking account of other factors, the analysis supports the hypothesis that as voter identification requirements increases, turnout declines.

The effects were more pronounced for some specific subgroups. Hispanic voters, the poor and those who did not graduate from high school appear to be less likely to vote as the identification requirement becomes more demanding. The analysis for some other demographic groups illustrate the range of effects predicted for more rigorous voter ID requirements:

Race or Ethnicity
- In the individual-level data for Hispanic voters, the probability of voting dropped by 9.7 percent across the various levels of identification requirements.
- More rigorous ID requirements did not have a statistically significant effect when looking at all African-Americans, but
- African-American voters from households below the poverty line were 7.5 percent less likely to vote as the ID requirements varied from stating one's name to providing photo identification.

Income
- Citizens from poor households were 5.3 percent less likely to vote as the requirements varied from stating one's name to attesting to one's identity in an affidavit.

Education
- Registered voters who had not graduated from high school were 6.7 percent less likely to say they voted as the requirements ranged from stating one's name to providing photo identification.
Age

- Age was also a key factor, with voters ages 18 to 24 being 7.7 percent to 8.9 percent less likely to vote as the requirements ranged from stating one’s name to providing a photo identification or affidavit.
- Turnout by young (18-24) African-American voters in states that required a government-issued photo ID was about 10% less likely to vote than in states where they had only to state their name.
- The elderly, while they would be slightly less likely to vote as the requirements changed from stating name to providing photo ID, would not necessarily be affected in the dramatic manner predicted by opponents of photo identification requirements.

Our analysis of litigation suggests that the courts will look strictly at requirements that voters produce a photo ID in order to cast a regular ballot. The courts have used a balancing test to weigh the legitimate interest in preventing election fraud against the citizen’s right to privacy (protecting social security numbers from public disclosure, for example) and the reasonableness of requirements for identity documents. To provide both the clarity and certainty in administration of elections needed to forestall destabilizing challenges to outcomes, best practice for the states may be to limit requirements for voter identification to the minimum needed to prevent duplicate registration and ensure eligibility.

Evidence on the incidence of vote fraud, especially on the kind of vote fraud that could be reduced by requiring more rigorous voter identification is not now sufficient to evaluate the tradeoffs between ensuring ballot access and ensuring ballot integrity.\(^3\) Assessing the effectiveness of voter ID as a way to protect the integrity of the ballot should logically include an estimate of the nature and frequency of vote fraud. This research does not include consideration of vote fraud nor the possible effectiveness of various voter ID regimes to counter attempts at vote fraud. As a result, our analysis of the effects of voter ID requirements on turnout cannot take into account how many potential voters who did not turn out under comparatively stricter voter ID requirements might have been ineligible or eligible to vote.

The current lack of understanding of precisely how voter ID requirements affect turnout can be remedied by requiring the collection and reporting of data on the reasons potential voters are required to cast a provisional ballot and the reasons for rejecting provisional ballots during the

\(^3\) The EAC has contracted with other researchers to study vote fraud issues.
2006 and subsequent elections. Also useful would be the results of surveys of voters on their experiences in meeting voter ID requirements and on what type of ballot they cast. And, of course, more information is needed on the incidence and varieties of vote fraud, but that inquiry is outside the scope of this report.

A voting system that requires voters to produce an identify document or documents may indeed prevent the ineligible from voting. It may also prevent eligible voters from casting a ballot. If the ID requirement of a ballot protection system blocks ineligible voters from the polls at the cost of preventing eligible voters who lack the required forms of identification, the integrity of the ballot may not have been improved; the harm may be as great as the benefit.

Recommendations for consideration and action by the EAC

The dynamics of Voter ID requirements – how more rigorous voter ID requirements affect the decision by potential voters to go or stay away from the polls -- are not well understood. This lack of understanding should be recognized in the policy process in the states. The debate over voter ID in the states would be improved by additional research sponsored by the EAC.

The EAC should consider the following actions to improve understanding of the relationship between voter ID requirements and the two important goals of ensuring ballot access and ensuring ballot integrity.

1. Encourage or sponsor further research to clarify the connection between Voter ID requirements and the number of potential voters actually able to cast a ballot.

2. Recommend as a best practice the publication of a “Voting Impact Statement” by states as they assess their voter ID requirements to protect the integrity of the ballot. The analysis will help ensure that efforts to increase ballot security have a neutral effect on electoral participation by eligible voters. The Voter Impact Statement would estimate the number and demographics of 1) eligible, potential voters that may be kept from the polls or permitted to cast a provisional ballot by a stricter ID requirement; and 2) and assess the number of ineligible voters who will be prevented from voting by the stricter ID requirements.

4 Arizona held its first election with its new, stricter ID requirements on March 14, 2006. In at least one county (Maricopa) election officials handed a survey to voters that asked if they knew about the voter identification law and if they did, how they found out about it. Edythe Jensen, “New Voter ID Law Goes Smoothly in Chandler,” Arizona Republic, March 15, 2006. More surveys of this kind can illuminate the dynamics of voter ID and voting in ways that are not possible now because of insufficient data.
3. Encourage or require the states in the 2006 election and beyond, to collect and report reliable, credible information on the relationship between ballot access and ballot security. EAC should publish an analysis of this information to provide a sound factual basis for the states to consider as they estimate the incidence of the kinds of vote fraud that more stringent ID requirements may prevent. The analysis should describe the dynamics of the voter ID process in preserving the security of the ballot. EAC can also use this information to encourage the states to assess the effectiveness of programs to ensure that all eligible voters have required ID and are permitted to vote in future elections.

   I. Useful information could be supplied by state-sponsored surveys of voters by local election officials. It would make clear why those who cast a provisional ballot were found ineligible to cast a regular ballot. The answers would illuminate the frequency with which ID issues divert voters into the provisional ballot line.

   II. Surveys to ask voters what they know about the voter ID requirements would also provide useful context for evaluating the effect of various voter ID requirements on electoral participation.

   III. Spot checks by state election officials on how the identification process works at polling places could provide information on how closely actual practice tracks statutory or regulatory requirements. Such reports should be available to the public.

4. Encourage states to examine the time period allowed for voters who cast a provisional ballot because they lacked required ID to return with their identification. In eleven states, voters who had to cast a provisional ballot because they lacked the ID required for a regular ballot were permitted to return later with their ID. Their provision of this ID is the critical step in evaluating the ballots. The length of the period in which the voter may return with ID is important. In setting the time period for return, which now varies among the states from the same day to about two weeks, states should consider three factors: the convenience of the voter, the total time allowed to evaluate ballots, and the safe harbor provision in presidential elections.

5. Recommendations to the states from EAC should reflect current judicial trends. Requirements that voters provide some identifying documentation have been upheld, where photo ID is not the only acceptable form. Whether laws requiring photo ID will be upheld is more doubtful. To date, only one court has considered a law requiring voters to show photo ID (Common Cause v. Billups), and that court concluded that this requirement is likely unconstitutional.

SUMMARY OF RESEARCH

Background and Approach of the Study

Establishing the eligibility of a person to vote has long been part of the electoral process. Voters may have to identify themselves twice in the electoral process: when registering to vote and then when casting a ballot. The pressures felt by the voter arising from the need to check ID, even so simple a check as a signature match, can be greater at the polls on Election Day than at the time of registration. Poll workers may feel under pressure when faced with long lines and limited time.

This analysis focuses on ID requirements on Election Day, but with an appreciation that the ID requirements at time of registration and on Election Day are inter-related. The emphasis in this report is on Voter ID requirements on Election Day and afterwards as election judges evaluate provisional ballots. This is the critical period for the electoral system, the time when ballot access and ballot security are in the most sensitive balance.

The report looks broadly at voter ID issues and goes beyond the rather narrow identification requirements in HAVA. Much of the current debate in state legislatures over voter ID ranges beyond HAVA to require more rigorous documentation of identity for all would-be voters, not just those who had not registered in person and are casting a ballot for the first time. Current controversies in the states over voter ID seems to have been sparked in part by the HAVA requirements, but goes beyond those requirements, and sets the context for the analysis here.

We recognize that the previously technical, rather dull subject of voter ID requirements has become fiercely partisan and divisive in many states. The polarization of the debate has raised the stakes over this issue, making dispassionate analysis both more valuable and more rare.

6 As the Carter-Baker Commission noted, photo ID requirements for in-person voting do little to address the problem of fraudulent registration by mail, especially in states that do not require third-party organizations that register voters to verify ID. Commission on Federal Election Reform, pp 46-47.

7 Harvard Law Review 119:1127: "Legislators hoping to stiffen their state antifraud laws have taken their cue from identification provisions buried in HAVA."

8 "Of the various electoral procedure laws passed in the fifty states since the 2000 and 2004 presidential elections and those still being debated in state legislatures and local media, few arouse more potent partisan feelings than voter identification laws." Harvard Law Review 119:1144. John Fund's 2004 book, Stealing Elections: How Voter Fraud Threaten Our Democracy, cites (pages 16 – 17) a Rasmussen Research poll that asked respondents if they were more concerned with voting by ineligible participants or with disenfranchisement of eligible voters. Sixty-two percent of Kerry supporters, but only 18 percent of Bush supporters, worried more about disenfranchisement; 58 percent of Bush supporters, but only 19 percent of Kerry supporters were more concerned with voter fraud.
Voter ID is often described as the critical step in protecting the integrity of the ballot, the process to ensure that the potential voter is eligible and, if eligible, is permitted to cast one ballot and one ballot only. Truly protecting the integrity of the ballot, however, requires a perspective that takes in the entire voting process. It demands more than preventing the ineligible from voting, and should also ensure that all those who are eligible and want to vote can cast a ballot that counts. The protection effort must embrace all forms of voting, including absentee ballots, and consider each step in the process from registration through vote counting.

A voting system that requires voters to produce an identity document or documents may prevent the ineligible from voting. It may also prevent the eligible from casting a ballot. If the ID requirements block ineligible voters from the polls at the cost of preventing eligible voters who cannot obtain or have left at home the required forms of identification, the integrity of the ballot may not have been improved; the harm may be as great as the benefit.

Assessing the effectiveness of voter ID as a way to protect the integrity of the ballot should logically include an estimate of the nature and frequency of vote fraud. The EAC has informed us that it has commissioned a separate analysis of the incidence of vote fraud. Consequently, this research does not include consideration of vote fraud nor the possible effectiveness of various voter ID regimes to counter attempts at vote fraud. As a result, our analysis of the effects of voter ID requirements on turnout cannot take into account how many potential voters who did not turn out under comparatively stricter voter ID requirements might have been ineligible or eligible to vote.

In some states, voters lacking required ID, or who have ID that does not reflect their current address, are able to vote only by casting a provisional ballot. Voter ID requirements that require voters to bring a document to the polls --rather than simply sign their names-- can divert more voters to the provisional ballot. Requiring poll workers to request and check ID, can put stress on the already demanding environment of the polling place. Scrutiny of ID can create lines at the polling places. Further delays can result when voters cast a provisional ballot and fill out the ballot envelope. Voters who cast a provisional ballot because they lack their ID on Election Day, and who then fail to return with the needed document or documents, will have their ballot

9 For example, the Florida voter ID law adopted after the 2004 election and pre-cleared by the Department of Justice, permits voters who cannot meet the ID requirements to sign an affidavit on the envelope of a provisional ballot, which will be counted if the signature matches that on the voter's registration form.
rejected. And, of course, the cost of processing provisional ballots is greater than the cost of regular ballots.

Each of these potential consequences of more elaborate voter identification processes can increase the chance of litigation. Long lines will, at best, discourage voters and at worst make voting seem a hassle, an impression that could keep more citizens (even those with ID) from the polls. In conducting this analysis, we were sensitive to the observation that the problem with American elections may well be that too many people do not vote rather than that a few people may vote more than once.

Evaluating the effect of different Voter ID regimes can be most effective when based on clear standards--legal, equitable, practical. The standards outlined here can best be described as the questions policy-makers should ask about Voter ID requirements. We suggest 7 questions that address important dimensions of the problem.

1. Is the Voter ID system designed on the basis of valid and reliable empirical studies of the incidence of the sorts of vote fraud it is designed to prevent?11
2. How effective is the ID requirement in increasing the security of the ballot? How well can it be coordinated with a statewide voter database?12
3. How practical is the requirement? (Can it be administered smoothly by the staff and budget likely to be made available? How much additional training of polling place workers might be required?) Is it simple enough or can it be defined with sufficient clarity that poll workers throughout the state can administer it uniformly and with a minimum of local interpretation made on the fly under the pressure of Election Day?13
4. How cost-effective is the system? Does it demonstrably increase the security of the ballot affordably, measured in both monetary and other costs? To improve

10 The EAC's Election Day Study found "improper ID," to be the third most common reason for a provisional ballot to be rejected. "Improper ID" was cited by 7 states responding to the survey, compared to 14 mentions for voting in the wrong precinct. Election Day Study, Chapter 6, p. 5.
11 "Often where the battle over voter identification is most heated, real evidence of voter fraud proves scarce: in Georgia, for example, the Secretary of State averred that she had never encountered a single instance of voter impersonation at the polls. State laws might sometimes impose tighter restrictions on in-person voting than on absentee ballots, which yield the greatest incidence of, and provide the easiest avenue for, voter fraud..." Harvard Law Review 127:1144 (2006)
12 See the final section of this report for a brief overview of possible effects of a statewide voter database on voter identification issues.
13 In New York, in 2004, disparities in training and voting information were made apparent in a study finding elections officials had wildly varying interpretations of what the state's voter identification requirement actually was. Tova Wang, "Warning Bell in Ohio," December 5, 2005. Website, the Foundation for National Progress.
understanding of the non-monetary component of the costs, conducting a voter impact study might be appropriate. The voter impact study would examine, before the adoption of the regulation, the cost of compliance by the voter (such as the cost in time and money of acquiring a photo ID card), any offsetting benefits to voters, and the possible disparate effects of the regulation on various groups of voters.\textsuperscript{14} A thorough, objective impact statement that demonstrated the nexus between the identification regime and the integrity of the ballot could provide protection against inevitable legal challenges.

5. If a side effect of the Voter ID regulation is likely to reduce turnout, generally or among particular groups, is it possible to take other steps to ameliorate the adverse consequences?\textsuperscript{15}

6. Does it comply with the letter and spirit of Voting Rights Act?\textsuperscript{16}

7. The seventh question is the most difficult to answer. Does the Voter ID requirement have a neutral result on the composition of the qualified and eligible electorate? ID requirements should not be designed to, nor unintentionally, reduce the turnout of particular groups of voters or supporters of one party or another.

\textbf{Voter ID and Turnout}

As of the 2004 election, the states and the District of Columbia could be divided into 5 different Voter ID regimes. These are shown in Table 1, \textit{Voter ID Requirements}. Nine states required that voters give their names; 14 that they sign their names; 8 match the signature to a sample in the registration book; 15 require some form of ID (ranging from a utility bill to a government-issued photo ID), and 5 states in 2004 required a photo ID, although in all those states voters without that credential could cast a regular ballot after signing an affidavit concerning their identity and eligibility or provide other forms of ID.

We recognize the difficulties in summarizing each state's voter ID requirements. The problem is illustrated by the number of footnotes to Table 1 below. The variety of statutory and regulatory details among the states is complex. Moving beyond the statutes and regulations, \textsuperscript{14} "Absent clear empirical evidence demonstrating widespread individual voter fraud, legislatures need to fashion narrowly tailored voter identification provisions with an eye toward the inevitable and well-grounded constitutional challenges that will arise in the courts. Only as states grow more adept at administering elections will courts likely demonstrate greater willingness to uphold strict identification requirements." Harvard Law Review 127:1144 (2006)

we also recognize that the assignment of each state to one category may fail to reflect actual practice at many polling places.

Like any system run by fallible people, the voter ID process is subject to variation in practice. Voters may be confronted with demands for identification different from the directives in state statutes or regulation. Under the pressures of Election Day, there is no sure way to report the wide variety of conditions each voter encounters. It seems reasonable to conclude, however, that while actual practices may vary, the variance is around each state's legal requirement for ID. The analysis of the effect of state requirements on turnout must be viewed with some caution. Nevertheless, we are satisfied that the categories used in this report provide a level of discrimination among voter identification regimes sufficient for the analysis that we have undertaken.

* States applies only HAVA's ID requirement, applicable for first-time voters who registered by mail and did not provide applicable ID at the time of registration.

1 Arizona voters who lack a photo ID may present 2 forms of ID with no photograph.
2 Florida required a photo ID in 2004. Voters without that credential could sign an affidavit concerning their identity and eligibility and cast a regular ballot. Florida subsequently changed its law to require that voters present photo ID to cast a regular ballot, though voters without photo ID may still cast a provisional ballot by signing an affidavit, which ballot should ordinarily be counted.
3 Louisiana required a photo ID in 2004. Voters without that credential could sign an affidavit concerning their identity and eligibility and cast a regular ballot.
4 Pennsylvania requires ID of all first-time voters, whether they registered by mail or in-person.
5 Voters lacking a photo ID could vote by providing another form of ID in 2004.
6 Voters lacking a photo ID could vote by providing another form of ID in 2004.
7 Tennessee voters must provide signature and address. In counties without computerized lists, the signature is compared to the registration card. In counties with computerized lists, the signature is compared to a signature on ID presented with the registration.
8 Texas voters must present a current registration certificate. Those without a certificate can vote provisionally after completing an affidavit.
Effect of Voter ID requirements on Turnout

We examined the potential variation in turnout rates based on the type of voter identification required in each state on Election Day 2004 using two sets of data: aggregate turnout data at the county level for each state, as compiled by the Eagleton Institute of Politics, and individual-level survey data included in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau. Classification of voter identification requirements comes from a review of state statutes conducted by the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University.

The Voter ID category assigned to each state is shown in Table 1. We analyzed turnout data for each county according to the voter identification requirements of its state. We also assessed self-reported turnout by the sample interviewed in the November 2004 Current Population Survey of the Census Bureau.

Voter turnout at the state level in 2004 varied based on voter identification requirements. An average of 64.6 percent of the citizen voting age population turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 58.1 percent in states that required photo identification. Other factors, of course, also influence turnout. Taking those other factors into account in the county-level analysis makes the effect of the voter ID requirement less dramatic. But the analysis supports the hypothesis that as voter identification requirements become more stringent, turnout declines. The effect is particularly noticeable in counties with concentrations of Hispanic residents or of people living below the poverty line.

The individual-level analysis, based on the CPS, produced a similar result. Voter identification requirements exert a statistically significant, negative effect on whether survey respondents said they had voted in 2004. The probability that a respondent to the survey voted dropped with each level of voter identification requirement, with a total drop of 2.5 percent across the five types of identification.

Methods

Based on research performed for this study by the Moritz College of Law, states had one of five types of requirements in place on Election Day 2004. Upon arrival at polling places, voters had to: state their names (nine states); sign their names (13 states and the District of Columbia); match their signature to a signature on file with the local election board (eight states); provide a form of identification that did not necessarily include a photo (15 states); or provide a photo identification (five states). 19

We coded the states according to these requirements to test the assumption that voter identification requirements would pose an increasingly demanding requirement in this order: stating one’s name, signing one’s name, matching one’s signature to a signature on file, providing a form of identification, and providing a form of photo identification.

Election laws in many states, however, offer exceptions to these requirements if potential voters lack the necessary form of identification, and laws in those states set a minimum standard that a voter must meet in order to vote using a regular ballot (as opposed to a provisional ballot). In recognition of this fact, we also categorized states based on the minimum requirement for voting with a regular ballot.

In 2004 none of the states required photo identification as a minimum standard for voting with a regular ballot. Four states, however, required voters to swear an affidavit as to their identity (Florida, Indiana, Louisiana, and North Dakota The five categories for minimum requirements were: state name (12 states), sign name (14 states and the District of Columbia), match one’s signature to a signature on file (six states), provide a non-photo identification (14 states), or swear an affidavit (four states).

We treated the minimum ID in terms of increasing demand on the voter: state name, sign name, match signature, provide non-photo identification, and, given the potential legal consequences for providing false information, swearing an affidavit.

We examined turnout among U.S. citizens of voting age in both the aggregate and the individual-level data. Determining citizenship status in the individual-level data simply involved restricting the analyses to individuals who identified themselves as citizens in the November 2004 Current Population Survey. (Those who said they were not citizens did not have the opportunity to answer the supplemental voting questions contained in the Current Population Survey.)

The aggregate data posed a greater challenge to determine percentage of the voting-age population that has U.S. citizenship. The Census Bureau gathers information on the citizenship status of adults ages 18 and older only during the decennial census. While the Census Bureau provides annual estimates of the population to account for changes between decennial censuses, the bureau does not offer estimates for the proportion of the adult population who are citizens as part of the annual estimates. To address this issue we estimated the 2004 citizen voting-age population for each county using a method reported. Therefore, we calculated the percentage of the 2000 voting-age population who were citizens in 2000, and applied that percentage to the July 1, 2004 estimates for voting-age population in each county. This method was used in the analysis of the 2004 Election Day Survey conducted for the U.S. Election Assistance Commission.

We classified each state as having one of five types of identification requirements in place on Election Day 2004. Upon arrival at polling places, voters had to either: state their names (9 states); sign their names (13 states and the District of Columbia); match their signature to a signature on file with the local election board (8 states); provide a form of identification that did not necessarily include a photo (15 states); or provide a photo identification (5 states). We then tested the assumption that voter identification requirements would prove to be increasingly demanding on the voter, with providing photo ID the most rigorous. In the statistical analysis, we coded the voter identification requirements on a scale of one to five, with one representing the least demanding form of identification and five representing the most demanding form of identification.

Findings

As the level of required ID proof increases, with photo identification as the most demanding requirement, turnout declines. Averaging across counties in each state, statewide turnout is negatively correlated with maximum voter identification requirements ($r = -.30, p < .0001$). In considering the array of minimum requirements, with affidavit as the most demanding requirement, voter identification also is negatively correlated with turnout ($r = -.20, p < .0001$). Breaking down the turnout rates by type of requirement reveals in greater detail the relationship between voter identification requirements and voter turnout.

The aggregate data show that 60.9 percent of the estimated citizen voting age population voted in 2004. Differences in voter turnout at the state level in 2004 varied based on voter identification requirements. Taking into account the maximum requirements, an average of 64.6 percent of the voting age population turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 58.1 percent in states that required photo identification. A similar trend emerged when considering minimum requirements. Sixty-three percent of the voting age population turned out in states requiring voters to state their names, compared to 60.1 percent in states that required an affidavit from voters.

Voter identification requirements alone do not determine voter turnout. Other factors make a difference in turnout, often a greater difference than the ID requirements. Multivariate models can take into account other predictors of turnout and therefore paint a more complete picture of the relationship between voter identification requirements and turnout. The model used here also took into account such variables as:

- Was the county in a presidential battleground state?
- Was the county was in a state with a competitive race for governor and/or the U.S. Senate?
- Percentage of the voting-age population in each county that was Hispanic or African-American
- Percentage of county residents age 65 and older
- Percentage of county residents below the poverty line

The dependent variable in each model was voter turnout at the county level, with turnout calculated as the percentage of the citizen voting-age population that voted in the 2004 election.
The maximum ID requirements had a small and negative effect on turnout in 2004 controlling for electoral context and demographic factors. Both contextual factors (whether the county was in a state that was a battleground state and whether that state had a competitive race for governor and/or U.S. Senate) increased voter turnout. The more senior citizens and African-Americans in the county, the higher the turnout. The percentage of the population living below the poverty reduced turnout. The effect of the percentage of Hispanic adults in the county on turnout fell just short of statistical significance (p = .05).

The analysis tested the hypothesis that stricter voter ID requirements dampen turnout among minorities. The data revealed no statistically significant effect on turnout for African-Americans in general. But it revealed a significant reduction in turnout for Hispanics and the poor. The analysis using the minimum ID categories produced similar results.

Analysis of the aggregate data at the county level supports the hypothesis that as voter ID requirements grow stricter, turnout declines. This effect is strongest in counties with concentrations of Hispanic residents or families below the poverty line. But aggregate data cannot fully capture the individual demographic factors that may figure into the decision to turn out to vote. For example, previous research has found that education is a powerful determinant of turnout. Married people are more likely to vote than those who are not married. To explore the effects of voter identification requirements on turnout, examining individual-level data is important.

Individual-level Analysis

Information collected for the Census Bureau Current Population Survey in November 2004 makes it possible to examine the influence of voter ID requirements at the individual level. Self-identified registered voters reported their experience at the polls in the survey. Note that the voter turnout rate for the CPS sample, an average of 89%, is much higher than the turnout rates presented in the aggregate data analysis, which average 60.9%. The difference is a result of several factors, including different denominators in calculating the turnout rate – self-reported registered voters in the CPS versus the much larger citizen voting-age population for the aggregate data. Also some survey respondents overstate their incidence of voting. Nevertheless, the CPS serves as a widely accepted source of data on voting behavior. One of the advantages of the CPS is the sheer size of the sample. The survey’s Voting and Registration Supplement consisted of interviews, either by telephone or in person, with 96,452 respondents. The large sample size permits analyses of smaller groups, such as Black or Hispanic voters or voters with less than a high school education. The analyses reported here are based on reports from self-described registered voters. Excluded are those who said they were not registered to vote and those who said they cast absentee ballots because the identification requirements for absentee ballots may differ from those required when one votes in person. Also excluded are respondents who said they were not U.S. citizens. The dependent variable in these analyses is whether a respondent reported voting in the November 2004 election. As in the aggregate analysis, stricter voter ID requirements exert a statistically significant, negative effect on whether survey respondents said they had voted in 2004.

Predicted probability of registered voters saying they voted as the identification requirement varies from the lowest to the highest point in the scale, with all other variables held constant. Data source: U.S. Census Bureau, Current Population Survey, Voting and Registration Supplement, November 2004.

21 The Census Bureau allows respondents to answer on behalf of themselves and others in the household during the interview. While proxy reporting of voter turnout raises the possibility of inaccurate reports, follow-up interviews with those for whom a proxy report had been given in the November 1984 CPS showed 99 percent agreement between the proxy report and the information given by the follow-up respondent.

22 The CPS did not ask the voting questions of respondents who were not U.S. citizens. The design of the questionnaire skips those questions for non-citizens.
The influence of voter identification requirements, holding all other variables constant, is shown in Table 3 below. The probability of voting dropped with each level of voter identification requirement, with a total drop of 2.5 percent, across the five types of identification for the maximum requirement and 3.3% for the minimum requirements.\footnote{The voter turnout percentages may seem disproportionately high compared to the turnout rates reported in the aggregate data analysis. It is important to consider that the turnout rates in the aggregate data were a proportion of all citizens of voting-age population, while the turnout rates for the individual-level data are the proportion of only registered voters who said they voted.}

Among the key variables of interest in the debate over voter identification requirements are race, age, income, and education. Given the large sample size (54,973 registered voters), it was possible to break the sample into sub-samples along those demographic lines to explore variation in predicted probability by group.

Both the maximum and minimum identification requirements had negative and statistically significant effects for White/Non-Hispanic voters. Allowing the requirements to vary from stating one's name to providing photo identification or an affidavit showed drops of 2.5 percent and 3.2 percent respectively in the predicted probability of voting. The predicted probability of Hispanics voting ranged from 87 percent if stating one's name was the required form of identification to 77.3 percent if a voter would have to provide an affidavit in order to vote, a difference of 9.7 percent.

The effects of voter identification requirements also varied by age, with the greatest variation occurring among voters ages 18 to 24.

- Turnout in states requiring photo ID was predicted as 8.9 percentage points lower than in states where voters simply stated their names.
- The strictest ID requirements reduced the probability that White/Non-Hispanic voters in the 18- to 24-year-old category would turn out by 7.8 to 9.2 percentage points.
- For African-Americans in the 18- to 24-year-old age group the gap was 10.6 percentage points.

Variation also emerged along the lines of income, with the effects of voter identification requirements varying to a greater extent for voters in households below the poverty line compared to those living above the poverty line.\footnote{Respondents were coded as being above or below the U.S. Census Bureau's 2004 poverty line based on their reported annual household income and size of the household.}
vary from the least to the most demanding, the probability that African-American voters below the poverty line said they had voted dropped by 7.5 percent.

The effects of voter identification requirements varied across education levels as well.
Registered voters who had less than a high school education had a 77.5 percent probability of voting if the maximum requirement would be stating one's name, and a 70.8 percent probability if they would have to provide photo identification under the maximum requirement, a difference of 6.7 percent. The range of effects of voter identification requirements was smaller among those with higher levels of education (and non-existent for one category – voters with some college education).

Conclusions of the Analysis

As the stringency of voter identification requirements increases, voter turnout declines. This point emerged from both the aggregate data and the individual-level data, although not always for both the maximum and minimum sets of requirements. The overall effect for all registered voters was fairly small, but statistically significant.

The effects of voter identification requirements were more pronounced for specific subgroups.
Hispanic voters and the poor appeared to be less likely to vote as the level of required identification became more demanding, according to both the aggregate and the individual-level data.

- In the individual-level data, for Hispanic voters, the probability of voting dropped by 9.7 percent across the various levels of minimum identification requirements.
- Survey respondents living in poor households were 5.3 percent less likely to vote as the requirements varied from stating one's name to attesting to one's identity in an affidavit.
- African-American voters from households below the poverty line were 7.5 percent less likely to vote as the maximum requirements varied from stating one's name to providing photo identification.

Effects of voter requirements also varied with education.
- Registered voters who had not graduated from high school were 6.7 percent less likely to say they voted as the maximum requirements ranged from stating one's name to providing photo identification.
• When considering the minimum requirements, those with less than a high school education were 7.4 percent less likely to say they voted if the requirement was an affidavit as opposed to stating one’s name.

Age was also a key factor, with voters ages 18 to 24 being 7.7 percent to 8.9 percent less likely to vote as the requirements ranged from stating one’s name to providing a photo identification or affidavit. Breaking down the age group by race, the effects were significant for young White/Non-Hispanic and Black/Non-Hispanic voters.

The results shed additional light on the effects of voter identification requirements on two groups often projected as being particularly sensitive to such requirements: African-American voters and elderly voters.

• The effects on African-American voters were pronounced for two specific sub-samples, African-American voters living below the poverty line and those in the 18- to 24-year-old age group.

• The elderly, while they would be slightly less likely to vote as requirements ranged from least to most demanding, would not necessarily be affected in the dramatic manner predicted by some opposed to photo identification requirements in particular.

The data examined in this project could not capture the dynamics of how identification requirements might lower turnout. Do potential voters who cannot or do not want to meet the identification requirements simply stay away from the polls? Or, do the requirements result in some voters being turned away when they cannot meet the requirements on Election Day? (Proponents of stricter voter ID requirements might argue that some part of the reduction comes from keeping the truly ineligible from voting.)

Our data alone cannot resolve these questions. Knowing more about the “on the ground” experiences of voters concerning identification requirements could guide policy-makers at the state and local level in determining whether and at what point in the electoral cycle a concerted public information campaign might be most effective in helping voters to meet identification requirements. Such knowledge also could help in designing training for election judges to handle questions about, and potential disputes over, voter identification requirements. It is important to note that the 2004 data do not allow us to draw conclusions about the effect of laws such as those recently passed in Georgia and Indiana, which require government-issued photo ID. No such laws were in place in 2004, and the five states that then required photo ID at the time allowed voters who signed an affidavit or provided another form of identification to cast a regular ballot.

Litigation Over Voter ID Requirements

A handful of cases have challenged identification requirements in court in recent years. In general, requirements that voters provide some identifying documentation have been upheld, where photo ID is not the only acceptable form. Whether laws requiring photo ID will be upheld is more doubtful. To date, only one court has considered a law requiring voters to show photo ID (Common Cause v. Billups), and that court concluded that this requirement is likely unconstitutional. Cases challenging the mandatory disclosure of voters’ Social Security numbers on privacy grounds have yielded mixed results.

Non-photo identification. For the most part, courts have looked favorably on requirements that voters present some form of identifying documents if the photo identification is not the only form accepted. In Colorado Common Cause v. Davidson, No. 04CV7709, 2004 WL 2360485, at *1 (Colo. Dist. Ct. Oct. 18, 2004), plaintiffs challenged a law requiring all in-person voters to show identification (not just first-time registrants). The court upheld this requirement against a constitutional challenge. Similarly, in League of Women Voters v. Blackwell, 340 F. Supp. 2d 823 (N.D. Ohio 2004), the court rejected a challenge to an Ohio directive requiring first-time voters who registered by mail to provide one of the HAVA-permitted forms of identification, in order to have their provisional ballots counted. Specifically, the directive provided that their provisional ballots would be counted if the voter (a) orally recited his driver’s license number or the last four digits of his social security number or (b) returned to the polling place before it closed with some acceptable identification (including reciting those identification numbers). Id. This was found to be consistent with HAVA.

Photo ID. Since the 2004 election, two states have adopted laws requiring photo identification in order to have one’s vote counted, without an affidavit exception: Georgia and Indiana. Both these requirements were enacted in 2005 and both have been challenged in court. The Georgia law required voters attempting to cast a ballot in person present a valid form of photographic identification. O.C.G.A. § 21-2-417. On October 18, 2005, the District Court granted the Plaintiff’s motion for a preliminary injunction, enjoining the application of the new identification requirements on constitutional grounds. In granting the injunction, the court held that plaintiffs' claims under both the Fourteenth Amendment (equal protection) and Twenty-Fourth Amendment (poll tax) had a substantial likelihood of succeeding on the merits at trial (Common Cause v. Billups, Prelim. Inj. 96, 104). In January 2006, Georgia enacted a modified version of its photo ID law, which the court has not yet ruled on. In the other state that has enacted a photo ID requirement without an affidavit exception (Indiana), legal challenges have also been filed. (Indiana Democratic Party v. Rokita and Crawford v. Marion County Election Board). Cross-motions for summary judgment are currently pending. Another case of significance, for purposes of photo ID requirements, is American Civil Liberties Union of Minnesota v. Kitimeyer, No. 04-CV-4653, 2004 WL 2428690, at *1 (D. Minn. Oct. 28, 2004). In that case, the court enjoined a Minnesota law that allowed the use of tribal photo ID cards, only for an Indian who lived on the reservation. 2004 WL 2428690, at *1. The Court found no rational basis for distinguishing based on whether or not the cardholder lives on the reservation. Id. at *1, 3. The court’s decision in this case indicates that courts are likely to look strictly on photo ID requirements.

Privacy. In Greidinger v. Davis, 988 F.2d 1344 (4th Cir. 1993), the court struck down on due process grounds a Virginia law requiring disclosure of voters’ social security numbers for voter registration. The social security numbers recorded in voter registration lists had been disclosed to the public and political parties that had requested the lists. The court found that the requirement to give the social security number effectively conditioned rights on the consent to an invasion of privacy. It concluded that this public disclosure of the social security numbers was not necessary to achieve the government’s interest in preventing fraud. On the other hand, in McKay v. Thompson, 226 F.3d 752 (6th Cir. 2000), the court rejected privacy challenges based on both the Constitution and federal statutes, to a Tennessee law requiring social security numbers for voter registration since 1972. 226 F.3d at 755. Second, the NVRA only permits requiring the minimum amount of information necessary to prevent duplicate voter registration and to determine eligibility. The distinction appears to be between the use of Social Security numbers for internal purposes only, which was deemed permissible, and the disclosure of those numbers to the public which was not.

These decisions suggest that the courts will look strictly at requirements that voters produce a photo ID in order to cast a regular ballot. The courts have used a balancing test to weigh the legitimate interest in preventing election fraud against the citizen's right to privacy (protecting social security numbers from public disclosure, for example) and the reasonableness of requirements for identity documents. To provide both the clarity and certainty in administration of elections needed to forestall destabilizing challenges to outcomes, these early decisions suggest that best practice may be to limit requirements for voter identification to the minimum needed to prevent duplicate registration and ensure eligibility.

Developments since 2004
Since the passage of HAVA, with its limited requirements for voter identification, and following the 2004 election, debate over voter ID has taken place in state legislatures across the country. That debate has not been characterized by solid information on the consequences of tightening requirements for voters to identify themselves before being permitted to cast a regular, rather than a provisional, ballot.

Better information might improve the quality of the debate. Answers to the following key questions are not available in a form that might satisfy those on both sides of the argument.

- What is the overall incidence of vote fraud?
- How does fraud take place in the various stage of the process: registration, voting at the polls, absentee voting, or ballot counting?
- What contribution can tighter requirements for voter ID make to reducing vote fraud?
- What would be the other consequences of increasingly demanding requirements for voters to identify themselves? This is the question addressed, within the limits of the available data, in the analysis in this report.

Answering these questions would provide the information needed for more informed judgment in the states as they consider the tradeoffs among the competing goals of ballot integrity, ballot access, and administrative efficiency. The Carter-Baker Commission recognized the tradeoffs when it tied recommendation for national ID to an affirmative effort by government to identify unregistered voters and make it easy for them to register.

State Voter Databases and Voter ID
With the implementation of the HAVA Computerized Statewide Voter Registration List, an application for voter registration for an election for Federal office may not be accepted or processed unless the application includes a driver's license number or last four digits of the Social Security number on the voter registration form. This information can be used to verify the identity of the registrant through interfacing with lists maintained by the Motor Vehicle office and Social Security office. If registrants do not have either a driver's license or Social Security number, the State will assign a unique identifier number to that person.

HAVA does not require that the states notify registrants to remedy any failure to provide either of these numbers or to confirm that they have provided a verifiable number. Verification at the time of registration could forestall difficulties at the polling place. HAVA is silent on how the ID might be required at the polling place for new voters whose driving license or Social Security number could not be verified. Errors in recording those numbers are sure to occur.

Some states are wrestling now with these unresolved issues. In New Jersey, for example, pending legislation would require that voters must be able to confirm their registration through a secure access to the SVRL. It also requires voters to present ID at the polls in order to cast a regular ballot if the numbers recorded on the registration have not been verified (or if no verifiable number appears on the registration). It recognizes the HAVA requirement that if the number provided by the voter has not been verified and if the voter does not present ID at the polls, that voter may cast a provisional ballot. The bill does not specify they have to provide ID within 48 hours in order for their vote to count, as is the case with first-time mail-in registrants.

As some states gain experience in this area, the EAC would perform a useful service by making timely recommendations of best practices for all states to consider.

Conclusions

The form of Voter ID required of voters affects turnout. Lack of ID can keep voters from the polls. Or, when they go to the polls, it is reasonable to conclude that stricter Voter ID requirements will divert more voters into the line for provisional ballots. (This conclusion is a conjecture because we lack good data on why voters must cast their ballots provisionally.) The result can be longer lines at the polls and confusion, without a clear demonstration that the security of the ballot is correspondingly increased.

In this connection, the Brennan Center's response to the Carter-Baker Commission report observes that, "while it might be true that in a close election "a small amount of fraud could make the margin of difference," it is equally true that the rejection of a much larger number of eligible voters could make a much bigger difference in the outcome." Response to the Report of the 2005 Commission on Federal
The dynamics of Voter ID requirements—how the more rigorous Voter ID requirements—affect the decision by potential voters to go or stay away from the polls are not well understood. This lack of understanding should be recognized in the policy process. The debate over voter ID in the states would be improved by additional research sponsored by the EAC. So far as it may be necessary to reduce vote fraud made possible by inadequate voter ID, the research could identify methods to eliminate the need for voters to bring specific identity documents with them to the polls while assuring that each voter who casts a ballot is eligible and votes only once.

One way to break the connection between the benefits of photo ID and the need for the voter to bring identification to the polling place, as recommended elsewhere by one of the authors of this report, Edward Foley: keep the information to verify a voter’s identity in the records at the polling place. Other approaches could be developed. 26

26 "A potential solution to this problem is to break the connection with the photo requirement and the obligation to produce identification at the polls. Eligible citizens could be required to provide a photograph at the time they register to vote, and poll workers would match this photograph with the image of the person standing in front of them. Given the availability of digital photography, the photos of registered voters could be stored in electronic poll books and easily "pulled up" with a click of a computer mouse when voters sign in to vote. Of course, to satisfy the concerns of liberals, a requirement to provide a digital photograph at time of registration would have to address the cost and accessibility issues identified earlier."

| Alabama   | Provide ID                | (b) Each elector shall provide identification to an appropriate election official prior to voting. A voter required to show identification when voting in person shall present to the appropriate election official either of the following forms of identification:

   (1) A current valid photo identification.
   (2) A copy of a current utility bill, bank statement, government check, paycheck, or other government document that shows the name and address of the voter.

The term "other government document" may include, but is not limited to, any of the following:

   a. A valid identification card issued by a branch, department, agency, or entity of the State of Alabama, any other state, or the United States authorized by law to issue personal identification.
   b. A valid United States passport.
   c. A valid Alabama hunting or fishing license.
   d. A valid Alabama permit to carry a pistol or revolver.
   e. A valid pilot's license issued by the Federal Aviation Administration or other authorized agency of the United States.
   f. A valid United States military identification card.
   g. A certified copy of the elector's birth certificate.
   h. A valid Social Security card.
   i. Certified naturalization documentation.
   j. A certified copy of court records showing adoption or name change.
   k. A valid Medicaid card, Medicare card, or an Electronic Benefits Transfer Card (formerly referred to as a "food stamp card").

(c) For voters required to show identification when voting by mail, the voter shall submit with the ballot a copy of one of the forms of identification listed in subsection (b).
(e) An individual required to present identification in accordance with this section who is unable to meet the identification requirements of this section shall be permitted to vote by a challenged or provisional ballot, as provided for by law.
(f) In addition, an individual who does not have identification in his or her possession at the polls shall be permitted to vote if the individual is positively identified by two election officials as a voter on the poll list who is eligible to vote and the election official signs the voters list by where the voter signs.

| Arizona | Provide ID | B. If a statewide voter registration database is not yet operational, for any person who has registered to vote by mail for the first time in this state after January 1, 2003 or who is reregistering by mail after January 1, 2003 after moving from one county to another county in this state, the person shall comply with the following in order to be issued a ballot:

1. The person shall present either one of the following:

(a) A current form of identification that bears a photograph of the person and the name of the person.

(b) A current utility bill, bank statement, paycheck, government issued check or other government document that shows the name and registration address of the person.

2. If the person does not present a document that complies with paragraph 1, the person is only eligible to vote a provisional ballot as prescribed by § 16-584.

| Arkansas | Provide ID | 7-5-305. Requirements.

(a) Before a person is permitted to vote, the election official shall:
(1) Request the voter to identify himself in order to verify the existence of his name on the precinct voter registration list;
(2) Request the voter, in the presence of the election official, to state his address and state or confirm his date of birth;
(3) Determine that the voter's date of birth and address are the same as those on the precinct voter registration list;
(4) If the date of birth given by the voter is not the same as that on the precinct voter registration list, request the voter to provide identification as the election official deems appropriate;
(5)(A) If the voter's address is not the same as that on the precinct voter registration list, verify with the county clerk that the address is within the precinct.
(B) If the address is within the precinct, request the voter to complete a voter registration application form for the purpose of updating county voter registration record files.
(C) If the address is not within the precinct, instruct the voter to contact the county clerk's office to determine the proper precinct;
(6) If the voter's name is not the same as that on the precinct voter registration list, request the voter to complete a voter registration application form for purposes of updating county voter registration record files;
(7) Request the voter, in the presence of the election official, to sign his name, including his given name, his middle name or initial, if any, and his last name in the space provided on the precinct voter registration list. If a person is unable to sign his signature or make his mark or cross, the election official shall enter his initials and the voter's date of birth in the space for the person's signature on the precinct voter registration list; and

(8)(A) Request the voter for purposes of identification to provide a valid driver's license, photo identification card issued by a governmental agency, voter card, social security card, birth certificate, United States passport, employee identification card issued by a governmental agency containing a photograph, employee identification card issued in the normal course of business of the employer, student identification card, Arkansas hunting license, or United States military identification card.

(B)(i) If a voter is unable to provide this identification, the election official shall indicate on the precinct voter registration list that the voter did not provide identification.

(ii) Following each election, the county board of election commissioners may review the precinct voter registration lists and may provide the information of the voters not providing identification at the polls to the prosecuting attorney.

(iii) The prosecuting attorney may investigate possible voter fraud; and

(9) Follow the procedures under §§ 7-5-310, 7-5-311, and 7-5-523, if the person is a disabled voter and presents himself or herself to vote.

Do I Need an I.D. to Vote on Election Day?

Yes. Be sure to have an I.D. with a picture and signature (such as a Hawaii driver's license or state I.D. card) when you go to vote. The NVRAC card is not an acceptable form of identification.

From the 2004 version of the administrative code.

Every person upon applying to vote shall sign the person's name in the poll book prepared for that purpose. This requirement may be waived by the chairperson of the precinct officials if for reasons of illiteracy or blindness or other physical disability the voter is unable to write. Every person shall provide identification if so requested by a precinct official. A poll book shall not contain the social security number of any person.

After signing the poll book and receiving the voter's ballot, the voter shall proceed to the voting booth to vote according to the voting system in use in the voter's precinct. The precinct official may, and upon request shall, explain to the voter the mode of voting.

Last amended 2003.
shall likewise repeat said name, and the voter shall be allowed to enter within the proximity of the voting booths, as above provided. One of the judges shall give the voter one, and only one of each ballot to be voted at the election, on the back of which ballots such judge shall indorse his initials in such manner that they may be seen when each such ballot is properly folded, and the voter's name shall be immediately checked on the register list. In those election jurisdictions where perforated ballot cards are utilized of the type on which write-in votes can be cast above the perforation, the election authority shall provide a space both above and below the perforation for the judge's initials, and the judge shall endorse his or her initials in both spaces. Whenever a proposal for a constitutional amendment or for the calling of a constitutional convention is to be voted upon at the election, the separate blue ballot or ballots pertaining thereto shall, when being handed to the voter, be placed on top of the other ballots to be voted at the election in such manner that the legend appearing on the back thereof, as prescribed in Section 16-6 of this Act, shall be plainly visible to the voter. At all elections, when a registry may be required, if the name of any person so desiring to vote at such election is not found on the register of voters, he or she shall not receive a ballot until he or she shall have complied with the law prescribing the manner and conditions of voting by unregistered voters. If any person desiring to vote at any election shall be challenged, he or she shall not receive a ballot until he or she shall have established his right to vote in the manner provided hereinafter; and if he or she shall be challenged after he has received his ballot, he shall not be permitted to vote until he or she has fully complied with such requirements of the law upon being challenged.

Besides the election officer, not more than 2 voters in excess of the whole number of voting booths provided shall be allowed within the proximity of the voting booths at one time. The provisions of this Act, so far as they require the registration of voters as a condition to their being allowed to vote shall not apply to persons otherwise entitled to vote, who are, at the time of the election, or at any time within 60 days prior to such election have been engaged in the military or naval service of the United States, and who appear personally at the polling place on election day and produce to the judges of election satisfactory evidence thereof, but such persons, if otherwise qualified to vote, shall be permitted to

If the voter registration cards are used in the precinct, the election official in charge of the precinct registration file shall compare the signature upon the application with the signature upon the registration card. If voter registration lists are used in the precinct, the election inspector shall determine if the name on the application to vote appears on the voter registration list. If the name appears on the voter registration list, the elector shall provide further identification by giving his or her date of birth or other information stated upon the voter registration list. In precincts using voter registration lists, the date of birth may be required to be placed on the application to vote. If the signature or an item of information does not correspond, the vote of the person shall be challenged, and the same procedure shall be followed as provided in this act for the challenging of an elector. If the person offering to vote has signed the registration card or application by making a mark, the person shall identify himself or herself by giving his or her date of birth, which shall be compared with the date of birth stated upon the registration card or voter registration list, or shall give other identification as may be referred to upon the registration card or voter registration list. If the elector does not have an official state identification card, operator's or chauffeur's license as required in this subsection, or other generally recognized picture identification card, the individual shall sign an affidavit to that effect before an election inspector and be allowed to vote as otherwise provided in this act. However, an elector being allowed to vote without the identification required under this subsection is subject to challenge as provided in section 727.

(2) If, upon a comparison of the signature or other identification, it is found that the applicant is entitled to vote, the election officer having charge of the registration list shall approve the application and write his or her initials on the application, after which the number on the ballot issued shall be noted on the application. The application shall serve as 1 of the 2 poll lists required to be kept as a record of a person who has voted. The application shall be filed with the township, city, or village clerk. If voter registration cards are used in the precinct, the date of the election shall be noted by 1 of the election officials upon the precinct registration card of each elector voting at an election. If voter registration lists are used in the precinct, the election official shall clearly indicate upon the list each elector voting at that election. The clerk of a city, village, or township shall maintain a record of voting participation for each registered elector.

1. A person before being allowed to vote shall be required, except as provided in this chapter, to sign his name on the back of his registration poll record on the first line reserved for his signature at the time of election which is not filled with a previous signature, or on the line of the computer generated registration list reserved for his signature. The two inspectors in charge shall satisfy themselves by a comparison of this signature with his registration signature and by comparison of his appearance with the descriptive material on the face of the registration poll record that he is the person registered. If they are so satisfied they shall enter the other information required for the election on the same line with the voter's latest signature, shall sign their names or initials in the spaces provided therefor, and shall permit the applicant to vote. Any inspector or inspectors not satisfied shall challenge the applicant forthwith.

2. If a person who alleges his inability to sign his name presents himself to vote, the board of inspectors shall permit him to vote, unless challenged on other grounds, provided he had been permitted to register without signing his name. The board shall enter the words "Unable to Sign" in the space on his registration poll record reserved for his signature or on the line of the computer generated registration list reserved for his signature at such election. If his signature appears upon his registration record or upon the computer generated registration list the board shall challenge him forthwith, except that if such a person claims that he is unable to sign his name by reason of a physical disability incurred since his registration, the board, if convinced of the existence of such disability, shall permit him to vote, shall enter the words "Unable to Sign" and a brief description of such disability in the space reserved for his signature at such election. At each subsequent election, if such disability still exists, he shall be entitled to vote without signing his name and the board of inspectors, without further notation, shall enter the words "Unable to Sign" in the space reserved for his signature at such election.

3. The voter's signature made by him upon registration and his signature made at subsequent elections shall be effectively concealed from the voter by a blotter or piece of opaque paper until after the voter shall have completed his signature.

4. In any case where a person who has heretofore voted has placed his voting signature on the back of his registration poll record on the first or any succeeding line or lines at the time or times of an election, instead of on the last line of the space thereon required to be reserved for such voting signatures and on any lines next running upward therefrom, the inspectors of election shall obliterate such misplaced signature or signatures, initial the obliteration and require such voter to sign his name again in the correct place on such registration poll record.

5. Any person who has heretofore registered and who at such time placed his or her registration signature on the back of the registration poll record otherwise than in the space required to be provided therefor at the bottom of such poll record, shall, before being permitted to vote at any election thereafter, subscribe a new registration signature for himself on the last line at the bottom of such poll record, and, at the same time, if the inspectors of election are satisfied that the signatures were made by the same person, obliterate his original registration signature placed elsewhere than on the bottom of such record. Such obliterations may be made by crossing out the signature so as to completely efface the same or by affixing thereover a piece of gummed tape of a size sufficient only to cover such signature and of a type adequate to fully conceal the same.

(b) The voter shall sign the application in the presence and view of a bipartisan pair. They shall locate the voter's name on the certified voting list for the voting district. Upon finding the voter's name on the certified voting list for the district, they shall initial the ballot application in the place provided next to the word "Approved" and shall enter on the certified list of voters a proper notation that the applicant has voted in the election. They shall then return the ballot application to the voter who shall pass down the line and present it to the clerk. After the voter has handed the approved ballot application to the clerk, the clerk shall provide the voter with the appropriate computer ballot and security sleeve, the warden shall direct the voter to the voting booth which the voter shall use, and unless the voter needs instruction or assistance as provided in this chapter, the voter shall cast his or her vote, and if he or she desires place the voted computer ballot in a security sleeve, and shall proceed to the optical scan precinct count unit and shall personally place his or her voted ballot into the designated ballot slot on the unit, and after doing so, shall leave the enclosure at once. No voter shall remain within the voting booth longer than ten (10) minutes, and if the voter refuses to leave after the lapse of ten (10) minutes, the voter shall be removed from the voting booth by order of the warden. Except for the election officials and the election inspector, not more than two (2) voters in excess of the number of voting booths shall be permitted within the enclosed space at any time.

When any person presents himself to vote, he shall produce his valid South Carolina driver's license or other form of identification containing a photograph issued by the Department of Motor Vehicles, if he is not licensed to drive, or the written notification of registration provided for by §§ 7-5-125 and 7-5-180 if the notification has been signed by the elector. If the elector loses or defaces his registration notification, he may obtain a duplicate notification from his county board of registration upon request in person, or by telephone or mail. After presentation of the required identification, his name must be checked by one of the managers on the margin of the page opposite his name upon the registration books, or copy of the books, furnished by the board of registration. The managers shall keep a poll list which must contain one column headed "Names of Voters". Before any ballot is delivered to a voter, the voter shall sign his name on the poll list, which must be furnished to the appropriate election officials by the State Election Commission. At the top of each page the voter's oath appropriate to the election must be printed. The signing of the poll list or the marking of the poll list is considered to be an affirmation of the oath by the voter. One of the managers shall compare the signature on the poll list with the signature on the voter's driver's license, registration notification, or other identification and may require further identification of the voter and proof of his right to vote under this title as he considers necessary. If the voter is unable to write or if the voter is prevented from signing by physical handicap, he may sign his name to the poll list by mark with the assistance of one of the managers.

<td>A voter shall sign an application for ballot, indicate the primary in which the voter desires to vote, if any, and present it to a registrar. The application for ballot shall include thereon a space for the address of the voter's current residence, and the voter shall write or print such address on the application when the voter signs it. The registrar shall compare the signature and information on the application with the signature and information on the duplicate permanent registration record. The registrar shall make a determination whether the voter's address is different from the address on the voter's permanent registration record or if the registration is in inactive status. If the voter has changed residence, or the voter's registration is inactive, the registrar shall follow the procedures for voting pursuant to § 2-7-140. If, upon comparison of the signature and other identification, it is found that the applicant is entitled to vote, the registrar shall initial the application and shall note on the reverse side of the voter's duplicate permanent registration record the date of the election, the number of the voter's ballot application, and the elections in which the voter votes. If the applicant's signature is illegible, the registrar shall print the name on the application. The registrar shall give the voter the ballot application which is the voter's identification for a paper ballot or ballots or for admission to a voting machine. The voter shall then sign the duplicate poll lists without leaving any lines blank on any poll list sheet. (2) In any computerized county, the county election commission shall have the option of using an application for ballot as provided in this section, or using the computerized voter signature list. A computerized voter signature list shall include the voter's name, current address of residence, social security number or registration number, birth date and spaces for the voter's signature, elections voted, ballot number and precinct registrar's initials. The following procedures shall be followed in the case of computerized voter signature lists: (A) The voter shall sign the signature list and indicate the election or elections the voter desires to vote in and verify the voter's address in the presence of the precinct registrar; (B) The registrar shall compare the voter's signature and information on the signature list with other evidence of identification supplied by the voter. If, upon comparison of the signature and other evidence of identification, it is found that the applicant is entitled to vote, the registrar shall initial the signature list; (C) If the applicant's signature is illegible, the registrar shall print the name of the applicant on the voter list; and (D) If a voter is unable to present any evidence of identification specified in subsection (c), the voter shall be required to execute an affidavit of identity on a form provided by the county election commission.</td>

West Virginia | Match Sig. | (a) Any person desiring to vote in an election shall, upon entering the election room, clearly state his or her name and residence to one of the poll clerks who shall thereupon announce the same in a clear and distinct tone of voice. If that person is found to be duly registered as a voter at that precinct, he or she shall be required to sign his or her name in the space marked "signature of voter" on the pollbook prescribed and provided for the precinct. If that person is physically or otherwise unable to sign his or her name, his or her mark shall be affixed by one of the poll clerks in the presence of the other and the name of the poll clerk affixing the voter's mark shall be indicated immediately under the affixation. No ballot may be given to the person until he or she so signs his or her name on the pollbook or his or her signature is so affixed thereon.

(c) When the voter's signature is properly on the pollbook, the two poll clerks shall sign their names in the places indicated on the back of the official ballot and deliver the ballot to the voter to be voted by him or her without leaving the election room. If he or she returns the ballot spoiled to the clerks, they shall immediately mark the ballot "spoiled" and it shall be preserved and placed in a spoiled ballot envelope together with other spoiled ballots to be delivered to the board of canvassers and deliver to the voter another official ballot, signed by the clerks on the reverse side required by this subsection. The voter shall thereupon retire alone to the booth or compartment prepared within the election room for voting purposes and there prepare his or her ballot using a ballpoint pen of not less than five inches in length or other indelible marking device of not less than five inches in length. In voting for candidates in general and special elections, the voter shall comply with the rules and procedures prescribed in section five, article six of this chapter.

APPENDIX B – Court Decisions and Literature on Voter Identification and Related Issues

Court Decisions

Summary of Relevant Cases:

Challenges Prevailed:

American Civil Liberties Union of Minnesota v. Kiffmeyer, 2004
- Action for temporary restraining order – granted
- Statute: allowed use of tribal identification cards w/ name, address & photo as a valid identification to register to vote only if the voter lives on the reservation to "complete" a mail-in application (which only affected about 600 voters w/ incomplete applications)
- Claim - 14th Amendment EPC: likely to prevail, no rational basis for a distinction between Indians residing on reservations and those not
- Statute: may use certain forms of photo identification lacking address together with a utility bill but not tribal identification cards
- Claim - 14th Amendment EPC: likely to prevail

Greidinger v. Davis, 1993
- Statute: mandated disclosure of SS # as a precondition to voter registration (rationale was voter identification, but the numbers were rarely used to verify identity & were disclosed in voter lists to both political parties and the public upon request)
- Claims:
  - 14th Amendment EPC: no classification (applied strict scrutiny)
  - Substantive due process: law invalid; found that the statute conditioned the fundamental right to vote on the consent to an invasion of privacy; this was found to be a substantial burden (applied strict scrutiny)
    - Compelling interests: preventing voter fraud (deemed compelling)
    - Necessary: fails, preventing voter fraud when allowing names for inspection could be achieved by supplying addresses and DOBs or use of voter registration numbers
    - HOWEVER: Court also made it clear that if the registration scheme kept the SS# for internal use only – it would be valid

Challenges Rejected:

- Sec. of State Directive: provisional ballots issued if first-time voter, who registered by mail and did not provide ID, cannot produce proper ID at the polls AND that the provisional ballot will only be counted if the voter returns to the poll before it closes w/ ID or can recite SS# or DL#
- Claims – Supremacy Clause & HAVA: ruled that HAVA did not specify how the first-time voters' identifications should be verified and this method was not unreasonable or too burdensome

Colorado Common Clause v. Davidson, 2004
- Statute: required all voters to show ID (most types permitted) before voting
- Claims:
  - HAVA: ruled that HAVA did not preempt more strict state laws & allowed States to be more strict as long as consistent with the purpose of HAVA (both HAVA & CO provisions' purposes were to prevent voter fraud)
  - Substantive due process and equal protection
    - No improper discrimination
Preventing voter fraud is a compelling interest since it is irreversible once vote is cast. Only marginally more intrusive than HAVA, many types of identification permitted – thus, valid.

McKay v. Thompson, 2000
- Statute: mandated disclosure of SS # as a precondition to voter registration.
- Claims:
  - Privacy Act, Section 7: ruled that Tennessee voter system exempt from Privacy Act because it is pre-75.
  - NVRA, permitting only min. amt. of info. necessary to prevent duplicate registration and determine eligibility: ruled that NVRA does not specifically forbid the use of SS#s & the Privacy Act specifically permits them pre-75.
  - Substantive due process: ruled that internal use of SS# not a burden.
  - Free Exercise, based on Bible’s supposed prohibition on use of universal identifiers: ruled that law is generally applicable and thus valid.
  - P&I, Article IV: does not protect in-state citizens.
  - P&I, 14th Amend.: no protection for privilege where Congress authorized its infringement.

Kemp v. Tucker, 1975
- Statute: required name, occupation, address, sex, race, height, hair color, eye color, and date of birth be listed on voter registration card for identification purposes.
- Claims:
  - VRA: ruled that race was not made a “qualification” for voting.
  - 15th Amendment: ruled that it did not abridge right to vote on account of race because rejection of application was due to failure to provide information, not race; race only one factor in identification.
  - 14th Amendment EPC: ruled there was no distinction among voters.

Perez v. Rhiddlehoover, 1966
- Statute: date of birth, place of birth, mother’s first or maiden name, color of eyes, sex, race, occupation, and whether owner, tenant or boarder must appear on the registration for identification.
- Claims:
  - VRA: ruled that it was not a “test or device” because it applied equally.
  - 15th Amendment: same reasons.

Cases in Which the Plaintiffs Have Prevailed in Challenging the Statute Requiring Voter Identification:

This was an action just before the November 2004 election for a temporary restraining order, which was granted. The ACLU challenged a Minnesota law allowing the use of tribal identification cards with the name, address, and photograph as a valid identification (equal to a driver's license) for use in “completing” an incomplete mail-in voter registration only if the Indian lives on the reservation. 2004 WL 2428690, at *1. The Court ruled that this distinction would likely violate the Equal Protection Clause because there was no rational basis for differentiating... between the validity of the identification based on whether or not the cardholder lives on the reservation. Id. at *1, 3.

Secondly, the ACLU challenged a second statute which allowed the use of certain photo identification lacking the voter’s address to be used together with a utility bill or bank statement as valid identification for registration. Id. at *3. The statute did not, however, permit using a tribal identification for this same purpose. Id. The Court ruled that this likely violated the equal protection clause as well. Id.

Greidinger v. Davis, 988 F.2d 1344 (4th Cir. 1993).

This case challenged a Virginia law requiring the social security number for voter registration, which the State subsequently disclosed to the public and political parties upon request in voter registration lists, which included the social security numbers. Failure to provide the social security number resulted in the denial of the registration application. Id. The law was challenged under the Equal Protection Clause and under substantive due process. The Court ruled that this likely violated the equal protection clause as well. Id.

Greidinger v. Davis, 988 F.2d at 1350.

The law was invalidated under substantive due process. Id. at 1355. The Court found that the statutory scheme conditioned the fundamental right to vote on the consent to an invasion of privacy, based on concerns of identity theft. Id. at 1353-54. The Court found this to be a substantial burden on the right to vote. Id. at 1354. The Court recognized that the government’s interest in preventing voter fraud was compelling. Id. However, the Court found that disclosure of the information to the public and political parties was not necessary to achieve that interest. Id. Disclosure of addresses or dates of birth would be sufficient to aid the public in distinguishing between two voters with the same name. Id. at 1355. The Court did state that required disclosure of the social security number for internal use only would be valid. Id. at 1354 n.10.

Cases in Which the Statute or Practice of Voter Identification Has Been Upheld:

The League of Women Voters challenged the Secretary of State’s directive that provisional ballots should be issued to all first-time voters who registered by mail without providing identification who cannot show proper identification at the polls. 340 F. Supp. 2d at 828. The Directive also stated that the provisional ballots would only be counted if the voter orally recited his driver’s license number or the last four digits of his social security number or returned to the polling place before it closed with some acceptable identification, including reciting those identification numbers. Id. The Court stated that HAVA only requires verification of eligibility of first time voters registering by mail; it does not say how that should be done. Id. at 831. The Court found the burden on the right to vote to be slight. Id. The Directive was found valid under HAVA and the Supremacy Clause because the number of uncounted votes would be small, the requirement was reasonable, and there was adequate notice of the requirement on the registration forms. Id. at 829-30.

In this case, the validity of three Colorado statutory provisions was challenged. The laws (1) required all in-person voters to show identification (not just first-time registrants); (2) provided that votes cast in the wrong precinct would not be counted; and (3) provided that provisional ballots would not be counted if the voter applied for an absentee ballot. 2004 WL 2360485, at *1. The plaintiffs also challenged the provisions under HAVA. The identification provision allowed nearly all forms of acceptable identification under HAVA. Id. at *6.

The challenge to the identification requirement failed under both challenges. The Court interpreted HAVA as not intended to preempt state laws and as permitting states to be more strict than, but not inconsistent with, HAVA. Id. at *10. The Court felt that the purpose of both laws was the same, to reduce voter fraud, and thus, both laws could coexist. As to the Constitutional claim, both equal protection and substantive due process, the Court felt that preventing voter fraud, which is impossible to remedy once a vote is cast, is a compelling interest, and the Court also felt that a voter identification requirement for all voters, with many types of acceptable identification, was only marginally more intrusive than HAVA. Id. at 12. The Court also found no improper discrimination between voters. Id. Thus, the provision was upheld.

McKay v. Thompson, 226 F.3d 752 (6th Cir. 2000).

The Sixth Circuit ruled that the Privacy Act, the National Voter Registration Act, Substantive Due Process, the Privileges and Immunities Clauses (Fourteenth Amendment & Article IV), and the First Amendment right to free exercise do not prohibit requiring disclosure of social security numbers as a precondition to voter registration.

The Privacy Act, Section 7, mandates that it is unlawful for a government to deny a right or privilege because of a citizen's refusal to disclose his social security number, unless the disclosure was required for a system established prior to 1975. 226 F.3d at 755 (citing Privacy Act of 1974, Pub. L. No. 93-579 (1974)). Since Tennessee required social security numbers for voter registration since 1972, his challenge was rejected. 226 F.3d at 755. Second, the NVRA only permits requiring the minimum amount of information necessary to prevent duplicate voter registration and to determine eligibility. Id. at 755-56 (citing 42 U.S.C. §1973gg-3(c)(2)(B)). The Court rejected this challenge because the NVRA does not specifically forbid the use of social security numbers, and the Privacy Act, a more specific statute, grandfathered their use if prior to 1975. 226 F.3d at 756.

Finally, the plaintiff's constitutional claims were all rejected. His substantive due process claim was rejected because internal receipt and use of social security numbers does not burden the fundamental right to vote. Id. The free exercise challenge, based on the Bible's supposed prohibition of universal identifiers, was rejected because the law was generally applicable and not directed at particular religious practices. Id. The Privileges and Immunities Clause claim was rejected because the Clause does not apply to citizens of the state. Id. The Fourteenth Amendment Privileges and Immunities claim, based on the right to vote as unique to U.S. citizenship, was rejected because the Clause provides no protection where Congress has authorized the infringement. Id.

A statute was upheld, which required name, occupation, address, sex, race, height, hair color, eye color, and date of birth to be recorded on the voter registration card and allowed registration officials to reject an incomplete application. 396 F. Supp. at 738. Claims were alleged under the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause, the Fifteenth Amendment, and the Voting Rights Act.

As to the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendment claims, the Court reasoned that preventing voter fraud is a compelling goal, and identification provisions are "an essential means of achieving the goal." Id. at 739. The Court also rejected the equal protection claim because the statutes did not create a distinction at all. Id. at 740 n.3. Since race is just one of several characteristics required, the Court found that it was intended for preventing voter fraud, not some other motive. \textit{Id.} at 740. As to the VRA, the Court rejected the claim that it added race as a qualification for voting as frivolous. \textit{Id.} As to a Fifteenth Amendment claim that it abridged the right to vote on account of race, the Court also made a distinction between rejecting a voter application because of race and rejecting an application because of failure to answer all relevant questions to assist in preventing voter fraud. \textit{Id.} The statute was upheld.

A voter registration requirement was challenged and upheld. The statute stated that date of birth, place of birth, mother's first or maiden name, color of eyes, sex, race, occupation, and whether owner, tenant or boarder must appear on the registration. 186 So.2d at 690. This information was required for identification of voters, especially when voters had the same name, to prevent duplicate voting. It was challenged under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 Section 4(a) which prohibits denying the right to vote for failure to comply with a “test or device.” The Court felt that this requirement was not a test or device for discrimination because it applied equally. \textit{Id.} at 691. The Court also determined that it was not in conflict with the Fifteenth Amendment either. \textit{Id.}

On November 30, 2004, the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund (MALDEF) filed suit seeking to halt the implementation of Proposition 200. Proposition 200 created a number of legal requirements to ensure that public benefits are not available to illegal immigrants. In particular, Proposition 200 requires that a person attempting to register to vote provide one of six specific forms of proof of United States citizenship. Compl. 12-13. Also, any person attempting to vote must present either one form of photo identification or two forms of non-photo identification. \textit{Id.} at 13.

The lawsuit alleges two violations that directly relate to the voting identification restrictions. First, the lawsuit alleges a violation of the Twenty-Fourth and Fourteenth amendments in that a voter must pay a poll tax by spending money to purchase the required identification. \textit{Id.} at 20. Second, the lawsuit alleges violation of the Voting Rights Act. \textit{Id.} at 21. The lawsuit was recently dismissed by the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals for a lack of standing. The Circuit Court found that there was no injury-in-fact, meaning that once an injury occurs the suit will likely be refiled. Additionally, it should be noted that the voter identification issue is only a part of the lawsuit, and much of the focus has been on other aspects of Proposition 200.

Current Litigation Concerning Voter ID Issues\textsuperscript{27}

Litigation is filled with uncertainty. Litigation stemming from newly passed voter identification requirements will continue into the foreseeable future. Lawsuits are currently pending over voter identification requirements in Georgia and Indiana. Other states, such as Ohio, are considering new identification requirements that could lead to further litigation. The Georgia lawsuit has already succeeded in getting a preliminary injunction against the law in question, which will likely galvanize interested parties in other states to pursue similar litigation. Of course, if the injunction is eventually overturned at the appellate level it could have a similar chilling affect on future litigation.

This summary major litigation pending in Georgia and Indiana includes a brief assessment of the likelihood of success:

\textsuperscript{27} As of January 2, 2006
Georgia (Common Cause/Georgia v. Billups):

On September 19, 2005, Common Cause of Georgia, in conjunction with several other non-profit organizations, filed suit in Federal District Court against the Georgia Secretary of State and other election officials, challenging the constitutionality of Georgia’s new voter identification requirements. The new law requires all voters attempting to cast a ballot in person to present a valid form of photographic identification. O.C.G.A. § 21-2-417. A voter that is unable to provide proper identification is given a provisional ballot. However, that provisional ballot will be counted only if the voter is able to subsequently present valid identification within two days of the election. Id.

The lawsuit alleges five separate violations of state and federal law. First, the complaint alleges that the identification requirements infringe on the right to vote guaranteed in the Georgia constitution (Compl. 32). In addition, the Plaintiffs claim violations of the Federal Civil Rights Act and Voting Rights Act. (Compl. 36,38). Finally, the lawsuit alleges violations of the Fourteenth and Twenty-Fourth amendments to the U.S. Constitution. The complaint claims that the ID requirements constitute an “undue burden” on the right to vote, in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (Compl. 34). The ID requirement does not apply to most absentee voters, and thus the requirement is also over-broad and not narrowly tailored to address the stated purpose of preventing voter fraud (Compl. 34). The complaint further alleges that the cost of obtaining a photo ID constitutes a poll tax, in violation of the Twenty-Fourth Amendment, and that the cost is also a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment because it applies to voters who choose to vote in person, and not to those who vote absentee (Compl. 34,35).

On October 18, 2005, the District Court granted the Plaintiff’s motion for a preliminary injunction, enjoining the application of the new identification requirements. In granting the injunction, the court held that both federal constitutional claims had a substantial likelihood of succeeding on the merits at trial (Prelim. Inj. 96, 104). The court also held that, while the two federal statutory claims were plausible, they both lacked sufficient evidence at the time to have a substantial likelihood of success. (Prelim. Inj. 109,111,116). Finally, the court held that the Georgia constitutional claim would be barred by the Eleventh Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. (Prelim. Inj. 77).

The Defendants appealed the motion for preliminary injunction to the Eleventh Circuit, and oral argument is scheduled for March 1, 2006. In addition, some news reports have claimed that the Georgia legislature is considering re-visiting the ID requirements in light of the on-going litigation. As for the merits, in granting the preliminary injunction the District Court has already signaled its belief that the federal constitutional claims are likely meritorious. The Eleventh Circuit may have a different view, but for now the case looks to have a reasonable chance of success.

Indiana (Indiana Democratic Party v. Rokita and Crawford v. Marion County Election Board):

The Indiana lawsuit is similar to its Georgia counterpart in content, though not in status. In Indiana separate lawsuits, now joined, were filed by the state Democratic Party and the Indiana Civil Liberties Union (ICLU). The Democratic Party's lawsuit is directed against the Indiana Secretary of State, while the ICLU's lawsuit involves the Marion County Board of Elections and the State of Indiana. Like Georgia, Indiana law also requires citizens voting in person to present some form of official photo identification. IC § 3-11-8-25.1. Voters unable to present identification are given a provisional ballot, which is counted if they are able to provide the required identification by Noon on the second Monday following the election. IC § 3-11.7-5-1. Unlike Georgia, Indiana provides state issued identification at no charge. However, there are costs involved in the process, including transportation to the Bureau of Motor Vehicles, and payment for documents such as birth certificates, which are needed to obtain the ID. (Second Am. Compl. 6).

The Democratic Party's complaint raises Fourteenth Amendment claims similar to those in the Georgia lawsuit, including concerns about substantially burdening the right to vote, the enactment of a de-facto poll tax from the costs indirectly associated with obtaining ID, and the lack of applicability to voters who cast an absentee ballot. (Second Am. Compl. 6-9). In addition, the complaint alleges that the substantial burden placed on the right to vote violates the First Amendment protection of expressive or symbolic speech, as well as the freedom of association as applied to Democratic primary elections. (Second Am. Compl. 9-10). Finally, the complaint alleges violations of the Voting Rights Act, National Voter Registration Act, and the Help America Vote Act (Second Am. Compl. 10-11). The ICLU's complaint alleges many of the same violations, but also includes claims of a violation of Indiana's constitutional guarantee of a free and equal election system. (Compl. 15)

The case is currently in the pre-trial phase, with both sides awaiting decisions on their respective motions for summary judgment. The likelihood of success is bolstered by the fact that the Fourteenth amendment constitutional claims have already been found persuasive by at least one other Federal District Court. However, the Indiana law is notably different than its Georgia counterpart in that it provides free identification. While the plaintiffs make a solid argument that related costs still amount to a poll-tax, it is possible that the court could distinguish on this matter.

Unlike the Georgia case, the Indiana lawsuit also claims a violation of the Help America Vote Act. Although the claim is not completely clear, it seems as though the Plaintiffs are arguing that the Indiana statute requires more stringent identification than what is required by HAVA. 42 U.S.C. § 15483(b)(1)-(2). While this is true, it is unclear how this violates the statute. HAVA merely states that certain voters unable to produce HAVA required identification be given a provisional ballot. Id. Indiana law meets this requirement. IC § 3-11-8-25.1. Although Indiana law requires more stringent identification for counting the provisional ballot, HAVA leaves these decisions to state law. 42 U.S.C. § 15482(a).

30 According to an AP article, the Plaintiffs filed some type of brief on December 21—however it is not yet up on the Moritz website and I am unsure how to access it otherwise.

Introduction

A key area of disagreement in the policy debate over voter identification requirements concerns whether such requirements dampen voter turnout. Opponents of voter identification laws argue that they constitute an institutional barrier to voting, particularly among the poor, African-Americans, Hispanics, the elderly and people with disabilities (Baxter and Galloway 2005, Electionline.org 2002, Jacobs 2005, Young 2006). This argument holds that voter identification requirements create an extra demand on voters, and thus may discourage some of them from participating in elections. Further, critics of voter identification requirements contend that the effect is greater for some specific types of requirements. For example, critics argue that requiring voters to produce government-issued photo identification on Election Day is more demanding than, say, requiring that they state their names at the polling place. Supporters of voter identification requirements, on the other hand, argue that the requirements are necessary to combat voter fraud, safeguard the integrity of the electoral process, and engender faith in the electoral process among citizens (Young 2006).

This report examines the potential variation in turnout rates based on the type of voter identification requirement in place in each state on Election Day 2004. It draws on two sets of data – aggregate turnout data at the county level for each state, as compiled by the Eagleton Institute of Politics, and individual-level survey data included in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau. Classification of voter identification requirements comes from a review of state statutes conducted by the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University.

Types of voter identification requirements

But election laws in numerous states offer exceptions to these requirements if individuals lack the necessary form of identification, and laws in those states set a minimum standard that a voter must meet in order to vote using a regular ballot (as opposed to a provisional ballot). Thus it is also possible to categorize states based on the minimum requirement for voting with a regular ballot. In 2004 the categories were somewhat different compared to the maximum requirement, in that none of the states required photo identification as a minimum standard for voting with a regular ballot. Four states, however, required voters to swear an affidavit as to their identity (Florida, Indiana, Louisiana, and North Dakota). The five categories for minimum requirements were: state name (12 states), sign name (14 states and the District of Columbia), match one’s signature to a signature on file (six states), provide a non-photo identification (14 states), or swear an affidavit (four states). For the purposes of this analysis I treated the array of minimum identification requirements also in terms of increasing demand on the voter: state name, sign name, match signature, provide non-photo identification, and, given the potential legal consequences for providing false information, swearing an affidavit.

This report examines turnout among U.S. citizens of voting age in both the aggregate- and the individual-level data. Determining citizenship status in the individual-level data simply involved restricting the analyses to individuals who identified themselves as citizens in the November 2004 Current Population Survey. (Those who said they were not citizens did not have the opportunity to answer the supplemental voting questions contained in the Current Population Survey.)

In the aggregate data, determining the percentage of the voting-age population that has U.S. citizenship posed a methodological challenge. The Census Bureau gathers information on the citizenship status of adults ages 18 and older only during the decennial census. While the Census Bureau provides annual estimates of the population to account for changes between decennial censuses, the bureau does not offer estimates for the proportion of the adult population who are citizens as part of the annual estimates. To address this issue I estimated the 2004 citizen voting-age population for each county using a method reported in the analysis of the 2004 Election Day Survey conducted for the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (U.S. Election Assistance Commission, 2005). I calculated the percentage of the 2000 voting-age population who were citizens in 2000, and applied that percentage to the July 1, 2004 estimates for voting-age population in each county. In other words, I assumed that the percentage of the voting-age population that had U.S. citizenship in 2004 was similar to the percentage of the voting-age population who were citizens in 2000.²

² McDonald and Popkin (2001) recommend an even more stringent approach to voter turnout calculations. They point out that voting-age population estimates include adults who are ineligible to vote (such as convicted felons), and the estimates overlook eligible citizens living overseas. While estimates of the voting-eligible population are available at the state level, I was unable to find such estimates for individual counties, which provide the unit of analysis for the aggregate data analyzed here.
Analysis of aggregate data

If one treats maximum voter identification requirements as an ordinal variable, with photo identification as the most demanding requirement, one finds some statistical support for the premise that as the level of required proof increases, turnout declines. Averaging across counties in each state, statewide turnout is negatively correlated with maximum voter identification requirements ($r = -0.30$, $p < 0.0001$). In considering the array of minimum requirements, with affidavit as the most demanding requirement, voter identification also is negatively correlated with turnout ($r = -0.20$, $p < 0.0001$). Breaking down the turnout rates by type of requirement reveals in greater detail the relationship between voter identification requirements and voter turnout.

The aggregate data show that 60.9 percent of the estimated citizen voting age population voted in 2004. Differences in voter turnout at the state level in 2004 varied based on voter identification requirements. Taking into account the maximum requirements, an average of 64.6 percent of the voting age population turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 58.1 percent in states that required photo identification. A similar trend emerged when considering minimum requirements. Sixty-three percent of the voting age population turned out in states requiring voters to state their names, compared to 60.1 percent in states that required an affidavit from voters.

Voter identification requirements alone, however, do not determine voter turnout. Multivariate models that take into account other predictors of turnout can paint a more complete picture of the relationship between voter identification requirements and turnout. I estimated the effects of voter identification requirements in multivariate models that also took into account the electoral context in 2004 and demographic characteristics of the population in each county. I coded the voter identification requirements on a scale of one to five, with one representing the least demanding form of identification and five representing the most demanding form of identification. To capture electoral context I included whether the county was in a presidential battleground state (any state in which the margin of victory for the winning candidate was five percent or less), and whether the county was in a state with a competitive race for governor and/or the U.S. Senate (also using the threshold of a margin of victory of five percent or less). Drawing from U.S. Census projections for 2003, I included the percentage of the voting age population in each county that was Hispanic or African-American to control for ethnicity and race. I controlled for age using the 2003 Census projection for the percentage of county residents age 65 and older, and I controlled for socioeconomic status by including the percentage of individuals who fell below the poverty line in each county in the 2000 Census.

I estimated a series of random intercept models to account for the likelihood that data from counties were correlated within each state (for further explanation of random intercept and other multilevel models, see Bryk and Raudenbush 1992, Luke 2004, Singer 1998). The

1 The data analyses provided evidence that there was, indeed, a clustering of data within each state. The intraclass correlation, bounded by 0 and 1, measures the variation between the states. A random intercept model using only the dependent variable in each model was voter turnout at the county level, with turnout calculated as the percentage of the estimated citizen voting-age population that voted in the 2004 election.

Turning first to an analysis using the maximum identification requirements; those requirements had a small and negative effect on turnout in 2004 controlling for electoral context and demographic factors. Both contextual factors (whether the county was in a state that was a battleground state and whether that state had a competitive race for governor and/or U.S. Senate) increased voter turnout. As the percentage of senior citizens in the county increased, so did turnout. The percentage of African-Americans in the county exerted a positive effect on voter turnout, and the percentage of individuals living below the poverty line had a negative effect. The effect of the percentage of Hispanic adults in the county on turnout fell just short of statistical significance (p = .05).

I then sought to test the hypothesis that voter identification requirements dampen turnout among minorities and the poor, a claim voiced by some critics of the requirements. To test this idea I incorporated a series of interactions between the maximum voter identification requirements and the percentage of African-Americans, Hispanics, and poor individuals in the counties. The interaction involving African-Americans was not significant, but those involving Hispanics and poor individuals were significant.\(^4\) In addition, adding the interactions to the model resulted in the percentage of Hispanics in the population having a direct and negative effect on turnout. The interactions suggest that voter identification requirements have a greater effect for Hispanics and those living below the poverty line. A chi-square test of the difference in the deviance for each model (represented by -2 log likelihood in Table 2), shows that the model with interactions provides a better fit to the data (\(p < 0.005\)).

The effects of the minimum requirements fell short of statistical significance (\(p = 0.08\)). The battleground state variable continued to exert a positive influence on turnout, while the presence of a competitive race for governor and/or U.S. Senate had no statistically significant effect. As in the maximum identification requirement model, as the percentage of the population that is poor increased, turnout declined. As the percentage of elderly increased, so did turnout. The proportion of African-Americans in the population had a positive effect on turnout, while the percentage of Hispanics did not affect turnout.

\(^4\) The interactions are labeled in Tables 2 and 3 as VID*African-American, VID*Hispanic, and VID*Poverty. To calculate the effects of voter identification requirements for a specific group, one must add the estimates for voter identification, the group, and the interaction. Doing so for Hispanic adults results in an estimate of \(-0.13\) \([-0.03 (voter id) - 0.13 (Hispanic) + 0.03 (voter id X Hispanic)\]).
Adding interactive effects to the model resulted in a statistically significant and negative effect of minimum voter identification requirements on turnout. The percentage of Hispanic adults in the county had a significant and negative effect on turnout, and the percentage of individuals below the poverty line continued to have a negative effect. Interactions between the percentages of Hispanics and those below the poverty line and minimum voter identification requirements also were significant. The percentage of African-Americans in the county and the interaction between African-Americans and voter identification requirements were not significant. A chi-square test for the difference in fit between the two models showed that the model with interactions provides a better fit to the data (p < .025).

Analysis of the aggregate data at the county level generates some support for the hypothesis that as the demands of voter identification requirements increase, turnout declines. This is particularly so for counties with concentrations of Hispanic residents or individuals who live below the poverty line. But aggregate data cannot fully capture the individual demographic factors that may figure into the decision to turn out to vote. For example, previous research has found that education is a powerful determinant of turnout (Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980, but see also Nagler 1991). Married individuals also are more likely to vote than those who are not married (Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002; Alvarez, Nagler and Wilson 2004; Fisher, Kenny, and Morton 1993). To fully explore the effects of voter identification requirements on turnout, it is important to examine individual-level data as well.

Individual-level turnout data exists in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau. The Census Bureau conducts the CPS monthly to measure unemployment and other workforce data, but the bureau adds a battery of voter participation questions to the November survey in even-numbered years to coincide with either a presidential or midterm Congressional election.

One of the advantages of the CPS is the sheer size of the sample. The survey’s Voting and Registration Supplement consisted of interviews, either by telephone or in person, with 96,452 respondents. The large sample size permits analyses of smaller groups, such as Black or Hispanic voters or voters with less than a high school education. The analyses reported here are based on reports from self-described registered voters. I omitted those who said they were not registered to vote. I also excluded those who said they cast absentee ballots because the identification requirements for absentee ballots may differ from those required when one votes in person. In addition, I eliminated from the sample respondents who said they were not U.S.

5 A reviewer for an earlier version of this paper recommended adding an education variable to the aggregate model. One version of the aggregate model not reported here included the percentage of adults in the county who had at least a college degree. The measure was highly collinear with the percentage of residents living below the poverty line, necessitating removal of the college degree variable from the model.

6 It is important to note that the Census Bureau allows respondents to answer on behalf of themselves and others in the household during the interview. While proxy reporting of voter turnout raises the possibility of inaccurate reports concerning whether another member of the household voted, follow-up interviews with those for whom a proxy report had been given in the November 1984 CPS showed 99 percent agreement between the proxy report and the information given by the follow-up respondent (U.S. Census Bureau 1990).

The dependent variable in these analyses is whether a respondent said he or she voted in the November 2004 election. As in the analysis of aggregate data, I coded voter identification requirements for each respondent's state of residence on a scale of one to five, with one representing the least demanding requirement (stating one's name) and five representing the most demanding requirement (photo identification or affidavit).

In addition to the voter identification requirements, the models include two other state-level factors that might have influenced turnout in 2004: whether the state was considered a battleground state in the presidential election, and whether there was a gubernatorial and/or U.S. Senate race in the state (see Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002, Alvarez et al. 2004, and Kenny et al. 1993 for similar approaches). As in the aggregate data analysis, the threshold that determined whether the state was a battleground state or had a competitive statewide race was a margin of victory of five percent or less. At the individual level, I controlled for gender, age in years, education, household income, and dummy variables representing whether a voter was Black/non-Hispanic, Hispanic, or another non-white race (with white/non-Hispanic voters as the omitted category for reference purposes). Drawing on previous research on voting behavior, I also controlled for whether an individual was employed, or at least a member of the workforce (as opposed to being a full-time student, a homemaker, or retired). Both employment and workforce membership have been shown to be positive predictors of turnout (see Mitchell and Wlezien 1995). Marital status, whether one is a native-born citizen and residential mobility also have emerged as significant predictors of turnout (Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002, Alvarez et al. 2004, Kenney et al. 1993, Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980). I included in the model variables for whether a respondent was married (coded 1 if yes, 0 otherwise), and whether one was a native-born citizen (coded 1 if yes, 0 otherwise). I measured residential mobility by coding for whether the respondent had moved to a new address in the six months prior to the interview (coded 1 if yes, 0 otherwise).

Results

The dependent variable is whether a respondent said he or she voted in the November 2004 election (coded 1 for yes, 0 for no). I estimated models using probit analysis, which

7 The U.S. Census Bureau reported, based on the November 2004 CPS, that 89 percent of those who identified themselves as registered voters said they voted in 2004 (U.S. Census Bureau 2005). Previous research has shown that, generally speaking, some survey respondents overstate their incidence of voting. Researchers speculate that over-reports may be due to the social desirability that accompanies saying one has done his or her civic duty, or a reluctance to appear outside the mainstream of American political culture (U.S. Census Bureau 1990). It is also possible that voting is an indication of civic engagement that predisposes voters to agree to complete surveys at a higher rate than non-voters (Flanigan and Zingale 2002). Hence the voter turnout rates reported in the CPS tend to be up to 10 percentage points higher than the actual turnout rate for the nation (Flanigan and Zingale 2002). Even with this caveat, however, the CPS serves as a widely accepted source of data on voting behavior.

8 Asian-Americans are included in the "other non-white races" category. In response to a request from officials at the U.S. Election Assistance Commission who had read an earlier version of this paper and were curious about the experiences of Asian-Americans, I ran models using Asian-Americans as a separate category in addition to the models presented here. Voter identification requirements did not have a statistically significant effect on whether Asian-American voters said they turned out in the 2004 election.
calculates the effects of independent variables on the probability that an event occurred – in this case whether a respondent said he or she voted. I estimated the models using robust standard errors to control for correlated error terms for observations from within the same state.

The two models in Table 4 use either the maximum or minimum voter identification requirements in each state. The two models generate virtually identical results. Voter identification requirements exert a statistically significant, negative effect on whether survey respondents said they had voted in 2004. Of the other state factors, only the competitiveness of the presidential race had a significant effect on turnout. In terms of demographic influences, African-American voters were more likely than white voters to say they had cast a ballot, while those of other non-white races were less likely than white voters to say they had turned out. Hispanic voters were not statistically different from white voters in terms of reported turnout. Consistent with previous research, age, education, income, and marital status all were positive predictors of voting. Women also were more likely to say they voted than men. Those who had moved within six months before the interview were less likely to say they had voted.

While the probit models provide statistical support for the influence of voter identification requirements and other variables on turnout, probit coefficients do not lend themselves to intuitive interpretation. Another common approach in studies of election requirements is to examine how the predicted probability of voter turnout would vary as election requirements vary. I used the probit coefficients to calculate the predicted probability of voting at each level of voter identification requirements while holding all other independent variables in the models at their means. I calculated the probabilities taking into account both maximum and minimum requirements, with photo identification serving as the most demanding of the maximum requirements and affidavits as the most demanding minimum requirement.

Allowing the voter identification requirement to vary while holding constant all other variables in the model showed that the predicted probability of turnout ranged from 0.912 for stating one's name to 0.887 for photo identification under the maximum requirements. In other words, the probability of voting dropped with each level of voter identification requirement, with a total drop of .025, or 2.5 percent, across the five types of identification. When taking into account the minimum requirement for identification, the probability showed a similar decline, with a slightly larger total drop of 3.3 percent.

Among the key variables of interest in the debate over voter identification requirements are race, age, income, and education. Given the large sample size (54,973 registered voters), it

10 The voter turnout percentages may seem disproportionately high compared to the turnout rates reported in the aggregate data analysis. It is important to consider that the turnout rates in the aggregate data were a proportion of all citizens of voting-age population, while the turnout rates for the individual-level data are the proportion of only registered voters who said they voted.
was possible to break the sample into sub-samples along those demographic lines to explore variation in predicted probability by group. I disaggregated the sample by the variable of interest, omitting that variable while I re-ran the probit model with the remaining predictors of voter turnout, including the voter identification requirements. If the analysis showed that the voter identification requirements had a statistically significant effect on turnout, I used the probit coefficients from the model to calculate the predicted probability of voting for each group across the five requirements while holding the other variables in the model constant.

Both the maximum and minimum identification requirements had negative and statistically significant effects for White/Non-Hispanic voters. Allowing the requirements to vary from stating one’s name to providing photo identification or an affidavit showed drops of 2.5 percent and 3.2 percent respectively in the predicted probability of voting. The identification requirements had no effect on the probability of Black/Non-Hispanics voting, but the minimum identification requirements had a comparatively sizable effect on voter turnout among Hispanics. The predicted probability of Hispanics voting ranged from 87 percent if stating one’s name was the required form of identification to 77.3 percent if a voter would have to provide an affidavit in order to vote, a difference of 9.7 percent.

Voters in that age group had a predicted probability of 83.9 percent when the maximum requirement was stating one’s name, and the probability dropped 8.9 percentage points if voters would have to provide photo identification. The range was from 83.1 percent to 75.4 percent under the minimum requirements. The gap in probability narrowed in older age groups (4.8 percent for the maximum requirements and 5.8 percent for the minimum requirements for those ages 25 to 44; 1.8 percent for the minimum requirements for those ages 45 to 64, and 2.4 percent for the minimum requirements for those ages 65 and older).

Breaking down the 18- to 24-year-old age group by race shed additional light on the effects of voter identification requirements on specific groups.

The gap in predicted probability that White/Non-Hispanic voters in the 18- to 24-year-old category would turn out was 9.2 percent when the identification requirements varied from stating one’s name to providing photo identification. The gap was 7.8 percent when taking into account the minimum requirements. The effects of maximum voter identification requirements also were statistically significant for African-Americans in the 18- to 24-year-old age group, with a gap in 11 See Nagler 1991 for a similar approach in analyzing the effects of registration closing dates broken down by education levels.

the predicted probability of voting of 10.6 percent. Maximum and minimum voter identification requirements were not a significant predictor of voting among Hispanics ages 18 to 24.

Variation also emerged along the lines of income, with the effects of voter identification requirements varying to a greater extent for voters in households below the poverty line compared to those living above the poverty line.\(^{12}\)

While the maximum set of requirements did not have a statistically significant effect for voters living below the poverty line, the minimum set of requirements had a significant and negative effect. The probability of voting was .784 for poor voters if they would have to identify themselves by giving their name, and the probability declined to .731 if they would have to provide an affidavit attesting to their identity. Both the maximum and minimum sets of requirements had a significant and negative effect on voters living above the poverty line, but the difference in probability across the effects was narrower (2.3 percent for the maximum requirements and 3.1 percent for the minimum requirements). Given that political discourse about voter identification requirements includes concerns about the effects of the requirements on poor and minority voters, I also ran probit analyses for sub-samples of white and minority voters who fell below the poverty line. The voter identification requirements did not exert statistically significant effects on turnout among poor White/Non-Hispanic and Hispanic voters, but did have a significant effect on Black/Non-Hispanic voters who were below the poverty line.\(^{13}\) Allowing the maximum voting requirement to vary from the least to the most demanding, the probability that African-American voters below the poverty line said they had voted dropped by 7.5 percent.

The effects of voter identification requirements varied across education levels as well, with those lowest in education demonstrating the widest variation in probabilities as identification requirements ranged from least to most demanding.\(^{12}\)

Registered voters who had less than a high school education had a 77.5 percent probability of voting if the maximum requirement would be stating one’s name, and a 70.8 percent probability if they would have to provide photo identification under the maximum requirement, a difference of 6.7 percent. The difference from the lowest to the highest requirement among the minimum requirements was 7.4 percent. The difference in probabilities ranged from 3.3 percent for the maximum requirements to 4.5 percent for the minimum requirements for voters with a high school diploma. The range of effects of voter identification requirements was smaller among those with higher levels of education (and non-existent for one category – voters with some college education).

\(^{13}\) The lack of significant effects for poor Hispanic voters is in contrast to the results from the aggregate data analysis. The sub-sample of poor Hispanic voters was small (n = 491), which may have contributed to the lack of statistical significance.
Discussion and conclusion

The results presented here provide evidence that as the level of demand associated with voter identification requirements increases, voter turnout declines. This point emerged from both the aggregate data and the individual-level data, although not always for both the maximum and minimum sets of requirements. The overall effect for all registered voters was fairly small, but still statistically significant.

The effects of voter identification requirements were more pronounced for specific subgroups. Hispanic voters and the poor appeared to be less likely to vote as the level of required identification became more demanding, according to both the aggregate and the individual-level data. In the individual-level data, for Hispanic voters, the probability of voting dropped by 9.7 percent across the various levels of minimum identification requirements. Survey respondents living in poor households were 5.3 percent less likely to vote as the requirements varied from stating one’s name to attesting to one’s identity in an affidavit. African-American voters from households below the poverty line were 7.5 percent less likely to vote as the maximum requirements varied from stating one’s name to providing photo identification.

Effects of voter requirements also varied with education. Registered voters who had not graduated from high school were 6.7 percent less likely to say they voted as the maximum requirements ranged from stating one’s name to providing photo identification. When considering the minimum requirements, those with less than a high school education were 7.4 percent less likely to say they voted if the requirement was an affidavit as opposed to stating one’s name. Age was also a key factor, with voters ages 18 to 24 being 7.7 percent to 8.9 percent less likely to vote as the requirements ranged from stating one’s name to providing a photo identification or affidavit. Breaking down the age group by race, the effects were significant for young White/Non-Hispanic and Black/Non-Hispanic voters.

The results shed additional light on the effects of voter identification requirements on two groups often projected as being particularly sensitive to such requirements: African-American voters and elderly voters. The effects on African-American voters were pronounced for two specific sub-samples: African-American voters living below the poverty line and those in the 18- to 24-year-old age group. Also, the elderly, while they would be slightly less likely to vote as requirements ranged from least to most demanding, would not necessarily be affected in the dramatic manner predicted by some opposed to photo identification requirements in particular.

In examining the effects of voter identification requirements on turnout, there is still much to learn. The data examined in this project could not capture the dynamics of how identification requirements might lower turnout. If these requirements dampen turnout, is it because individuals are aware of the requirements and stay away from the polls because they cannot or do not want to meet the requirements? Or, do the requirements result in some voters

14 The individual-level data offer some insight here. If advance knowledge of the voter identification requirements were to dampen turnout, it is reasonable to expect that advance knowledge of those requirements also could discourage some individuals from registering to vote. I ran the same probit models using voter registration as the dependent variable (coded 1 if the respondent said he or she was registered, and 0 if the respondent was not being turned away when they cannot meet the requirements on Election Day? The CPS data do not include measures that can answer this question. Knowing more about the "on the ground" experiences of voters concerning identification requirements could guide policy-makers at the state and local level in determining whether and at what point in the electoral cycle a concerted public information campaign might be most effective in helping voters to meet identification requirements. Such knowledge also could help in designing training for election judges to handle questions about, and potential disputes over, voter identification requirements.

registered). Neither the maximum nor minimum array of voter identification requirements had a statistically significant effect on the probability that a survey respondent was registered to vote.

Thanks, Tom.

Assume you just got the e-mail I sent to the EAC review team that included the paper, the analysis and the call-in information

Thursday at 11:30

A few items on timelines and materials for May 23-24 meetings:

The Commissioners will review the final Eagleton Voter ID and Provisional Voting reports at their Tuesday, May 16 meeting. At this meeting they will decide how they wish to present these reports to the EAC Board of Advisors and Standards Boards.

Your materials that will be distributed to the EAC Board of Advisors and Standards Boards must be finalized and ready for our Xeroxing process by Thursday, May 18. I will be in touch along the way to provide input/guidance on what these materials should be, based on the Commissioner's review and decisions

All-

Attached please find the complete packet of materials that will serve as the basis for our conference call on Thursday. You have already received the statistical analysis; the voter ID report was submitted this morning.

The Eagleton staff have noted that you may find the material contained in Appendix A useful to your review; the other appendices are likely to be less germane.

The call in information for Thursday:

Thank you again for your assistance.

Tom-

It is my understanding that Adam Ambrogi has been in touch with Ned Foley and, in turn, Dan Tokaji to indicate that you and Dan will present the information on the Voter ID project, while you and Ned will present the information on the Provisional Voting project.

Adam Ambrogi can also clarify your presentations. As I understand it, you will present your Voter ID and Provisional Voting projects to the Standards Board. You will then present your Voter ID and Provisional Voting Projects to the Board of Advisors.

I believe Adventure Travel handles hotel and travel arrangements.

I do not believe accommodations have been made for other members of the project team to attend. I will ask Adam Ambrogi, who is the principal point of contact on these meetings, to clarify this.

Karen,

As we discussed last week, the Eagleton-Moritz team making the presentations at the advisory board meetings will include others in addition to Ned and me. While Ned and I will handle the briefing on the provisional voting report, the team for the briefing on the Voter ID report will include Dan Tokaji and Tim Vercellotti.

Just to understand what Adventure Travel is to provide: will its services include hotel reservations and travel, or does it have a more limited mission?

Thanks,

Tom O'Neill

Tom O' Neill and Ned Foley-

As you know you are scheduled to make two presentations to the EAC Board of Advisors and Standards Board on Tuesday May 23, 2006 from 2:30-4:00 PM (on Provisional Voting) and on Wednesday ,May 24th from 1:40-2:45 PM (on Voter Identification)

If you have not already done so, please make your hotel and travel arrangements through Adventure Travel, Judy Mays

These reservations should be made no later than tomorrow COB.

Please indicate to Judy Mays that you are a contractor, who is scheduled to make a presentation at the meeting.

On behalf of the EAC our sincere thanks for your willingness to review the Eagleton paper on Voter Identification. Your insights and critique were extremely helpful and provided our agency with just the type of input which was needed.

I'm pleased to know of your work and hope that I may be able to call upon your expertise at some point in the near future.

Indeed, this is something several of the EAC staff noted.

As the EAC moves forward, I think that including a longitudinal component to our studies, to the extent possible, is a must.

Karen,

hi. My own take on this is that we would get a much better idea of the impact of reforms if we had a database of how those reforms changed over time. Looking across states is always going to be problematic.

Notification to bidders

You are hereby advised that the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) has competitively awarded a contract to the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey for research assistance to support the development of guidance on the two topics of provisional voting and voter identification procedures. Eagleton is partnering with the Moritz College of Law of Ohio State University for this work effort. The amount of this award is $560,002.

EAC appreciates the interest you have expressed in supporting our research agenda by submitting a proposal for this work. Should you wish to receive a de-brief on this procurement, please contact Carol A. Paquette, Interim Executive Director, by email at cpaquette@eac.gov.

Tim, Tom, John, et.al--

The EAC has identified three academics who are going to serve as peer reviewers of the Eagleton Voter ID paper and research.

They are Jonathan Nagler of New York University, Jan Leighley, University of Arizona, and Adam Berinsky of MIT.

They are ready to review the documents as soon as they are available.

I would like to them one week to review the material and then have a joint conference call on Thursday, May 11, in which we would all have an opportunity to discuss the research methodology and statistical analysis, along with general comments and suggestions.

If you are able to get to me the paper and the supporting data analysis, I will distribute to the documents ASAP.

Also let me know, if you would, your availability on May 11 to do this conference all.
I anticipate that it will last approximately 90 minutes.

Subject No-Cost Extension Request

Karen - We are requesting a no-cost extension on the EAC contract to the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University to have the contract's concluding date move from March 31, 2006 to June 30, 2006. As I indicated earlier, it would be very helpful if we could receive approval of this request no later than April 28th.

This extension is necessary to enable the following activities:

1. The EAC has informed us that it will assemble a panel of researchers the week of May 8th to review the Eagleton/Moritz draft background report on Voter Identification. The EAC wishes to supplement the review of this draft already conducted by the Peer Review Group called for in the contract. The Eagleton/Moritz research team, as well as at least some of the Peer Review Group will participate in the conference call or meeting of the EAC's reviewers;

2. Eagleton/Moritz will revise the draft Voter Identification report based upon comments made by the two sets of reviewers, and distribute the revised report to the EAC and its Advisory Board in mid-May.

3. Eagleton/Moritz will present its draft reports on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification to the EAC Advisory Board at its May 25th meeting in Washington, D.C.;

4. Eagleton/Moritz will revise both draft reports to take into account comments made by the EAC Advisory Board, and submit printed final reports to the EAC before June 23rd. Eagleton/Moritz will also prepare a PowerPoint presentation for both reports.

5. Eagleton/Moritz will present both reports at the EAC public meeting in Washington, D.C. on June 23rd, thus concluding its work under this contract.
Please let me know if you need any additional information.

Thanks,

John

K (Lynn-Dyson)-

I saw this before. It's helpful for me to know the proposed end-date, but what we need to get Tom's signature--for this project and Cleveland State--is a memorandum to the file explaining why we are granting the extension and modification, respectively.

From what I understand, in addition to other things, we need the memo in the file to explain our thought process if anything is ever challenged. I think that Eagleton wrote the memo for you last time, but if not, I know you gave it to me...

Subject No Cost Extensions (with extensions)

Karen - I am attaching a spreadsheet providing the information you have requested (Attachment 1), but I want to highlight a few points which may not be immediately self-evident.

First, the original budget (Attachment 2) we submitted to the EAC, dated March 22nd, did not itemize personnel expenses by each person. In addition, when we actually began work two months after submitting that budget, we decided to reallocate more time to people within Eagleton and hire fewer outside hourlies.

Second, in the figures I sent you in late December we tried to account for all the expenses and projections but overlooked a few things including neglecting to include the honoraria for our peer review team. Hence, the figures we're now sending are different than what I sent in December.

Lastly, we originally discussed a no-cost extension through February, but since we don’t yet have the EAC comments on our draft Provisional Voting material nor an estimate of when they are likely to be ready, I think it is prudent to extend the no-cost extension through March 31st. We would still like to conclude by the end of February, but if you can approve the extension for another month we could avoid going through this process again if everything is not complete six weeks from now.

It is my understanding that Rutgers will soon be sending our December invoice. At this time, I would also like to request that we combine January and February into one invoice the EAC once for that time period.

As you can see, we are currently projecting an ending balance of approximately $10,000. If additional expenses are incurred beyond what is currently projected, we’re confident they will not exceed the original budget of $560,002.

Thanks and I look forward to hearing from you.

Subject: Re: No Cost Extension Request

Karen - Our request for a no-cost, reallocation of resources is based on (a) the fact that our personnel costs have already been higher than we anticipated and (b) the reality that keeping the project operating for at least nine months, instead of seven as planned, will require the participants to devote more time than anticipated. While we are not producing more product than originally promised, the time involved in our work continues to increase. Both Provisional Voting and Voter ID have proved to be very dynamic topics requiring us to continually monitor developments and update our data, analysis and evolving work products as we learn of new or revised information. As a result, despite the extension of the schedule, the staff and consultants on this project have had no "down" time. We anticipate this research, monitoring and revising to continue for the months added to the project, necessitating significantly more hours by all members of the project team than anticipated.

Our request asks for changes to three line items which I will address below on the assumption that the EAC response to our already-submitted Provisional Voting draft and to-be-submitted Voter ID draft will be sufficiently timely to enable us to complete our work on both topics by the end of February.

1. Eagleton Institute of Politics personnel: We originally budgeted $110,695 ($15,813 average per month) for Eagleton faculty, staff and graduate student assistants for the seven-month project from May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005. Our actual costs have been approximately $14,500 more than that. In addition, we are anticipating needing another $21,000 for personnel costs in January and February, calculated on the basis of 2/3 of the original monthly estimate. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $110,695 to approximately $146,000.

2. Consultant Services: We originally budgeted $79,50 ($11,357 average per month) for consultant services which we have used to engage Tom O'Neill as the project manager. We anticipate no additional cost for the original contract period of May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005, but do anticipate needing his services during January and February at a slightly reduced rate of $10,125 per month or $20,250 total additional. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $79,500 to $99,750.

3. Moritz School of Law: We originally budgeted $84,744 ($12,106 average per month) for staff and overhead for the May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005 period. We anticipate needing an additional $23,171 ($11,585 average per month) to support their time on this project in January and February. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $84,744 to $107,915.

With these revisions, approximately $22,000 of the EAC contract award to Eagleton would remain not yet allocated, primarily because the cost for the public hearings would have incurred Rutgers University overhead whereas the additional expenditures for consultants and the subcontract with Moritz do not.

I hope this provides you the information you need. While Rutgers is shutting down until January 3rd, I will be checking email at least every day or two.

Karen - At this time, we anticipate reallocating funds primarily from the public hearings line item and spending approximately $35,500 more than originally budgeted on personnel, $23,250 more on the subcontract with Ohio State and $20,250 more on consultants. There are other additional variances but they are not significant (e.g. less on honoraria, less on travel, and more on general operations such as phone expenses). Subject: Meeting with EAC and Ballot Design

Karen, This email addresses two topics.

1. Meeting with EAC

At the end of August, we will have a draft of the Analysis and Alternatives paper for provisional voting, and we will have developed an outline of the alternatives to be described in the Preliminary Guidance Document (PGD). Before beginning to draft the PGD, we would benefit from a discussion with EAC staff and, perhaps, the commissioners. We would like to explore, through you, the scheduling of a meeting for that purpose, and suggest the date of August 26 at your offices in Washington. Several of us would attend and others might participate by teleconference.

2. Design of Provisional Ballots

In our teleconference a week ago, Tom Wilkey asked if we were collecting actual provisional ballots from around the country to assess their design. A collection of provisional ballots is not a deliverable under our contract, but at your request we have estimated what such an effort might require.
The goal would be to collect ballots, examine them to determine how well they conform to any ballot design criteria established in state legislation or regulations and possibly evaluate them against objective design standards of clarity and ease of use.

If state regulations or legislation specify the detailed design of provisional ballots, collecting a sample ballot and envelope from each state would be feasible. If states have delegated the details of design to county or other levels of government, the collection process would probably not be worth the substantial time and expense involved in contacting more than 3,000 jurisdictions.

Step One -- Feasibility

A prudent approach to this work would begin with a feasibility study. It would determine how many states use a uniform provisional ballot throughout the state and how many allow significant variation in design among counties or other jurisdictions. Working with the statutes and regulations now being collected by Moritz, we would also determine if state statutes or regulations specify the details of the design of provisional ballots. This work would provide the information needed to decide if the project is doable at reasonable cost. The feasibility study would probably require 5 to 10 days of research time. On a time-and-materials basis, including overhead charges, the cost of the feasibility analysis would be in the range of $2,500 -- $5,000.

Step Two -- Collection and Analysis

If EAC determines on the basis of our feasibility report that the project is feasible, collecting the provisional ballots and envelopes would require 3 – 4 weeks of research, collection and analysis at a cost of $6,000 -- $9,000 (with overhead). The research process would include:

- Determining the appropriate official in each state to contact,
- Sending each official a letter requesting a provisional ballot and envelope as used in federal elections,
- Making up to 3 follow-up calls.
- Compiling and categorizing the ballots
- Comparing the actual ballots to any specifications contained in state statutes or regulations.

The deliverables would be:
- The collection of ballots,
- A compendium of statutory or regulatory specifications of ballot design,
- Classification of ballots according to the major design principles reflected in their layout and appearance.
Possible Step 3 – Evaluation of Provisional Ballot Design

The EAC might also wish to consider a logical, third step. Once the ballots are collected, Eagleton could arrange to evaluate provisional ballots for clarity and user-friendliness. The review could be done by one or more focus groups that Eagleton would empanel, or it could be conducted by a design firm that would review the ballots and make recommendations for principles of good design that could be issued as guidance to the states. We have not identified an individual designer or firm with credentials in this field, but could do so as part of the feasibility study. Eagleton could do the focus group in-house at relatively modest cost.

Please let me know if you would like us to go further with this assignment.

Tom O’Neill

--- Forwarded by Carol A. Paquette/EAC/GOV on 07/08/2005 05:07 PM ----

Carol,

After our discussion in New York, you asked me to put in writing our response to the EAC's suggestions for expanding the number and kinds of groups that would review and comment on our work. I hope after your review of this response, we will be able to quickly recruit a balanced Peer Review Group (PRG) and move ahead as the schedule in our work plan indicates. Attached is a revised list of the members we propose for appointment to the PRG. We will probably not be able to persuade all of them to serve, but the number and range of views included on the proposed list should ensure that the resulting group is well-balanced.
RESPONSE TO EAC RECOMMENDATIONS FOR ADDITIONAL REVIEW GROUPS

EAC’s Recommendations for the PRG
Karen Lynn-Dyson reported this response from the EAC commissioners to our proposal for the composition of the PRG.

1. Not sufficient conservative representation on the PRG

2. Create a “tiered process” of review in which:
   A. The PRG will prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions.
   B. PRG’s analysis would be vetted by a defined/select group of local election officials.
   C. A defined/select group of advocacy organizations would review the comments of the local election officials.
   D. Empanel a final focus group of local election officials, advocates and academics for an overall, interactive reaction to the analysis and recommendations.

Project Team Response
Creating three new committees to the review process to supplement the work of the Peer Review Group (PRG) is possible, but would add at least 8 weeks—and possibly 12 weeks—to our completion of the guidance document on provisional voting. We believe this delay would risk limiting the value of this project for the 2006 election. In addition, the change would add at least $30,000 to the cost of our work. (See the attached table showing the possible effect on our work plan, and note the optimistic assumptions such as the ability to hold a hearing the week after Christmas.). If the same groups were to be engaged in reviewing our work on Voter ID, the time for that work would also have to be stretched at a similar increased cost.

This additional cost and the added time might be worthwhile... if the new layers of review were to produce a consensus on how to strengthen the research, sharpen the analysis, and increase the relevance of the Guidance Document. Our team concluded, however, that additional review groups were unlikely to achieve these results.

PRG focuses on quality of research
We believe that our research would be strengthened by a balanced Peer Review Group that will focus on the design of the research and our conduct of it. Based on the EAC’s recommendation, we have revised the composition of the PRG to include additional, well-recognized authorities in the field whose perspective is generally agreed to be conservative.

The PRG will focus on the strength of the research design and the quality of our analysis, not on the politics of our recommendations for the guidance document. The PRG will critique the research design and suggest how to strengthen it. Members of the group will review the quality of our analysis so that we can fill holes and correct errors before we make policy recommendations to the EAC. The PRG may or may not meet as a group. The likelihood is that most comments will come in writing from individual members, most of whose schedules would not permit attendance at meetings. In any case, the PRG members will not gather around a table to come to consensus on the study’s recommendations.
While using the PRG as a forum to reach consensus on the knotty issues involved does not appear practical, the EAC can benefit from the work of other groups in this regard. It is not necessary for this project to duplicate the deliberative processes of the Carter-Baker Commission, the Century Foundation and the Election Center. The EAC itself as well as the project team can get the benefit of these reports without duplicating this "policy evaluation board" structure as part of this contract.

Karen reported that the Commissioners believed that the PRG would "prepare a dispassionate analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions." As we see it, the PRG will neither analyze data nor draw conclusions, tentative or otherwise. Its members will review and comment on how the Project Team has designed and carried out the research. Analysis, conclusions and recommendations are the responsibility of the Project Team. We have all seen in the preface to books or articles a sentence or two that read something like this, "The author thanks Mr. X, Ms. Y, and Dr. Z for their review and comment on the manuscript. Their analysis has strengthened the work, but they are in no way responsible for errors or for my conclusions." That is the way we think about the Peer Review Group.

In short, the PRG will help ensure that EAC's Guidance Document is founded on a solid base of data and analysis. The review and comment on the Preliminary Guidance Document by the EAC's Board of Advisors and Standards Board will provide participation by important stakeholder groups without the need for the other review committees. This Board is broad-based and represents a key stakeholder group. It also enjoys a significant advantage over a "defined/select" group we might empanel. Any group we define will be open to criticism or charges of bias by representatives of interest groups not represented.

The criticism and charges of bias might be tolerable, but only if we could expect consensus from the "defined/select" group we would appoint. We believe that consensus would be elusive. In empanelling a "defined/select" group, we would naturally look for balance and would appoint members to represent a point of view or an institutional interest. As representatives they would likely feel that they had little choice but to be strong advocates. They would have little incentive to compromise. Our research, as opposed to our policy recommendations, would be better served by the analysis of scholars than by the advocacy of interests.

Policy judgments
We regard the EAC itself as responsible for the policy judgments involved in shaping the Guidance Document. We plan, of course, to respond to the EAC's comments on our preliminary draft, so that the EAC's comments will shape the Preliminary Guidance Document before it is released for public comment. And further revision will follow the public hearing and comments. The EAC and individual Commissioners can always seek comment informally on our analysis or recommendations. That course appears to us preferable to the creation of a new, more elaborate review process.

Voting rights and wrongs
By Donna Brazile
THE WASHINGTON TIMES
Published April 16, 2007

Just when civil rights advocates were celebrating recent advances in restoring the voting rights of 5.3 million Americans prohibited from voting in several states because of their felony convictions, along comes the news that the Bush administration has been playing politics with meaningful electoral reform.

Geez, can't they focus on governing without engaging in partisan warfare?

The New York Times has reported that the Election Assistance Commission, a federal agency charged with administering federal elections, "played down the findings of experts who concluded last year that there was little voter fraud around the nation." According to the New York Times' review, the "original report on fraud cites 'evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression' of voters by local officials, especially in some American Indian communities, while the final report says only that voter 'intimidation is also a topic of some debate because there is little agreement concerning what constitutes actionable voter intimidation.'"

Just why would the EAC suppress or alter a report that could have helped restore citizens' confidence in our electoral system? Did someone pressure them to disown reports they commissioned? If so, we need to find the guilty parties and bring yet another shameful episode of partisanship to public attention.

As the Times notes, this issue played a "significant role" in the Bush administration's "firing of eight United States attorneys, several of whom, documents now indicate, were dismissed for being insufficiently aggressive in pursuing voter fraud cases." Perhaps disgraced Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez will have the decency to respond to these allegations next week when he testifies on Capitol Hill.

The Election Assistance Commission, according to its own mission statement, is supposed to be a clearinghouse for all "matters that affect the administration of federal elections," providing "information and guidance with respect to laws, procedures and technologies affecting the administration of federal elections." Fair enough, but why did they shove aside a report that could have provided timely guidance to members of Congress trying to address so-called voter fraud by imposing restrictive voter-ID requirements?

The EAC not only refused to accept the reasoned conclusion of its bipartisan consultants, they also refused to release those findings at a time when doing so would have discounted claims of rampant voter fraud that were the justification for the restrictive voter ID law passed last year by the Republican-controlled House of Representatives. Thank God the Senate had no appetite to take up a similar measure being pushed to address the phantom of voter fraud.

Here we approach another major electoral season and the agency in charge of helping states reform their electoral practices has lost its credibility. Loyola Law professor and election expert Richard Hansen have written that the "EAC needs to remain a credible broker and cannot be timid by what it finds." Mr. Hansen believes that if the evidence supports one side of the debate, that is "not a reason to disown a report and start over." Hmmm, unless it's about politics and helping one side gain an electoral advantage.

Since the 2000 presidential election, states have moved to enact stringent voter ID requirements. According to election experts, as of the November 2006 election, 24 states had enacted some form of voter identification law, up from 11 in 2000.

While state and federal courts have thrown out some restrictive and punitive photo ID laws on the grounds they may lead to disenfranchising poor, elderly or minority citizens otherwise eligible to vote, the drumbeat still rages to put in place more punitive laws. The motives are simple: Suppress the turnout of eligible citizens who may not embrace the political priorities of one of the major political parties. Shameful.

No citizen should vote twice, and felons and others seeking to have their voting rights restored must remain patient while the wheels of justice turn in their favor. But, under the guise of people "stuffing ballot boxes," allowing the dead to vote or undocumented workers attempting to claim citizenship, Republican lawmakers have begun to erect new laws that could severely curtail the right of all eligible citizens to vote and have those votes counted accurately.

Perhaps it's time we all put aside partisan consideration and agree that no eligible citizen should have to pay to vote. As many civil rights advocates will tell you, proof of citizenship requirements can place an undue financial burden on voters. I know because many of my family members who had all their possessions washed away during Hurricane Katrina are still scurrying to replace passports, birth certificates and other proof of citizenship, and the expense is shocking.

We should also agree that no eligible citizen should face intimidation by partisan poll workers or be asked to produce ID at the polling place when state law only requires first-time voters and those who did not list an ID number on their registration forms to do so. It's wrong, and it's illegal.

The Justice Department and the Election Assistance Commission, you are now on notice that civil rights groups are watching your every step, your partisan reports and, yes, your role in destroying one of the most important ingredients of our democracy: the right of all citizens regardless of race, gender, disability, age or class to participate in the electoral process.

Carnahan urges time, resources to deal with election laws
By SAM HANANEL, The Associated Press
Apr 18, 2007 8:07 PM (13 hrs ago)

WASHINGTON - States will need time and resources to comply with any changes that Congress might order to electronic voting systems, Missouri Secretary of State Robin Carnahan told a congressional panel on Wednesday.
"Obviously elections are run locally," Carnahan told the House Subcommittee on Information Policy, the Census, and the National Archives. "If you all take over the election process, that's a big change in our country and it will take money to do that."

The hearing examined the reliability and security of electronic voting systems that have been put into place across the country since the failure of paper ballots was exposed in the 2000 election.

Subcommittee chairman William Lacy Clay, D-Mo., said he wants Congress to require a paper trail to back up electronic voting machines and make the process of testing election software and verifying its security coding more transparent.

Clay cited results from the 2006 election that show some electronic voting systems still produced unreliable results, causing distrust among voters.

"It is absolutely vital that we utilize technology that provides an independent, auditable voting record that can be verified by election officials," Clay said.

Carnahan, a Democrat, said lawmakers need to give states a reasonable time frame to comply if Congress implements any changes, and guarantee full funding for any mandates that come down. She also urged lawmakers to gather input from state and local officials before taking action.

Carnahan described Missouri's elections as "fair, accurate and secure," and said the state's use of new optical scan and touch-screen voting systems was generally a success.

But there were some problems, such as long lines that formed when some polling places ran out of... ballots. She said there is a need for more training for poll workers unfamiliar with the new technology.

Missouri is one of 27 states that already require paper records for electronic machines.

Gracia Hillman, a member of the U.S Election Assistance Commission, told Clay that only Congress has the authority to order nationwide use of paper voting verification.

Depending on what Congress does, Hillman said, at least 180,000 machines around the country would need to be replaced or upgraded. That could be a "recipe for colossal confusion" if lawmakers try to enact such legislation with only a year-and-a-half before the 2008 election, she said.

Clay also grilled Hillman about reports that EAC officials rewrote the findings of a government-funded report on voter fraud to downplay the pervasiveness of problems with electronic systems. Clay said he has concerns the EAC is improperly politicizing its work.

Hillman said changes in the report drafted by researchers at Rutgers University were made because some conclusions were not supported by the data.

"I do not believe that the EAC could have reached agreement on the conclusions offered by those researchers without being allowed to validate those conclusions," Hillman said.

Avi Rubin, a computer science professor at Johns Hopkins University, testified that an electronic voting system without a backup paper receipt cannot be properly audited.

Lawmakers call for e-voting paper trails
By Grant Gross, IDG News Service
April 18, 2007

U.S. lawmakers on Wednesday called for electronic voting machines to include paper trail backups, while a government auditor said better security measures for the machines are needed.

A still-contested 2006 election for the U.S. House of Representatives in Florida's 13th district is a "prominent example of how, in some instances, electronic voting systems have produced unreliable results, raising concerns among voting-system experts and causing distrust among voters," said Representative William Lacy Clay, chairman of the House Information Policy, Census, and National Archives Subcommittee.

In the Florida House election, more than 18,000 voters failed to cast ballots on e-voting machines, and the Republican candidate won by fewer than 400 votes.

Clay, from Missouri, and other Democrats called for paper trail printouts to be required as a way to audit results from touchscreen DRE (Direct Recording Electronic) machines. But Gracia Hillman, a member of the U.S. EAC (Election Assistance Commission), warned Congress not to rush into paper-trail requirements.

Hillman avoided taking a position on paper trail ballots during a subcommittee hearing. But at least 180,000 DREs across the U.S. would have to be upgraded or replaced if Congress required paper trails, she said.

"When you combine the introduction of new equipment, earlier primaries, and the enormous tasks of recruiting and training poll workers to meet a presidential election year deadline -- which is only a year and a half from now -- you have all of the ingredients of a recipe for colossal confusion," Hillman said.

Robin Carnahan, secretary of state for Missouri, also called on Congress to allow reasonable time frames for changes in e-voting requirements. "Don't do things that create expectations but can't be met by local election officials," she said.

Carnahan said the 2006 election in Missouri was "fair, accurate and secure." Voters there used optical scan and DRE machines with paper trails.

Other lawmakers seemed skeptical of the need for paper trails. Representative Bill Sali, an Idaho Republican, asked Hillman and Randolph Hite, director of information technology architecture and systems for the U.S. GAO (Government Accountability Office), if they knew of any e-voting machines that had been hacked during an election. Both said they were not aware of any.

But Hite called on state and local elections officials to pay more attention to e-voting security and machine life cycle.

Several groups have "raised significant concerns about the security and reliability of electronic voting systems," Hite said. "Many of these security and reliability concerns are legitimate and thus merit the combined and focused attention of federal, state, and local authorities."

In an extensive GAO review, the agency found that many jurisdictions did not use the most current voting system standards, and many do not consistently monitor election performance. Voting-machine best practices were implemented to "varying degrees," he said.

Security measures for e-voting machines "ranged from rigorous to ad hoc," Hite added. He called on the EAC to work with local and state election authorities to strengthen security measures.

Commission urges caution on election reform
National Journal's Congress Daily AM
An official with the commission charged with overseeing the administration of federal elections urged House lawmakers Wednesday to proceed with caution as they consider sweeping electoral reform legislation.

Election Assistance Commission member Gracia Hillman told the House Oversight and Government Reform Information Policy Subcommittee that earlier primary elections, new equipment and increased poll-worker training demands already stand to complicate the administration of federal elections next year, National Journal's Technology Daily reported.

During a hearing on electronic voting machines, she said lawmakers are right to question the use of certain e-voting machines. A measure sponsored by Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J., would require all e-voting machines to be backed up by paper trails.

But Hillman said Congress needs to be aware of the confusion that extensive e-voting upgrades might cause. She also urged the panel to consider other electoral issues such as voter registration, participation and disenfranchisement.

Rodriguez elected EAC vice chair
VoteTrust USA
Former Denver City Council President Rosemary E. Rodriguez today was elected vice chair of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) during a public meeting.

As vice chair, she will work with EAC Chair Donetta Davidson as part of the bipartisan leadership team at the commission to set priorities and communicate EAC initiatives.

"My foremost conviction is that all eligible voters should be empowered with simple, unfettered and uncomplicated access to registration and to the voting booth" said Rodriguez. "I look forward to working with my colleagues as we seek practical means to improve elections in this country in ways that most benefit the voters."
Vice Chair Rodriguez joined the EAC in March. She was nominated to EAC by President Bush in 2006 and confirmed by the U.S. Senate in February. She will serve until December 12, 2007, filling the remaining term of Ray Martinez, who resigned in August 2006.

She served on the Denver, Colorado City Council for three years, and was its president from 2005 to 2006. She was director of Boards and Commissions for the mayor's office from 2002 to 2003 and a clerk and recorder for the City and County of Denver from 1997 to 2002. In 1997 she was acting director of the Denver Election Commission where she supervised city elections. She has been active in numerous grass roots civic and voter advocacy organizations, including the Colorado Voter Initiative where she co-chaired a statewide initiative to allow Election Day voter registration. She was also a co-founder and chair of Latinos Vote, a voter registration project to register Latino voters and provide non-partisan election information to the Latino community.

EAC is an independent bipartisan commission created by HAVA. It is charged with administering payments to states and developing guidance to meet HAVA requirements, implementing election administration improvements, adopting voluntary voting system guidelines, accrediting voting system test laboratories and certifying voting equipment and serving as a national clearinghouse and resource of information regarding election administration. The four EAC commissioners are Donetta Davidson, chair; Rosemary Rodriguez, Caroline Hunter and Gracia Hillman.

NALEO Press Release
Los Angeles, CA - The National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials (NALEO), the nation’s preeminent Latino leadership organization, congratulates Commissioner Rosemary Rodriguez on her election today to serve as Vice-Chair of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC). Commissioner Rodriguez, who is a former NALEO Educational Fund Board member, joined the EAC in March 2007, and was elected Vice-Chair by her fellow Commissioners at a meeting held in Kansas City, Missouri. The EAC is an independent bipartisan commission created to provide guidelines and resources to states for federal election reform.

Commissioner Rodriguez comes to her position with over a decade of experience in public service where she gained extensive expertise with many different aspects of election administration. In the 1990’s, she was actively involved in educating community members about the need for representative districts during redistricting, and in 2001, she was appointed to the Colorado Reapportionment Commission and served as its Chair. For several years, she served as the City of Denver’s Clerk and Recorder, where she was responsible for supervising candidate filings, voter registration and the dissemination of official election information. As Clerk and Recorder, she was a member of Denver’s Election Commission, which directs city-wide elections.

Commissioner Rodriguez also served as a member of the Denver City Council since 2003, and in 2005, she was elected by her peers to serve a one-year term as Council President. Through her experiences in public service, Commissioner Rodriguez developed a thorough understanding of the challenges that voters face in gaining access to the electoral process. As a board member of the NALEO Educational Fund, she was involved in efforts to further Latino political participation through the organization’s U.S. citizenship promotion work and non-partisan voter engagement project Voces de Pueblo.

“Rosemary Rodriguez brings a wealth of knowledge on election issues to the Election Assistance Commission,” said John Bueno, NALEO President and former President Pro-Tem for the City of Pontiac, Michigan. “Throughout her career, she has demonstrated a strong commitment to ensuring that all voters have a voice on Election Day, and she will provide the Commission with invaluable perspectives and expertise. NALEO congratulates Commissioner Rodriguez on her election,” concluded Mr. Bueno.

The EAC is an independent bipartisan commission created by the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA).

It is charged with administering payments to states and developing guidance to meet HAVA requirements, implementing election administration improvements, adopting voluntary voting system guidelines, accrediting voting system test laboratories and certifying voting equipment and serving as a national clearinghouse and resource information regarding election administration. In addition to Commissioner Rodriguez, the members of the EAC are Chair Donnetta Davidson, Gracia Hillman, and Caroline Hunter. Commissioner Rodriguez succeeds former Commissioner Raymundo Martinez III, who resigned in August 2006.

The fraudulance of fraud
By Joel Bleifuss
In Our Times

On April 6, 2006, in Washington, D.C., Karl Rove gave a speech to the Republican National Lawyers Association and issued this dire warning:

We are, in some parts of the country, I'm afraid to say, beginning to look like we have elections like those run in countries where the guys in charge are, you know, colonels in mirrored sunglasses. I mean, it's a real problem, and I appreciate all that you're doing in those hot spots around the country to ensure that the ballot—the integrity of the ballot—is protected, because it's important to our democracy.

When Rove talks about protecting "ballot integrity," that is shorthand for disenfranchising Democratic Party voters. Over the last several years, the Justice Department, with the help of White House... operatives, has sought to boost GOP electoral fortunes by orchestrating a national campaign against voter fraud. But the administration overreached on Dec. 7, when President George W. Bush fired eight U.S. attorneys, a political scandal that some say could become this president’s Watergate.

When Republicans talk about "voter fraud" they are referring to illegal voting by individuals, as opposed to "vote fraud"—systematic attempts to steal an election by an organized group of partisans. This emphasis on voter fraud has convinced eight states to pass laws requiring voters to present official photo identification in order to cast a ballot—laws that studies have shown suppress Democratic turnout among voters who are poor, black, Latino, Asian-American or disabled.

Understanding that one way to win closely contested elections is to keep Democratic voters away from the polls, the Republican Party has tried to stoke public fears of voter fraud. On Feb. 15, 2005, the U.S. Senate Republican Policy Committee issued a report, "Putting an End to Voter Fraud," which said, "Voter fraud continues to plague our nation's federal elections, diluting and canceling out the lawful votes of the vast majority of Americans." To remedy the situation, the Senate Republicans advised Congress to "require that voters at the polls show photo identification."

But voting experts maintain that voter fraud is not a national problem. In March, Lorraine C. Minnite, a professor of political science at Columbia University, released "The Politics of Voter Fraud," a report she prepared for Project Vote, an advocacy group based in Arkansas. She writes:

The claim that voter fraud threatens the integrity of American elections is itself a fraud. It is being used to persuade the public that deceitful and criminal voters are manipulating the electoral system. ... The exaggerated fear of voter fraud has a long history of scuttling efforts to make voting easier and more inclusive, especially for marginalized groups in American society. With renewed partisan vigor, fantasies of fraud are being spun again to undo some of the progress America has made lowering barriers to vote.

This is borne out by a study from the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University, which found that in the 2004 election, voters in states that required documentation of identity were 2.7 percent less likely to vote than voters in states where documentation was not required. Specifically, the study, commissioned by the U.S. Election Assistance Commission, found that Latinos were 10 percent less likely to vote, Asian-Americans 8.5 percent less likely to vote and blacks 5.7 percent less likely to vote.

What's more, despite GOP claims to the contrary, voter fraud is a very rare occurrence. In 2002 the Justice Department established the Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative to ferret out fraudulent voters. On Oct. 4, 2005, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, with great fanfare, proclaimed, "We've made enforcement of election fraud and corrupting offenses a top priority." Yet according to an April 12 New York Times article, only 120 people have been charged with the crime over the past five years, leading to 86 convictions. Furthermore, the Times noted, federal attorneys say that most of the transgressions have been mistakes by immigrants and felons who simply misunderstood eligibility requirements.

The extent of voter fraud is further complicated by the fact that earlier this year the Election Assistance Commission changed the conclusions of a report it had commissioned. The original report by outside election experts concluded, "There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud." The commission deleted that sentence and replaced it with, "There is a great deal of debate on the pervasiveness of fraud."

Rep. José Serrano (D.-N.Y.), who chairs the House Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the commission, is disturbed by this apparently politically motivated substitution. He told In These Times:

This possibly could be another Watergate. We have to ask the questions, "Why was this report doctored, and how does this play into the larger picture of voter suppression and intimidation?" By directing public attention to voter fraud you divert attention from the fact that Americans in certain communities are not able to cast their votes properly and that their votes are not being counted. Is this something that this small new agency thought of by themselves or did they get marching orders from somewhere else, perhaps as far up as the White House?

Firing prosecutors
It appears that, under Rove's direction the White House has been planning to use U.S. attorneys to fan national fears of voter fraud. In his speech to the GOP lawyers, Rove listed 11 states that would play a pivotal role in the 2008 elections. Since 2005, Bush has appointed new U.S. attorneys in nine of those states: Florida, Colorado, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Michigan, Nevada, Arkansas and New Mexico.

What's more, the firings of U.S. attorneys in New Mexico, Arkansas and Washington appear directly related to this Republican plan to exploit the issue of voter fraud and suppress Democratic turnout.

In Arkansas, Bush fired a sitting U.S. attorney in order to appoint Rove protégé Tim Griffin. (See "The Talented Mr. Griffin" by Greg Palast on page 31.)

In Washington, fired U.S. Attorney John McKay had refused to prosecute alleged voter fraud in the 2004 Washington governor's race, in which Democrat Chris Gregoire beat Republican Dino Rossi by 129 votes.

On March 6, McKay testified before the Senate that after the election Republicans pressured him to open an investigation. He said his office had examined the allegations of voter fraud and decided there was not enough evidence to pursue a case.

"Had anyone at the Justice Department or the White House ordered me to pursue any matter criminally in the 2004 governor's election, I would have resigned," McKay told the Seattle Times. "There was no evidence, and I am not going to drag innocent people in front of a grand jury."

In New Mexico, David C. Iglesias was equally suspect in the eyes of the GOP. Recall that in 2000, Gore beat Bush by 377 votes in New Mexico. Consequently, in 2004, Democrat-affiliated groups initiated voter registration campaigns in New Mexico. As a result, two boys, age 13 and 15, received voter cards in the mail. Iglesias responded by setting up a bipartisan task force to investigate. This didn't satisfy attorney Mickey D. Barnett, who represented the 2004 Bush-Cheney campaign in New Mexico. He told Iglesias he should bring federal charges against a canvasser who forged their signatures, which he refused to do.

In a New York Times op-ed, Iglesias wrote:

What the critics, who don't have any experience as prosecutors, have asserted is reprehensible--namely that I should have proceeded without having proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The public has a right to believe that prosecution decisions are made on legal, not political grounds.

Manufacturing voter fraud

The issue of fraudulent voters undermining American democracy did not spontaneously erupt. To promote national concern about voter fraud, in March 2005 GOP operatives with ties to the White House established a 501(c)4 organization called the American Center for Voting Rights Legislative Fund (ACVR). The group went public by establishing a Web site, ac4vr.com. (The site has since been taken down for unknown reasons.)

According to its 990 tax forms, ACVR is based in Midlothian, Va., and its executive director is Robin DeJarnette, who is also the founder and executive director of the Virginia Conservative Action PAC. However, according to the registration form for its Internet domain name, the group's address is a mailbox at a UPS Store in Dallas. The chairman of ACVR is Brian Lunde, a former Democratic National Committee official from Texas, who in 2004 was head of Democrats for Bush.

ACVR specializes in issuing studies that purport to document a host of voter fraud cases, like the report titled: "Democrat operatives far more involved in voter intimidation and suppression in 2004 than Republicans."

On March 21, 2005, four days after ACVR went public, Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), then chair of the Committee on House Administration, opened hearings on 2004 election irregularities. One person who testified was ACVR National Counsel Mark "Thor" Hearne II, who described himself as "a longtime advocate of voter rights and an attorney experienced in election law." In the aftermath of the 2000 presidential campaign, Hearne was dispatched to Florida as a Republican observer in Broward County's manual recount, and in 2004 he worked as the national general counsel for Bush/Cheney '04 Inc.

In his testimony, Hearne described ACVR as "committed to defending the rights of voters and working to increase public confidence in the fairness of the outcome of elections." And he submitted to the committee a copy of the ACVR's "Ohio Election Report," of which he was the lead author. That report read in part:

This Democratic voter registration effort was not limited to registration of legal voters but, criminal investigations and news reports suggest, that this voter registration effort also involved the registration of thousands of fictional voters such as the now infamous Jive F. Turkey, Sr., Dick Tracy and Mary Poppins. Those individuals registering these fictional voters were reportedly paid not just money to do but were, in at least one instance, paid in crack cocaine.

And in testimony on Dec. 7, 2006, the same day the prosecutors were fired, Hearne told the Election Assistance Commission: "Recent press reports suggest that voter registration fraud remains a significant issue in the recent mid-term elections."

The press contact for ACVR is Jim Dyke, who was the communications director of the Republican National Committee during the 2004 election. In the fall of 2005 he was working in the White House trying to get Harriet Miers on the Supreme Court, before moving on to work in Vice President Dick Cheney's office. Brad Friedman of BradBlog.com reported that according internet records, Dyke registered the ACVR Internet domain name, ac4vr.com, in December 2004. Those records have since disappeared from public view. (The source of ACVR's funding is also mysterious. According to the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, "When asked to name any contributors to his nonprofit, Hearne claimed he did not know but said Lunde did. When Lunde was asked, he claimed he did not know but said Hearne did.")

Dyke is a good friend of his fellow Arkansan Tim Griffin, the new U.S. attorney in Arkansas. In 2004, both worked at the Republican National Committee helping Bush get re-elected. Dyke has been a vocal defender of Griffin's appointment as U.S. Attorney. "He has a real passion for the law," Dyke told the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette.

Rounding out the GOP operatives is Pat Rogers, who sits on the board of ACVR. An attorney for the Republican Party in New Mexico, he has been a vocal critic of fired U.S. Attorney Iglesias. According to the Albuquerque Tribune, Rogers is on the short list to replace Iglesias.

Rove's role

Minnite, who did the study on voter fraud, has read through the reports prepared by ACVR and presented by Hearne at various official hearings. She noticed that the claims follow a predictable script. "It all starts to look the same," she says. "There is a pattern in the way the documents that claim to show voter fraud are put together. It is usually a compilation of news reports on allegations. There is no follow up, no research done, no analysis."

"As I delved into it, I was faced with the question: 'Why do people think there is a lot of fraud when there isn't any real evidence?' I think people are being manipulated by politics, which takes the form of these reports that are dumped on the public. It is as if you get a big enough pile maybe you will convince people that the volume of fraud is quite large and that we have a serious problem."

Wisconsin provides a case in point. At a March 13 press conference, White House Counsel Dan Bartlett identified Wisconsin as one of the states from which the White House had "received complaints about U.S. attorneys."

In 2005, U.S. Attorney Steve Biskup, who was appointed by Bush, investigated these allegations of voter fraud and reported that he found no evidence on which to press charges.

It turns out that early in 2005, Republican officials in Wisconsin prepared a report titled "Fraud in Wisconsin 2004: A Timeline/Summary." The document, which was found in White House and Justice Department records released by the House Judiciary Committee, was written by Chris Lato, the former communications director for the state Republican Party, on orders from Rick Wiley, the party's executive director. The 30-page report, which covers Aug. 31, 2004 to April 1, 2005, contains 65 entries detailing voter fraud. The final example is titled: "RPW [Republican Party of Wisconsin] News Release: Evidence of Election Fraud Piles Up."

The information contained in this Wisconsin compilation, made its way into a 78-page report released on July 21, 2005, by ACVR: "Vote Fraud, Intimidation & Suppression in the 2004 Presidential Election." In the introduction, the ACVR's Hearne and Lunde wrote that the report "documents hundreds of incidents and allegations from around the country.... [T]housands of Americans were disenfranchised by illegal votes cast on Election Day 2004 .... [P]aid Democrat operatives were far more involved in voter intimidation and suppression activities than were their Republican counterparts.... [R]equired government-issued photo ID at the polls ... will help assure ... that no American is disenfranchised by illegal votes."

And who was behind this trail of misinformation? On April 7, Daniel Bice, a columnist for the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, reported that a source familiar with the document told him, "The report was prepared for Karl Rove. Rick [Wiley] wanted it so he could give it to Karl Rove."

On April 6, 2006, in Washington, at the aforementioned speech to Republican Party attorneys, Rove began with a joke: "I ran into [ACVR's] Thor Hearne as I was coming in. He was leaving; he was smart, and he was leaving to go out and enjoy the day." Rove then told the assembled party lawyers, "We have, as you know, an enormous and growing problem with elections in certain parts of America today."

Rove should know. He helped grow the problem.

A Selective View of Fraud

By: Joe Conason
New York Observer

Even as Alberto Gonzales rehearses his excuses for the strange dismissal of eight United States Attorneys, which he will perform in public at a Senate hearing this week, he is looking like a marginal player in this scandal. The Attorney General fumbled his role, but in keeping with his Presidential nickname (Fredo), he probably never understood the broader scheme originating in the Bush White House.

Developed by deputy chief of staff Karl Rove, the President's top political aide, that scheme was evidently designed to advance his objective of discouraging minority voters and others with the bad habit of supporting Democratic candidates. In Republican parlance, such attempts to hamper registration, intimidate citizens and reduce turnout in targeted communities are lauded as "combating voter fraud." Several of the fired U.S. Attorneys had angered party operatives, including Mr. Rove, because they had shown so little enthusiasm for trumping up fraud cases against Democrats.

Following the 2004 election, David Iglesias, then serving as the U.S. Attorney in New Mexico, set up a task force to investigate Republican allegations of fraud. Those accusations boiled down to a single case where a woman had created a handful of phony registrations. (She did so for financial reasons, rather than out of any desire to manipulate the election.) When Mr. Iglesias declined prosecution for lack of airtight evidence, local Republicans began to demand his replacement with a more pliable and less professional prosecutor—a demand eventually fulfilled by Mr. Rove and President Bush.

In Wisconsin, by contrast, U.S. Attorney Steven Biskupic prosecuted voter-fraud allegations regardless of merit, winning big headlines when he indicted 14 black Milwaukee residents for casting ballots illegally. Nine of those cases were either tossed out or lost in court—an awful result compared with the normal conviction rate of over 90 percent. But at least the mediocre Mr. Biskupic—who convicted of a Democratic state official was just overturned on appeal—managed to remain in the good graces of the White House and keep his job.

The Republican cry of "voter fraud" is a specious complaint, amplified by right-wing hacks to conceal the fact that in recent years, the most sustained efforts to interfere with orderly elections and voting rights can be traced to the Republican National Committee.

Harassing minority voters with bogus claims of fraud is a venerable tradition in the G.O.P., as anyone familiar with the career of the late Supreme Court Chief Justice William Rehnquist would know. Back in the early 60's, when Rehnquist was just another ambitious young lawyer in Arizona, he ran a partisan campaign to confront black and Hispanic voters over their "qualifications." Along with many of today's generation of Republican leaders, he was a stalwart of the Goldwater campaign in 1964, which garnered its handful of electoral votes in the South by opposing the Voting Rights Act.

Then came Richard Nixon's Southern strategy of nurturing racist grievances to build Republican majorities—around the time that a young operative named Karl Rove was rising in the party. Under his leadership, the G.O.P. has repeatedly been disgraced by conspiracies to diminish voter participation.

In 2002, Republican operatives used a telemarketing firm to illegally jam Democratic phone banks in New Hampshire to win the U.S. Senate seat now held by John Sununu. In 2004, Florida state officials sent armed officers into certain Orlando neighborhoods to scare elderly black registrants, while Republicans sought to challenge minority voters en masse in communities in Kentucky, Nevada, South Carolina, Pennsylvania and Ohio, and paid for the destruction of Democratic voter registrations in Nevada and Oregon.

Actual voter fraud of the kind decried in Republican propaganda is rare, according to nonpartisan experts. Although the White House recently rewrote a careful federal study by the Election Assistance Commission to hide that basic fact, it remains true that very few individuals intentionally seek to fabricate a registration or cast an illegal ballot. There are exceptions, of course—most notably illustrated by Republican celebrity Ann Coulter.

When the far-right columnist and television personality registered to vote in Palm Beach, Fla., in 2005, she wrote down the address of her realtor's office rather than her own home address. She then signed the form, despite its plain warning that falsifying any information on it would make her liable to felony prosecution—and which she, as a lawyer, surely understood. According to Palm Beach County election officials, she also voted in the wrong precinct the following year, disregarding a poll worker who explained her error. (Coulter fans can view her dubious voter-registration form online at www.bradblog.com.)

If proved, those acts would be crimes punishable by prison terms of up to five years, but Ms. Coulter has stonewalled the ongoing investigation. (She says the Palm Beach officials are syphilitic and mentally defective.) No charges have been filed so far, perhaps because her lawyer is a prominent Republican who worked on Bush v. Gore in 2000—and whom the President then appointed as U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Florida. He must know a lot about voter fraud.

Voter ID laws need measured implementation
The controversy over laws that require citizens to present identification in order to vote returned to national attention last week with a prominent report cataloging steps that the Election Assistance Commission took to lessen the splash of a study examining voter fraud in the United States. Where the original study concluded that there is "widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud," the version revised by the EAC finds that "there is a great deal of debate" about the prevalence of voter fraud and made other adjustments to temper the findings.

Voter ID laws tend to invite rancor because partisans on both sides of the aisle believe any changes could affect the outcome of various elections. Republicans generally express concern that lax requirements open the door for elections to be stolen by duplicate voters and the like, while Democrats point to a lack of evidence about the extent of fraud and fear that identification requirements dissuade a large number of poor and minority voters—traditionally Democratic constituencies—from voting. Many people in these demographics, the argument goes, do not have drivers' licenses or comparable identification and can experience difficulty in acquiring them. Further, even the identifications that some states provide for free require documentation—birth certificates or the like—that themselves can require high fees. In this way, ID requirements are compared to modern poll taxes.

A balanced take on the situation is made more difficult by a terrible paucity of convincing evidence regarding both the extent of fraud and the degree to which ID requirements depress turnout. Timothy Vercellotti and David Anderson have released a study suggesting a small negative influence on turnout, but they will be the first to admit that good evidence is hard to come by and that their conclusions are hardly definitive. Similarly, Tova Wang, Spencer Overton, and others point to the fact that relatively few examples of voter fraud have been reported, but skeptics can always respond with the valid concern that fraud, being a criminal activity, is undetectable whenever it is successful. We only know about fraud when it is caught; who knows how much fraud escapes our attention? And even if fraud is uncommon today, could it not become a problem tomorrow?

Aside from the difficulty of balancing integrity and accessibility, proponents of voter ID laws argue that identification requirements will help to restore the flagging confidence in election administration and that the standards are needed to bring U.S. practices on par with the rest of the world; most advanced democracies require identification of some kind (though the onus of providing the ID oftentimes lies on the government).

Perhaps there are a few items within the debate upon which both sides of the aisle can agree. First, voter ID laws would not prevent all kinds of fraud or even the most consequential. Requiring an ID might prevent impersonation of other individuals at the polling places, but it would not, for example, prevent the stuffing of ballot boxes, either in the old, literal sense or the modern electronic equivalent: the subversion of machine software through hacking.

Second, it is difficult to perpetrate fraud—at least the kind of fraud that IDs are designed to prevent—in the volume that would be necessary to swing an election. Impersonating a voter would require either falsifying registration forms to place fictional voters on the rolls or stealing the persona of someone who had already registered. In the first case, an election thief would typically have to contrive fake addresses, a kind of fraud that could well be discovered if perpetrated on a large scale. Similarly, stealing the identity of a real person would require an assurance that the victim had not already voted. Otherwise, a fraudulent voter could be caught red-handed.

Furthermore, in-person fraud would require the perpetrators to travel to enough polling stations on Election Day so as to cast a significant number of fraudulent votes. How many polling places could a single person visit in one day? Fifteen? Perhaps twenty? Such a small number of fraudulent votes is unlikely to change the outcome of an election, and so it seems that any successful scheme would have to employ a group of individuals. Of course, as the number of perpetrators increases, so does the probability of being caught. How many of even the most avid partisans would undertake the formidable risk of jail time in order to marginally increase the likelihood of their favored candidate winning? In many ways, the kind of fraud that an ID requirement would prevent is akin to the counterfeiting of nickels and dimes: high risk for low reward.

Finally, any effort to neutralize voter fraud without a sober consideration of absentee voting would be sorely incomplete. Absentee voting, which routinely constitutes 30 percent or more of the votes cast in some states (such as California), requires no proof of ID and is very much the Achilles heel of election security. Because a single individual could theoretically acquire hundreds of absentee ballots and complete them in private, it is the method most likely to facilitate wholesale voter fraud. If fraud through impersonation is analogous to counterfeiting nickels and dimes, absentee voting could be the equivalent of counterfeiting $100 bills. It is for this reason that efforts to encourage absentee voting, such as allowing absentee voting without an excuse, should be considered with great caution.

Nevertheless, if the states do want to employ some kind of ID requirement, they should take steps to minimize the possibility that ID laws will prevent legitimate votes from being cast. For instance, Virginia allows ID-less voters to cast a ballot as long as they are registered and sign an affidavit affirming their identity. It is a practice not altogether satisfactory to hard-liners on either side, but a reasonable middle ground between security and accessibility. Administrators might even consider strengthening this practice by allowing ID-less voters to check a box indicating that they do not own an acceptable identification. If checked, that individual would receive an ID application in the mail. He or she could then submit the application along with a utility bill or other proof of identity in order to receive a free voter identification card. To reinforce the affidavit’s status as a short-term fix, voters who habitually show up to Election Day without an ID might eventually lose the privilege of identifying by affidavit.

There remains room for spirited debate about the merits of voter ID laws. One could plausibly favor them for reasons of confidence and facility of recordkeeping while still denying that large-scale fraud exists at all. Still, hastily implemented ID laws could disenfranchise legitimate voters to a far greater degree than they would prevent illegitimate voting. For this reason, lawmakers who genuinely seek to administer elections with an eye towards inclusiveness as well as integrity should consider the imposition of greater requirements with the utmost care.

What the Senators Should Ask Gonzalas

By Mark A.R. Kleiman

There are really only two questions the Senate Judiciary Committee needs to ask Alberto Gonzales today:

1. Why are you such a lying turkey?
2. When are you going to resign?

But that would make for an unduly short hearing, so here are a few more questions, just to fill in the time:

1. In your prepared testimony released over the weekend, you assert that you had no advance role in planning for the Pearl Harbor Day massacre. An email sent last year by your assistant, Kyle Sampson, says otherwise. Can you explain the discrepancy?

2. If you were concerned about the performance of the U.S. Attorneys who were fired, why didn’t you or anyone from DoJ HQ write them to document those concerns and ask for plans of improvement? Isn’t that normal management practice?

3. If you were concerned about the performance of the U.S. Attorneys who were fired, why did the Director of the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys not know anything about those concerns until the firings happened?

4. Did anyone in the White House, directly or indirectly, ever express concern about Carol Lam’s corruption investigations? Who? When? What was said?

5. Do you agree with the theory offered by U.S. Attorney Biskupic than anytime political considerations enter into the award of a public contract, that constitutes misappropriation of funds? Has the Public Integrity Section considered or brought such cases against any Bush Administration officials? Why not? And if you don't think that theory is legally sound, why does Mr. Biscupic still have a job?

6. Is it true that Karl Rove and/or Pete Domenici asked you to fire David Iglesias? If so, what were their stated reasons? Is it true that you refused to fire him without a direct order from the president? Did you ever discuss Mr. Iglesias's tenure with the president? Did he instruct you to fire Mr. Iglesias?

7. No doubt you've seen the letter sent by an anonymous group of DoJ career staff, charging that the Honors Program hiring process has been politicized, and that summa cum laude graduates of Harvard and Yale Law Schools chosen by the operating divisions as potential new hires were denied interviews on the orders of the Deputy Attorney General's office because their resumes indicated liberal political leanings or experience working for Democratic legislators. What inquiries have you made into the truth of those allegations? When can you have us a full report, with the names of the candidates redacted?

8. When was it decided that the Civil Rights Division would give preference in hiring to attorneys with no experience in civil rights law? Why? Is it helpful for fewer than half of the new hires to have relevant experience, compared to the historical average of more than three-quarters?

Or is it simply that less experienced attorneys generally aren't as likely as career professionals to resist political interference?

9. During your tenure, the Department has moved away from prosecuting cases of voter intimidation and suppression and toward prosecuting cases of "voter fraud." But you have yet to develop a case where there was any concerted effort to steal a federal election by having ineligible people vote, and in fact a high proportion of the "vote fraud" indictments brought have ended in acquittals. A consultant's report to the Election Assistance Commission found no evidence of any widespread vote fraud, but did find systematic voter suppression and intimidation. Why, in the face of this evidence, do the Department and the White House and the RNC continue to insist that "voter fraud" is a serious problem. If it is, why can't you seem to find any?

10. In your view, does the theory of the unitary executive bar the Justice Department from prosecuting White House officials for contempt of Congress if they refuse to comply with Congressional subpoenas?

11. After Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty testified before this committee that the U.S. Attorney for Arkansas, Bud Cummins, had been let go for purely political reasons, Brian Roehrkasse of your public affairs staff, who was traveling with you in Argentina, sent an email to your chief of staff, Kyle Sampson, saying that you were unhappy with that testimony. Were you unhappy about it because it was false, or because it was true? If you thought it was false -- if you thought, that is, that the Deputy Attorney General of the United States had testified falsely before this committee -- why did you not notify the committee, or insist that Mr. McNulty notify the committee, about the error? If you didn't think it was false, what was the basis of your concern? Did you think it inappropriate for the Deputy Attorney General to tell the truth under oath?

12. There are conflicting stories about the role of the junior senator from Minnesota, Mr. Coleman, in the appointment of Rachel Paulose as U.S. Attorney. It would have been normal for the only senator of the President's party from the affected state to be consulted. Did you, or to your knowledge anyone in DoJ or the White House, ever discuss Ms. Paulose's appointment with Senator Coleman? If so, what was his advice?

13. What was your role in inserting the provision allowing the president to appoint replacement U.S. Attorneys without Senate confirmation into the USA PATRIOT Act reauthorization? To your knowledge, who first came up with that proposal? At what point did you first consider using that provision in connection with the Pearl Harbor Day massacre? How did it happen that Mr. Tolman, formerly the Chief Counsel to this committee who (according to the senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Specter, then the Chairman) oversaw the somewhat surreptitious insertion of that provision into the law, then became United States Attorney for Utah? Why did the Department oppose the repeal of that provision after the Pearl Harbor Day massacre? What communications have you had with the senator from Arizona, Mr. Kyl, about his placing of a hold on that repeal proposal even after DoJ reversed its stated position?

14. Why wasn't Monica Goodling dismissed immediately after she asserted her right against self-incrimination in connection with the Pearl Harbor Day massacre? Would that not be consistent with the Department's pressure on corporations to fire employees who refuse to cooperate in investigations?

A really important homework assignment

By Joan Brunwasser
Op-Ed News

A Really Important Homework Assignment
By Joan Brunwasser, Voting Integrity Editor, OpEdNews April 18, 2007

I am better at writing than doing, talking than doing, virtually anything than actually doing. I'm probably not the only one, but it sometimes makes a mockery of my so-called activism.

My heart is in the right place, but I was born in the wrong generation. High-tech is just not me. If I had been around in the early twentieth century, I would have been a hold-out for the horse and buggy, flustered by those whippersnappers flashing by in their horseless wonders. Paper and pencil are my preferred means of communication, which is why you'll never catch me with a PDA. My sore rear end is a result of my work at OpEdNews, not from surfing the web.

One of the perks of my role as voting integrity editor is that I've been able to connect and establish a rapport with many of the people who have been driving the election integrity movement over the last few years. I do my best to be fair, and I have no particular axe to grind, so people are pretty patient about my technological shortcomings. OpEdNews does its best to include as many of the activists and their work as possible, and we've done a pretty good job at it.

Brad Friedman is one of my cyber-buddies. I have gotten a great education on election integrity from BradBlog.com. His daily exposés are, for me, what I imagine a cup of coffee is for caffeine addicts. I need my fix to feel like I'm on top of things. We have corresponded for quite a while, and even once had a freewheeling phone conversation with the potential of turning into an interview (except for the fact that I don't know how to do interviews and my computer ate the file of the transcript that he sent me). I am grateful to him for teaching me how to insert links so that my articles would look more professional, even though I wasn't a particularly quick study.

I often feel like a cheerleader (finally, sort of fulfilling my aspirations as a junior high schooler). People do great work, and I commend them for it by posting their articles at OpEdNews to give them more exposure. But, in terms of being able to follow exactly what they're saying or actually follow through on their calls to action, there's the rub. And I don't think I'm the only one, either.

I've had an idea for a while about developing a prototype so that people could print it up and have it in front of them when they made calls to their secretaries of state to enlist their support for election reform. It's a project that is on my friend Nancy (of the Election Defense Alliance) Tobi's list, but the truth is that she is so busy with everything else she's doing, she hasn't been able to get to it yet. Nancy believes that our congressional representatives need to hear from their constituents, and that we all need to begin identifying which ones are on our side and which are not. We need to be strategic in order to win. (Stay tuned for your next assignment. Our template for contacting your congressional reps is in the works.)

In the meantime, there I am, full of good intentions. But, have I picked up the phone and called my own Secretary of State, Jesse White? No, I shamefacedly admit, I have not. And if I haven't, I venture to guess that most people haven't either.

Why haven't I? I'm uncomfortable doing it because I don't feel that I really get all the issues yet, which makes me tentative. That's why I thought of this how-to template that would lay out the issues in a very straightforward, easy-to-follow format. That way, I could just clutch it in front of me when I made my phone call.

I wrote Brad about his article on the latest electronic voting machine/EAC scandal - click here "Exclusive: ES&S Touch-Screen Voting Systems Found Vulnerable to 'Serious' Viral Vote-Flipping Attack; US Election Assistance Commission Refuses to Issue Warning" - which reads in part,

The vulnerability is said to allow for a single malicious user to introduce a virus into the system which "could potentially steal all the votes in that county, without being detected," according to a noted computer scientist and voting system expert who has reviewed the findings.

I commended Brad (and co-author Michael Richardson) on the post. This is what he wrote me when I asked what we can be doing.

[Make] noise, noise, noise. Any way possible. You're media! Call the EAC [Election Assistance Commission] and see if they have any explanation for that article!

When they give you the same old song and dance, report it again! Call a couple of the SoS offices at the affected states and ask them if they know their systems were found to have been vulnerable to viruses from a single person that could flip an entire county's election undetectedly, and ask them why they didn't know about it, since the EAC did, and if they think the EAC should have let them know. Etc.

Advance the story, report it. We could use ya, teammate!

So, here's what I did. I went online and got the telephone number of the EAC, (toll-free 866-747-1471) and the name of the director (Jeannie Layson).

Then, I went online again and got the link for the complete roster of all 50 states (http://www.nass.org/sos/soscontact.html) with the Secretaries of States and their phone and fax numbers, snail mail and e-mail addresses. In short, more information than you or I will ever need.

Then, I printed up a copy of the original article from April 16th by Michael Richardson and Brad Friedman (http://www.bradblog.com/?p=4396#more-4396) as well as an update that lists the 16 states affected by this newly discovered "virus vulnerability" (http://www.bradblog.com/?p=4416). So now I'm all set with everything I need.

Unfortunately, it's too late today to call. But, tomorrow, I will take all of my pieces and:

1. Call the EAC and ask them about the article and why they take no responsibility for contacting and warning the states affected by this serious breach. (Keep in mind that this incompetent group is about to be made a permanent fixture on the political landscape if HR 811 is passed.) I will note any comment, or refusal to comment.

2. Then, I will call as many of the 16 secretaries of state as I can to ask what they think about this article, which I will offer to fax or email to them. (I'm assuming that after one or two calls, it will be pretty easy and the words will just roll off my tongue.)

3. Then, I will contact my own secretary of state (thankfully, Illinois is not on this list, but we have plenty of our own problems) and discuss how we can work together on spreading the word about the problems with the EAC, electronic voting and HR 811.

4. Then, I will write another OpEdNews piece and tell you how it went!

Hopefully, you will all take heart from this boiled-down, step-by-step template and be empowered to follow the steps yourselves. Let me know where you got and what they said. Trust me when I say that this kind of approach can make a difference. In the meantime, we will be creating dozens - hopefully even hundreds or thousands - of citizen journalists who are stepping forward to do the job so disastrously abandoned by the mainstream corporate press.

I almost forgot the last step:

5. I will take my shoes off, put my feet up, and heave a big sigh of relief. Thanks, Brad, for making me do this. I feel a lot better now. And it wasn't even as hard as I thought it would be.

Millender-McDonald reveals few details

After feeling ill earlier this month, House Administration Chairwoman Juanita Millender-McDonald (D) visited at least one doctor in Washington, D.C., and returned home to California prior to the April recess for several more sessions with physicians before informing House Democratic leaders Friday that she is suffering from cancer.

According to Millender-McDonald's chief of staff, Bandele McQueen, the Congresswoman, who has closely guarded information regarding her health over the years, has not even told her Capitol Hill staff what type of cancer she is suffering from or how aggressive it might be.

"We appreciate the concerns folks have for the Congresswoman, but at this point we don't have any more information on the type of cancer or the type of treatment," McQueen said.

Millender-McDonald's official leave of absence, granted by Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), extends through May 25.

"She's not going into the office this week or anything, but by being in the district she will have the ability, whether it's working from home or going into the office, to continue to conduct the business of the 37th," said McQueen. "But right now the main focus is making sure that she's well. Hence she's asked for this leave of absence. ... She is hoping to return as soon as possible."

However, McQueen added, "I would be lying to you if my concern is her return to Congress. My concern is her return to good health."

He added that Millender-McDonald has medical staff attending to her at home on an hourly basis, but he dismissed rumors that it was any kind of hospice situation.

On Wednesday, Millender-McDonald was elected, in absentia, to serve as vice chairwoman of the Joint Committee on the Library at the panel's organizational hearing.

During that session, several Members on both sides of the aisle expressed their sympathy and wishes for a speedy recovery, including Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), the newly elected chairwoman of the Library of Congress panel.

Immediately afterward, the Joint Committee on Printing held its organizational hearing, in which House Administration Vice Chairman Robert Brady (D-Calif.) was elected chairman of the joint panel (Feinstein will serve as his vice chairwoman). While the Printing gavel has in the past fallen to the chairman of the House Administration Committee, the decision that Brady would run the committee in the 110th Congress was made with input from the Democratic leadership well before Millender-McDonald announced her illness, according to Brady's chief of staff.

Meanwhile Brady will be leading the House Administration Committee during Millender-McDonald's absence, although he stressed on Wednesday that "I'm just keeping things warm until the lady comes back."

But while giving his remarks at the joint committee's meeting, House Administration ranking member Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.) – who also is serving on both joint panels and led the Library committee in the 109th Congress – jokingly referred to Brady as "Mr. Mayor" in reference to his ongoing campaign for mayor of Philadelphia.

The primary for that election will be held more than a week before Millender-McDonald is due to return from her leave of absence.

When asked about the joke after the hearing, Ehlers simply noted that Brady will have "a very busy life" chairing the committee while seeking another office.

"But," he added, "it's Speaker [Nancy] Pelosi's (D-Calif.) appointment and he's going to have to decide if he wants to do it" while he's actively campaigning.

But even prior to this week's news about Millender-McDonald's illness, Republican committee staff have raised concerns about the panel's inaction in certain areas of jurisdiction including the Capitol Visitor Center project and Smithsonian Institution. Meanwhile, other House and Senate committees have been holding hearings on those subjects.

Earlier this month, Ehlers wrote a letter to Millender-McDonald criticizing Democratic leaders for not yet appointing Members to serve on the Franking Commission, which oversees House lawmakers' official mail. Ehlers pointed to a rise in unsolicited e-mail as "evidence of the toll that a lack of oversight has taken."

Ms. Bertelson and Mr. Horrigan,
Thank you so much for speaking with me. Here's information about the vote fraud/voter intimidation project:

The vote fraud and voter intimidation project began in Sept. 2004. As I said, the statement that this project had been five years in the making is incorrect -- that predates the creation of the EAC. Commissioners were appointed in Dec. 2003, and the agency's first year of operations was 2004 with a $1.2 million operating budget.

Also, any assertion that the administration edited the final report, Election Crimes: An Initial Review and Recommendations for Further Study, is absolutely false. And just to be clear, at no point in this process did the administration play any role at any time during the life of this project. As we discussed, EAC contracted with two consultants to do two things: define "vote fraud" and "voter intimidation" and provide recommendations for future study based on their review of court cases, literature and interviews with 24 people who have experience in these areas. On page 24 of the final report, there are links to appendices which contain the consultants' bios, as well as interview summaries, and all of the court cases and literature they reviewed. EAC advisory boards were briefed on this project at a public meeting in May 2006.

EAC staff reviewed every article, every court case and every interview for accuracy, as we have a responsibility to do. This review process was conducted within the agency by EAC staff. After the staff reviewed the document and edited it for accuracy, added information reflecting which recommendations the commission should adopt, it presented its recommended report to the commission. The commission adopted the final report at a public meeting in December 2006. This meeting was also webcast.

Since the adoption of the final report, the Commission's actions have been questioned by Members of Congress, the media and others. Yesterday, EAC Chair Donetta Davidson requested that the inspector general conduct a review surrounding the circumstances of this project and the voter ID research project. Go here to read the Commission's statement, the memo to the IG and the letters we've received from Congress.

Criticism is fair and healthy. However, I request that criticism be based on facts. It is not factual to state that it took five years to complete this project. And it is not factual to state that the administration played any role -- editing or otherwise -- in this project.

I request a correction that clarifies both of the above points. Also, I think it would be fair to point out that the chair has asked the IG to look into the process. You could link to the IG memo and let readers see our point of view, and the point of view of those who are critical of EAC decisions.

I thank both of you for your consideration in this matter. And again, let me reiterate the fair and professional treatment EAC has received from the reporters in the DC bureau. We look forward to answering any questions the editorial board or the news side of your organization has about EAC or its decisions or actions. Please don't hesitate to call me if I can be of assistance in the future.

Thanks, Jeannie— I appreciate the 'head's up.' I had heard that from Bryan's list serve a couple of minutes before your email. I will make sure that Howard has seen the release and memo. I will forward it to Senator Durbin's Appropriations staff as well. When you have an estimated timeline for the Commission's projected response to Sens. Durbin and Feinstein, please let me know.

Also- I've been asked to let you all know that Chairman Feinstein has set a tentative date of June 13th for a hearing on the Election Assistance Commission. Beyond the tentative date—there are no other details.

I hope that you're doing ok— drop me a line or call if there's anything else that's new.

Just wanted to make sure you knew that Donetta has requested that the IG review the circumstances surrounding the voter ID and the vote fraud and voter intimidation research projects. Info is attached. Let me know if you have questions or need more info... Howard Gantman is on our distribution list, so he should have received this as well.
Hope all is well with you...

EAC Requests Review of Voter ID, Vote Fraud and Voter Intimidation Research Projects

WASHINGTON - U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) Chair Donetta Davidson today issued a formal request to the commission's inspector general to conduct a review of the commission's contracting procedures, including a review of two recent projects focusing on voter identification and vote fraud and voter intimidation. The chair's memo to the inspector general is attached (to view the memo and attachments, click here).

"The actions taken by the commission regarding these research projects have been challenged, and the commissioners and I agree that it is appropriate and necessary to ask the inspector general to review this matter," said EAC Chair Davidson.

Chair Davidson has requested that the inspector general specifically review the circumstances surrounding the issuance and management of the voter identification research project and the vote fraud and voter intimidation research project.

The IG’s request contains the following information, which is what was in the earlier version of the press release.

This report was the culmination of research conducted by Tova Wang and Job Serebrov, who were tasked with defining the terms vote fraud and voter intimidation and providing recommendations how to conduct extensive research in the future on these topics. The contract stated that the consultants were responsible for “creating a report summarizing the findings of this preliminary research effort and working group deliberations. This report should include any recommendations for future EAC research resulting from this effort.”

Sorry bout that... is this sentence acceptable to everyone? It's the last sentence in the fifth paragraph. Revised press release is attached.

"EAC staff reviewed the consultants’ material, and found inconsistencies in their conclusions and the data they submitted. The material in the final report was motivated by a responsibility, especially as a federal agency, to issue findings only when they are supported by data that can enable EAC to firmly defend its conclusions."

Commissioners,
Per the chair's request, I have drafted the following press release to communicate the commission's decision to ask the IG to review our contract procedures. Please let me know if this is okay with all of you. I would like this to go out ASAP, so if you could get back to me with any comments before noon, I would appreciate it. Sorry for the short turnaround, but I think circumstances demand that this get out immediately. Thank you.

After you give me the okay on the press release, I will send everything to staff before releasing it.

Since it's Donetta's statement, I think she should have her consent is important. I don't see a need to defend our actions in this release but simply to announce that we have asked the IG to take a look.

EAC Requests Review of Voter ID, Vote Fraud and Voter Intimidation Research Projects

Deliberative Process Privilege 013959
Commissioners,

The chair has asked me to provide you with the memo she just submitted to Curtis Crider, requesting a review of our contracting procedures surrounding the voter identification and vote fraud and voter intimidation research projects. She has asked me to write a press release about this decision, which I will send to you shortly. She requests that we incorporate the commission's request into the letter to the advisory boards and to Congresswoman Lofgren. She also requests that we respond to Sen. Feinstein's letter, letting her know that we are working to comply with her request, but we wanted to alert her to the action we've taken.

I am going to circulate this to the staff so everyone will be aware of this action. Please let me know if you have any questions, and I will have a press release for your review shortly. Attached to the press release will be this memo, letters from Members of Congress regarding this issue, and the recent statements from Congressmen Hinchey and Serrano.

MEMORANDUM

To: EAC Inspector General Curtis Crider
Fr: EAC Chair Donetta Davidson
Cc: Commissioners Rodriguez, Hillman and Hunter, Tom Wilkey, and Julie Hodgkins
RE: EAC requests review of contracting procedures

On Friday, April 13, each of my three colleagues -- Rosemary Rodriguez, Gracia Hillman, and Caroline Hunter -- agreed with my recommendation that we issue the following formal request to the Commission’s Office of Inspector General to review the circumstances surrounding two recent EAC research projects -- vote fraud and voter intimidation and voter identification.

Background
The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) is an independent, bipartisan Commission created by the Help America Vote Act (HAVA) of 2002.

EAC develops guidance to meet HAVA requirements, adopts voluntary voting system guidelines, accredits voting system test laboratories, certifies voting systems and audits the use of HAVA funds. HAVA also directs EAC to maintain the national mail voter registration form developed in accordance with the National Voter Registration Act (NVRA) of 1993.

The Commission serves as a national clearinghouse and resource of information regarding election administration. It is under the Commission’s clearinghouse role that research projects are conducted with the goal of providing information that will lead to improvements in election administration, as well as inform the public about how, where and when we vote.

The voter identification research was conducted by Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey, through its Eagleton Institute of Politics ("Contractor"). The contract, awarded in May 2005, required the Contractor to perform a review and legal analysis of state legislation, administrative procedures and court cases, and to perform a literature review on other research and data available on the topic of voter identification requirements. Further, the Contractor was asked to analyze the problems and challenges of voter identification, to hypothesize alternative approaches and to recommend various policies that could be applied to these approaches. Last month, the commission voted unanimously not to adopt the report, citing concerns with its methodology, but voted to release all of the data provided by the Contractor.

The vote fraud and voter intimidation research was conducted by Tova Wang and Job Serebrov ("Consultants"). The contracts, awarded in September 2005, issued to these Consultants tasked them with defining the terms vote fraud and voter intimidation and providing recommendations how to conduct extensive research in the future on these topics. The contract stated that the Consultants were responsible for "creating a report summarizing the findings of this preliminary research effort and Working Group deliberations. This report should include any recommendations for future EAC research resulting from this effort."

Review Request
The actions taken by the Commission regarding both the voter identification and the vote fraud and voter intimidation research projects have been challenged. Specifically, Members of Congress, the media, and the public have suggested that political motivations may have been part of the Commission’s decision making process regarding these two projects. Also, the Commission has been criticized for the amount of taxpayer dollars that were spent on these two projects, as well as how efficiently these projects were managed.

The Commission takes these allegations very seriously, and we request that you fully review the following issues and provide the Commission and the Congress with a report of your findings as soon as possible. The Commission stands ready to assist you in these efforts and will provide whatever information, including memos, emails and other documents you will need. Cooperating with your review will be the staff’s top priority.

1. Current Commission policy regarding awarding and managing research contracts.
2. Issuance and management of the vote fraud and voter intimidation contract.
3. Circumstances surrounding the receipt of information from Consultants regarding the vote fraud and voter intimidation project.
4. Circumstances surrounding staff efforts to write a final report for Commission consideration.
5. Identification of staff members who assisted in the editing and collaboration of the final vote fraud and voter intimidation report for Commission consideration.
6. Staff and/or Commissioner collaboration with political entities or other federal agencies regarding the vote fraud and voter intimidation project.
7. Circumstances surrounding Commission discussion and deliberation of final adoption of Election Crimes: An Initial Review and Recommendation for Further Study.
8. Issuance and management of the voter identification contract.
9. Circumstances surrounding the receipt of information from Contractor regarding the voter identification report.
10. Identification of staff members who assisted in the editing, collaboration, and recommendation to the Commission regarding final adoption of the voter identification report.
11. Staff and/or Commissioner collaboration with political entities or other federal agencies regarding the voter identification project.

12. Circumstances surrounding Commission deliberation whether to adopt a final voter identification report.

For your information, I have attached statements and related correspondence from Members of Congress, and a statement issued by the Commission regarding the criticism.

It is our hope that your findings will instruct us how to move forward in a more efficient, effective and transparent manner. The Commission takes its mandates under HAVA very seriously, and this small Commission has an enormous amount of work to conduct, including testing and certifying voting equipment, providing guidance and assistance to election officials, and auditing the proper use of the $3.1 billion that was distributed under HAVA.

We look forward to your findings so that we may take the actions necessary to improve the way we conceive research projects, manage research contracts, and make decisions regarding the final release of data provided to the Commission from a third party.
Hello everyone,
I'm sure you have read the article in today's NYT about the voter fraud report this agency issued. Today, Congressmen Hinchey and Serrano have issued the following statement. Very shortly, EAC will post and distribute the attached statement to articulate our role and approach to conducting research and the steps we will take to improve our process. Please let me know if you have any questions about this, as I am sure we will all receive phone calls today about this issue. You may also direct people with questions to the statement that will be on the website. I will keep everyone informed as this situation evolves.

Hinchey, Serrano Urge Non-Partisanship, Greater Transparency at Election Assistance Commission

Washington, DC - Today, Congressmen Maurice Hinchey (NY-22) and José E. Serrano (NY-16) urged the Election Assistance Commission (EAC) to act with greater transparency and without partisanship. The comments from the congressmen came as the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Financial Services and General Government released a draft version of an EAC report on voter fraud and intimidation that shows significant changes were made to the findings of outside experts before the final report was released.

"The EAC has an obligation to be forthright with the American people and operate transparently and in a non-partisan manner," said Congressman Hinchey, who requested the draft report from EAC Commissioner Donetta L Davidson during subcommittee hearing last month. "The draft report was commissioned with taxpayer dollars upon a mandate from Congress so that we could learn more about voter fraud and intimidation. The need for this report is even more clear when we see the way in which the Bush administration is carrying out the electoral process and how this system is sliding towards corruption. In hiding a draft report from the public that is significantly different from the final version, the EAC has created a lot more questions than it has answered while stunting debate on the issue. In order for our democracy to function properly it is essential that our elections are free of any corruption and that includes ensuring that the EAC does not work to benefit one political party over the other. To achieve that goal we must have all the facts and opinions on the table not just..."
some of them. The EAC must never limit discussion and debate."

"The EAC is charged with helping to ensure our elections are trustworthy and administered fairly," said Congressman Serrano, who is Chair of the Appropriations Subcommittee that oversees the EAC budget. "I’m concerned if changes were made to the report on voter fraud because of partisan bias rather than impartial analysis. When you read the draft report side-by-side with the final version, it is clear that important conclusions of the experts who wrote the draft report were excluded from the final product. Among the excluded information is an analysis that undermines the notion that voter fraud is rampant.

"I am concerned that the EAC did not publicly release the taxpayer-funded draft report, and I worry that political considerations may have played a role. We cannot have a politicized EAC, or one that yields to outside pressure. Our democracy, and the American people’s faith in it, is far more important than a short-term political advantage."

The draft report was written by outside experts under contract with the EAC. The final report was entitled "Election Crimes: An Initial Review and Recommendations for Future Study" and was issued on December 7, 2006.

The EAC is an independent bipartisan commission created by the 2002 Help America Vote Act in order to disburse funds to the states for the purchase of voting systems, certify voting technologies, develop guidelines and serve as an information resource for election administration.
EAC Statement Regarding Research and Contracting Policies

Commission to Review Internal Procedures

For Immediate Release
April 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) directs the Election Assistance Commission (EAC) to serve as a national clearinghouse and resource by, among other things, conducting studies with the goal of improving the administration of federal elections. To fulfill this mandate, the EAC has entered into contracts with a variety of persons and entities. Reports adopted by the EAC, a bipartisan federal entity, are likely to be cited as authoritative in public discourse. Prior to the EAC's adopting a report submitted by a contractor, the EAC has the responsibility to ensure its accuracy and to verify that conclusions are supported by the underlying research.

The Commission takes input and constructive criticism from Congress and the public very seriously. We will take a hard look at the way we do business. Specifically, we will examine both the manner in which we have awarded contracts and our decision-making process regarding the release of research and reports. The EAC takes its mandates very seriously, and we will continue to move forward in a bipartisan way to improve the way America votes.

EAC is an independent bipartisan commission created by HAVA. It is charged with administering payments to states and developing guidance to meet HAVA requirements, implementing election administration improvements, adopting voluntary voting system guidelines, accrediting voting system test laboratories and certifying voting equipment and serving as a national clearinghouse and resource of information regarding election administration. The four EAC commissioners are Donetta Davidson, chair; Rosemary Rodriguez, Caroline Hunter and Gracia Hillman.

Laura,

The fraud and intimidation research contract was for $147,106, and the voter ID and provisional voting research contract was $560,002. Voter ID was only part of the contract. It also tasked Eagleton to provide information about provisional voting practices. In Oct. 2006, the Commission issued provisional voting best practices.

Please let me know if you need anything else, and I'll send you the statement as soon as it's ready to go.

Despite requests, the Election Assistance Commission is refusing to release a report written months ago that reportedly pokes holes in the widespread myth that voter fraud is rampant in America. EAC Chairman Paul S. DeGregorio Thursday denied a request by People For the American Way Foundation (PFAWF) to make the taxpayer-funded findings available to the public in time for the November elections, now less than three weeks away. PFAWF President Ralph G. Neas said the information should be released immediately and questions whether the report is being suppressed for political reasons.

The existence of the report was revealed days ago by USA Today, which reported that instances in which non-eligible persons attempt to pass themselves off as voters and somehow cast fraudulent votes are exceedingly rare. PFAWF’s sister advocacy organization, People For the American Way, has launched a petition drive asking the commissioners to release the report, since it will refute rampant allegations of voter fraud which have led to restrictive voting requirements.

“As we approach the elections, the last thing election officials need is to labor under the false impression that ineligible people are trying to pass themselves off as qualified voters at the polls. They should be focusing on ways to keep the path to the ballot box clear for as many eligible voters as possible, instead of looking for nonexistent fraud that will slow down the process and possibly even discourage eligible voters,” said PFAW President Ralph G. Neas. “We need to raise confidence in our elections process, not allow harmful myths to stand – especially when the government has findings available to refute them.”

Neas sent a letter on behalf of PFAW Foundation to the EAC earlier this week asking that the report be made available to the public, but on Thursday the EAC denied the request. The report was written by by Tova Wang, an elections scholar at the Century Foundation think tank, and Job Serebrov, an Arkansas attorney, and has been in the hands of the EAC commissioners for more than four months.

Neas said the report has critical implications for election legislation around the country. During the past few years, a number of states have passed legislation to combat supposed “voter fraud” through overly restrictive identification requirements and other impediments to the ballot box. According to USA Today, the report found such voter fraud to be exceedingly rare.

“We have plenty of problems to deal with. We’ve all seen long lines, unreliable voting equipment, purges that wrongly remove eligible voters from the roll. It turns out the problem is not that bad people are trying to vote, but that too many qualified voters are discouraged from voting. This report apparently confirms what common sense has told us for years – we need to make it easier for eligible voters to cast a vote that counts, not harder,’ said Neas. “Instead of fighting nonexistent fraud, these restrictive new laws will discourage voters – people like senior citizens, students and disabled voters who may not have drivers’ licenses or other forms of ID required by these new laws. That’s just wrong, and is clearly not supported by the evidence.”

Neas said the new laws are often politically motivated. The misleadingly-named right-wing group the American Center for Voting Rights has supported extremely restrictive laws by pointing to supposed voting fraud.

“Any law that disadvantages certain groups of voters – like senior citizens and students – should be suspect. If the voters are disadvantaged, which political parties and candidates stand to gain? The same question should be asked about the reason the release of this report has been delayed. Is there a political motivation?” he asked. “Has this study been buried because anti-voter activists like the American Center for Voting Rights find its conclusions inconvenient? That’s unacceptable. The Commissioners of the EAC have had this report for months, even as they have testified before Congress on critical legislation that could have been informed by the report’s findings. It’s unconscionable.”

Laws passed in several states this year raise barriers to the ballot box that would prevent poor, elderly, and minority voters from casting a ballot. PFAW’s sister organization, People For the American Way Foundation, has challenged laws in Ohio, Missouri, and Arizona; in all three, the laws were either struck down or stayed until after the November election. Yet restrictions still in effect in a number of states could harm voters. One such provision, stringent ID requirement, has been likened to a modern day poll tax.
Said Neas, “All American citizens have a vested interest in having fair and open elections. This report contains valuable information that can help us do that. The EAC should release the report immediately, no matter what the political implications may be and hold public hearings to discuss the findings.”

On the money as far as I am concerned

Need you to let me know if this response is okay ASAP:

EAC staff presented a status report about this research project to our advisory boards at a public meeting in May. Since then, we've received a draft from the consultants and EAC staff is currently reviewing the data to ensure it is accurate and complete. After we've completed this process, we'll release a final report.
Hey Jeannie - thanks for all of your help yesterday - got any response/thoughts on this?
Thanks

Bryan,

This article slamming the EAC ran in a major Washington newspaper on Tuesday (the link is http://www.spokesmanreview.com/opinion/story.asp?ID=156039, and the text is included below). All I've heard about the report is what USA Today mentioned, plus Tom Wilkey told me that the report is currently being worked on for a near-future release.

I'm planning to respond to this article on the issue of whether voter fraud is widespread, and wanted to also defend the EAC's actions, which I think were wise. It sounds like the news editors just conjectured what happened, as they indicated no attempt to find out for sure why the report was withheld.

In responding to them, it would be nice to have your side of the story to help me accurately explain what happened. Can you give me any comments on why the report was held? Was it because the EAC was trying to help those who are "peddling suspicions of voter fraud"?

Any thoughts you have would be helpful.

Cordially,

Jonathan

Our view: Fraudulent fears
Shame on hiding report finding low voter fraud

October 24, 2006

Proponents of stringent election laws designed to stop fraud surely don't want to hear that there's little evidence of chicanery. That's probably why the results of a federal study on the matter, which was delivered in May, were kept quiet.

Many states have adopted restrictions on voter registration and polling place practices, and the U.S. House of Representatives passed a photo-identification bill aimed at poll-site voting. The Senate is expected to take up the issue next year.

The premise behind all of this legislation is that fraud is widespread. But the U.S. Election Assistance Commission, which was established by Congress to ensure voting integrity, commissioned a study that questions that assumption. USA Today obtained the study four months after its completion and recently reported on the findings:

"There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling-place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, 'dead' voters, non-citizen voting and felon voters."

That's an awfully inconvenient summation for those who back stricter voting laws and consistently assert that there's rampant fraud while providing scant proof.

Voter fraud is a highly politicized issue. The congressional bill on photo IDs drew the support of 98 percent of Republicans and the opposition of 98 percent of Democrats. And voters in Washington state lived through the partisan wrangling after the razor-thin victory by Chris Gregoire in the 2004 gubernatorial election, when mistakes were quickly relabeled "fraud."

When a favorite candidate loses a close race, partisans attack the system of voting. It happened in Florida in 2000 and in Washington state in 2004. What's interesting about the federal commission's study is that it points to the system that most reforms would not touch as having the highest potential for fraud.

Absentee balloting is more susceptible to manipulation, the report states, via coercion and forgery. But it's polling places that have been placed under heavy scrutiny by reformers.
The lack of focus on mail-in balloting is probably a political calculation, because it's popular. Most counties in Washington state have moved to that system.

Politicians can get more mileage hyping the possibility of votes by illegal immigrants and felons, but their solutions can serve to discourage voting by honest citizens.

Unfortunately, the federal commission has played into the hands of those peddling suspicions by choosing not to release its report to the public.

The public deserves to know what is happening with its election systems as it weighs the merit of various reform proposals. But a commission that was formed to zero in on real problems has undermined its credibility by sitting on a report that highlights them.
tom,
who should get these emails? There's a petition out there, asking us to release the fraud report, so someone needs to be the point person on these.

Subject EAC Commissioned Report on Voter Fraud

Honorable EAC Commissioners,

I ask you to release the EAC commissioned report on voting fraud. Regardless of political persuasion, voting is the bedrock upon which our representative democracy is built. Because of this your responsibilities are great. Currently there has been a rush of litigation intended to protect against voter fraud. There are real concerns that these protections will decrease voter turnout, and likely decrease turnout disproportionately in minority groups. This will obviously affect the parties differently, thereby creating a tense environment and adding to the strife in our society today. It is important, you can not disagree, that any laws regulating voting practices are only created and passed with honorable intentions, since if the voting process itself is compromised the whole of our representative democracy is as well.

I respect you are in difficult circumstances, but it is better for the country to know the results of an objective report than to be litigated under subjective pretenses and in a disenfranchising manner. All people in this country who are citizens deserve to vote, and this report can help ensure that they continue to have that right free of trappings whose intentions are not true. Thank you for your work and time.

Sincerely,
Dr. Michael D. Marsolek
Dear Mr. Whitener:

Thank you for taking the time to speak with me this morning. As you know, I was calling to request a copy of the complete report regarding voter fraud written by Tova Wang and Job Serebov. I am sending this in accordance with your request that I email our request for a copy of that report to you and that I "cc" Ms. Layson on the email.

I'd very much appreciate obtaining a copy of this report today. In the event that you can send it electronically or fax it, my contact information is below. If not, please let me know when and where I may pick it up.

Thank you for your assistance.

Sincerely,

Judith E. Schaeffer

MEMORANDUM

TO: MEMBERS OF EAC STANDARDS BOARD
FROM: PEGGY NIGHSWONGER, CHAIR, EXECUTIVE BOARD
       RAY MARTINEZ, EAC COMMISSIONER
DATE: APRIL 28, 2006
SUBJECT: UPCOMING MEETING OF STANDARDS BOARD, MAY 23-24, 2006

The next meeting of the EAC Standards Board (to be held jointly with the EAC Board of Advisors) will be held in Washington, D.C. on Tuesday, May 23 and Wednesday, May 24, 2006 at the Hamilton Crown Plaza hotel. We hope you will be able to attend this important meeting, which will focus on consideration and discussion of a number of ongoing election administration research projects currently underway by the EAC. Additionally, there will also be an update and discussion regarding recent work conducted by the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) on the voluntary evoting system guidelines. (Please see the draft agenda attached for additional information.)

As was the case with our previous meetings of the EAC Standards Board, the EAC will pay the cost of travel, hotel and a Federal per diem for any member of the Standards Board wishing to attend the May 2006 meeting. Upon receipt of this memorandum, please contact the EAC's travel agent, Adventure Travel, at (877) 472-6718 to make your travel arrangements. Additionally, if you have any questions or need assistance in making your travel plans, please call (email address is

5:00 P.M. ADJOURN
I have taken a look at the agendas. My questions start with assignment as resource person. Is Peggy going to be present for the Vote Fraud and Intimidation presentation? I have not been the person refereeing between Job and Tova, nor am I up to date on what their findings and work are. If I am just there to support the meeting, that's great, but Peggy should be there to make any substantive comments. I suffer from a similar problem with regard to the Eagleton presentation (other than what I gathered from their presentation a few weeks ago).

Perhaps what I need to know is what is the "resource person" supposed to do?

As a second question, do we know whether this lunch on Tuesday is "set". The hotel contract will have to be amended to include this lunch. I don't want to move forward on setting that up if it is not approved by the two Boards or it is otherwise not going to occur.

Third issue is that last time the Standards Board wanted a parliamentarian -- not volunteering, but that should be considered in terms of how our staff is assigned.

Julie, in response to your questions:

The first response is that we've placed you as a resource person for only the ID, Provisional ballot, and then your presentation on legal clearinghouse website. So that's changed. The EAC reference person is not supposed to really interact, but be able to respond to the Board if they have questions regarding EAC processes in conducting the research. The panelists should start and lead the discussion. (i.e. for the breakout sessions on VVSG, I only answered procedural questions from the crowd). The ID and PV issues are inherently legal, so we wanted you to be on hand to explain those items.

As to the second issue, I'm copying Ray, because I believe that the lunch has the Executive Board's approval to alter the contract to provide for a lunch. They had requested an earlier start that day, and this is an effort to accommodate that request. If he disagrees, then I can do what is necessary to get approval for that lunch officially.

Third issue, we may need a parliamentarian for the SB, however, that role might be filled by Bill Campbell as the new role of secretary, or as one of the other SB members appointed. Do you believe we need a line in the first plenary session to appoint the parliamentarian? Maybe Gavin's interested? Ray, any thoughts?

Thanks,
Adam

Dear Commissioners:

This is to let you know that the Working Group for our Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation preliminary research project is scheduled to meet in EAC's large conference room the afternoon of Thursday, May 18. I will provide more information about this meeting to you later.

Peggy Sims
Election Research Specialist
To help guide our thoughts for those of us working on the 1 PM meeting on what materials will be available for the SB/BOA meeting, I have drawn up a "comment" version of the SB agenda, which indicates, for each agenda item present, what materials will be available, and when. This is a preliminary agenda, and I realize we'll discuss these issues at the meeting today, but I thought it would be better to see this in written form, so we can identify potential problem areas. I'd like to work from this, modify this document, as we make our determinations as when, and in what form we will be providing materials to the Boards.

Again-- you all are the experts as to what stage these projects are at-- so I apologize if there's missing or incomplete information here.

Thanks,

Attached, please find draft letter to be sent to the Commissioners. Any comments or corrections, please make them and send them back to Amie and myself. We hope to send this email by 3 PM today, so please take a look quickly – for your projects.

Commissioners:

Peggy, Edgardo, Karen, Laiza, Adam and Amie met this afternoon to discuss what materials will be ready to present to the Standards Board and Board of Advisors members during the meetings later this month. Listed below is what we have determined to be available for their review and feedback. Please review this list and offer your feedback.

Also, attached is an updated SB agenda with "comments" on work product for each project to be discussed.

Design for Democracy - exhibits to be on display for board member review and feedback; Ric Grefe will be present with KLD to discuss the processes used to get to these specific examples; Preliminary Design Report (dated April 10, 2006) to be delivered electronically to the members for their review prior to the meeting

Legal Information Clearinghouse - demo version of the website will be available to show

Public Access Portals - there is a conference scheduled for June 16-18; a tentative agenda and, if desired, a list of participants will be made available to the members for their review and feedback; also future steps can also be outlined for their feedback

Katrina Voting Assistance Relief - due to the limited amount of information that we can offer, we propose eliminating this topic and substituting discussions on our Language Working Group meetings

Language Working Groups - the members will be updated on our two working group meetings and the information received at both, as well as our next steps

Provisional Voting - a draft of the final report is to be delivered to the 4 C's by 5/11 for their review and feedback; product following 4C review will be available 5/17 for electronic distribution to board members

Poll Worker R T & R (including College Pollworker) - reports as they stand now are not ready to be presented, according the KLD; Peggy and Karen to communicate to project managers the need for a report by 5/11 for review by the 4 C's

Proposed Management Guidelines - Connie, Brit, and Brian to determine on 5/10 what materials are ready for presentation to board members; currently a 3 page overview briefing of guideline principles and a 20 page chapter on security principles have been prepared

Vote Count/Recount - materials to be delivered to board members include the public testimony given by Thad Hall and Doug Chapin at our Seattle public meeting and several case studies outlining examples

EAC Election Day Survey - draft report with changes/updates highlighted and website application clips to be presented (Ready).
Voting Fraud/Voter Intimidation - a summary of the preliminary research and a recap of the discussions of the May 18 working group meeting offering brainstorming ideas, not advice.

NIST/TGDC activities - Allan Eustis states that NIST is working to provide their summary of materials to be provided, and that they will get that to us ASAP.

Voter Identification - a PowerPoint presentation outlining the process and a summary of findings. Peer review group to occur May 11th, with final Draft due the 15th. At this time, Commissioners can determine whether Draft Report is ready to submit to the SB and BOA.

As you may recall, the Commissioners directed me to find a nonpartisan local election official to serve on the Working Group. The three of us discussed the desirability of having a Hispanic. I proposed that I find someone from Texas because of that State's colorful history of voting fraud and their innovative approaches to combat it. In those Texas counties that hire Election Administrators to run elections, rather than having elected officials do so (Tax Assessor for voter registration; County Clerk for balloting), the Election Administrator is hired by the County Election Commission and is supposed to perform his or her duties in a nonpartisan manner. (See attached excerpts from Texas Election Code regarding election administrator hiring and restrictions on partisan activity.) Any experienced Texas election official will be familiar with voting fraud and voter intimidation schemes used in that State. Mr. Perez has over 13 years experience as a county Election Administrator in Texas. You won't find many news articles mentioning him because he has kept his nose clean. (The Texas press, as in many other parts of the country, prefers to report bad news.) Mr. Perez is plugged into the association of Texas election officials and the two largest organizations of election officials in this country: the International Association of Clerks, Recorders, Election Officials and Treasurers (IACREOT); and The Election Center. He is a past President and past Chairman of the Legislative Committee for the Texas Association of Election Administrators. He currently serves on IACREOT's Election Officials Committee, which plans the educational sessions for election officials that are conducted at that organization's conferences. His peers in IACREOT and The Election Center have selected his submissions on web presentations (IACREOT) and his professional practices papers (Election Center) for awards. Mr. Perez also has access to information from other States through his membership in IACREOT and The Election Center. He also has a sense of humor, which you will note if you access the staff web page on the Guadalupe County Elections web site and hear the Mission Impossible theme .. something that might be useful in the upcoming meeting.

Guadalupe County is small but growing. In 2004, the county had over 65 thousand registered voters (a number more than doubled the number of registered voters in 1988). A third of the county's population claims Hispanic or Latino origin, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. The county is in south central Texas and is bordered by Comal, Hays, Cladwell, Gonzales, Wilson, and Bexar counties. In the 1980s, the county was predominately a farming community; but in recent years, many people have moved from San Antonio (Bexar County) to Guadalupe County, preferring to live in Guadalupe County and work in Bexar County.

Peggy:

What political party is Perez with? How political is he? Is the position in Texas neutral or political? Who appointed Perez?

As to Pat I will contact him but I can’t promise anything. If Pat can’t come, who is getting knocked off Tova’s list?

We are still on for 4 PM. Ray is out of the office due to a family emergency, so I suggest you NOT contact him. You may contact his Special Assistant, Adam Ambrogi (aambrogi@eac.gov or [redacted]), who also hails from Texas. --- Peggy

We are still doing the 4 pm call, right? We can discuss it more then. Would it be OK if I see if Ray knows this person? Thanks. Tova

Regarding the Vote Count/Recount contract, I am trying to schedule a teleconference with Thad for tomorrow. We will discuss preparations for his presentation, among other things. He may suggest additional materials, other than the testimony, that may be acceptable to us.

Regarding the Vote Fraud/Voter Intimidation project, I don't think the materials will include a written recap of the Working Group meeting, scheduled for May 18, if we have to have the materials to you NLT COB May 17. I can provide a verbal recap at the meeting. I may be able to pull together a written recap after May 18, but it won't be available much earlier than the week of the meetings.

Let me know if you have any questions. --- Peggy

It is my understanding that Adam Ambrogi has been in touch with Ned Foley and, in turn, Dan Tokaji to indicate that you and Dan will present the information on the Voter ID project, while you and Ned will present the information on the Provisional Voting project.

Adam Ambrogi can also clarify your presentations. As I understand it, you will present your Voter ID and Provisional Voting projects to the Standards Board. You will then present your Voter ID and Provisional Voting Projects to the Board of Advisors.

I believe Adventure Travel handles hotel and travel arrangements.

I do not believe accommodations have been made for other members of the project team to attend. I will ask Adam Ambrogi, who is the principal point of contact on these meetings, to clarify this.

Tom O' Neill and Ned Foley-

As you know you are scheduled to make two presentations to the EAC Board of Advisors and Standards Board on Tuesday May 23, 2006 from 2:30-4:00 PM (on Provisional Voting) and on Wednesday, May 24th from 1:40-2:45 PM (on Voter Identification)

If you have not already done so, please make your hotel and travel arrangements through Adventure Travel, Judy Mays

These reservations should be made no later than tomorrow COB.

Please indicate to Judy Mays that you are a contractor, who is scheduled to make a presentation at the meeting.

These are the only publicly released agendas yet-- The discussion, and modification that was done last week as to what products are being produced are not reflected-- but will in the final version. These were distributed because of numerous Staff questions as to time and place issues.

We'll forward around the final draft info when available.

Peggy- any word yet on what's up for Voting Fraud issue for the meeting(I know you have that WG in two days, but....)?

U.S. ELECTION ASSISTANCE COMMISSION

Status Report on the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research Project

May 17, 2006
INTRODUCTION

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

In September 2005, the Commission hired two consultants with expertise in this subject matter, Job Serebrov and Tova Wang, to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;
- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

As of the date of this report, the consultants have drafted a definition of election fraud, reviewed relevant literature and reports, interviewed persons from government and private sectors with subject matter expertise, analyzed news reports of alleged election fraud, reviewed case law, and established a project working group.
DEFINITION OF ELECTION FRAUD

The consultants drafted a definition of election fraud that includes numerous aspects of voting fraud (including voter intimidation, which is considered a subset of voting fraud) and voter registration fraud, but excludes campaign finance violations and election administration mistakes. This draft will be discussed and probably refined by the project working group, which is scheduled to convene on May 18, 2006.

LITERATURE REVIEW

The consultants found many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. They found little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud appears to be the report written by Lori Minnite, entitled "Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud". The most systematic look at voter intimidation appears to be the report by Laughlin McDonald, entitled "The New Poll Tax". The consultants found that books written about this subject all seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Moreover, the consultants found that reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund’s frequently cited book, "Stealing Elections".

Consultants found that researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.

- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate; but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
• There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.

• Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.

• Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.

• Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Recommendations

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research include a follow up study of allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles. They also suggest that the research should focus on filling the gap between the lack of reports based on methodical studies by social or political scientists and the numerous, but less scientific, reports published by advocacy groups.

INTERVIEWS

The consultants jointly selected experts from the public and private sector for interviews. The consultants’ analysis of their discussions with these members of the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities follows.

Common Themes

• There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.

• There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, “dead” voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud,
although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.

- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.

- Several people – including representatives from the Department of Justice (DOJ) - indicate that, for various reasons, DOJ is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. While DOJ’s Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance, the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting at the same time as it maintains an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process.

- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed.

- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.
o With respect to DOJ’s Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one’s definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and his office has not pursued any such cases.

o Craig Donsanto of DOJ’s Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases DOJ is investigating and the number of indictments his office is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, DOJ has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so that his agency can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.

- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.

- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.

- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud.

- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment.

- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama’s “deceptive practices” bill.

- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected as non partisan officials, they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas are a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states’ office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.

- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots “for cause” only if it were politically feasible.
• A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the proposal in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.

• A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

NEWS ARTICLES

Consultants conducted a Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006. A systematic, numerical analysis of the data collected during this review is currently being prepared. What follows is an overview of these articles provided by the consultants.

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

• Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.

• Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.

• Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.
Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms;
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with.

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles, in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;
• Poll watchers harassing voters;
• Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;
• Disproportionate police presence;
• Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate; and
• Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from “battleground” states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

“Dead Voters and Multiple Voting”

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials, and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found five such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.
As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia). There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of completed voter registration applications. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case, charges were filed against ten individuals. In another case, a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this Nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem was the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker’s possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples’ votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Recommendation

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research should include a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

CASE LAW RESEARCH

After reviewing over 40,000 cases from 2000 to the present, the majority of which came from appeals courts, the consultants found comparatively few applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, the consultants found that no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it appears to them that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

Recommendation

Because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, consultants suggest that subsequent EAC research include a review of state trial-level decisions.

PROJECT WORKING GROUP

Consultants and EAC worked together to select members for the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group that included election officials and representatives of advocacy groups and the legal community who have an interest and expertise in the subject matter. (See Attachment A for a list of members.) The working group is scheduled to convene at EAC offices on May 18, 2006 to consider the results of the preliminary research and to offer ideas for future EAC activities concerning this subject.

FINAL REPORT

After convening the project working group, the consultants will draft a final report summarizing the results of their research and the working group deliberations. This report will include recommendations for future EAC research related to this subject matter. The draft report will be reviewed by EAC and, after obtaining any clarifications or corrections deemed necessary, will be made available to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors for review and comment. Following this, a final report will be prepared.

- Doug Chapin, electionline.org
Requirement for Study

- Section 241 of the HAVA requires the EAC to conduct a study examining vote counting and recounting.
- Identify methodology for studying best practices
- Examine election laws and regulations in all 50 states and the District Study Overview

- Identified best practice methodologies
- Developed criteria for evaluating practices
- Presented the most common practices for vote counting and recounting.
- Identified "benchmark" practices that exceed the most common practices in states.
- Identified best practices for vote counts and recounts that have been implemented.
Criteria for Studying Vote Counting and Recounting GAO Best Practice Methodology

- Document existing process
- Research literature; talk to practitioners and experts
- Select comparative entities for review
- Collect data from selected entities
- Identify barriers to change
- Compare/contrast processes; develop implementation recommendations
Best Practice Study

- Researched existing literature on vote counting
- Developed baseline of existing activity
- Developed benchmarks for practices that exceed baseline
- Identified potential best practices for review by the EAC Commissioners
- States and localities have to do the hard work: Implementation
International Principles for Vote Counting

IFES, (IDEA), and the United Nations election project states:

to establish and maintain public confidence in the electoral process, vote counting systems and procedures should incorporate the [eight] fundamental principles of vote counting in a democratic election.
Eight Principles for Vote Counting

- Transparency
- Secrecy
- Security
- Timeliness
- Professionalism
- Accountability
- Accuracy
- Equality
Common International Practice

- All ballots should be reconciled against the number of voters who cast ballots.
- Ballots are initially counted at the precinct where the vote was cast.
- There are explicit legal requirements for securing ballots.
- Recounts are allowed by request; five countries conduct 100 percent audits.
- Convenience voting is everywhere.
Evaluating State Practices in Statute and Regulation
Developing National Baseline

- Survey of state laws and regulations
  - Security
  - Pre-election procedures
  - Election ballot procedures
  - End of Election Procedures
  - Definition of “What Constitutes A Vote”
- Counting and Accounting
- Recounting
- Challenges
Developing National Baseline

- Survey of state laws and regulations
  - Identified Specific Questions
  - Reviewed Survey with EAC, Election Officials, and Outside Experts
- Collected Data
  - Statutory or Regulatory Language
  - Legal Citation
Key Findings

- Three issues with great variation in coherence and completeness
  - Ballot Accounting
  - Ballot Security
  - What Constitutes a Vote
Survey Next Steps

- Each report is being carefully reviewed and edited

- Submit surveys to states for review

- States will have interactive online survey form to note problems
Benchmarking Election Law
Benchmarking

- Common in public and private sectors
- How does your performance stack up to similar organizations? OR
- How does your performance stack up to a pre-selected target?

- GOAL: Think about your practices.
Benchmarking Practices

- Using the survey data, we have identified most common practices.
- For many activities, we will propose "benchmark" practices:
  - Clearer,
  - More detailed, or
  - More comprehensive.
Benchmarking Example:
Ballot Accounting

- Most Common Practice: No Standard
- Benchmark: The counting board shall count all ballots to ensure that the total number of ballots corresponds with the total number of names in the poll book. If [they] cannot reconcile... [they] shall submit... a written report stating how many ballots were missing or in excess and any reason ...for the discrepancy.
Benchmarking Limitations

- Not all activities can be benchmarked
- Some activities reflect political and cultural decisions by the state. For example:
  -Absentee voting
  -Handling of recounts and challenges
Best Practices in Election Law
What are Best Practices

- Best practices refer to the processes, practices, and systems identified in... organizations that performed exceptionally well and are widely recognized as improving an organization’s performance and efficiency in specific areas.
Effective Best Practices

- Address a complete process
- Have been carefully charted
- Often come from organizations with similar characteristics

I am told that a Wordperfect copy of the Provisional document will be fine.

EAC staff will convert it to a PDF file. Please send the final drafts of the reports ASAP.

Also, you are correct to note the changes in the time allotments. Please divide the time among your staff as you deem appropriate.

Subject RE: Presentations at the EAC Governing Boards

Karen, I don’t have the capacity to produce a PDF copy of the report. (I thought we discussed this last week and you agreed that the word document would suffice.) Someone at Eagleton could surely convert the DOC file to PDF, but since I just read your email now (4:50), we could not provide a PDF copy today. Please let me know if you want me to pursue this tomorrow.

Thanks for the schedule below. But it raises a question. Earlier this week you told me that the Commissioners asked that we limit our presentation to 10 minutes and leave the rest of the time for questions and comments. As I noted in my response, condensing our reports to 10 minutes poses a challenge. Is the 10 minute limit no longer operative?

Tom-

Look forward to getting a PDF copy of the final versions of the Voter ID paper and the Provisional Voting Paper by COB today.

Here is the timing breakdown for next week’s presentations:

EAC Standards Board (137 members)

Tuesday, May 23, 2006
- 2:30-4:00 PM
- Hamilton Ballroom
- Provisional Voting
- 45 minutes for presentation
- 45 minutes for questions and answers

Wednesday, May 24, 2006
- 1:40-2:45 PM
- Hamilton Ballroom
- Voter Identification
- 40 minutes for presentation
- 25 minutes for questions and answers

EAC Board of Advisors (36 members)

Wednesday, May 24, 2006
- 8:30-9:15 AM
- Lafayette Park Ballroom
- Provisional Voting
- 20 minutes for presentation
- 25 minutes questions and answers

Wednesday, May 24, 2006
- 11:00-11:55 AM
- Lafayette Ballroom
- Voter Identification
- 30 minutes presentation
- 25 minutes questions and answers

EAC General Counsel Julie Thompson - Hodkins will facilitate / moderate all of your sessions

Will be in touch tomorrow after the Commissioners have met.

Karen,

Attached is the Final Draft of our report on Provisional Voting for review by the Advisory Board and the Standards Board. I understand from our conversation earlier today that it will be reviewed by the Commissioners at their meeting next week, and, if approved by them, distributed to the boards in advance of their meetings on May 23 and 24. This report will form the basis of our PowerPoint briefing for the boards at those meetings. I will not have hard copies of those PowerPoint presentations for distribution to the boards until the day of the meeting.

We intend to have the Final Draft Voter ID Report to you in time for review by the Commissioners at their second meeting next week.

Thanks for your guidance.

This research report on Provisional Voting in the 2004 election is part of a broader analysis that also includes a study of Voter Identification Requirements, a report on which is forthcoming. Conducting the work was a consortium of The Eagleton Institute of Politics of Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey, and The Moritz College of Law of The Ohio State University.

The Eagleton Institute explores state and national politics through research, education, and public service, linking the study of politics with its day-to-day practice. It focuses attention on how contemporary political systems work, how they change, and how they might work better. Eagleton regularly undertakes projects to enhance political understanding and involvement, often in collaboration with government agencies, the media, non-profit groups, and other academic institutions.

The Moritz College of Law has served the citizens of Ohio and the nation since its establishment in 1891. It has played a leading role in the legal profession through countless contributions made by graduates and faculty. Its contributions to election law have become well known through its Election Law @ Moritz website. Election Law @ Moritz illuminates public understanding of election law and its role in our nation’s democracy.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Background and Methodology

This report to the United States Election Assistance Commission (EAC) presents recommendations for best practices to improve the process of provisional voting. It is based on research conducted by the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey, and the Moritz College of Law at Ohio State University under contract to the EAC, dated May 24, 2005.

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA, Public Law 107-252) authorizes the EAC (SEC. 241, 42 USC 15381) to conduct periodic studies of election administration issues. The purpose of these studies is to promote methods for voting and administering elections, including provisional voting, that are convenient, accessible and easy to use; that yield accurate, secure and expeditious voting systems; that afford each registered and eligible voter an equal opportunity to vote and to have that vote counted; and that are efficient. Section 302(a) of HAVA required states to establish provisional balloting procedures by January 2004. The process HAVA outlined left considerable room for variation among the states, arguably including such critical questions as who qualifies as a registered voter eligible to cast a provisional ballot that will be counted and in what jurisdiction (precinct or larger unit) the ballot must be cast in order to be counted.

The general requirement for provisional voting is that, if a registered voter appears at a polling place to vote in an election for Federal office, but either the potential voter's name does not appear on the official list of eligible voters for the polling place, or an election official asserts that the individual is not eligible to vote, that potential voter must be permitted to cast a provisional ballot. In some states, those who should receive a provisional ballot include, in the words of the EAC's Election Day Survey, "first-time voters who registered by mail without identification and cannot provide identification, as required under HAVA. . ." HAVA also provides that those who vote pursuant to a court order keeping the polls open after the established closing hour shall vote by provisional ballot. Election administrators are required by HAVA to notify individuals of their opportunity to cast a provisional ballot.

1 The Election Center's National Task Force Report on Election Reform in July 2001 had described provisional ballots as providing "voters whose registration status cannot be determined at the polls or verified at the election office the opportunity to vote. The validity of these ballots is determined later, thus ensuring that no eligible voter is turned away and those truly ineligible will not have their ballots counted." It recommended "in the absence of election day registration or other solutions to address registration questions, provisional ballots must be adopted by all jurisdictions." See www.electioncenter.org.

2 The 2004 election saw at least a dozen suits filed on the issue of whether votes cast in the wrong precinct but the correct county should be counted. One federal circuit court decided the issue in Sandusky County Democratic Party v. Blackwell, 387 F.3d565 (6th Cir. 2004), which held that votes cast outside the correct precinct did not have to be counted. The court relied on the presumption that Congress must be clear in order to alter the state-federal balance; thus Congress, the court concluded would have been clearer had it intended to eliminate state control over polling location (387 F.3d at 578). An alternative argument, that HAVA's definition of "jurisdiction" incorporates the broader definition in the National Voting Rights Act, however, has not been settled by a higher court. But for now states do seem to have discretion in how they define "jurisdiction" for the purpose of counting a provisional ballot.

3 The definition of who was entitled to a provisional ballot could differ significantly among the states. In California, for example, the Secretary of State directed counties to provide voters with the option of voting on a provisional paper ballot if they felt uncomfortable casting votes on the paperless e-voting machines. "I don't want a voter to not vote on Election Day because the only option before them is a touch-screen voting machine. I want that voter to have the confidence that he or she can vote on paper and have the confidence that their vote was cast as marked," Secretary Shelley said. See http://wired.com/news/evote/0,2645,63298,00.html. (Our analysis revealed no differences in the use of provisional ballots in the counties with these paperless e-voting machines. In Ohio, long lines at some polling places resulted in legal action directing that voters waiting in line be given provisional ballots to enable them to vote before the polls closed. (Columbus Dispatch, November 3, 2004.)
Our research began in late May 2005. It focused on six key questions raised by the EAC.
1. How did the states prepare for the onset of the HAVA provisional ballot requirement?
2. How did this vary between states that had previously had some form of provisional ballot and those that did not?
3. How did litigation affect implementation?
4. How effective was provisional voting in enfranchising qualified voters?
5. Did state and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots?
6. Did local election officials have a clear understanding of how to implement provisional voting?

To answer those questions, we:
1. Surveyed 400 local (mostly county) election officials to learn their views about the administration of provisional voting and to gain insights into their experience in the 2004 election.
2. Reviewed the EAC's Election Day Survey, news and other published reports in all 50 states to understand the local background of provisional voting and develop leads for detailed analysis.4
3. Analyzed statistically provisional voting data from the 2004 election to determine associations between the use of provisional voting and such variables as states' experience with provisional voting, use of statewide registration databases, counting out-of-precinct ballots, and use of different approaches to voter identification.
4. Collected and reviewed the provisional voting statutes and regulations in all 50 states.
5. Analyzed litigation affecting provisional voting or growing out of disputes over provisional voting in all states.

Our research is intended to provide EAC with a strategy to engage the states in a continuing effort to strengthen the provisional voting process and increase the consistency with which provisional voting is administered, particularly within a state. As EAC and the states move forward to assess and adopt the recommendations made here, provisional voting merits continuing observation and research. The situation is fluid. As states, particularly those states that did not offer a provisional ballot before 2004, gain greater experience with the process and as statewide voter databases are adopted, the provisional voting process will demand further, research-based refinement.

Variation among the states
In the 2004 election, nationwide about 1.9 million votes, or 1.6% of turnout, were cast as provisional ballots. More than 1.2 million, or just over 63%, were counted. Provisional ballots accounted for a little more than 1% of the final vote tally. These totals obscure the wide variation in provisional voting among the states.5

4 Attachment 1 provides detailed information on how this study classifies the states according to the characteristics of their provisional voting procedures. It also describes how the data used in the statistical analysis may differ from the data in the Election Day Survey, which became available as our research was concluding.
5 HAVA allows the states considerable latitude in how to implement provisional voting, including deciding who beyond the required categories of voters should receive provisional ballots and how to determine which provisional ballots should be counted.
Six states accounted for two-thirds of all the provisional ballots cast.\(^6\)

The percentage of provisional ballots in the total vote varied by a factor of 1,000 -- from a high of 7\% in Alaska to Vermont's 0.006\%.

The portion of provisional ballots cast that were counted ranged from 96\% in Alaska to 6\% in Delaware.

States with voter registration databases counted, on average, 20\% of the provisional ballots cast.

States without databases counted ballots at more than twice that rate: 44\%.\(^7\)

States that provided more time to evaluate provisional ballots counted a greater proportion of those ballots. Those that provided less than one week counted an average of 35.4\% of their ballots, while states that permitted more than 2 weeks, counted 60.8\%.

An important source of variation among states was a state's previous experience with provisional voting. The share of provisional ballots in the total vote was six times greater in states that had used provisional ballots before than in states where the provisional ballot was new. In the 25 states that had some experience with provisional voting before HAVA, a higher portion of the total vote was cast as provisional ballots and a greater percentage of the provisional ballots cast were counted than in the 18 new to provisional balloting.\(^8\)

Within states, too, there was little consistency among different jurisdictions. Of the 20 states for which we have county-level provisional ballot data, the rate of counting provisional ballots varied by as much as 90\% to 100\% among counties in the same state. This suggests that additional factors (including the training of election judges or poll workers) beyond statewide factors, such as experience or the existence of voter registration databases, also influence the use of provisional ballots.

- In Ohio some counties counted provisional ballots not cast in the assigned precinct even though the state's policy was to count only those ballots cast in the correct precinct.
- Some counties in Washington tracked down voters who would otherwise have had their provisional ballots rejected because they had failed to complete part of their registration form, gave them the chance to correct those omissions, and then counted the provisional ballot.

Resources available to administer provisional voting varied considerably among and within states. Differences in demographics and resources result in different experiences with provisional voting. For example, the Election Day Survey found that staffing problems appeared to be particularly acute for jurisdictions in the lowest income and education categories. Small, rural jurisdictions and large, urban jurisdictions tended to report higher rates of an inadequate number of poll workers within polling places or precincts.

- Jurisdictions with lower education and income tend to report more inactive voter registrations, lower turnout, and more provisional ballots cast.

\(^6\) California, New York, Ohio, Arizona, Washington, and North Carolina. The appearance of Arizona, Washington and North Carolina on this list shows that the number of provisional ballots cast depends on factors other than the size of the population.

\(^7\) As the Carter-Baker Commission report put it, "provisional ballots were needed half as often in states with unified databases as in states without." Report on the Commission on Federal Election Reform, "Building Confidence in U. S. Elections," September 2005, p. 16.

\(^8\) See the appendix for our classification of "old" and "new" states and explanation of why the total is less than 50.
Jurisdictions with higher levels of income and education reported higher average numbers of poll workers per polling place or precinct and reported lower rates of staffing problems per precinct.

In precincts located in districts where many voters live in poverty and have low levels of income and education, the voting process, in general, may be managed poorly. Provisional ballots cannot be expected to work much better. In these areas, the focus should be on broader measures to improve the overall functionality of struggling voting districts, although improving the management of provisional balloting may help at the margin.

The lessons of litigation
Successful legal challenges highlight areas where provisional voting procedures were wanting. A flurry of litigation occurred around the country in October 2004 concerning the so-called "wrong precinct issue" — whether provisional ballots cast by voters in a precinct other than their designated one would be counted for statewide races. Most courts, including the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit (the only federal appeals court to rule on the issue), rejected the contention that HAVA requires the counting of these wrong-precinct provisional ballots. This litigation was significant nonetheless.

First, the Sixth Circuit decision established the precedent that voters have the right to sue in federal court to remedy violations of HAVA.
Second—and significantly—the litigation clarified the right of voters to receive provisional ballots, even though the election officials were certain they would not be counted. The decision also defined an ancillary right—the right to be directed to the correct precinct. There voters could cast a regular ballot that would be counted. If they insisted on casting a provisional ballot in the wrong precinct, they would be on notice that it would be a symbolic gesture only.
Third, these lawsuits prompted election officials to take better care in instructing precinct officials on how to notify voters about the need to go to the correct precinct in order to cast a countable ballot.

States move to improve their processes
Shortly after the 2004 election, several states came to the conclusion that the administration of their provisional voting procedures needed to be improved, and they amended their statutes. The new legislation highlights areas of particular concern to states about their provisional voting process.

Florida, Indiana, Virginia, and Washington have clarified or extended the timeline to evaluate the ballots.
Colorado, New Mexico, North Carolina, and Washington have passed legislation focused on improving the efficacy and consistency of the voting and counting process.
Colorado, Arkansas, and North Dakota took up the issue of counting provisional ballots cast in the wrong precinct.

The wide variation in the implementation of provisional voting among and within states suggests that EAC can help states strengthen their processes. Research-based recommendations for best, or at least better, practices that draw on the experience gained in the 2004 election can be useful in states’ efforts to achieve greater consistency in the administration of provisional voting. The important effect of experience on the administration of the provisional ballot process indicates that the states have much they can learn from each other.
SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS FOR BEST PRACTICES

State efforts to improve the provisional voting process have been underway since the 2004 election. By recommending best practices, the EAC will offer informed advice while respecting diversity among the states.

Take a quality-improvement approach
Defining what constitutes a successful provisional voting system is difficult. Defining quality requires a broad perspective about how well the system works, how open it is to error recognition and correction, and how well provisional voting processes are connected to the registration and voter identification regimes. A first step is for states to recognize that improving quality begins with seeing the provisional voting process as a system and taking a systems approach to regular evaluation through standardized metrics with explicit goals for performance. EAC can facilitate action by the states by recommending as a best practice that:

- Each state collect data systematically on the provisional voting process to permit evaluation of its voting system and assess changes from one election to the next. The data collected should include: provisional votes cast and counted by county; reasons why provisional ballots were not counted, measures of variance among jurisdictions, and time required to evaluate ballots by jurisdiction.

Emphasize the importance of clarity
Above all else, the EAC should emphasize the importance of clarity in the rules by which each state governs provisional voting. As state legislators and election officials prepare for the 2006 election, answers to the questions listed in the recommendation section of this report could be helpful. Among those questions are:

- Does the provisional voting system distribute, collect, record, and tally provisional ballots with sufficient accuracy to be seen as procedurally legitimate by both supporters and opponents of the winning candidate?
- Do the procedural requirements of the system permit cost-efficient operation?
- How great is the variation in the use of provisional voting in counties or equivalent levels of voting jurisdiction within the state? Is the variation great enough to cause concern that the system may not be administered uniformly across the state?

Court decisions suggest areas for action
The court decisions following the 2004 election also suggest procedures for states to incorporate into their procedures for provisional voting. EAC should recommend to the states that they:

- Promulgate clear standards for evaluating provisional ballots, and provide training for the officials who will apply those standards.
- Provide effective materials to be used by local jurisdictions in training poll workers on such procedures as how to locate polling places for potential voters who show up at the wrong place.
- Make clear that the only permissible requirement to obtain a provisional ballot is an affirmation that the voter is registered in the jurisdiction and eligible to vote in an election for federal office. Poll workers need appropriate training to understand their duty to give such voters a provisional ballot.

Assess each stage of the provisional voting process
Beyond the procedures suggested by court decisions, states should assess each stage of the provisional voting process. They can begin by assessing the utility and clarity of the information for voters on their websites and by considering what information might be added to sample ballots mailed to voters before elections. The better voters understand their rights and obligations, the easier the system will be to manage, and the more legitimate the appearance of the process.

Avoiding error at the polling place will allow more voters to cast a regular ballot and all others who request it to cast a provisional ballot. Our recommendations for best practices to avoid error at the polling place include:

- The layout and staffing of the multi-precinct polling place is important. States should ensure that training materials distributed to every jurisdiction make poll workers familiar with the options available to voters.
- The provisional ballot should be of a design or color sufficiently different from a regular ballot to avoid confusion over counting and include take-away information for the voter on the steps in the ballot evaluation process.
- Because provisional ballots offer a fail-safe, supplies of the ballots at each polling place should be sufficient for all the potential voters likely to need them. Best practice would be for states to provide guidelines (as do Connecticut and Delaware) to estimate the supply of provisional ballots needed at each polling place.

The clarity of criteria for evaluating voter eligibility is critical to a sound process for deciding which of the cast provisional ballots should be counted.

- State statutes or regulations should define a reasonable period for voters who lack the HAVA-specified ID or other information bearing on their eligibility to provide it in order to facilitate the state's ability to verify that the person casting the provisional ballot is the same one who registered. At least 11 states allow voters to provide ID or other information one to 13 days after voting. Kansas allows voters to proffer their ID by electronic means or by mail, as well as in person.
- More provisional voters have their ballots counted in those states that count ballots cast outside the correct precinct. While HAVA arguably leaves this decision up to the states, pointing out the effect of the narrower definition on the portion of ballots counted could be useful to the states in deciding this question. States should be aware, however, of the additional burden placed on the ballot-evaluation process when out-of-precinct ballots are considered. And tradeoffs are involved if out-of-precinct voters are unable to vote for the local offices that might appear on the ballot in their district of residence.
- If a state does require voters to appear at their assigned precinct, where the same polling site serves more than one precinct, a voter's provisional ballot should count as long as the voter cast that ballot at the correct polling site even if at the wrong precinct within that location. While the best practice might be for poll workers to direct the voter to correct precinct poll workers' advice is not always correct, and the voter should be protect against ministerial error.
- Officials should follow a written procedure, and perhaps a checklist, to identify the reason why a provisional ballot is rejected. Colorado's election rules offer particularly clear guidance to the official evaluating a provisional ballot.

In verifying provisional ballots, the time by which election officials must make their eligibility determinations is particularly important in presidential elections because of the need to certify electors to the Electoral College. Our research did not identify an optimum division of the five weeks available.
The best practice here is for states to consider the issue and make a careful decision about how to complete all steps in the evaluation of ballots and challenges to those determinations within the five weeks available.

After the election, timely information to voters about the disposition of their provisional ballot can enable voters to determine if they are registered for future elections and, if not, what they need to do to become registered.

- Best practice for the states is to establish mechanisms to ensure that voters casting provisional ballots are informed whether they are now registered for future elections and, if not, what they need to do to become registered.

Final observation

The detailed examination of each stage in the provisional voting process can lay the foundation each state needs to improve its system. Efforts to improve provisional voting may be most effective as part of a broader effort by state and local election officials to strengthen their systems. Collecting and analyzing data about those systems will enable states to identify which aspects of the registration and electoral system are most important in shunting voters into the provisional ballot process. Responsible officials can then look to their registration system, identification requirements or poll worker training as ways to reduce the need for voters to cast their ballots provisionally.
Provisional Voting in 2004

In the 2004 election, nationwide about 1.9 million votes, or 1.6% of turnout, were cast as provisional ballots. More than 1.2 million or just over 63% were counted. Provisional ballots accounted for a little more than 1% of the final vote tally.

These totals obscure the wide variation in provisional voting among the states. Six states accounted for two-thirds of all the provisional ballots cast. State by state, the percentage of provisional ballots in the total vote varied by a factor of 1,000 -- from a high of 7% in Alaska to Vermont's 0.006%. The portion of provisional ballots cast that were actually counted also displayed wide variation, ranging from 96% in Alaska to 6% in Delaware. States with voter registration databases counted, on average, 20% of the provisional ballots cast. Those without databases counted provisional ballots at more than twice that rate, 44%.

An important source of variation was a state's previous experience with provisional voting. The share of provisional ballots in the total vote was six times greater in states that had used provisional ballots before than in states where the provisional ballot was new. In the 25 states that had some experience with provisional voting before HAVA, a higher portion of the total vote was cast as provisional ballots and a greater percentage of the provisional ballots cast were counted than in the 18 new to provisional balloting.

- The percentage of the total vote cast as provisional ballots averaged more than 2% in the 25 experienced states. This was 4 times the rate in states new to provisional voting, which averaged 0.47%.
- The experienced states counted an average of 58% of the provisional ballots cast, nearly double the proportion in the new states, which counted just 33% of cast provisional ballots.
- The combined effect of these two differences was significant. In experienced states 1.53% of the total vote came from counted provisional ballots. In new states, provisional ballots accounted for only 0.23% of the total vote.

Those voting with provisional ballots in experienced states had their ballots counted more frequently than those in the new states. This experience effect is evidence that there is room for improvement in provisional balloting procedures, especially in those states new to the process. That conclusion gains support from the perspectives of the local election officials revealed in the survey conducted as a part of this research. Local (mostly county level) election officials from "experienced" states were more likely to:

9 HAVA allows the states considerable latitude in how to implement provisional voting, including deciding who beyond the required categories of voters should receive provisional ballots and how to determine which provisional ballots should be counted.
10 California, New York, Ohio, Arizona, Washington, and North Carolina. The appearance of Arizona, Washington and North Carolina on this list shows that the number of provisional ballots cast depends on factors other than the size of the population.
11 See the appendix for our classification of "old" and "new" states and explanation of why the total is less than 50.
12 To compensate for the wide differences in vote turnout among the 50 states the average figures here are calculated as the mean of the percent cast or counted rather than from the raw numbers of ballots cast or counted.
13 Managing the provisional voting process can strain the capacity election administrators. For example, Detroit, counted 123 of the 1,350 provisional ballots cast there in 2004. A recent study concluded that Detroit's "6-day time limit to process provisional ballots was very challenging and unrealistic. To overcome this challenge, the entire department's employees were mobilized to process provisional ballots." (emphasis added.) GAO Report-05-997, "Views of Selected Local Officials on Managing Voter Registration and Ensuring Citizens Can Vote," September 2005.
• Be prepared to direct voters to their correct precincts with maps;
• Regard provisional voting as easy to implement;
• Report that provisional voting sped up and improved polling place operations
• Conclude that the provisional voting process helped officials maintain accurate registration databases.

Officials from "new" states, on the other hand, were more likely to agree with the statement that provisional voting created unnecessary problems for election officials and poll workers.

If experience with provisional voting does turn out to be a key variable in performance, that is good news. As states gain experience with provisional ballots their management of the process could become more consistent and more effective over subsequent elections. Further information from the EAC on best practices and the need for more consistent management of the election process could sharpen the lessons learned by experience. The EAC can facilitate the exchange of experience among the states and can offer all states information on more effective administration of provisional voting.

Concluding optimistically that experience will make all the difference, however, may be unwarranted. Only if the performance of the "new" states was the result of administrative problems stemming from inexperience will improvement be automatic as election officials move along the learning curve. Two other possibilities exist. Our current understanding of how provisional voting worked in 2004 is not sufficient to determine unambiguously which view is correct.

1. "New" states may have a political culture different from "old" states. That is, underlying features of the "new" states political system may be the reason they had not adopted some form of provisional voting before HAVA. The "new" states may strike a different balance among the competing objectives of ballot access, ballot security and practical administration. They may ascribe more responsibility to the individual voter to take such actions as registering early, finding out where the right precinct is, or re-registering after changing address. They may value keeping control at the local level, rather than ceding authority to state or federal directives. The training they offer poll workers about provisional ballots may not be as frequent or effective as in other states. If the inconsistent performance in the "new" states arises out of this kind of political culture, improving effectiveness in the use of the provisional ballots -- as measured by intrastate consistency in administration--- will be harder and take longer to achieve.

2. "Old" states may devote fewer resources to updating their registration files or databases because they consider provisional ballots as a reasonable fail safe way for voters with registration problems a way to cast a ballot. The adoption of statewide voter registration databases in compliance with HAVA therefore may reduce the variation in the use of provisional ballots among the states.

Other influences decreasing consistency among the states include:

14 Despite differing political cultures among states and the latitude HAVA provides states, the statute does, indeed impose some degree of uniformity on issues that Congress thought essential. For example, before HAVA, took effect, "no state gave the voter the right to find out the status of their ballot after the election." Now all offer that opportunity. See Bali and Silver, "The Impact of Politics, Race and Fiscal Strains on State Electoral Reforms after Election 2000," manuscript, Department of Political Science, Michigan State University. Resisting HAVA's mandates through foot-dragging lacks any legitimate foundation in law or policy.
• The more rigorous the verification requirements, the smaller the percentage of provisional ballots that were counted. Some states verified provisional ballots by comparing the voter’s signature to a sample, some matched such identifying data as address, birth date, or social security number, others required voters who lacked ID at the polling place to return later with the ID to evaluate the provisional ballot, and some required provisional voters to execute an affidavit.
  - In the 4 states that simply matched signatures, nearly 3.5% of the total turnout consisted of provisional ballots, and just under three-fourths of those ballots (73%) were counted.
  - In the 14 states that required voters to provide such additional information as address or date of birth just over 1.5% of the total turnout consisted of provisional ballots, and 55% of those ballots were counted.
  - In the 14 states that required an affidavit (attesting, for example, that the voter was legally registered and eligible to vote in the jurisdiction) just over one-half of a percent (0.6%) of turnout came from provisional ballots, and less than one-third of those (30%) were counted. (But note that HAVA requires all voters to certify that they are eligible and registered in order to cast a provisional ballot, which is functionally an affidavit. The 14 states described here used an explicit affidavit form.)
  - In the 10 states that required voters to return later with identifying documents just under 1.5% of the total turnout came from provisional ballots, and more than half (52%) of these were counted. Voters apparently found this requirement less onerous than the affidavit, even though it required a separate trip to a government office.

• Voter registration databases provided information that reduced the number of provisional ballots counted. In states using provisional voting for the first time, states with registered-voter databases counted only 20% of the ballots that were cast. States without such databases counted more than double that rate (44%). As HAVA’s requirement for adoption of statewide databases spreads across the country, this variation among states is likely to narrow. Real-time access to a continually updated, statewide list of registered voters should reduce the number of provisional ballots used and reduce the percentage counted since most of those who receive them will be less likely to be actually registered in the state.

• States that counted out-of-precinct ballots counted 56% of the provisional ballots cast. States that counted ballots cast only in the proper precinct counted an average of 42% of provisional ballots.

15 See Table 2 in Appendix 2 for information on the verification method used in each state.
16 The Election Day Survey found that states using statewide voter registration databases reported a lower incidence of casting provisional ballots than states without voter registration databases, suggesting that better administration of voter registration rolls might be associated with fewer instances where voters would be required to cast a provisional ballot due to a problem with their voter registration.
17 The Election Day Survey concluded that: “Jurisdictions with jurisdiction-wide provisional ballot acceptance reported higher rates of provisional ballots cast, 2.09 percent of registration or 4.67 percent of ballots cast in polling places, than those with in-precinct-only acceptance, 0.72 and 1.18 percent, respectively. Predictably, those jurisdictions with more permissive jurisdiction-wide acceptance reported higher rates of counting provisional ballots, 71.50 percent, than other jurisdictions, 52.50 percent.”
In experienced states, the disparity was even more pronounced: 52% of provisional ballots cast were counted in states requiring in-district ballots, while 70% were counted in those allowing out-of-precinct ballots.

- If all states had counted out-of-precinct ballots, perhaps 290,000 more provisional ballots would have been counted across the country.\(^{18}\)

- States that provide a longer the time to evaluate provisional ballots counted a higher proportion of those ballots.\(^{19}\)
  - Fourteen states permitted less than one week to evaluate provisional ballots, 15 states permitted between one and two weeks, and 14 states permitted greater than two weeks\(^{20}\).
  - Those states that permitted less than one week counted an average of 35.4% of their ballots.
  - States that permitted between one and two weeks counted 47.1%.
  - States that permitted more than 2 weeks, counted 60.8% of the provisional ballots cast\(^{21}\).
  - The effect of allowing more time for evaluation is felt most strongly in states where more than 1% of the overall turnout was of provisional ballots. In states where provisional ballots were used most heavily, those that permitted less than one week to evaluate ballots counted 58.6% while those that permitted one to two weeks counted 65.0% of ballots, and those states that permitted greater than three weeks verified the highest proportion of provisional ballots, at 73.8%.

Variation Within States
Not only was there little consistency among states in the use of provisional ballots, there was also little consistency within states. This was true in both new and old states. Of the 20 states for which we have county-level provisional ballot data, the rate of counting provisional ballots varied by as much as 90% to 100% among counties in the same state. This suggests that additional factors beyond statewide factors, such as verification requirements or the time provided for ballot evaluation, also influence the provisional voting process. Reacting to the lack of consistency within states, the Carter-Baker Commission) recommended that "states, not counties or municipalities, should establish uniform procedures for the verification and counting of provisional ballots, and that procedure should be applied uniformly throughout the state."\(^{22}\)

Election Line reported that:

\(^{18}\) This estimate is a rough approximation. States that recognize out-of-precinct ballots counted, on average, 56% of the provisional votes cast. Applying that ratio to the 1.9 million provisional ballots cast nationwide would result in 1.1 million provisional ballots that would have been counted if all states accepted out-of-precinct votes. States that did not recognize out-of-precinct ballots counted 42% of the provisional ballots cast, or about 813,000 ballots, for a difference of about 290,000 votes.

\(^{20}\) Many thanks to Ben Shepler, of the Moritz College of Law, for assembling complete data on the time requirements states permitted for the counting of provisional ballots.

\(^{21}\) 43 states are included in this analysis, including Washington D.C. The 7 election-day registration states are omitted, as is Mississippi, which never provided data on provisional ballots. North Carolina is also omitted from the regressions, as it does not have a statewide policy on how it verifies provisional ballots.

\(^{22}\) Recommendation 2.3.2 of the Report of the Commission on Federal Election Reform, “Building Confidence in U.S. Elections,” September 2005, p.16. The report also observed that, “...different procedures for counting provisional ballots within and between states led to legal challenges and political protests. Had the margin of victory for the presidential contest been narrower, the lengthy dispute that followed the 2000 election could have been repeated.”
In Ohio some counties counted provisional ballots not cast in the assigned precinct even though the state's policy was to count only those ballots cast in the correct precinct. Some counties in Washington tracked down voters who would otherwise have had their provisional ballots rejected because they had failed to complete part of their registration form, gave them the chance to correct those omissions, and then counted the provisional ballot. This would probably not have come to light except for the sharp examination caused by the very close election for governor.

Resources available to administer provisional voting varied considerably among and within states. The result is that differences in demographics and resources result in different experiences with provisional voting. For example, the Election Day Survey found that:

- Jurisdictions with lower education and income tend to report more inactive voter registrations, lower turnout, and more provisional ballots cast.
- Jurisdictions with higher levels of income and education reported higher average numbers of poll workers per polling place or precinct and reported lower rates of staffing problems per precinct.
- Staffing problems appeared to be particularly acute for jurisdictions in the lowest income and education categories. Small, rural jurisdictions and large, urban jurisdictions tended to report higher rates of an inadequate number of poll workers within polling places or precincts.
- Predominantly non-Hispanic, Black jurisdictions reported a greater percentage of polling places or precincts with an inadequate number of poll workers. Predominantly non-Hispanic, Native American jurisdictions reported the second highest percentage of staffing problems.

The conclusions to be drawn from these findings are clear. In voting districts with lower education levels, poverty, and inadequately staffed polling places, the voting process is unlikely to function well. More people will end up casting provisional ballots. That makes the provisional voting process especially important in such districts. But if jurisdictions struggle with regular voting, how well are they likely to do with the more complicated provisional balloting process? In precincts were the voting process, in general, is managed poorly, provisional ballots cannot be expected to work much better. In these areas, the focus should be on broader measures to improve the overall functionality of struggling voting districts, although improving the management of provisional balloting may help at the margin.

Effectiveness of Provisional Voting

The certainty of our conclusions about the effectiveness of provisional voting is limited because of the complexity of the problem and a lack of important information. An ideal assessment of how well provisional ballots worked in 2004 would require knowing the decisions of local officials in 200,000 precincts on how to inform voters about provisional voting; their performance in providing a provisional ballot to those qualified to receive one, and their decisions whether to count a provisional ballot. Information needed about the eligibility or registration status of provisional voters is also not available.

We see no automatic correlation between the quality of a state's voting system and either the number of provisional ballots cast or counted. Low numbers could reflect accurate statewide voting data and good voter education. Or they could suggest that provisional ballots were not made easily available. High numbers could be seen as signifying an effective provisional voting system or a weak registration process. But we do know that in 2004 provisional ballots allowed 1.2 million citizens to vote, citizens who would otherwise have been turned away from the polls.

Since we do not know the total number of registered voters who might have voted but could not makes a precise, quantitative estimate of the effectiveness of provisional voting impossible. The Cal Tech – MIT Voting Technology Project, however, estimated that 4 – 6 million votes were lost in the 2000 presidential election for the reasons shown in Table 1 below. The estimate is an approximation, but it may provide data good enough for a general assessment of the size of the pool of potential voters who might have been helped by the provisional ballot process.

Table 1 Cal Tech – MIT Voting Technology Project Estimates

4 – 6 million votes are lost in presidential elections due to the causes shown in the table. Registration mix-ups (e.g., name not on list) and polling place operations (e.g., directed to wrong precinct) are the causes most likely to be remedied by provisional voting.

The table shows that the universe of voters who could be helped by provisional voting might be 2.5 – 3 million voters. In 2004, about 1.2 million provisional voters were counted. A rough estimate, then, of the effectiveness of provisional voting in 2004, then, might be 40% to 50% (ballots counted/votes lost)\(^{23}\). Whatever the precise figure, it seems reasonable to conclude that there is considerable room for improvement in the administration of provisional voting.

Legislative Response

Indeed, several states\(^ {24} \) came to the conclusion that the administration of their provisional voting procedures needed to be improved and amended their statutes after the 2004 election. State legislation adopted since the election points to particular areas of concern.

\(^{23}\) Another interpretation of the data should be considered. The Census Bureau's Current Population Survey (CPS) developed the category of "registration mix-ups" to assess the states' registration systems. After each election the CPS asks people if they were registered and if they voted. The CPS gives breakdowns of reasons why people did not vote. Survey responders tend to deflect blame when answering questions about voting. In the narrow context of provisional ballots, "registration problems" would cover only voters who went to the polls where the determination that they were not registered was wrong or they were registered, but in the wrong precinct. If they were in the wrong precinct, provisional voting can help them in only 17 states. In 2004, only 6.8% of those not voting and registered blamed registration problems, while 6.9% reported so in 2000.

\(^{24}\) Twelve states made statutory or regulatory changes: Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Louisiana, Montana, New Mexico, North Carolina, Virginia and Wyoming. See Table 4 in Appendix 2.
Not enough time to examine and count the provisional ballots. Florida, Indiana, Virginia, and Washington all have clarified or extended the timeline to evaluate the ballots. But taking more time can prove a problem, particularly in presidential elections with the looming deadline to certify the vote for the Electoral College.\textsuperscript{25}

Lack of uniform rules for counting ballots and effective training of the election officials in interpreting and applying those rules to determine the validity of ballots. Colorado, New Mexico, North Carolina, and Washington have all passed legislation focused on improving the efficacy and consistency of the voting and counting process.

Litigation

Successful legal challenges to the process highlight areas where provisional voting procedures were wanting. A flurry of litigation occurred around the country in October 2004 concerning the so-called “wrong precinct issue” — whether provisional ballots cast by voters in a precinct other than their designated one would be counted for statewide races. These lawsuits were largely unsuccessful in their stated goal: most courts, including the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit (the only federal appeals court to rule on the issue), rejected the contention that HAVA requires the counting of these wrong-precinct provisional ballots.

This litigation was significant nonetheless.

- First, the Sixth Circuit decision established the precedent that voters have the right to sue in federal court to remedy violations of HAVA.

- Second—and significantly—the litigation clarified the right of voters to receive provisional ballots, even though the election officials were certain they would not be counted. The decision also defined an ancillary right—the right to be directed to the correct precinct. There voters could cast a regular ballot that would be counted. If they insisted on casting a provisional ballot in the wrong precinct, they would be on notice that it would be a symbolic gesture only.

- Third, these lawsuits prompted election officials to take better care in instructing precinct officials on how to notify voters about the need to go to the correct precinct in order to cast a countable ballot—although the litigation regrettably came too late to be truly effective in this regard. In many states, on Election Day 2004, the procedures in place for notifying voters about where to go were less than ideal, reflecting less-than-ideal procedures for training poll workers on this point.

There was also pre-election litigation over the question whether voters who had requested an absentee ballot were entitled to cast a provisional ballot. In both cases (one in Colorado and one, decided on Election Day, in Ohio), the federal courts ruled that HAVA requires that these voters receive a provisional ballot. Afterwards, it is for state officials under state law to \textsuperscript{25} The resources available to evaluate and count provisional ballots within a tight schedule may not be easily available. The General Accounting Office reports that Detroit, where 1,350 provisional ballots were cast and 123 counted, found the 6-day time frame for processing provisional ballots “very challenging and unrealistic. To overcome this challenge, the entire department’s employees were mobilized to process provisional ballots.” The report also found that in Los Angeles County, “staff had to prepare duplicate ballots to remove ineligible or invalid contests when voters cast their ballots at the wrong precinct. To overcome this challenge, staffing was increased to prepare the duplicate ballots.” In a close, contested election, “duplicate” ballots would doubtless receive long and careful scrutiny.” See Appendix 7, GAO, “Views of Selected Local Election Officials on Managing Voter Registration and Ensuring Eligible Citizens Can Vote,” September 2005. (GAO Report-05-997) determine whether these provisional ballots will be counted, in part by determining if these provisional voters already had voted an absentee ballot (in which case one ballot should be ruled ineligible, in order to avoid double voting). These decisions confirm the basic premise that provisional ballots should be available whenever voters believe they are entitled to them, so that their preferences can be recorded, with a subsequent determination whether these preferences count as valid votes.

Because every provisional ballot counted represents a voter who, if the system had worked perfectly, should have voted by regular ballot, the advent of statewide registration databases is likely to reduce the use provisional ballots. The one area in which such databases may not make a difference is for those who voted by provisional ballot because they did not bring required identification documents to the polling place. The statewide voter registration database will facilitate verifying that ballot, but the voter will still have vote provisionally. Beyond that exception, even with statewide registries in every state, provisional voting will remain an important failsafe, and voters should have confidence that the failsafe will operate correctly.

The wide variation in the implementation of provisional voting among and particularly within states suggests that EAC can help states strengthen their processes. Research-based recommendations for best, or at least better, practices based on the experience gained in the 2004 election can be useful in states’ efforts to achieve greater consistency in the administration of provisional voting.

Recommendations for Best Practices
Recent legislative activity shows that state efforts to improve the provisional voting process are underway. Those states, as well as others that have not yet begun to correct shortcomings that became apparent in 2004, can benefit from considering the best practices described here. By recommending best practices, the EAC will offer informed advice while respecting diversity among the states. One way to strengthen the recommendations and build a constituency for them would be for EAC to ask its advisory committee members to recommend as best practices procedures that have worked in their states.

Self-evaluation of Provisional Voting –4 Key Questions
The first need to achieve greater consistency within each state is to think about provisional voting systematically. As legislators, election officials, and citizens in the states prepare for the 2006 election, they should ask themselves these questions about their provisional voting systems.

1. Does the provisional voting system distribute, collect, record, and tally provisional ballots with sufficient accuracy to be seen as procedurally legitimate by both supporters and opponents of the winning candidate? Does the tally include all votes cast by properly registered voters who correctly completed the steps required?

2. Is the provisional voting system sufficiently robust to perform well under the pressure of a close election when ballot evaluation will be under scrutiny and litigation looms?

3. Do the procedural requirements of the system permit cost-efficient operation? Are the administrative demands of the system reasonably related to the staff and other resource requirements available?
4. How great is the variation in the use of provisional voting in counties or equivalent levels of voting jurisdiction within the state? Is the variation great enough to cause concern that the system may not be administered uniformly across the state?

If the answers to these questions leave room for doubt about the effectiveness of the system or some of its parts, the EAC’s recommendation of best practices should provide the starting point for a state’s effort to improve its provisional voting system.

Best Practices For Each Step In The Process

We examined each step of the provisional voting process to identify specific areas where the states should focus their attention to reduce the inconsistencies noted in our analysis. We offer recommendations in each area appropriate to the responsibilities that HAVA assigns the EAC for the proper functioning of the provisional voting process.

The Importance of Clarity

The EAC should emphasize above all else the importance of clarity in the rules governing every stage of provisional voting. As the Century Foundation’s recent report observed, “Close elections increasingly may be settled in part by the evaluating and counting of provisional ballots. . . To avoid post election disputes over provisional ballots—disputes that will diminish public confidence in the accuracy and legitimacy of the result—well in advance of the election, states should establish, announce, and publicize clear statewide standards for every aspect of the provisional ballot process, from who is entitled to receive a provisional ballot to which ones are counted.”

Litigation surrounding the 2004 election resulted in decisions that, if reflected in state statutes or regulations and disseminated in effective training for poll workers, can increase the clarity of provisional ballot procedures, increase predictability, and bolster confidence in the system. By taking the following steps, states can incorporate those court rulings into their procedures.

- Promulgate, ideally by legislation, clear standards for evaluating provisional ballots, and provide training for the officials who will apply those standards. For example, in Washington State, the court determined that an election official’s failure in evaluating ballots to do a complete check against all signature records is an error serious enough to warrant recanvassing. Clear direction by regulation or statute on what records to use in evaluating ballots could have saved precious time and effort and increased the reliability of the provisional voting system.

- States should provide poll workers standard information resources for the training of poll workers by local jurisdictions. Training materials might include, for example, maps or databases with instruction on how to locate polling places for potential voters who show up at the wrong place. Usable and useful information in the hands of poll workers can protect voters from being penalized by ministerial errors at the polling place.

While rejecting the notion that all ballots cast in the wrong precinct should be counted, the court ruled that provisional votes cast in the wrong precinct should be thrown out provided that the voter had been directed to the correct precinct. This meant that provisional votes cast in the wrong precinct (and even the

- State training materials provided to local jurisdictions should make clear that the only permissible requirement to obtain a provisional ballot is an affirmation that the voter is registered in the jurisdiction and eligible to vote in an election for federal office. Recent legislation in Arizona indicates that recommendations should emphasize HAVA's requirement that persons appearing at the polling place claiming to be registered voters cannot be denied a ballot because they do not have identification with them. Poll workers may need appropriate training to understand their duty to give such voters a provisional ballot.

A. Registration and Pre-Election Information for Voters

Providing crisp, clear information to voters before the election is important to the success of the provisional voting process. The better voters understand their rights and obligations, the easier the system will be to manage, and the more legitimate the appearance of the process. States can begin by assessing the utility and clarity of the information for voters on their websites and by considering what information might be added to sample ballots mailed to voters before elections. Best practices in this area would include:

1. If states require identification at the time of registration, the kind of IDs required should be stated precisely and clearly and be publicly and widely available in a form that all voters can understand. For example, "You must bring your driver's license. If you don't have a driver's license, then you must bring an ID card with your photograph on it and this ID card must be issued by a government agency."

2. The process to re-enfranchise felons should be clear and straightforward. To avoid litigation over the registration status of felons, best practice should be defined as making re-enfranchisement automatic, or no more burdensome than the process required for any new registrant.

3. State or county websites for voters should offer full, clear information on boundaries of precincts, location of polling places, requirements for identification, and other necessary guidance that will facilitate registration and the casting of a regular ballot. An 800 number should also be provided. Models are available: the statewide databases in Florida and Michigan provide voters with provisional voting information, registration verification and precinct location information.

wrong polling place) would count if there were no evidence that the voter had been directed to a different polling place. The court placed a duty upon election officials to make sure the voters were in the correct locations. Note that this question would not arise in a state that counted ballots cast in the wrong polling place but within the correct county.

30 The Florida Democratic Party v. Hood, 342 F. Supp. 2d 1073, 1075-76 (N.D. Fla. 2004). The court explained that provisional voting is designed to correct the situation that occurs when election officials do not have perfect knowledge and when they make incorrect determinations about eligibility (the "fail-safe" notion). Denying voters provisional ballots because of on-the-spot determinations directly contradicts this idea. Even before the cited decision, the Florida Secretary of State’s office had determined that any voter who makes the declaration required by federal law is entitled to vote a provisional ballot, even if the voter is in the wrong precinct.

31 Websites in 29 states describe, with varying degrees of specificity, the identification voters may need. In 18 states voters can learn something about the precinct in which they should vote. And in 6 states (California, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Michigan, North Carolina, and South Carolina) they can verify their registration on the website.

32 The Century Foundation, op. cit.
Avoiding error at the polling place will allow more voters to cast a regular ballot and all others who request it to cast a provisional ballot.

1. The layout and staffing of the polling place, particularly the multi-precinct polling place is important. Greeters, maps, and prominently posted voter information about provisional ballots, ID requirements, and related topics can help the potential voters cast their ballot in the right place. States should require poll workers to be familiar with the options and provide the resources needed for them to achieve the knowledge needed to be helpful and effective. Colorado has clear regulations on polling place requirements, including HAVA information and voting demonstration display.\(^{33}\) Many states require training of poll workers. In some states that requirement is recent: after the 2004 election, New Mexico adopted a requirement for poll workers to attend an "election school."\(^{34}\) A state statutory requirement for training could facilitate uniform instruction of poll workers in those states that do not already provide it.

2. The provisional ballot should be of a design or color sufficiently different from a regular ballot to avoid confusion over counting, as occurred in Washington State. The ballot might include a tear-off leaflet with information for voters such as: "Reasons Why Your Provisional Ballot Might Not Be Counted" on one side and "What to Do if My Provisional Ballot Is Not Counted" on the other.

3. Because provisional ballots offer a fail-safe, supplies of the ballots at each polling place should be sufficient for all the potential voters likely to need them. In 2004, some polling places ran out of ballots, with unknown effects on the opportunity to vote. In Middlesex County, New Jersey, for example, on Election Day the Superior Court ordered the county clerk to assure that sufficient provisional ballots were available at several heavily used polling places, and it authorized the clerk "in the event additional provisional ballots are required . . . to photocopy official provisional ballots."\(^{35}\) At least two states, Connecticut and Delaware, provide guidelines to local election officials on how to estimate the demand for provisional ballots. Connecticut sets the number at 1% of the voters in the district, Delaware at 6%.\(^{36}\) States that do not offer a practical method to guide the supply of provisional ballots at polling places should consider doing so. The guideline should take into account both the number of voters in the district and the number of provisional ballots actually cast in recent elections.

4. To achieve the procedural clarity needed to forestall disputes, states should establish a clear chain of custody for the handling of provisional ballots from production through distribution, collection and, finally, evaluation. A number of states have clear procedures for at least parts of this chain of custody. All states should examine their chain-of-custody requirements for clarity. Illinois includes the potentially beneficial requirement that ballots be transported by bi-partisan teams, which offers the potential to avoid some charges of election fraud.

C. Evaluating Voter Eligibility and Counting Provisional Ballots

The clarity of criteria for evaluating voter eligibility is critical to a sound process for deciding which of the cast provisional ballots should be counted. Public recognition of the validity of those criteria is important to establishing the legitimacy of the system as a whole. The experience in 2004 in North Carolina, Washington, and Ohio underlines the importance of clear criteria. As the Century Foundation report put it, “Whatever procedures the states choose [to determine if a provisional ballot should be counted], the paramount consideration—as with all others concerning provisional voting—is that they be clear and thus not susceptible to post-election manipulation and litigation.” Nonetheless, the Panio v. Sutherland decision in New York shows the difficulty of defining the range of administrative errors from which the provisional voters should be held harmless. Even when the standard is “clerical error” judges can differ over what that means exactly. Possibly a state law might be able to clarify a definition by giving examples of clerical errors, but even then the definition is unlikely to be perfect.

1. State statutes or regulations should define a reasonable period for voters who lack the HAVA-specified ID or other information bearing on their eligibility to provide it in order to facilitate the state’s ability to verify that the person casting the provisional ballot is the same one who registered. While there may be a concern to ensure that the individual who returns with the ID may not be the same individual who cast the provisional ballot, the spirit of HAVA demands that the opportunity to prove identity be provided after Election Day. A signature match can go far in establishing that the individual who voted and the individual returning later with identification is, in fact, the same person. Encouraging a voter who lacks ID on Election Day to return later to help the verification process by providing proper identification will strengthen the system and increase public confidence in the electoral process. Our data indicate that some voters would prefer to return with ID rather than to sign an affidavit, perhaps because of uncertainty about the legal process involved in the affidavit. At least 11 states allow voters to provide ID or other information one to 13 days after voting. Of particular interest is Kansas, which allows voters to proffer their ID by electronic means or by mail, as well as in person.

2. More provisional ballots are counted in those states that verify ballots cast outside the correct precinct. While HAVA arguably leaves this decision up to the states, pointing out the effect of the narrower definition on the portion of ballots counted could be useful to the states in deciding this question. States should be aware, however, of the

See Andersen, op. cit, pgs. 23 – 24 for an analysis of the significant effect of counting out-of-precinct ballots. The Election Day Survey found that, “Most notably, jurisdictions that permitted jurisdiction-wide acceptance of provisional ballots reported higher rates of provisional ballots being cast, but also reported a much higher incidence of provisional ballots being counted, than other jurisdictions.”
additional burden placed on the ballot-evaluation process when out-of-precinct ballots are considered. And tradeoffs are involved if out-of-precinct voters are unable to vote for the local offices that might appear on the ballot in their district of residence. One option for states is to involve the voters in the decision by pointing out that voters who cast their provisional ballots in the wrong precinct may not be able to participate in the local election. The voter could then decide to go to the correct precinct or vote provisionally for the higher offices at the top of the ticket only.

3. Alternatively, if a state chooses to require voters to appear at their assigned precinct, where the same polling site serves more than one precinct, a voter's provisional ballot should count so long as the voter cast that ballot at the correct polling site even if at the wrong precinct within that location. Ideally the voter could be directed to the correct machine, but poll worker advice will not always be correct. One way to assess the balance of issues here is to consider that, if a voter in a multi-precinct polling place is sent to the wrong machine, the error is probably the poll worker's, and the voter should not be penalized.

4. Officials should follow a written procedure, and perhaps a checklist, to identify the reason why a provisional ballot is rejected (e.g., check the applicable box “unregistered voter”; “lack of signature match” “wrong precinct,” etc.) Those forms should be disclosed publicly when completed. Colorado’s election rules offer particularly clear guidance to the official evaluating a provisional ballot.

D. Verification of Provisional Ballots

1. States that use the information on the provisional ballot to permit voters who have changed their addresses to update their registrations should adopt clear procedures on that process and specify how the new information will be communicated between different Boards of Elections.

2. In verifying provisional ballots, the time by which election officials must make their eligibility determinations is particularly important in presidential elections because of the need to certify electors to the Electoral College. States should consider in particular how to divide the time allowed them by the safe-harbor provisions that apply in presidential elections to the certification to the Electoral College. Some part of this five-week period will be consumed by the eligibility evaluation, but states should take care to provide a sufficient period of time as well for challenges. If a state consumes 21 days following the election in the eligibility evaluations, only two weeks will remain for legal challenges to be concluded. Is that sufficient? Or should the state provide the resources needed to complete the eligibility determinations in 10 days or two weeks, leaving three weeks or more for legal challenges in a close election? Our research did not identify an optimum division of the five weeks available. The prudent course here would be to encourage states to consider the issue and then make a careful decision about how to complete all steps in the evaluation of ballots and challenges to those determinations within the five weeks available.

E. Post-election Information for Voters

Timely information to voters about the disposition of their provisional ballot will provide helpful feedback and more important enable voters to determine if they are registered for future elections and, if not, what they need to do to become registered.

1. Establish mechanisms to ensure that voters casting provisional ballots are informed whether they are now registered for future elections and, if not, what they need to do to become registered.

F. State Laws Governing Litigation over Provisional Voting

1. Establish special, streamlined litigation procedures for Election Day complaints that individuals are being denied the right to cast a provisional ballot.

Broader Considerations

G. Integrity and the Appearance of Integrity

1. State laws or regulations providing for non-partisan or bi-partisan bodies to make a public determination of the validity of provisional ballots would increase confidence in the system.
2. To improve transparency, state laws or regulations should require the purging process for registration to be public and with an opportunity for voters to correct an erroneous determination that they should be purged.

3. State laws or regulation should require the evaluation process for provisional ballots to be public, while protecting the names of those who voted provisionally.

H. Continuous Assessment of the Provisional Ballot -- Process and Performance

Defining what makes for a successful provisional voting system is difficult. The most successful system is probably not the one with the most provisional votes cast (that could indicate problems with the registration system). Nor is the system with the greatest number counted or with the fewest counted necessarily superior because the evaluation process could be flawed.

Defining quality requires a broad perspective about how well the system works, how open it is to error recognition and correction, and how well provisional voting processes are connected to the registration and voter identification regimes. The EAC should consider engaging one of the national quality organizations or processes, such as Six Sigma\(^{43}\) or the Baldridge Quality process\(^{44}\) to evaluate the provisional ballot process. Pending such a review, the EAC can recommend that states take the following actions.

1. Recognize that the first step to improving quality is to see the provisional voting process as a system and take a systems approach to regular evaluation through standardized metrics with explicit goals for performance.

2. States should begin by collecting data systematically on the provisional voting process so that they can evaluate their voting system and assess changes from one election to the next. The effort should start in the 2006 election, and the data collected should include:
   - Provisional votes cast and counted by jurisdiction, say counties, with details on why the voter had to vote provisionally (lack of ID, not on list, challenged at polling place, issued absentee ballot, etc) and number of ballots actually counted in each category.
   - Reasons why provisional ballots were not counted, using categories such as those that have been adopted by Colorado, described earlier in this report.
   - Measures of variance among jurisdictions.
   - Number of poll workers trained in administration of provisional voting by polling place
   - Number of jurisdictions posting information on provisional voting in the polling place
   - Time required to evaluate ballots by jurisdiction

\(^{43}\) Six Sigma is a measure of quality that strives for near perfection. Six Sigma is a disciplined, data-driven approach and methodology for eliminating defects (driving towards six standard deviations between the mean and the nearest specification limit) in any process -- from manufacturing to transactional and from product to service.

\(^{44}\) The Baldridge Criteria for Performance Excellence provide a systems perspective for understanding performance management. They reflect validated, leading-edge management practices against which an organization can measure itself. With their acceptance nationally and internationally as the model for performance excellence, the Criteria represent a common language for communication among organizations for sharing best practices. The Criteria are also the basis for the Malcolm Baldrige National Quality Award process.
Improving understanding of the provisional voting process through analysis of detailed information will enable state and local election officials to strengthen their systems. By collecting and analyzing this data states can identify which aspects of the registration and electoral system are most important in shunting voters into the provisional ballot process. Responsible officials can then look to their registration system, identification requirements or poll worker training as a way to reduce the need for voters to cast their ballots provisionally.
ATTACHMENT 1 – Data Sources for Classification of the States

Our research on provisional voting divided the various states into several categories to allow an assessment of how different factors may have influenced the process of casting and counting provisional ballots. This analysis was conducted before the release of the Election Day Study, and the categories we used may differ in some respects from its work. The variables used to analyze a state’s use of provisional ballots:

1. New vs. Old (states that used a provisional ballot before the 2004 election)
2. Use of a statewide database of registered voters vs. no use of a statewide database
3. Counting out-of-precinct ballots vs. not counting out-of-precinct ballots
4. Voter identification requirements
5. Method used to verify provisional ballots
6. Levels of provisional ballots cast and counted

We first assigned states within these categories based on classifications done by Electionline.org in its studies. The Electionline data was the only published information available at the time of our research. We reviewed the Electionline data carefully, and, in select cases, updated it with new, detailed information that had become available after its publication. The changes we made are explained below:

--Idaho, Maine, Minnesota, New Hampshire, Wisconsin and Wyoming were excluded from our analysis. They have election-day registration systems, and did not need to use HAVA-compliant provisional ballots.

--North Dakota does not register voters, so it also was excluded from HAVA requirements and did not use provisional voting.

--Mississippi has not reported its provisional voting results and could not be included in our analysis, though it was compliant in 2004.

--Pennsylvania did not report its totals for the Election Day Study, but we obtained information on Pennsylvania and included it in our analysis.

New vs. Old States

We classified states as “new” or “old” based on the 2001 Electionline study of provisional voting, but condensed its classifications into a single dichotomous variable, new/old with all other cases excluded. The Electionline study divided states into five categories of their use of provisional ballots in the 2000 election:

1. Use of provisional ballots (P)
2. Limited use of provisional ballots (LP)
3. Affidavit ballots (A)
4. No system in place (N)
5. Unnecessary/Not Applicable (U/NA)

We included in the list of “Old States” all states listed as using provisional ballots, limited use of provisional ballots or affidavit ballots. States in all three categories would have been familiar with key aspects of provisional voting. States that had no provisional voting system in place for the 2002 election, and were HAVA compliant in 2004, were listed as “new” states, as 2004 would have been the first year in which they would be offering the option of provisional voting. States that were listed as unnecessary or not applicable were excluded from this study, as they were exempt from the HAVA regulations in 2004 because they either allowed same-day registration or did not register voters.

Rhode Island is the only state categorized as an old state by Electionline that we moved into the list of new states. Electionline’s map shows Rhode Island as a state that used provisional voting in 2000, but in the state description, it is listed as having no system in place. We learned from the Rhode Island Board of Elections that the state had previously permitted potential voters to sign an affidavit if they did not appear on a precinct’s list of registered voters, but felt they were registered to vote. Based on the signed affidavit, the election official would then contact a county official to see if the voter was on a more complete registration list. If the voter’s name was on the complete list, that voter was permitted to cast a regular ballot. As this process did not grant the voter a provisional ballot, but served as a different type of administrative failsafe, we concluded that Rhode Island’s first use of provisional voting was in 2004 and, therefore, classified the state as “new” to the system of provisional balloting.

Statewide List of Registered Voters

The Electionline preview of the 2004 Election was the starting point for compiling a list of states that had a statewide database of registered voters. That study listed 34 States that did not have their statewide database systems complete, and 16 that did, including the District of Columbia. North Dakota does not register voters, so does not need to compile such a database. Electionline’s criterion for concluding that a state had a statewide list was that the state have participation from all jurisdictions in a statewide system. We added Oklahoma to the list of states with statewide databases because we found it had met the Electionline criteria by the 2004 election, albeit too late for inclusion in the Electionline survey.

Out-of-Precinct Ballots

We based our classification of states that allow the counting of ballots cast outside the correct precinct on the data in the 2004 Electionline preview of the 2004 election. States that evaluated ballots cast in a precinct where the voter was not registered were categorized as “out-of-precinct.” States that invalidated such ballots were categorized as “In-precinct only.”

47 In Illinois, it is not clear that all counties followed this procedure. Some counties may not have counted out-of-precinct ballots.
Verification Method

We identified four different ways states assessed provisional ballots to determine if they should be counted: signature match, match voter data, signed affidavits, and bringing back identification later. We gathered information about these verification techniques by checking state websites and consulting journalistic accounts. We consulted state legislation to provide further information where needed.

Data Collection

To assemble our data for analysis, we began by using the data on provisional votes cast and counted reported by Electionline. To increase the accuracy of this data, we surveyed each state’s election websites for updated data, and for reported numbers on the county level. We then sent emails to 49 (we excluded Alaska, see below) states and the District of Columbia, requesting updated data on the number of provisional votes cast and counted by county. We received information from 25 states by our cut-off date of August 25, 2005.

26 States  25 States

48 Alaska was not contacted via email, as the state does not have voting districts comparable to counties in other states and could not be matched with comparable census data.

49 Maryland reported provisional ballots that were counted per county, but not number cast.

50 Nebraska reported an incomplete list of provisional ballots cast and counted by county, but designated counties by number, rather than by name.
The data used in this study differ from the data reported in the Election Day Study for 19 states. The Election Day Study was not completed until well after our statistical analysis of provisional voting was finished. Where there are differences, they are typically very small, usually fewer than 100 votes either cast or counted. Of the 9 states that have differences of more than 100 votes cast or counted, 7 have reported their numbers directly to us and can be considered updated data that EDS had not obtained. For one of those states, New Mexico, EDS had incomplete data, and for another, Pennsylvania, EDS had no data at all. The data that we have collected reflects updated numbers from the states that have changed following recounts and litigation that altered how ballots were evaluated.

Subject Re: Voter ID Report and Appendices

Tom-

As was just discussed, the EAC's Commissioners have elected to delay a presentation of Eagleton's report on Voter Identification to the EAC Board of Advisors and Standards Board, at this time.

The Commissioners will spend time over the next several weeks reviewing and considering this report in great detail and will make a determination, shortly thereafter, regarding how they wish to proceed with the issuance of an EAC report on this study.

Many thanks to you and your staff for the work that has been done. We look forward to next week's presentation of the Eagleton/Moritz study of provisional voting.

Hope all is going well in your new position— I wanted to get to you the agenda for the Standards Board meetings next week. The Board of Advisors is occurring concurrently, so you can feel free to wander, or to stay at one of the meetings— the same information will be presented in each meeting.

Let me know if you have any questions.

Questions/Issues: (Sorry they're a little late)

There have been concerns about both machine failure and pollworker training in the recent primary in Chicago-- what is the EAC doing to focus on these concerns, and how do you believe local election officials are meeting the challenge, and what can ordinary citizens do to assist the process.

What can voters do best to protect their right to vote on election day? What should they bring with them and what information should they know?

(There is, of course the voter identification issues that have been debated on the country with conservatives largely concerned about voting fraud, and liberals largely concerned about voter access. Can you comment on this debate?)

I've heard about a new requirement for provisional voting? What does this mean, and if I'm a voter, and told I can't vote, how do I cast a provisional vote?

You recently authored a New York Times opinion piece (along with Fair Vote President John Anderson) recommending that all high school graduates be registered to vote (to be effective on their 18th birthday). What do you think can be done with that recommendation in the states, and why did you come to that opinion.

You were recently in Ohio to observe the federal primary. Do you see different issues in different states, or are the problems based on the technology used or procedures promulgated?

Supremes Rule on Re-Redistricting of Texas
10:15 am - 11:30 am
Three years after the highly publicized redrawing of Texas congressional districts, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June on whether the Legislature acted unconstitutionally. How will the decision alter the redistricting process? What subtle, but critical, lines were buried in the text of the opinions?

Legislative Competition and the role of Gerrymandering?
11:30 am - 12:45 pm
Are legislative elections really less competitive today than in the past? Is gerrymandering the culprit or one of many reasons. New research helps put the redistricting factor in perspective.

Are Voters Who they Say they Are?
1:00 pm - 2:00 pm
Many states continue to look at the issue of voter ID and struggle with balancing the need for maximum access to the polls with trying to eliminate any possible fraud. How big is this problem and what are states doing about it?

Will Fall Elections Run like Clockwork?
2:00 pm - 3:00 pm
Since the controversial 2000 election debacle, most states have implemented key election reforms to shore up the system and respond to federal legislation. Will this fall's 2006 election go off without a hitch or will new problems emerge in the voting process?

What's Next in Redistricting Technology
3:15 pm - 4:15 pm
Redistricting software vendors will preview and demonstrate what they are planning for 2010. They will be discuss things like the next generation of redistricting technology with support for desktop, Web based and PDA/Cellular applications.

Are 527s Here to Stay?

In many states, the so-called 527 groups are likely to play a major part in this fall’s campaigns. What are they? Should they be regulated? Can they be regulated? What are states doing in this area?

2:45 pm - 4:15 pm   Money and Politics

As ethical scandals over campaign contributions and influence-buying swirl around Washington, D.C., states once again take the lead in finding new solutions to an old problem. This session will highlight states’ innovative ideas for regulating money in politics and the role of lobbyists in fundraising and campaigns.

10:15 am - 5:15 pm   Redistricting & Elections Committee

Supremes Rule on Re-Redistricting of Texas
10:15 am - 11:30 am
Three years after the highly publicized redrawing of Texas congressional districts, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June on whether the Legislature acted unconstitutionally. How will the decision alter the redistricting process? What subtle, but critical, lines were buried in the text of the opinions?

Legislative Competition and the role of Gerrymandering?
11:30 am - 12:45 pm
Are legislative elections really less competitive today than in the past? Is gerrymandering the culprit or one of many reasons. New research helps put the redistricting factor in perspective.

Are Voters Who they Say they Are?
1:00 pm - 2:00 pm
Many states continue to look at the issue of voter ID and struggle with balancing the need for maximum access to the polls with trying to eliminate any possible fraud. How big is this problem and what are states doing about it?

Will Fall Elections Run like Clockwork?
2:00 pm - 3:00 pm
Since the controversial 2000 election debacle, most states have implemented key election reforms to shore up the system and respond to federal legislation. Will this fall’s 2006 election go off without a hitch or will new problems emerge in the voting process?

What’s Next in Redistricting Technology

3:15 pm - 4:15 pm
Redistricting software vendors will preview and demonstrate what they are planning for 2010. They will be discuss things like the next generation of redistricting technology with support for desktop, Web based and PDA/Cellular applications.

Countdown to Census 2010

4:15 pm - 5:15 pm
Speakers: Linda Franz, Geographer, U.S. Census Bureau; Washington, D.C.
Bob LaMacchia, Chief, Geography Division, U.S. Census Bureau, Washington, D.C.
Cathy McCully, Chief, Census Redistricting Data Office, U.S. Census Bureau, Washington, D.C.

Wednesday, August 16, 2006

10:15 am - 11:30 am  Redistricting & Elections Committee

Are 527s Here to Stay?

In many states, the so-called 527 groups are likely to play a major part in this fall's campaigns. What are they? Should they be regulated? Can they be regulated? What are states doing in this area?

2:45 pm - 4:15 pm  Money and Politics

As ethical scandals over campaign contributions and influence-buying swirl around Washington, D.C., states once again take the lead in finding new solutions to an old problem. This session will highlight states' innovative ideas for regulating money in politics and the role of lobbyists in fundraising and campaigns.

Friday, August 18, 2006

8:30 am - 10:00 am  General Session and Breakfast

Dear Craig:

Hope is well with you. Hoping that you can help us out with a quick request from a member of congressional committee. They would like to know if there exists a list (compendium or index) of state election laws on crime and fraud specifically. They are trying to get access to such a list as soon as possible, for a Congressional hearing on Thursday. If no list exists to your knowledge, that's great. If it does exists, and we can get access to it, please let me know.

Thanks so much, Craig. I hope all is well.
Best,
Adam

Doesn't look like there's a state list of fraud statutes-- there's a federal one.
(See below.)
It's something we have planned to do, but have not completed. What's your timeline and priority? I could pull something together...

Adam, Craig thought you were looking for a list of federal statutes, which are discussed in our election fraud manual. We don't have lists of state election crimes. Craig suggests that you contact Peggy Sims at the EAC – she's a wonderful resource, and I'm including her in my reply. Good luck.

Nancy
Thanks! Do you or Joyce have the one from the 24th??

Commissioners-

As was discussed during our session on February 17, 2005, please review and provide your approval, disapproval or amendments to the following items by Friday, February 25, 2005:

1. The attached Scope of Work which outlines the tasks related to contract work around projects relating to voluntary guidance on provisional voting and voter identification procedures.

2. The proposal will be advertised beginning February 28, 2005.

3. The deadline for submitting proposals will be March 14, 2005.

4. Proposal review will be completed by EAC staff by March 17, 2005

5. Staff will recommend a contractor to the Commissioners on March 18, 2005.

6. Commissioners will be asked for their decisions no later than Tuesday, March 22, 2005
Thank you for your help and attention to this matter.

PROVIDING EAC ASSISTANCE IN DEVELOPING VOLUNTARY GUIDANCE ON PROVISIONAL VOTING AND VOTER IDENTIFICATION PROCEDURES

0.0 Contract Title: Assistance to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission in the Development of Guidance on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification Procedures

1.0 Background: Sec. 302(a) of HAVA requires that all States allow the casting of provisional ballots in instances where a voter declares their eligibility to vote but their name does not appear on the official list of eligible voters, or an election official asserts that a voter is not eligible to vote. This section describes several requirements for implementation of provisional voting, but the States have considerable latitude in specifying how to carry out these requirements. The EAC seeks to examine how provisional voting was implemented in the 2004 general election and to prepare guidance for the States on this topic for the 2006 Federal elections.

HAVA Sec. 303(b) mandates that first time voters who register by mail are required to show proof of identity before being allowed to cast a ballot. The law prescribes certain requirements concerning this section, but also leaves considerable discretion to the States for its implementation. The EAC seeks to examine how these voter identification requirements were implemented in the 2004 general election and to prepare guidance for the States on this topic for the 2006 elections.

One of the remedies for a voter not having an acceptable proof of identity is to allow the voter to cast a provisional ballot, either at the polling place or by mail. This linkage between these two HAVA sections provides a rationale for conducting research on these topics in parallel. However, it is anticipated that two separate guidance documents will result.

2.0 Objective: The objective of this contract is for EAC to obtain assistance with the collection, analysis and interpretation of information regarding HAVA provisional voting and voter identification requirements for the purpose of drafting guidance on these topics for promulgation to the States in time for implementation for the 2006 Federal elections. The anticipated outcome of this activity is the generation of concrete policy recommendations to be issued as voluntary guidance for States.

3.0 Scope: In general the Contractor shall be responsible for all research and analysis activities, including the conduct of public hearings for fact finding and public comment purposes. However, in light of the urgent need to get this work underway, the EAC has scheduled a public hearing on February 23, 2005, on the topic of provisional voting.
An initial framework for provisional voting policy has been set by the court decisions rendered on the election procedures utilized in the 2004 election. The 6th Circuit decision, in particular, has drawn some boundaries which must be given due regard in the course of considering future policy alternatives for provisional voting.

Notice of public meetings and hearings is required to be published in the Federal Register. The Contractor shall be responsible for preparing the notice documents, and the EAC will submit the notices and cover the cost of publication. In addition, draft guidance documents must be published in the Federal Register to obtain public comment prior to their adoption. Again, the Contractor will work with the EAC to prepare the draft documents for publication, which the EAC will submit and cover the cost of publication. Comments received will be provided to the Contractor for analysis and incorporation into the final guidance documents, as appropriate.

4.0 Specific Tasks

For ease of reference, following task 4.3 the remaining tasks are listed separately under the headings of Provisional Voting and Voter Identification Requirements. It is understood that the work on these two topics will be conducted essentially concurrently, with Voter Identification activities starting approximately one month after Provisional Voting.

4.1 Prepare a project work plan. The Contractor shall prepare and deliver a brief Project Plan not later than 10 days after contract award. This plan shall describe how the Contractor will accomplish each of the project tasks, including a timeline indicating major milestones. A single document will be prepared to include both provisional voting and voter identification tasks. The Plan shall be presented at a project kickoff meeting with the EAC Project Manager.

4.2 Submit monthly progress reports. The Contractor shall submit a monthly progress report within 2 weeks of the end of each month. This report shall provide a brief summary of activities performed and indicate progress against the timeline provided in the Project Plan. Any issues that could adversely affect schedule should be identified for resolution. Budget status should also be provided.

4.3 Conduct periodic briefings for the EAC. The Contractor shall periodically meet with the EAC Project Manager and the lead Commissioner for this work to discuss research findings and progress. The Project Plan should make allowance for this activity. The number and frequency of briefings will be determined by the Contractor Project Manager and the EAC Project Manager as the work progresses. The Contractor may also be required to periodically brief the full Commission on their work.

Provisional Voting

4.4 Collect and analyze State legislation, administrative procedures, and court cases. An understanding of the disparities and similarities of how provisional voting was implemented around the country will provide a baseline for the consideration of future approaches. Seventeen States never had provisional voting before HAVA was enacted, while many other States did. A State-by-State compendium of the legislation, procedures, and litigation reviewed shall be delivered along with the analysis results.

4.5 Recommend alternative approaches for future implementation of provisional voting. The Contractor shall conduct a literature review to identify other research results and data available on this topic. The EAC Election Day Survey, for example, contained several questions on provisional voting. The EAC will make these survey data available to the Contractor. Based on their analysis of available research and the results of Task 4.5, the Contractor shall diagnose the problems and challenges of provisional voting implementation and hypothesize alternative approaches.

The Contractor shall assess the efficacy of these alternatives in relation to the following inter-related policy objectives: (1) enabling the maximum number of eligible voters to cast ballots that will be counted; (2) providing procedural simplicity for voters, poll workers, and election officials; (3) minimizing opportunity for voter fraud; and (4) maintaining a reasonable workload for election officials and poll workers. Additional policy considerations may be identified in the course of this research effort. The Contractor shall document and brief these alternatives to the Commission.

4.6 Prepare preliminary draft guidance document. Based on the feedback received from the Commission, the Contractor shall prepare a draft guidance document for review and comment by the EAC Board of Advisors. EAC will convene a Board of Advisors meeting or teleconference for the discussion of this document. The Contractor shall provide the document in advance and participate in the Board meeting to answer questions and record comments.

4.7 Revise draft guidance for publication in the Federal Register. The Contractor shall revise the guidance document as appropriate to reflect the comments of the EAC and the Board of Advisors and provide the draft guidance for publication in the Federal Register by the EAC.

4.8 Arrange one public hearing for receiving public comment on draft guidance. This hearing should be scheduled 30 days after the initial publication date. The Contractor shall select the location in consultation with the EAC. No speakers will be required. EAC will handle publicity for the meeting.

4.9 Prepare final guidance document for EAC adoption. Review all comments received in response to Federal Register publication and at public hearing and revise guidance document as appropriate. Provide final version to EAC for adoption.
Voter Identification Requirements

4.10 Collect and analyze State legislation, administrative procedures, and court cases. It is assumed that the collection of information for analysis of voter identification requirements will be performed concurrently with the research for Task 4.5. An understanding of the disparities and similarities of how voter identification requirements were implemented around the country will provide a baseline for the consideration of future approaches. A State-by-State compendium of the legislation, procedures, and litigation reviewed shall be delivered along with the analysis results.

4.11 Convene a half day public hearing on the topic of voter identification requirements. The Contractor shall be responsible for all aspects of planning and conducting this hearing in consultation with the EAC. The Contractor shall identify three panels of three to four speakers each. The Contractor shall arrange for speaker attendance to include travel and per diem expenses. The EAC will provide publicity for the hearing. The Contractor shall prepare a document summarizing the proceedings and containing all testimony provided.

4.12 Recommend alternative approaches for future implementation of HAVA voter identification requirements. The Contractor shall conduct a literature review to identify other research results and data available on this topic. Based on their analysis of available research and the results of Task 5.11, the Contractor shall diagnose the problems and challenges of voter identification and hypothesize alternative approaches. The Contractor shall coordinate with the EAC to identify appropriate policy objectives by which to assess these alternatives. The Contractor shall document and brief these alternatives to the Commission.

4.13 Prepare preliminary draft guidance document. Based on the feedback received from the Commission, the Contractor shall prepare a draft guidance document for review and comment by the EAC Board of Advisors. EAC will convene a Board meeting or teleconference for the discussion of this document. The Contractor shall provide the document in advance and participate in the Board meeting to answer questions and record comments.

4.14 Revise draft guidance for publication in the Federal Register. The Contractor shall revise the guidance document as appropriate to reflect the comments of the EAC and the Board of Advisors and provide the draft guidance for publication in the Federal Register by the EAC.

4.15 Arrange one public hearing for receiving public comment on the draft guidance. This hearing should be scheduled 30 days after the initial publication date. The Contractor shall select the location in consultation with the EAC. No speakers will be required. EAC will handle publicity for the hearing.

4.16 Prepare final guidance document for EAC adoption. Review all comments received in response to Federal Register publication and at public hearing and revise guidance document as appropriate. Provide final version to EAC for adoption.
Contract Type. The contract type will be Time and Materials with a ceiling of 6.0 Place of performance. The principal place of performance will be the Contractor’s place of business. Meetings and occasional work efforts may be performed at the EAC offices.

7.0 Period of Performance. The period of performance is from date of award until October 28, 2005.

8.0 Schedule of Deliverables:

- Project plan – 10 days after contract award
- Progress reports – monthly
- Briefings – as required
- Analysis report on provisional voting - TBD
- Alternatives report on provisional voting – TBD
- Preliminary draft guidance on provisional voting - TBD
- Draft guidance on provisional voting for publication – 8/2005
- Public hearing on draft guidance – 30 days after publication
- Final guidance on provisional voting for EAC adoption – 9/2005
- Analysis report on voter identification requirements – TBD
- Public hearing on voter identification requirements – TBD
- Summary of voter identification requirements hearing - TBD
- Alternatives report on voter identification requirements - TBD
- Preliminary draft guidance on voter identification requirements - TBD
- Draft guidance on voter identification requirements for publication – 9/2005
- Public hearing on draft guidance – 30 days after publication
- Final guidance on voter identification requirements to EAC for adoption – 10/2005

REMAINING STANDARD CONTRACT TERMS TO BE PROVIDED.
Tom-

Had a very good review and discussion of the PRG at this morning's Commissioner meeting.

Also, the Commissioners have marked their calendars for a conference call with the Eagleton/Moritz team on July 12 at 9:30 AM.

Several concerns were raised about the composition of the PRG and, after some discussion, I indicated that Eagleton will provide the EAC with a revised participant list, and with a more detailed description of the PRG's mission, goals, objectives, workplan and timelines for accomplishing its work.

The Vice Chair is concerned that there is not sufficient conservative representation on the PRG. I would suggest the team do more research to identify well-recognized conservative academics to put on the Group.

Further, the Commissioners recommend a tiered process in which the PRG will prepare a "dispassionate" analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions. This analysis and these conclusions will then be vetted with a defined/select group of local election officials, and then, with a defined/select group of advocacy organizations.

It was also suggested that a final round of focus group meetings be held with a cross-section of these election officials, advocates and academics for an overall interactive reaction to the analysis and recommendations.

Hope this helps clarify concerns; I look forward to sharing your revisions to the PRG with them.

Deliberative Process Privilege
INTRODUCTION

This report describes our progress from the start of the project on May 26 through June 30, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

The objective of the contract is to assist the EAC in the collection, analysis and interpretation of information regarding HAVA provisional voting and voter identification requirements on which to base policy recommendations as guidance for the states in the conduct of the 2006 elections. The work has begun well, thanks to the clarity of the EAC’s expectations and the strong collaboration by the scholars and staff at the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey, and the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University.

The document report is divided into 4 sections that cover: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, Project Management, and the Financial Report. Each section references the specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract.

Please direct any questions or comments about this report to Tom O’Neill at:
PROVISIONAL VOTING

Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to provisional voting. Work on the first of these must be complete before proceeding to later tasks. The work plan provides for two months to complete Task 3.4. Work on this task is on schedule.

Task 3.4: Collect and analyze state legislation, administrative procedures, and court cases. Understand the disparities and similarities of how provisional voting was implemented around the country.

LEGISLATION, REGULATIONS, AND LITIGATION

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. When complete, this information will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task. It also will provide a base of understanding for the analysis of states’ actual experience with provisional voting in 2004, for which the Eagleton team has lead responsibility.

Description: The Moritz team includes faculty, an executive administrator, a reference librarian, and several research assistants. It began immediately to compile statutes, case law and administrative procedures regarding Provisional Voting. The team has created a 50 state chart to summarize information on provisional voting. Categories for which state statutes and administrative procedures are being reviewed include:

- When did the state create a system compliant with the HAVA provisional ballot requirements?
- Who may be eligible to cast a provisional ballot? and
- What is the process for discovering whether your provisional ballot was counted in the election?

Progress: Initial research for 27 states, including the collection of provisional voting statutes is complete. This phase of the work is on schedule for completion by August 1. By the beginning of the week of July 11, Moritz’s full time research assistant will move from voter identification research to gathering and organizing case law on provisional voting.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging; states use different terminology to codify provisional voting issues. Many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variation from state to state makes creating a snapshot view across states a challenge. The team is meeting this challenge, and the work is on schedule.
PREPARATION FOR AND EXPERIENCE WITH PROVISIONAL VOTING

The Eagleton team is constructing a narrative description for each state of the 50 states and the District of Columbia. It is also surveying a stratified random sample of county election officials to improve its understanding of actual practice in administering provisional voting.

Description: To construct the narratives, a researcher is examining newspaper accounts, state websites, and reports from third-party organizations to determine what information is publicly available about these issues during the 2004 election. To organize the information derived from this examination, we are creating an information system that will make it possible to catalog the basic information about the states (i.e. whether a state was new to provisional voting, the percentage of provisional votes counted, the method of notifying voters if their vote was counted, etc.) and combine it with Moritz's collection and analysis of statutes, regulations and litigation. The information system will make it possible to provide answers to such topics of particular interest listed in the contract as: How did preparation for provisional voting vary between states that had some form of provisional voting and those that did not?” and “How did litigation affect implementation?”

Progress: The researcher in this area has identified sources of information for every state and the collection process is well underway. Verified database entries for 24 states are complete, as are two state narrative summaries. This phase of the research is on schedule for completion by the end of July.

Challenges: A key challenge is determining just what states actually did in practice to verify and count provisional ballots. A second challenge has been determining the variations in policy within individual states. We are still wrestling with resolving this challenge, but the work is on schedule.

Work Plan: By the end of the July, the compilation of statutes, administrative regulations, and litigation will be complete and ready to be combined with the state-by-state narrative compiled by Eagleton. That will form the basis for the analysis and recommendation of alternative approaches for provisional voting required under Task 3.5.

SURVEY OF COUNTY ELECTION OFFICIALS

This survey will help the research team understand more about such key topics of interest as:

- “How did the experience of provisional voting vary between states that previously had some form of provisional voting and those where provisional voting was new in 2004?”
- “Did state and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots?”
- “Did local officials have a clear understanding of how to implement provisional voting?”

The survey results will supplement the information on these topics from the compilation of statutes, regulations and cases and from the narrative we are constructing for each state.
Description: The Center for Public Interest Polling (CPIP) at Eagleton is conducting a national survey of county election officials to measure several aspects of provisional voting. The survey is designed to determine the following factors related to provisional voting at the county level:

- The content and quality of instructions provided to county officials by the states
- The steps taken by county officials to pass information on to poll workers;
- Differences in experience between states new to provisional voting and those that had some form of provisional ballot before HAVA; and
- Recommendations to improve and/or reduce the need for provisional voting

Progress: The survey instrument is complete. CPIP has compiled a list of election officials at the county level and at the municipal or regional level for states that do not assign the election responsibility to counties. It was forwarded to the call center, Schulman, Ronca & Bucuvalas Inc., (SRBI) the week of July 5, 2005. A sample will be drawn the week of July 12. Human Subjects Approval from Rutgers University was granted July 12. Pre-notification letters will be sent to election officials around July 12-13, 2005. The EAC has reviewed a draft of this letter, which we have now revised to make clear that the survey will increase our understanding of the provisional voting process, but is not being conducted on behalf of the EAC.

Challenges: We made special efforts to expedite Human Subject Approval to meet the schedule in the work plan. In the absence of an existing, reliable database of local election officials, we had to create one especially for this project. In order to provide a valid comparison between the states new to provisional voting with those that previously had some form of provisional ballot we doubled the sample size from 200 to 400. This increase will require an increase in the budget for the survey from $15,000 to about $24,000. We intend to reallocate costs within the existing budget to make this improvement possible, and will submit a letter describing the reallocation to the EAC in mid-July.

The sample has been, and will continue to represent the biggest challenge in this survey. Compiling the sample required substantial coordination and research to determine the accuracy of the identity and contact information for potential respondents. The difficulty in determining the appropriate contact is attributed to variation in county election officials' titles, jurisdiction types, and state and county election structures across the country. In addition to the potential pitfalls of reaching the appropriate county official, another factor in actually making contact with this special population will be dependent upon the hours that they keep, and may be hindered by the summer season.

Work Plan: This questionnaire will be pre-tested by July 15, and will field July 18 through August 5, 2005. This is somewhat later than projected in the revised work plan, but the information will arrive in time to be considered in drafting the analysis and alternatives document required under Task 3.5.
VOTER IDENTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. During the reporting period, we have made substantial progress in the first two tasks, which constitute the information-gathering phase of the work on Voter ID. The research of Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of provisional voting.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. When complete, this information will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: A team of Election Law@Moritz faculty, executive administrator, a reference librarian, and several research assistants is compiling statutes on Voter Identification, and providing a summarized analysis of this research.

Progress: The Moritz team has created a 50-state chart to record data on voter identification. Categories for which state statutes and administrative regulations are being reviewed include: “Who is required to present ID”, “Types of ID required”, and “Consequences of having no ID”. We have completed the initial research for 45 states and have collected the voter identification statutes for those states. An Election Law@Moritz Fellow is conducting an academic literature review on voter identification. This literature review will help shape the analytical framework that will guide us when the compendium of statutes and administrative regulations is complete.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging because of the different terminology used from state to state to codify voter identification issues, and because many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variety from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Projections: At the current rate, a draft of the voter identification chart should be complete on schedule, by the end of July. Work on the literature review will continue into August, but will be available to inform the analysis of alternative approaches for voter identification called for by Task 3.12 of the contract.

SUPPLEMENTS TO LEGAL ANALYSIS

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of voter ID requirements. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern with more rigorous identification requirements for all voters. We are following these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.

Individual narratives for the states with significant activity in voter ID will provide a resource for understanding the wide range of experience in the 2004 election. The narratives will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud, a focus of the concern with increasing the rigor of voter ID requirements. This work is on schedule to be completed by the end of July. The next key milestones will be the completion of the state database and drafting the first narratives.

VOTER ID AND TURNOUT ANALYSIS
The second supplemental analysis will provide objective information on a contentious feature of the debate over voter ID in the states: the effects of more rigorous voter ID regimes on voter turnout and the relationship between the voter ID regime and vote fraud. As part of this effort, Eagleton is undertaking a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state's voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We are creating a database and gathering statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election. Analysis on the county-level will enable us to estimate the influence of ID requirements on various age groups, races, ethnicities and gender groups. We are compiling data from both the 2000 and 2004 Presidential elections to measure the effect that changes in ID requirements may have had on voter turnout through two national election cycles.

Progress: The structure of the database is complete. It contains demographic information from the Census, and turnout data from various sources. The researcher assigned to this task is devising the syntax that will be required to run the statistics when the dataset is complete. The methodology for this part of the study is complete, and the actual data collection will soon be finished.

Projection: We are waiting for the Census Bureau to release the 2004 County Demographic Estimates. We have ordered and await the arrival of 2 datasets that contain voter turnout and voter registration numbers on the county-level for both the 2000 and 2004 elections. Once these two sources of information are received, the researcher will insert this information into the existing database, clean up the dataset, and begin to run the statistics. By that point, the researcher will have separated the states into various ID-requirement groupings that have been determined by the team, which will require coordination with several other parts of the study. This work is on schedule. By the end of July, the researcher should have county-level and state-level statistics on the impact of each ID system upon turnout, analyzed through various demographic features on the county-level.
Task 3.11 Public meeting on Voter Identification Requirements

Description: We are working closely with EAC staff, particularly the General Counsel, to plan a half day public meeting on Voter ID requirements. Presentations at the meeting will form an important part of the information we are compiling about Voter ID requirements and the strengths and shortcomings of a range of alternative approaches.

Progress: We have recommended a focus on the debate over Voter ID now underway in the states. To provide a vivid picture of the debate, we have recommended that one panel include legislators on opposite sides of the issue from two different states. Our research identified Mississippi and Wisconsin as two states to focus on, and we have recommended specific legislators from each. We have discussed with staff adding a researcher to the panel to put the debate in Wisconsin and Mississippi in either a national or historic context. We also recommended two researchers from contrasting points of view, to address the effects of Voter ID provisions under HAVA and broader provisions that are now the subject of national debate. EAC staff recommended a panel of two state election directors to address the interaction of Voter ID with HAVA. We are awaiting a decision on our recommendations from EAC staff. We have no reason not to believe that the work is on schedule to be completed in time to organize a productive meeting on July 28.

Challenges: The date and location of this hearing has been changed twice since the beginning of the project. It was originally scheduled to take place in late June, but was rescheduled for July to allow the June hearing to focus on voting machine technology. The regular meeting was rescheduled for July 26 in Minneapolis, and was recently changed to July 28 in Pasadena. The changes in the scheduling of the July meeting have complicated our choice of panelists. More seriously, the changes mean that information from the hearing will not be available as early in the research process as contemplated in the contract. This timeframe will now require the team to summarize the hearing events at the same time that we are drafting the analysis and alternatives paper in early August.

Additionally, while our contract states that the "Contractor shall be responsible for all aspects of planning and conducting this hearing in consultation with the EAC," we have been asked only to make recommendations of topics and panelists, and the arrangements for the organization of the hearing are in other hands. This lack of clarity has caused some confusion and has delayed invitations to panelists. Thanks to frequent communication with members of the EAC, the process now seems to be working smoothly.

Projection: We believe the work is on schedule for completion in time to recruit the panelists for the July 28 hearing. Preparation of the hearing summary will likely be delayed because of the need to complete the analysis and alternatives paper.
PROJECT MANAGEMENT

Immediately after announcement of the award of the contract, Eagleton and Moritz began supplementing the core group that had prepared to proposal to building a highly qualified team to undertake the work. That team was in place by mid June, just a few weeks after the contract award.

As described in the proposal, the direction of the project is the responsibility of a five-person committee of faculty and staff from Eagleton and Moritz, chaired by Dr. Ruth Mandel, Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics. Project Director Thomas O’Neill, a consultant to Eagleton, reports to this team and provides day-to-day guidance and coordination for the research. A weekly meeting of all the researchers engaged in the project if the primary means of coordinating the work. We have recently added an internal website to facilitate the review and revision of written materials.

Task 3.1 Update the Work Plan

The first task was completed on time with the submission of a detailed work plan and timeline. EAC staff requested that the work plan be supplemented with a Gantt chart created on MS Project, and we submitted that a few days later.

PEER REVIEW GROUP

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group (PRG). The EAC indicated at our first meeting in May that it would review our recommendations for members of the PRG. Our initial vision of the PRG was a small group of scholars and representatives of advocacy organizations that would comment on the research design, review drafts of our analyses and reports, and, in general, identify areas of the research that should be strengthened and help us improve the breadth, depth and clarity of reports based on that research.

Progress: Upon reflection, the project team agreed that the PRG should not include representatives of advocacy groups. We concluded, as representatives they would feel obligated to act as advocates for positions already taken by their groups. While advocacy organizations should be consulted as stakeholders during the course of our work, they were unlikely to achieve the goals we had in mind for the PRG as a source of advice on research design, methodology, and analysis. We submitted a revised list of potential members, substantially comprised of academics, to EAC for review.

The EAC responded with suggestions concerning both the balance of the PRG’s membership and the creation of additional committees to review our work. We answered with an analysis of the cost and time involved adopting the EAC’s suggestions as well as with suggestions for a balanced selection of academics for the Peer Review Group. We have not received response on this correspondence from the EAC, and the recruitment of the group is on hold.
Challenges: Communications on this issue with the EAC have not been clear or timely. The PRG should be in place now to comment on our research design while there is still time to refine it. While we are confident in the quality of our work, the wisdom and perspective of the outstanding candidates we have proposed for membership would strengthen the analysis and reports of our work.

Projections: We have effectively brought these challenges to the attention of EAC staff and look forward to a resolution speedy enough to allow recruitment of the PRG’s members before the end of the month. If we meet that goal, the work of the PRG will be about 2 weeks behind the milestones indicated in the work plan.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and a website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law will be merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding provisional voting and voter identification.

Progress: The Moritz team has provided Eagleton staff with samples of the work that they are performing. An Eagleton staff member will be reviewing the content and formats of data from all supporting research and (re-)formatting once the work has been completed. The researchers and staff at Eagleton have created a shared folder on the Institute’s server for the safe storage of work and access for those staff members. All of this work is being reviewed by the project team to ensure that a broad survey is being performed.

Challenges: There are no evident challenges to this task at this time.

Projections: By the end of July 2005, much of the above referenced research will have been completed with respective materials and charts near completion. At that time, staff at Eagleton will review, combine and format all documents and materials in preparation for our final reporting to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: A trial Intranet for the project became available during the week of June 26. The Intranet will facilitate the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.

Progress: After meetings with staff members of Rutgers University Computer Services (RUCS) and subsequent submission of a proposal by RUCS for technical support and hosting of the Intranet and the evaluation of alternative commercial services, the project team decided at its June 28th meeting to publish the Intranet through www.intranets.com.
one of the leading commercial services. This decision was based on lower costs and earlier publication schedules than offered under the RUCS proposal. The Intranet services were evaluated during a free trial period, which demonstrated the ease of design and navigation of the proposed service.

Challenges: There are no immediate challenges to completion of this task by the timeframe specified below.

Projections: Design, testing and publication of initial content of the Intranet service is continuing, with all participants expected to be provided access by July 8, 2005.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Given that the report reflects the first month of the project, several procedures for payment of subcontractors on the project were initiated. Expenses related to those members of the team are not reflected in this report because they have not yet been incurred.

Our contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (732) 932-0165, EXT. 2235.

A detail of expenses incurred from project inception through June 30, 2005, is attached.
Job-

I write to see if you might be available to come to Washington on Monday, August 1 to meet with several EAC staff and Commissioners to discuss the voter fraud/voter intimidation project and your possible work as a consultant on the project.

I'd like to schedule this 1-2 hour meeting for sometime between 1 and 3 in the afternoon.

Might you be available to come to Washington for this?

Tom-

I will be in touch shortly with possible dates in very late August or early September, when EAC staff might be available to meet with Eagleton to discuss the project's research results and next steps.

In the meantime, I thought it was important to follow up on the issues Vice Chair DeGregorio raised while we were in Pasadena.

To be certain that I have the latest information, could you send to me the final list of the Eagleton/Moritz Peer Review Group and the list of organizations that Eagleton will be contacting for input?

INTRODUCTION

This report describes our progress from July 1 through July 31, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

The effort this month continued to focus on research for the analysis and alternatives paper, including the compilation of Provisional Voting statutes, regulations, and litigation from the 50 states. We also prepared and delivered testimony at the EAC's regular monthly meeting in Pasadena on July 28.

The data collection, analysis, and compilation are all on schedule. Because of delays in agreeing on the composition of the Peer Review Group with EAC, however, the actual completion and submission of the analysis and alternatives paper to the EAC will most likely be delayed about a week beyond the target date in the work plan. We are scheduled to discuss the draft paper and guidance document prior to submission, with the EAC on September 6, and the final draft cannot be completed until several days after that date.

The document report is divided into 4 sections that cover: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, Project Management, and the Financial Report. Each section references the specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract.

Please direct any questions or comments about this report to Tom O'Neill at:
PROVISIONAL VOTING

Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to provisional voting. Work on the first of these must be complete before proceeding to later tasks. Task 3.4 was completed this month.

Task 3.4: Collect and analyze state legislation, administrative procedures, and court cases. Understand the disparities and similarities of how provisional voting was implemented around the country.

LEGISLATION, REGULATIONS, AND LITIGATION

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. This information constitutes the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task. It also will provide a base of understanding for the analysis of states’ actual experience with provisional voting in 2004, for which the Eagleton team has lead responsibility.

Description: The Moritz team has created a 50-state chart to summarize information on provisional voting, compiled statutes, case law and administrative procedures regarding Provisional Voting.

Progress: The 50-state (plus District of Columbia) chart created to collect data on provisional voting is complete. We have collected the statutes for all states. State by state summaries of provisional voting have been written for 47 states and D.C. A memorandum summarizing provisional voting litigation is complete. The collection of the documents associated with the litigation is nearing completion.

Challenges: The variety in the form of provisional voting legislation from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: The remaining 3 state summaries of provisional voting will be completed by August 8. Analysis of all the information, data, and survey results concerning provisional voting data will be performed in August.

PREPARATION FOR AND EXPERIENCE WITH PROVISIONAL VOTING

The Eagleton team has researched and compiled a narrative of each state’s experience with provisional voting in 2004. At the end of July the survey of 400 local election officials was nearing its end, and – as of this writing – is now complete with an analysis and report in draft form. We will rely on the survey results to improve our understanding of actual practice in administering provisional voting, including the steps local officials took to prepare for the election.
PROVISIONAL VOTING NARRATIVES

Description: To construct the narratives, a researcher examined newspaper accounts, state websites, and reports from third-party organizations to gather information on the experience with provisional voting in the 2004 election. To organize the information derived from this examination, we created an information system that catalogues information about the states (i.e. whether a state was new to provisional voting, the percentage of provisional votes counted, the method of notifying voters if their vote was counted, etc.) and combined it with Moritz's collection and analysis of statutes, regulations and litigation.

Progress: The state-by-state database is complete, as is a first draft of all state narratives. This work has been shared with the larger team and is being reviewed currently in preparation for constructing analysis and recommendation of alternative approaches for provisional voting required under Task 3.5.

Work Plan: In the next month, revisions of the narratives will be complete. In addition to this research, we will expand upon vote fraud research and examine further the relationship between instances of vote fraud and ensuing election reforms.

SURVEY OF COUNTY ELECTION OFFICIALS

Description: The Center for Public Interest Polling (CPIP) at Eagleton conducted a national survey of county election officials to measure several aspects of provisional voting. The survey was designed to determine the following factors related to provisional voting at the county (or equivalent election jurisdiction) level:

- The content and quality of instructions provided to county officials by the states;
- The steps taken by county officials to pass information on to poll workers;
- Differences in experience between states new to provisional voting and those that had some form of provisional ballot before HAVA; and
- Recommendations to improve and/or reduce the need for provisional voting.

Progress: The fielding and initial analysis of the survey results are complete.

Work Plan: The information derived from the survey will be considered in drafting the analysis and alternatives document required under Task 3.5.
The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. During the reporting period, we have completed tasks 3.10 and 3.11. The research on Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of provisional voting.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation with regard to Voter Identification Requirements. When complete, this information will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: The Moritz team has compiled statutes on Voter Identification, and will provide a summarized analysis of this research to the project team for review.

Progress: The chart created to collect data on voter identification is complete and is now being reviewed. Voter identification statutes are being collected.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging because of the different terminology used from state to state to codify voter identification issues, and because many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variety from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: Review of the voter identification chart, the collection of the voter identification statutes, and the writing of the state by state summaries will be completed by the end of August.

SUPPLEMENTS TO LEGAL ANALYSIS

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter ID in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of voter ID requirements. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern with more rigorous identification requirements for all voters. We are following these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.

Individual narratives for the states with significant activity in voter ID will provide a resource for understanding the wide range of experience in the 2004 election. The narratives will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud, a focus of the concern with increasing the rigor of voter ID requirements. The next key milestones will be the completion of the state database and drafting the first narratives.

Voter ID and Turnout Analysis

The second supplemental analysis will provide objective information on a contentious feature of the debate over voter ID in the states: the effects of more rigorous voter ID regimes on voter turnout and the relationship between the voter ID regime and vote fraud. As part of this effort, Eagleton is undertaking a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state's voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We are creating a database and gathering statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election.

Progress: The collection of data for the Voter ID-Turnout analysis is complete. The assembled database contains population demographic data, voter registration data and voter turnout data from all 50 states, 3113 Counties, and the District of Columbia. It also contains exit poll data from the 50 states, providing demographic data of voter turnout. The analysis of that data is well underway.

Challenges: The initial methodology that was devised to investigate the questions involved in this part of the study proved insufficient, as the necessary data was unobtainable (the Census Bureau has not yet released their 2004 data). After re-developing an appropriate methodology, the necessary data has been assembled, we have resumed the analysis of this data.

Projection: The analysis of the impact that voter identification requirements have upon voter turnout should be completed around mid-August.

Task 3.11 Public meeting on Voter Identification Requirements

Description: In early July, we continued our efforts to identify specific Voter ID topics or issues and panelists who could shed light on them. We recommended a focus on the debate over Voter ID now underway in the states. To provide a vivid picture of the debate, we recommended that one panel include specific legislators on opposite sides of the issue from two different states, Mississippi and Wisconsin. We also discussed adding a researcher to the panel in order to place the debate in a national or historical context. We also recommended a panel of two academic researchers with contrasting points of view, to address the effects of Voter ID provisions under HAVA. In response to our suggestions, EAC staff recommended a panel of two state election directors to address the interaction of Voter ID with HAVA.

By mid-July, the EAC had decided which topics and speakers should be invited, however most of those speakers proved unable to attend.
Progress: Tom O'Neill and Dan Tokaji attended the EAC Public Meeting held in Pasadena on July 28. Their presentations at the meeting described the progress of the research and our developing perspective on how to assess the quality of the provisional voting process in the states and identify possible steps for improvement.

Challenges: The changes in the scheduling of the July meeting delayed and ultimately made it impossible to assemble a panel, from which we could derive substantive insight into voter identification issues as they are playing out in the states. Additionally, due to the date of the hearing, the information from the hearing was not available as early in the research process as contemplated in the contract.

Projection: Preparation of the hearing summary will likely be delayed, due to the team's focus on preparation of the analysis and alternatives paper.

PROJECT MANAGEMENT

PEER REVIEW GROUP

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group (PRG). The EAC indicated at our first meeting in May that it would review our recommendations for members of the PRG. Our initial vision of the PRG was a small group of scholars and representatives of advocacy organizations that would comment on the research design, review drafts of our analyses and reports, and, in general, identify areas of the research that should be strengthened and help us improve the breadth, depth and clarity of reports based on that research.

Progress: Upon reflection, the project team agreed that the PRG should not include representatives of advocacy groups. We concluded that as representatives they would feel obligated to act as advocates for positions already taken by their groups. While advocacy organizations might be consulted as stakeholders during the course of our work, they were unlikely to achieve the goals we had in mind for the PRG as a source of advice on research design, methodology, and analysis. We submitted a revised list of potential members, substantially comprised of academics, to the EAC for review.

The EAC responded with suggestions concerning both the balance of the PRG's membership and the creation of additional committees to review our work. We provided an analysis of the cost and time involved in adopting the EAC's suggestions as well as with suggestions for a balanced selection of academics for the Peer Review Group. In the end, the EAC determined that Eagleton should appoint a balanced Peer Review Group of its own choosing. Initial phone calls were made to all members of that group by the end of July, and written invitations and descriptions of the process have gone to all possible members who had indicated their interest in serving.

Challenges: Communications on this issue with the EAC were not clear or timely. The purpose of the PRG is to review our work, and to comment on our research design, which is well underway. We had planned to have the PRG in place early enough in the project to enable them to provide feedback, including the research design. While we are confident in the quality of our work, the experience and perspective of the Peer Review Group will strengthen our analysis and recommendations as we find a way to receive its critique in the more limited time now available. The delay in creating the Peer Review Group will result in a delay in the completion of the final draft of the analysis and alternatives paper and in the preliminary guidance document.

Projections: The work of the PRG will be about 2 weeks behind the milestones indicated in the work plan.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and an internal website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law will be merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding provisional voting and voter identification.

Progress: The Moritz team has provided Eagleton staff with all completed work. An Eagleton staff member reviews the content and formats of data from all supporting research and will (re-)format once the work has been completed for the compendium and reports submitted to the EAC. The researchers and staff at Eagleton have created a shared folder on the Institute’s server for the safe storage of work and access for those staff members. All of this work is being reviewed by the project team to ensure that a broad survey is being performed.

Projections: By the end of July 2005, much of the above referenced research has been completed. The entire project team has begun the process of reviewing all work, and will combine and format all documents and materials in preparation for our final reporting to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: All project team members have signed on to the Intranet site. The Intranet facilitates the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.

Progress: Project team members regularly post drafts, completed materials and spreadsheets online for internal review. The intranet has been extremely helpful to team members and serves as an internal website with announcements and important documents readily available to all team members.
The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Our contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (732) 932-0165, EXT. 2235.

A detail of expenses incurred from project inception through June 30, 2005, is attached.
Tom-

Thank you for sharing this list of your Peer Review Group members, to-date. I will share this list with the Commissioners and will be certain to let your know of their feedback, if any.

I will also be back in touch regarding Eagleton’s research around voter fraud and the research project EAC will be undertaking, this fall, around voting fraud and voter intimidation. The EAC is presently in the process of finalizing a work and staff plan for this project and once it is completed, I will be certain to brief you on it.

In the meantime, EAC staff and several of the Commissioners looks forward to meeting with the Eagleton/Moritz team on September 6 at 1:30 PM.

Karen,

Attached is a report on the status of recruitment of members of the Peer Review Group. We extended 9 invitations. We have four confirmed members, one reluctant turn-down, one who has yet to respond to an initial inquiry, and are awaiting confirmation from 3 others who initially agreed. Please let me know if you need additional information.

Thanks-- we had, and it's good coverage. The AP had a piece as well-- this can be seen as a victory. Has the CHC come out officially on these ID issues? It is my opinion that the movements are being made in state legs. that will apply AZ type laws elsewhere. We obviously have good communications with House Admin and Senate Rules, as well as Whip Hoyer's office, but increased communications with Hill member offices would be helpful, if you have any suggestions.

Feds revise stance on Arizona voter ID requirement

Wednesday, August 31, 2005 7:43 PM PDT

PHOENIX (AP) - Arizona voters may be able to obtain at least a provisional ballot at polling places even if they don't show required identification despite the ID requirement in a ballot measure approved by voters last year. Whether that provisional ballot gets counted is another question.

The U.S. Justice Department in January signed off on election-law changes made by Proposition 200 itself. And a top department official in April signaled that the state would not run afoul of federal law if it put into place procedures to implement the ballot measure's voter ID mandate.

However, a different department official on Thursday wrote the state, saying it was "necessary to clarify our earlier interpretation in order to ensure an accurate representation of the Justice Department's views."

Acting Assistant Attorney General Bradley J. Schlozman's letter to a state official said the federal Help America Vote Act of 2002 requires that a person claiming to be an eligible voter and willing to sign a statement to that effect be given at least a provisional ballot.

However, HAVA leaves it up to states to decide whether a person who casts a provisional ballot is actually eligible to vote and therefore whether a provisional ballot should be counted, Schlozman wrote. Therefore, the state is free to

Hi Karen,

Attached is the August progress report in fulfillment of our Contract to Provide Research Assistance to the EAC for the Development of Voluntary Guidance on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification Procedures. Please note, as per your instructions earlier this month, that the financial report will be sent via Fedex under separate cover to: Ms. Dianna Scott, Administrative Officer, EAC. Also attached to the progress report is a finalized list of our Peer Review Group members. If you have any questions regarding this report, please contact Tom O'Neill at (908) 794-1030 or.

Have a great day,

INTRODUCTION

This report describes our progress from August 1 through August 31, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

Research on Provisional Voting and a draft of reports on the analysis and alternatives were substantially completed in preparation for the September 6 briefing for the EAC. Important reports such as the National Survey of Local Election Officials' Experience with Provisional Voting; Statistical Review Provisional Voting in the 2004 Election; State-by-state Narrative of Developments in Provisional Voting; and the compilation of Provisional Voting statutes, regulations, and litigation from the 50 states, were all completed in August.

We made further progress on recruiting a balanced and authoritative Peer Review Group (which, as this report is written, is receiving all the documents listed above for review). Ingrid Reed of Eagleton will coordinate the work of the Peer Review Group. A list of the members of the Peer Review Group is attached.

This report is divided into 3 sections: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, and Project Management. Each section references specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract. The Financial Report will be sent separately by the Rutgers Division of Grant and Contract Accounting.

Please direct questions or comments about this report to Tom O'Neill at: [Redacted]
Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to provisional voting. Work on the first of these must be complete before proceeding to later tasks. Task 3.4 was completed in August, and Task 3.5 is well underway.

Task 3.5: Analysis and Alternative Approaches. Assess the potential, problems, and challenges of provisional voting and develop alternative means to achieve the goals of provisional voting.

LEGISLATION, REGULATIONS, AND LITIGATION

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. This information constitutes the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task. It has provided a base of understanding for the analysis of states’ actual experience with provisional voting in 2004, for which the Eagleton team has lead responsibility.

Description: The Moritz team has created a 50-state chart to summarize information on provisional voting, compiled statutes, case law and administrative procedures regarding Provisional Voting and is near completion with this research.

Progress: We completed the state by state summaries of provisional voting in August. Also complete is a memorandum outlining provisional voting legislative changes since the 2004 election. This material was sent to the EAC as part of the package for briefing on September 6.

Challenges: The variety in the form and frequency of provisional voting legislation from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: The analysis of all the information, data, and survey results concerning provisional voting data will be completed in September, on schedule. The alternatives document should also be complete in September, pending response from the EAC on which direction those alternatives should follow.

PREPARATION FOR AND EXPERIENCE WITH PROVISIONAL VOTING

The Eagleton team has researched and compiled a narrative of each state’s experience with provisional voting in 2004. The report findings from the survey of 400 local election officials is now complete. The survey results improve our understanding of actual practice in administering provisional voting, including the steps local officials took to prepare for the election.
PROVISIONAL VOTING NARRATIVES

Description: To construct the narratives, a researcher examined newspaper accounts, state websites, and reports from third-party organizations to gather information on the experience with provisional voting in the 2004 election. To organize the information derived from this examination, we created an information system that catalogues information about the states (i.e. whether a state was new to provisional voting, the percentage of provisional votes counted, the method of notifying voters if their vote was counted, etc.) and combined it with Moritz's collection and analysis of statutes, regulations and litigation.

Progress: A state-by-state narrative of developments in Provisional Voting is complete and has been distributed to the EAC and the Peer Review Group. This work has been crucial to the process of constructing our draft analysis and recommendation of alternative approaches for provisional voting required under Task 3.5.

Challenges: The primary obstacle to constructing the narratives was difficulty in communicating and obtaining necessary information from various state officials. As a result, the narratives underwent multiple revisions in order to incorporate the most up-to-date material available. Had the Election Day Study been available, this task would probably have been simplified considerably.

Work Plan: We completed revisions of the narratives.

SURVEY OF COUNTY ELECTION OFFICIALS

Description: The Center for Public Interest Polling (CPIP) at Eagleton conducted a national survey of county election officials to measure several aspects of provisional voting.

Progress: The analysis of the survey results and findings report are complete.

Work Plan: We used the information from the survey in drafting the analysis and alternatives document required under Task 3.5.
VOTER IDENTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. The research on Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of provisional voting, and is becoming the principal focus of our research.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation with regard to Voter Identification Requirements. This collection of material is nearing completion. It will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: The Moritz team has compiled statutes on Voter Identification, and will provide a summarized analysis of this research to the project team for review.

Progress: We are refining the 50 state (plus District of Columbia) chart of data on voter identification. So far collected are voter identification statutes for 35 states. Summaries of the existing voter identification statutes have been written for forty states.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging because of the different terminology used from state to state to codify voter identification issues, and because many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variety from state to state makes creating a snapshot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: The state by state voter identification statute summaries will be completed for the remaining ten states and D.C. and the review of the chart will be completed. Analysis of voter identification data will begin.

SUPPLEMENTS TO LEGAL ANALYSIS

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter ID in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of different voter ID regimes. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern, and a sharp political debate over rigorous identification requirements for all voters. The research follows these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.

Individual narratives for the states with significant activity in voter ID will provide a resource for understanding the wide range of experience in the 2004 election. The narratives will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud, a focus of the concern with increasing the rigor of voter ID requirements. The next key milestones will be the completion of the state database and drafting the first narratives.

VOTER ID AND TURNOUT ANALYSIS

The second supplemental analysis will provide objective information on a contentious feature of the debate over voter ID in the states: the effects of more rigorous voter ID regimes on voter turnout and the relationship between the voter ID regime and vote fraud. As part of this effort, Eagleton is undertaking a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state’s voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We are creating a database and gathering statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election.

Progress: The collection of data for the Voter ID-Turnout analysis is complete. The assembled database contains population demographic data, voter registration data and voter turnout data from all 50 states, 3113 Counties, and the District of Columbia. We have also utilized exit poll data collected on Election Day 2004 as a resource for understanding the demographics of voter turnout. The analysis of that data is underway.

Challenges: The main challenges to this task include gathering the complete set of changes to Voter ID laws over the past 5 years, and then incorporating those changes into a sound statistical methodology.

Projection: We will continue to work towards resolving the methodology issue, and ultimately produce a final report on this subject. The analysis of the impact that voter identification requirements have upon voter turnout should be completed around mid-September.
PROJECT MANAGEMENT

PEER REVIEW GROUP

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group (PRG). The Peer Review Group will review our research and methodology and provide valuable feedback and suggestions for the direction of our work.

Progress: The composition of the Peer Review Group has been determined and the membership has been submitted to the EAC. Additionally, as of the date of this report all PRG members have received their first mailing, which included several reports from our research, and a draft of our analysis and alternatives outline for their review.

Challenges: Our timeline for circulating and discussing our research with the PRG has been compromised due to delays in completing the recruitment of members of the group.

Projections: We are in the process of scheduling our first conference call with PRG members for the week of Sept. 19, 2005.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and an internal website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law is being merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding provisional voting and voter identification.

Progress: At this point in the research process, many documents are complete after a lengthy process of circulating drafts among team members. As we near the end of the Provisional Voting research and move into the Voter Identification research, we will re-evaluate the volume of files contained in the Information System and update the system.

Projections: The entire project team continues to review all project drafts, and will staff members combine and format all documents and materials in preparation for our final reporting to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: All project team members have signed on to the Intranet site. The Intranet facilitates the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.
Progress: Project team members regularly post drafts, completed materials and spreadsheets online for internal review. The intranet has been extremely helpful to team members and serves as an internal website with announcements and important documents readily available to all team members.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Our contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (732) 932-0165, EXT. 2235.

A detail of expenses incurred from project August 1 - August 31, 2005, will be sent under separate cover to: Ms. Dianna Scott, Administrative Officer, EAC.

Hi Adam,

It was great meeting you at the UDC Law Symposium last week. I wanted to let you know that we are having a meeting about the voter fraud and intimidation meeting at 10 AM on October 28 at the EAC, and it would be great if you and Commissioner Martinez could be there. Let me know, and let's stay in touch. Thanks so much.

Adam,

Just to make sure we're talking about the same thing, I'm actually not going to be at the "kick-off" on the 14th. This is a meeting just about our project on the 28th. The project is already underway and the contracts finalized.

Since the meeting I refer to on the 28th is from 10-12, is there any possibility of the three of us having lunch after that?

Tova:

I was about to email you as well. It was certainly good to meet you last week, as I've heard about your work through numerous sources, and am glad we have finally been able to chat. As with many things (we started to discuss), the EAC is doing a lot of these projects for the first time. And unlike a thinktank, or nonprofit, we are constrained in a number of ways, and there are "sensitivities" that exist. Of course, there are benefits to not being a nonprofit, as well.

I'll state that at least myself, but hopefully Cmsr. Martinez will be at the kickoff meeting. You may do this already, but I would attempt to lay out the ideal structure for your involvement in the contract, and perhaps communicate this to Karen and the other contractor immediately before the meeting. That will frame this contract structure (beyond the terms of the agreement) to your liking.

Obviously a suggestion. However, I think that the goal is good, efficient research that is unimpeachable in partisan or methodological grounds—that will then be submitted to the Commission for it approval (and actually getting its approval).

Feel free to call me anytime. If you're in DC before then, and have some time, let's get Cmsr Martinez, you and I together for lunch or coffee.

Best,
Adam

Karen:

I enjoyed the discussion too. I really think that this project will be of national importance and can positively affect elections administration while providing an answer to the handling of the vote fraud problem for the future.

On another note, why don't you leave an evening free while I am there for dinner. I am trying to bring my wife along. If you can bring your husband it could make for an interesting evening.

Summary of Election Activities of Job Serebrov

Background to Election Problems in Arkansas

Ever since Reconstruction, Arkansas has had a history of election problems. The election fraud that gave rise to the Brooks-Baxter War in Arkansas in the 1870s involved people from both sides of the aisle voting more than once, the dead rising to cast a ballot or two, destroying ballots, creating ballots and making ballot boxes disappear. A strong one-party system perpetuated this tradition into modern times.

In 1995, I met with Arkansas Supreme Court Justice Tom Glaze to discuss voting issues and my efforts to clean up the electoral process. Although supportive, Justice Glaze encouraged me to proceed with caution. Before being elected to the Supreme Court, Justice Glaze had been employed in the 1960s by Gov. Win Rockefeller to clean up ballot fraud throughout Arkansas. He was nearly disbarred in the process by those involved in ballot fraud in a small, rural county.

Shortly after my discussion with Justice Glaze, I discovered how pervasive the election problems were in the state. For instance, ballot boxes were stuffed or disappeared into the night only to return altered. Contrary to state law, county sheriffs running in contested elections maintained custody of the ballot boxes. In one instance, 20 voted ballot boxes were found in the attic of a sheriff’s deputy after he died.

In my private practice as an attorney, I represented numerous clients in county election contests throughout Arkansas. I also represented clients in matters before the Federal Election Commission. I have never lost an election case. Finally, I was hired as a consultant to a major nonprofit legal organization to review and summarize the 2002 amendments to federal election laws and apply the new law to 10 scenarios.

Member, Washington County Board of Election Commissioners, Fayetteville, Arkansas (1990-1996)

This board consisted of three commissioners; I was the lone Republican. We were charged with supervising the training of poll workers, evaluating voting systems and then purchasing an optical scan system to be used countywide, preparing and justifying our annual budget before the Washington County Quorum Court, hiring and supervising staff and sitting as an administrative tribunal.

When I first came on the board, Washington County was primarily a one-party county and the Democrats were used to running elections according to tradition rather than the law. I had to battle with the two Democrats on the board to enforce election laws within the county. As I started to force the issue in the courts, the Republican Party gained strength. Four years later and after outlasting eight Democrat commissioners, I was able to work with new Democrat commissioners who recognized the need to enforce the law. At this point, the commission requested that I draft administrative regulations for the board. These remain in place today.
Founder, President, General Counsel; Arkansans for Fair Elections (1994-1999)

In 1994, Gov. Mike Huckabee (R), then a candidate for lieutenant governor, asked me to serve as his general counsel for ballot fraud protection. Thinking it best to act independently of any candidate, I formed Arkansans for Fair Elections. I served as the organization’s president and, later, general counsel. This group launched a statewide educational campaign to train poll watchers to recognize irregular or fraudulent electoral procedures; this included the creation of literature and a video. Our extensive public relations campaign brought media attention to the issue. We also organized a statewide team of citizen poll watchers and attorneys to ensure that the election laws were fairly enforced. We were so successful in the lieutenant governor’s race that Arkansans for Fair Elections was asked to continue the effort until 1999 when I moved to Louisiana.

General Counsel – Ballot Fraud Protection Committee, Republican Party of Arkansas (1995-1999)

In late 1995, Asa Hutchinson, chairman of the Republican Party of Arkansas, appointed me as general counsel for the newly formed Ballot Fraud Protection Committee of the state party. I retained this position until 1999. I was responsible for coordinating statewide enforcement efforts and directing a legal team to respond to problematic situations prior to and on election day.

(Through my role with Arkansans for Fair Elections and the Ballot Fraud Protection Committee, I successfully sued or negotiated a settlement in more than two-thirds of the 75 counties in Arkansas over electoral irregularities.)

Legal Consultant to Republican Members of the Arkansas General Assembly (1994-1996)

Republicans in the General Assembly requested that I review and draft suggested changes to Arkansas election law. Based on my personal experience as an election commissioner and as an election attorney, I identified a number of areas of concern and drafted new statutes modeled on the best examples that I could find from other states. My proposal was not passed by the Democrat-controlled General Assembly as a package, however, several of its components were passed into law.

Consultant to the Arkansas Court of Appeals Redistricting Commission (1996-1999)

I drafted five redistricting bills and maps for the constitutionally required redistricting of the Arkansas Court of Appeals. These bills were based on current U.S. Supreme Court precedent regarding gerrymandering. I had to present each bill and give supporting testimony to the commission.

Director of International Development - Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, Louisiana (2000-2003)

Part of my duties as director was to develop international cooperative projects. The theme of several of these proposals was democratization. In each case, I required review of the national election code of the country involved.

My activities in Namibia led to a request by the director of the Namibian Election Commission, Joram Rukambe and the Speaker of the Namibian National Assembly, Dr. Mose Tjitendero to review and suggest changes to the Namibian election code. This review took three months and resulted in proposed alterations a number of code sections. These suggestions were considered by the Namibian National Assembly and a number were incorporated into the code revisions. Additionally, I drafted legislation for the Speaker to guarantee voting rights to agricultural workers that were being denied by the owners of the farms. This legislation also was passed into law.

During this time, I was qualified as an election expert and placed on an election consultant list by the United Nations, IFES and the Electoral Institute of Southern Africa.

Subject: October Progress Report

Karen,
Attached is the Progress Report for October. Please note that this report includes an attachment showing how our study classifies each state on key variables, such as counting out-of-precinct ballots, requirements for ballot evaluation, and other variables. It also displays how the data we used differs for some states for the vote counts reported by the Election Day Survey. We believe that our data is more accurate and complete (see for example the data for New Mexico and Pennsylvania).

I look forward to responding to any questions or concerns you or others at the EAC may have.

INTRODUCTION

This report describes our progress from October 1 through October 31, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

In October we focused on finalizing our Provisional Voting analysis paper, including the development of recommendations to the EAC for a draft guidance document and best practices. These policy prescriptions are based on our research and the comments of the Peer Review Group. We completed a careful review of our data to reconcile it with other sources and identify the latest, most reliable information to use in the analysis. (See the attachment to this Progress Report for the details.) The importance of this demanding effort was described in September's Progress Report.

Also in October we revised the schedule for the project in light of the additional time that has been needed for review of earlier drafts by the EAC and the late completion of the Election Day Study. We will seek a meeting with the EAC in the next several weeks to confer about the schedule to complete the project and alternative approaches that could speed the conclusion of our work.

We will submit to the EAC a final draft of our report, a preliminary guidance document, and draft best practices before Thanksgiving. We project that EAC will take 3 to 4 weeks to review and react to that final draft. And we understand that after its review, the EAC will decide if it should move towards issuing a Guidance Document or recommending best practices. If the EAC does decide to issue a Guidance Document on Provisional Voting, the time needed for a review by the advisory boards is likely to delay a public hearing until early February.
This report is divided into 3 sections: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, and Project Management. Each section references specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract. The Financial Report will be sent separately by the Rutgers Division of Grant and Contract Accounting.

Please direct questions or comments about this report to

PROVISIONAL VOTING

Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to Provisional Voting. Work on the first of these must be complete before proceeding to later tasks. Task 3.4 was completed in August, Tasks 3.5 and 3.6 are nearing completion.

Task 3.5: Analysis and Alternative Approaches. Assess the potential, problems, and challenges of Provisional Voting and develop alternative means to achieve the goals of Provisional Voting.

LEGISLATION, REGULATIONS, AND LITIGATION

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. This information constitutes the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task. It has provided a base of understanding for the analysis of states' actual experience with Provisional Voting in 2004, for which the Eagleton team has lead responsibility.

Description: The Moritz team has created a 50-state chart to summarize information on Provisional Voting, compiled statutes, case law and administrative procedures regarding Provisional Voting and has completed this research.

Progress: We have completed the memorandum outlining Provisional Voting legislative changes since the 2004 election and we are continuing to clarify the laws prior to these changes.

Challenges: The variety in the form and frequency of Provisional Voting legislation from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: The final analysis will be sent to the EAC by Thanksgiving.
PREPARATION FOR AND EXPERIENCE WITH PROVISIONAL VOTING

The Eagleton team has researched and compiled a narrative of each state’s experience with Provisional Voting in 2004. The report findings from the survey of 400 local election officials are now complete. The survey results have proven to be instrumental in shaping our understanding of actual practice in administering Provisional Voting, including the steps local officials took to prepare for the election.

PROVISIONAL VOTING NARRATIVES

Description: To construct the narratives, a researcher examined newspaper accounts, state websites, and reports from third-party organizations to gather information on the experience with Provisional Voting in the 2004 election. To organize the information derived from this examination, we created an information system that catalogues information about the states (i.e. whether a state was new to Provisional Voting, the percentage of provisional votes counted, the method of notifying voters if their vote was counted, etc.) and combined it with Moritz’s collection and analysis of statutes, regulations and litigation.

Progress: We completed a state-by-state narrative of developments in Provisional Voting and distributed it to the EAC and the PRG. This work has been helpful in understanding the context of the data collected on provisional voting from the states.

Challenges: The primary obstacle to constructing the narratives was difficulty in communicating and obtaining necessary information from various state officials. As a result, the narratives underwent several revisions to incorporate up-to-date and reliable information. Now that so many other analyses, including the Election Day Survey, have been released, we were challenged by different interpretations of the same basic facts. But the reconciliation of interpretation and data collection has been invaluable in establishing rigor in our report.

Work Plan: We completed revisions of the narratives incorporating comments from the PRG and addressing any discrepancies between our findings and other interpretations of similar information included in other studies.

PROVISIONAL VOTING STATISTICAL ANALYSIS

Description: During October the Eagleton research team continued to check its statistical analysis, and worked to reconcile the classifications of this analysis (such as states counting only those provisional ballots cast within the proper precinct versus states that counted ballots cast within the proper county) with the classification made in other parts of this study or in other studies (such as the Election Day Study or Electionline reports).

Progress: The effort to double check all of the classifications used in the study is complete. The results of this effort are displayed in the attachment to this progress report, “Characteristics of the Provisional Voting Process -- Classification of the States,” beginning on page 9. Only Delaware and Arkansas remain unclear in regard to one of the measures, and both states have been contacted to receive clarification in this area.

Challenges: The difficulties encountered have been a result of communication delays and time constraints. Some states have been more responsive to our inquiries about their practices than others. Overall, this is not an irresolvable problem but it does slow the process of completion down.

Work Plan: By early-November the final revision of the statistical analysis, which includes full reconciliation of all data within the study, will be complete. The reconciliation of data is displayed in the attachment to this progress report.

Survey of County Election Officials

Description: The Eagleton Center for Public Interest Polling (CPIP) conducted a national survey of county election officials to measure several aspects of Provisional Voting.

Progress: The analysis of the survey results and findings report is complete. As a result of the critique by the PRG, the research team is revising and clarifying the descriptions of the survey design and sample selection process to make the research methods more transparent.

Work Plan: We used the information from the survey in drafting the analysis and alternatives document required under Task 3.5. We will include necessary clarifications regarding survey design and sample selection in the final analysis and alternatives document.

Task 3.6: Prepare preliminary draft guidance document.

The report and recommendations now nearing completion constitutes the draft preliminary guidance document. Based on our conversation with the EAC, the draft gives the EAC the option of proceeding with a guidance document or issuing recommendations to the state for best practices, recommendations that would not constitute voluntary guidance. Before proceeding to Task 3.7 (revise the guidance document for publication) or 3.8 (arrange a public hearing on the draft guidance), we will await the EAC’s decision on how to proceed.
VOTER IDENTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. The research on Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of Provisional Voting, and is becoming the principal focus of our research.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation with regard to Voter Identification Requirements. This collection of material is nearing completion. It will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: The Moritz team has compiled statutes on Voter Identification, and will provide a summarized analysis of this research to the project team for review.

Progress: The 50 State (plus the District of Columbia) chart has been completed, the voter identification statutes have been collected for all states and D.C., and summaries of the existing voter identification statutes have been written for all states and D.C.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging because of the different terminology used from state to state to codify voter identification issues, and because many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variety from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: Analysis of voter identification data has begun and will increasingly become the central focus of our work.

SUPPLEMENTS TO LEGAL ANALYSIS

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter ID in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of different voter ID regimes. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern and a sharp political debate over rigorous identification requirements for all voters. The research follows these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.
VOTER ID AND TURNOUT ANALYSIS

The second supplemental analysis will provide objective information on a contentious feature of the debate over voter ID in the states: the effects of more rigorous voter ID regimes on voter turnout and the relationship between the voter ID regime and vote fraud. As part of this effort, Eagleton is undertaking a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state’s voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We have created a database and gathered statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election.

Progress: The collection of data for the Voter ID-Turnout analysis is complete. The assembled database contains population demographic data, voter registration data and voter turnout data from all 50 states, 3113 Counties, and the District of Columbia. We have also used exit poll data collected on Election Day 2004 as a resource for understanding the demographics of voter turnout.

Challenges: The analysis of these data had been postponed until the data reconciliation of Provisional Voting is complete. As a result of the extensive revision and data reconciliation efforts aimed at the Provisional Voting section of our work VID had been temporarily placed on hold. We are now beginning data analysis on the impact of voter identification requirements on voter turnout.

Work Plan: The analysis of the impact that voter identification requirements have upon voter turnout should be completed by early December. Early January is our target to deliver the draft report and outline of alternative policies to the Peer Review Group. In mid January, the EAC would receive a draft report and recommendations that take into account the comments of the PRG.

PROJECT MANAGEMENT

PEER REVIEW GROUP

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group (PRG). It reviews our research and methodology and provides valuable feedback and suggestions for the direction of our work.

Progress: Eagleton has stayed in touch with members of the Peer Review Group since the September 21st conference call, and has solicited their final comments on the Provisional Voting research. During October, we telephoned two members who did not participate in the conference call to confirm their commitment to serving as members of the Peer Review Group. Profess Guy Charles affirmed his interest. Professor Pamela Karlan did not return the call. The revisions in the schedule for the project have now made it possible to begin the process of scheduling a meeting of the PRG to consider our draft report and recommendations on Voter Identification Issues. We anticipate that meeting will take place the second week of January.
Challenges: No new challenges were encountered during October.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and an internal website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law is being merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding Provisional Voting and voter identification.

Progress: At this point in the research process, many documents are complete after a lengthy process of circulating drafts among team members. We have reorganized our system by separating final drafts from earlier versions of documents, discarding dated files contained in the Information System, and updating the system as a whole. Upon their completion, new documents continue to be added.

Projections: The entire project team continues to use the Information System which contains the above referenced research, in working toward the preparation for our final reports to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: All project team members have signed on to the Intranet site, and regularly post drafts, completed materials and spreadsheets online for internal review. The Intranet facilitates the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Our contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (732) 932-0165, EXT. 2235.

A detail of expenses incurred from project October 1- October 31, 2005, will be sent under separate cover to: Ms. Dianna Scott, Administrative Officer at the EAC.
Characteristics of the Provisional Voting Process

Classification of the States

Our research on provisional voting divided the various states into several categories to allow an assessment of how different factors may have influenced the process of casting and counting provisional ballots. This analysis was conducted before the release of the Election Day Study, and the categories we used may differ in some respects from its work. The categories analyzed here are:

1. New vs. Old (states that used a provisional ballot before the 2004 election)
2. Use of a statewide database of registered voters vs. no use of a statewide database
3. Counting out-of-precinct ballots vs. not counting out-of-precinct ballots
4. Voter identification requirements
5. Method used to verify provisional ballots
6. Levels of provisional ballots cast and counted

We first assigned states within these categories based on classifications done by Electionline.org in its studies. The Electionline data was the only published information available at the time of our research. We reviewed the Electionline data carefully, and, in select cases, updated it with new, detailed information that had become available after its publication. The changes we made are explained below.

Please note that:

--Idaho, Maine, Minnesota, New Hampshire, Wisconsin and Wyoming were excluded from our analysis. They have election-day registration systems, and did not need to use HAVA-compliant provisional ballots.

--North Dakota does not register voters, so it also was excluded from HAVA requirements and did not use provisional voting.

--Mississippi has not reported its provisional voting results and could not be included in our analysis, though it was compliant in 2004.

--Pennsylvania did not report its totals for the Election Day Study, but we obtained information on Pennsylvania and did include it in our analysis.
New vs. Old States

We classified states as “new” or “old” based on the 2001 Electionline study of provisional voting\(^1\) and condensing its classifications into a single dichotomous variable, new/old with all other cases excluded. The Electionline study divided states into five categories of their use of provisional ballots in the 2000 election:

1. Use of provisional ballots (P)
2. Limited use of provisional ballots (LP)
3. Affidavit ballots (A)
4. No system in place (N)
5. Unnecessary/Not Applicable (U/NA)

We collapsed all of the states listed as using provisional ballots, limited use of provisional ballots or affidavit ballots as “old” states, because the states in all three categories would have been familiar with key aspects of provisional voting. States that had no provisional voting system in place for the 2002 election, and were HAVA compliant in 2004, were listed as “new” states, as 2004 would have been the first year in which they would be offering the option of provisional voting. States that were listed as unnecessary or not applicable were excluded from this study, as they were exempt from the HAVA regulations in 2004 because they either allowed same-day registration or did not register voters.

Rhode Island is the only state categorized as an old state by Electionline that we moved into the list of new states. Electionline’s map shows Rhode Island as a state that used provisional voting in 2000, but in the state description, it is listed as having no system in place. We learned from the Rhode Island Board of Elections that the state had previously permitted potential voters to sign an affidavit if they did not appear on a precinct’s list of registered voters, but felt they were registered to vote. Based on the signed affidavit, the election official would then contact a county official to see if the voter was on a more complete registration list. If the voter’s name was on the complete list, that voter was permitted to cast a regular ballot. As this process did not grant the voter a provisional ballot, but served as a different type of administrative failsafe, we concluded that Rhode Island’s first use of provisional voting was in 2004 and, therefore, classified the state as “new” to the system of provisional balloting.

Statewide List of Registered Voters

The Electionline preview of the 2004 Election\(^2\) was the starting point for compiling a list of states that had a statewide database of registered voters. That study listed 34 States that did not have their statewide database systems complete, and 16 that did, including the District of Columbia. North Dakota does not register voters, so does not need to compile such a database. Electionline’s criterion for concluding that a state had a statewide list was that the state have participation from all jurisdictions in a statewide system. We added Oklahoma to the list of states with statewide databases.

because we found they had met the Electionline criteria by the 2004 election, albeit too late for inclusion in the Electionline survey.

Minnesota has a statewide database but was excluded from the analysis because it did not offer provisional ballots and was exempt from the HAVA requirements.

Out-of-Precinct Ballots

We based our classification of states that allow the counting of ballots cast outside the correct precinct on the data in the 2004 Electionline preview of the 2004 election. States that evaluated ballots cast in a precinct where the voter was not registered were categorized as "out-of-precinct." States that invalidated such ballots were categorized as "In-precinct only."

Voter Identification

We relied on Electionline studies, including the Voter Identification study[^3] and the 2004 Election Preview, to classify the states on their requirements for voter identification. Each state's categorization is taken directly from the Electionline studies except Hawaii.[^4] The five different, and increasingly rigorous, categories are: Give Name (8 states), Sign Name (14 states), Match Signature (8 states), Provide ID (15 states), and Photo ID (5 states).

[^4]: In 2004, ElectionLine listed Hawaii as requiring identification. Our review of statutes revealed that Hawaii could require photo ID. Since that is the most rigorous form of identification that may be required of voters, we classified Hawaii under this category.

South Dakota complicates the effort to assign each state to a category. It permits voters to sign an affidavit that would allow them to vote without presenting photo ID. While Hawaii did not normally require photo ID, its statutes gave challenged voters the opportunity to respond by producing a photo ID.

Verification Method

We identified four different ways states assessed provisional ballots to determine if they should be counted: signature match, match voter data, signed affidavits, and bringing back identification later. We gathered information about these verification techniques by checking state websites and consulting journalistic accounts. We consulted state legislation to provide further information where needed.

Data Collection
To assemble our data for analysis, we began by using the data on provisional votes cast and counted reported by Electionline. To increase the accuracy of this data, we surveyed each state’s election websites for updated data, and for reported numbers on the county level. We then sent emails to 49 (we excluded Alaska, see below) states and the District of Columbia, requesting updated data on the number of provisional votes cast and counted by county. We received information from 25 states by our cut-off date of August 25, 2005.

* North Carolina lacked clear standards to evaluate provisional ballots and is excluded from this analysis.

26 States 25 States

Data Differences with Election Day Study

The data used in this study differs from the data reported in the Election Day Study for 19 states. The Election Day Study was not completed until well after our statistical analysis of provisional voting was finished, on the schedule laid out in our work plan. Where there are differences, they are typically very small, usually fewer than 100 votes either cast or counted. Of the 9 states that have differences of more than 100 votes cast or counted, 7 have reported their numbers directly to us and can be considered updated data that EDS had not obtained. For one of those states, New Mexico, EDS had incomplete data, and for another, Pennsylvania, EDS had no data at all. The data that we have collected reflects updated numbers from the states that have changed following recounts and litigation that altered how ballots were evaluated.

INTRODUCTION

This report describes our progress from November 1 through November 30, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

In November we completed and submitted our Provisional Voting analysis paper, including recommendations to the EAC for best practices. These policy prescriptions are based on our research and the comments of the Peer Review Group on that research. We completed a careful review of our data to reconcile it with other sources and identify the latest, most reliable information to use in the analysis. The importance of this demanding effort was described in October’s Progress Report. We continue to await the EAC’s comments on that final draft.

Also in November we revised the schedule for the project in light of the additional time that has been needed for review of earlier drafts by the EAC and the late completion of the Election Day Study. We made a written request to the EAC for a no-cost extension of the contract through the end of February which we understand is likely to be approved before Christmas.

Since the submission of our Provisional Voting report to the EAC on November 28, 2005, our efforts have been entirely aimed at the completion of the voter identification research. We have been advised that EAC will take several weeks to review and react to our final draft on provisional voting. As we await a January meeting on that topic, we are moving ahead quickly on the statistical analysis of voter identification data and summarizing the legal research that was completed earlier.

This Monthly Progress Report is divided into 3 sections: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, and Project Management. Each section references specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract. The Financial Report will be sent separately by the Rutgers Division of Grant and Contract Accounting.

Please direct questions or comments about this report to [redacted] or by telephone at [redacted].

PROVISIONAL VOTING

Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to Provisional Voting. Task 3.4 was completed in August, and Tasks 3.5 and 3.6 were completed in November.

Task 3.6: Prepare preliminary draft guidance document.

The report and recommendations which were sent to the EAC on November 28, 2005 recommends against the adoption of a guidance document per se and advises that the EAC adopt its recommendations as best practices. That recommendation followed agreement by the EAC with that course of action. The submission of that report and recommendations, however, constitutes the document required under this task. Before proceeding to Task 3.7 (revise the guidance document for publication) or 3.8 (arrange a public hearing on the draft guidance), we await the EAC’s decision on how to proceed.
VOTER IDENTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. The research on Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of Provisional Voting, and is the principal focus of our research at this time.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation with regard to Voter Identification Requirements. This collection of material is nearing completion. It will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: The Moritz team has compiled statutes on Voter Identification, and will provide a summarized analysis of this research to the project team for review.

Progress: The 50 state (plus District of Columbia) chart has been completed, the voter identification statutes have been collected for all states and D.C., and summaries of the existing voter identification statutes have been written for all states and D.C. Moritz has completed its review of voter identification litigation. Moritz and Eagleton have worked together to review the research, clarify the categorization of that research on our charts, and reconcile the data developed in our two different research techniques categorizations.

Challenges: The biggest challenge facing the reconciliation process of research findings, descriptions and categorizations is that it is being done by two different teams (Moritz and Eagleton) who rely on different primary source materials. Despite the necessity this has created to reconcile conflicting data from time to time, the collaboration has also been very beneficial because it has made our research efforts more rigorous.

Work Plan: During December we will conclude our reconciliation and continue analysis of voter identification research, including an analysis of the most important issues and trends in voter identification litigation.

SUPPLEMENTS TO LEGAL ANALYSIS

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter ID in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of different voter ID regimes. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern and a sharp political debate over rigorous identification requirements for all voters. The research follows these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.
During the month of November, we developed narratives to establish how laws were passed, looking at when they were proposed and when they were eventually enacted. In the upcoming month, Eagleton will examine voter registration forms across the states to see what forms of identification are requested from mail-in registrants. The difficulty will be determining the 2004 status of the states.

VOTER ID AND TURNOUT ANALYSIS

Now under way is a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state’s voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We have created a database and gathered statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election. In November, we have analyzed both aggregate- and individual-level data to determine whether there is any relationship between voter turnout and the various forms of voter identification states require.

Progress: Analysis is under way for two data sets: County-level data that includes registration and turnout rates for 2000 and 2004, as well as Census measures and indicators of the type of voter identification requirements that were in existence at the time of the 2004 presidential election. The second data set consists of the voter supplement to the November 2004 Current Population Survey. This data set allows for testing of the same hypotheses at the individual level. Preliminary findings from the aggregate data set suggest that voter ID requirements have their greatest effect at the registration stage, as opposed to the turnout stage. This is a first cut at the data, however, and we will be adding a number of control variables to the analysis to see if the relationship holds.

Challenges: These analyses use hierarchical linear modeling. Because voter identification requirements vary by state, one must pay special attention to other, unseen state-level influences on the data. The models are difficult to run and interpret, so the analyses are time-consuming.

Work Plan: The statistical analyses will continue during the month of December, and a draft of the findings is anticipated by the end of the month.

PROJECT MANAGEMENT

PEER REVIEW GROUP

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group (PRG). It reviews our research and methodology and provides valuable feedback and suggestions for the direction of our work.
Progress: During the month of November, Eagleton contacted the PRG Members on two occasions. First, all members received the final draft provisional voting report that was submitted to the EAC. Further comments are welcome but not expected from the PRG. Second, we have asked PRG members to reserve two dates in mid-January for potential conference call sessions to review the voter identification report.

Challenges: No new challenges were encountered during November.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and an internal website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law is being merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding Provisional Voting and voter identification.

Progress: At this point in the research process, many documents are complete after a lengthy process of circulating drafts among team members. We have reorganized our system by separating final drafts from earlier versions of documents, discarding dated files contained in the Information System, and updating the system as a whole. Upon their completion, new documents continue to be added.

Projections: The entire project team continues to use the Information System which contains the above referenced research, in working toward the preparation for our final reports to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: All project team members have signed on to the Intranet site, and regularly post drafts, completed materials and spreadsheets online for internal review. The Intranet facilitates the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Our contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (732) 932-0165, EXT. 2235.
A detail of expenses incurred from project November 1- November 30, 2005, will be sent under separate cover to: Ms. Dianna Scott, Administrative Officer at the EAC.
U.S. ELECTION ASSISTANCE COMMISSION

Status Report on the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research Project

May 17, 2006
INTRODUCTION

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and

- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

In September 2005, the Commission hired two consultants with expertise in this subject matter, Job Serebrov and Tova Wang, to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;

- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;

- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;

- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and

- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

As of the date of this report, the consultants have drafted a definition of election fraud, reviewed relevant literature and reports, interviewed persons from government and private sectors with subject matter expertise, analyzed news reports of alleged election fraud, reviewed case law, and established a project working group.
DEFINITION OF ELECTION FRAUD

The consultants drafted a definition of election fraud that includes numerous aspects of voting fraud (including voter intimidation, which is considered a subset of voting fraud) and voter registration fraud, but excludes campaign finance violations and election administration mistakes. This draft will be discussed and probably refined by the project working group, which is scheduled to convene on May 18, 2006.

LITERATURE REVIEW

The consultants found many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. They found little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud appears to be the report written by Lori Minnite, entitled “Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud”. The most systematic look at voter intimidation appears to be the report by Laughlin McDonald, entitled “The New Poll Tax”. The consultants found that books written about this subject all seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Moreover, the consultants found that reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund’s frequently cited book, “Stealing Elections”.

Consultants found that researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.

- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate; but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
• There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.

• Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.

• Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.

• Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Recommendations

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research include a follow up study of allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles. They also suggest that the research should focus on filling the gap between the lack of reports based on methodical studies by social or political scientists and the numerous, but less scientific, reports published by advocacy groups.

INTERVIEWS

The consultants jointly selected experts from the public and private sector for interviews. The consultants’ analysis of their discussions with these members of the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities follows.

Common Themes

• There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.

• There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, “dead” voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud,
although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.

- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.

- Several people – including representatives from the Department of Justice (DOJ) - indicate that, for various reasons, DOJ is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. While DOJ’s Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance, the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting at the same time as it maintains an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process.

- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed.

- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.
With respect to DOJ’s Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted — it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one’s definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape — race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and his office has not pursued any such cases.

Craig Donsanto of DOJ’s Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases DOJ is investigating and the number of indictments his office is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, DOJ has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so that his agency can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.

- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment.
- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama’s “deceptive practices” bill.
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials — some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected as non partisan officials, they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas are a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states’ office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.
- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots “for cause” only if it were politically feasible.
• A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the proposal in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.

• A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

NEWS ARTICLES

Consultants conducted a Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006. A systematic, numerical analysis of the data collected during this review is currently being prepared. What follows is an overview of these articles provided by the consultants.

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

• Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.

• Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.

• Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.
Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms;
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with.

There was only one self-evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles, in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004—there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters’ registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;
• Poll watchers harassing voters;

• Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;

• Disproportionate police presence;

• Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate; and

• Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from "battleground" states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

"Dead Voters and Multiple Voting"

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials, and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found five such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.
As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia). There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of completed voter registration applications. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case, charges were filed against ten individuals. In another case, a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this Nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem was the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker’s possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples’ votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Recommendation

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research should include a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

CASE LAW RESEARCH

After reviewing over 40,000 cases from 2000 to the present, the majority of which came from appeals courts, the consultants found comparatively few applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, the consultants found that no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it appears to them that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

Recommendation

Because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, consultants suggest that subsequent EAC research include a review of state trial-level decisions.

PROJECT WORKING GROUP

Consultants and EAC worked together to select members for the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group that included election officials and representatives of advocacy groups and the legal community who have an interest and expertise in the subject matter. (See Attachment A for a list of members.) The working group is scheduled to convene at EAC offices on May 18, 2006 to consider the results of the preliminary research and to offer ideas for future EAC activities concerning this subject.

FINAL REPORT

After convening the project working group, the consultants will draft a final report summarizing the results of their research and the working group deliberations. This report will include recommendations for future EAC research related to this subject matter. The draft report will be reviewed by EAC and, after obtaining any clarifications or corrections deemed necessary, will be made available to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors for review and comment. Following this, a final report will be prepared.

Tom-

Had a very good review and discussion of the PRG at this morning's Commissioner meeting.

Also, the Commissioners have marked their calendars for a conference call with the Eagleton/Moritz team on July 12 at 9:30 AM.

Several concerns were raised about the composition of the PRG and, after some discussion, I indicated that Eagleton will provide the EAC with a revised participant list, and with a more detailed description of the PRG's mission, goals, objectives, workplan and timelines for accomplishing its work.

The Vice Chair is concerned that there is not sufficient conservative representation on the PRG. I would suggest the team do more research to identify well-recognized conservative academics to put on the Group.

Further, the Commissioners recommend a tiered process in which the PRG will prepare a "dispassionate" analysis of the issues and draw some tentative conclusions. This analysis and these conclusions will then be vetted with a defined/select group of local election officials, and then, with a defined/select group of advocacy organizations.

It was also suggested that a final round of focus group meetings be held with a cross-section of these election officials, advocates and academics for an overall interactive reaction to the analysis and recommendations.

Hope this helps clarify concerns; I look forward to sharing your revisions to the PRG with them.

Tom-

I will be back to you early next week with EAC's feedback on this.

Our initial reaction is that the group needs to include some local and/or state-level election officials, who have first-hand experience with these issues.

We will get you additional names and reactions by mid-week next week.

Thanks

Karen,

As you probably recall, one of the features of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group to look over our findings, conclusions and draft reports before we prepare final drafts for the EAC's review. The EAC asked that before recruiting members of the PRG we submit names for EAC's review. The aim, course, is to assemble a panel that is experienced, informed, and balanced.

Attached is a list of potential PRG members drawn from academia, the law, and non-profit organizations with interests in this area. Please look it over.

We may conclude that the PRG should also include two or three former government officials now in academia or related fields. We have a conference call with our partners at Moritz planned for tomorrow or Friday to decide a) if former officials should be included in the PRG and b) if so, who they should be. I'll keep you informed of our thinking as it develops.

Tom
Should any of you all need or want a sense of what Eagleton has done on provisional voting and voter identification in preparation for the Cal Tech meeting, attached is their June monthly report.

Subject Eagleton Institute June 2005 Progress Report

Ms. Dyson,

Attached please find the June 2005 Progress Report for the project entitled, "Contract to Provide Research Assistance to the EAC for the Development of Voluntary Guidance on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification Procedures." If you have any questions regarding any part of this document please direct them to Tom O’Neill at...

The financial reporting for this project is performed by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting at Rutgers University. A copy of this report was not made available to us in an electronic format. Hard copies of the Progress Report and Financial Report have been Fedex’ed to you this afternoon and should arrive to your attention tomorrow morning. Please let me know if you do not receive this package by tomorrow afternoon.

Thank you for your time, have a great evening.

Best,
Lauren Vincelli

INTRODUCTION

This report describes our progress from the start of the project on May 26 through June 30, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

The objective of the contract is to assist the EAC in the collection, analysis and interpretation of information regarding HAVA provisional voting and voter identification requirements on which to base policy recommendations as guidance for the states in the conduct of the 2006 elections. The work has begun well, thanks to the clarity of the EAC’s expectations and the strong collaboration by the scholars and staff at the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey, and the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University.

The document report is divided into 4 sections that cover: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, Project Management, and the Financial Report. Each section references the specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract.

Please direct any questions or comments about this report to Tom O’Neill at:
Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to provisional voting. Work on the first of these must be complete before proceeding to later tasks. The work plan provides for two months to complete Task 3.4. Work on this task is on schedule.

Task 3.4: Collect and analyze state legislation, administrative procedures, and court cases. Understand the disparities and similarities of how provisional voting was implemented around the country.

LEGISLATION, REGULATIONS, AND LITIGATION

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. When complete, this information will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task. It also will provide a base of understanding for the analysis of states’ actual experience with provisional voting in 2004, for which the Eagleton team has lead responsibility.

Description: The Moritz team includes faculty, an executive administrator, a reference librarian, and several research assistants. It began immediately to compile statutes, case law and administrative procedures regarding Provisional Voting. The team has created a 50 state chart to summarize information on provisional voting. Categories for which state statutes and administrative procedures are being reviewed include:

- When did the state create a system compliant with the HAVA provisional ballot requirements?
- Who may be eligible to cast a provisional ballot? and
- What is the process for discovering whether your provisional ballot was counted in the election?

Progress: Initial research for 27 states, including the collection of provisional voting statutes is complete. This phase of the work is on schedule for completion by August 1. By the beginning of the week of July 11, Moritz’s full time research assistant will move from voter identification research to gathering and organizing case law on provisional voting.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging; states use different terminology to codify provisional voting issues. Many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variation from state to state makes creating a snapshot view across states a challenge. The team is meeting this challenge, and the work is on schedule.
PREPARATION FOR AND EXPERIENCE WITH PROVISIONAL VOTING

The Eagleton team is constructing a narrative description for each state of the 50 states and the District of Columbia. It is also surveying a stratified random sample of county election officials to improve its understanding of actual practice in administering provisional voting.

Description: To construct the narratives, a researcher is examining newspaper accounts, state websites, and reports from third-party organizations to determine what information is publicly available about these issues during the 2004 election. To organize the information derived from this examination, we are creating an information system that will make it possible to catalog the basic information about the states (i.e. whether a state was new to provisional voting, the percentage of provisional votes counted, the method of notifying voters if their vote was counted, etc.) and combine it with Moritz’s collection and analysis of statutes, regulations and litigation. The information system will make it possible to provide answers to such topics of particular interest listed in the contract as: How did preparation for provisional voting vary between states that had some form of provisional voting and those that did not?” and “How did litigation affect implementation?”

Progress: The researcher in this area has identified sources of information for every state and the collection process is well underway. Verified database entries for 24 states are complete, as are two state narrative summaries. This phase of the research is on schedule for completion by the end of July.

Challenges: A key challenge is determining just what states actually did in practice to verify and count provisional ballots. A second challenge has been determining the variations in policy within individual states. We are still wrestling with resolving this challenge, but the work is on schedule.

Work Plan: By the end of July, the compilation of statutes, administrative regulations, and litigation will be complete and ready to be combined with the state-by-state narrative compiled by Eagleton. That will form the basis for the analysis and recommendation of alternative approaches for provisional voting required under Task 3.5.

SURVEY OF COUNTY ELECTION OFFICIALS

This survey will help the research team understand more about such key topics of interest as:

- “How did the experience of provisional voting vary between states that previously had some form of provisional voting and those where provisional voting was new in 2004?”

- “Did state and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots?”

- “Did local officials have a clear understanding of how to implement provisional voting?”

The survey results will supplement the information on these topics from the compilation of statutes, regulations and cases and from the narrative we are constructing for each state.
Description: The Center for Public Interest Polling (CPIP) at Eagleton is conducting a national survey of county election officials to measure several aspects of provisional voting. The survey is designed to determine the following factors related to provisional voting at the county level:

- The content and quality of instructions provided to county officials by the states
- The steps taken by county officials to pass information on to poll workers;
- Differences in experience between states new to provisional voting and those that had some form of provisional ballot before HAVA; and
- Recommendations to improve and/or reduce the need for provisional voting

Progress: The survey instrument is complete. CPIP has compiled a list of election officials at the county level and at the municipal or regional level for states that do not assign the election responsibility to counties. It was forwarded to the call center, Schulman, Ronca & Bucuvalas Inc., (SRBI) the week of July 5, 2005. A sample will be drawn the week of July 12. Human Subjects Approval from Rutgers University was granted July 12. Pre-notification letters will be sent to election officials around July 12-13, 2005. The EAC has reviewed a draft of this letter, which we have now revised to make clear that the survey will increase our understanding of the provisional voting process, but is not being conducted on behalf of the EAC.

Challenges: We made special efforts to expedite Human Subject Approval to meet the schedule in the work plan. In the absence of an existing, reliable database of local election officials, we had to create one especially for this project. In order to provide a valid comparison between the states new to provisional voting with those that previously had some form of provisional ballot we doubled the sample size from 200 to 400. This increase will require an increase in the budget for the survey from $15,000 to about $24,000. We intend to reallocate costs within the existing budget to make this improvement possible, and will submit a letter describing the reallocation to the EAC in mid-July.

The sample has been, and will continue to represent the biggest challenge in this survey. Compiling the sample required substantial coordination and research to determine the accuracy of the identity and contact information for potential respondents. The difficulty in determining the appropriate contact is attributed to variation in county election officials’ titles, jurisdiction types, and state and county election structures across the country. In addition to the potential pitfalls of reaching the appropriate county official, another factor in actually making contact with this special population will be dependent upon the hours that they keep, and may be hindered by the summer season.

Work Plan: This questionnaire will be pre-tested by July 15, and will field July 18 through August 5, 2005. This is somewhat later than projected in the revised work plan, but the information will arrive in time to be considered in drafting the analysis and alternatives document required under Task 3.5.
The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. During the reporting period, we have made substantial progress in the first two tasks, which constitute the information-gathering phase of the work on Voter ID. The research of Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of provisional voting.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. When complete, this information will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: A team of Election Law@Moritz faculty, executive administrator, a reference librarian, and several research assistants is compiling statutes on Voter Identification, and providing a summarized analysis of this research.

Progress: The Moritz team has created a 50-state chart to record data on voter identification. Categories for which state statutes and administrative regulations are being reviewed include: “Who is required to present ID”, “Types of ID required”, and “Consequences of having no ID”. We have completed the initial research for 45 states and have collected the voter identification statutes for those states. An Election Law@Moritz Fellow is conducting an academic literature review on voter identification. This literature review will help shape the analytical framework that will guide us when the compendium of statutes and administrative regulations is complete.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging because of the different terminology used from state to state to codify voter identification issues, and because many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variety from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Projections: At the current rate, a draft of the voter identification chart should be complete on schedule, by the end of July. Work on the literature review will continue into August, but will be available to inform the analysis of alternative approaches for voter identification called for by Task 3.12 of the contract.

Supplements to Legal Analysis

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of voter id requirements. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern with more rigorous identification requirements for all voters. We are following these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.

Individual narratives for the states with significant activity in voter ID will provide a resource for understanding the wide range of experience in the 2004 election. The narratives will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud, a focus of the concern with increasing the rigor of voter ID requirements. This work is on schedule to be completed by the end of July. The next key milestones will be the completion of the state database and drafting the first narratives.

Voter ID and Turnout Analysis

The second supplemental analysis will provide objective information on a contentious feature of the debate over voter ID in the states: the effects of more rigorous voter ID regimes on voter turnout and the relationship between the voter ID regime and vote fraud. As part of this effort, Eagleton is undertaking a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state’s voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We are creating a database and gathering statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election. Analysis on the county-level will enable us to estimate the influence of ID requirements on various age groups, races, ethnicities and gender groups. We are compiling data from both the 2000 and 2004 Presidential elections to measure the effect that changes in ID requirements may have had on voter turnout through two national election cycles.

Progress: The structure of the database is complete. It contains demographic information from the Census, and turnout data from various sources. The researcher assigned to this task is devising the syntax that will be required to run the statistics when the dataset is complete. The methodology for this part of the study is complete, and the actual data collection will soon be finished.

Projection: We are waiting for the Census Bureau to release the 2004 County Demographic Estimates. We have ordered and await the arrival of 2 datasets that contain voter turnout and voter registration numbers on the county-level for both the 2000 and 2004 elections. Once these two sources of information are received, the researcher will insert this information into the existing database, clean up the dataset, and begin to run the statistics. By that point, the researcher will have separated the states into various ID-requirement groupings that have been determined by the team, which will require coordination with several other parts of the study. This work is on schedule. By the end of July, the researcher should have county-level and state-level statistics on the impact of each ID system upon turnout, analyzed through various demographic features on the county-level.
Task 3.11 Public meeting on Voter Identification Requirements

Description: We are working closely with EAC staff, particularly the General Counsel, to plan a half day public meeting on Voter ID requirements. Presentations at the meeting will form an important part of the information we are compiling about Voter ID requirements and the strengths and shortcomings of a range of alternative approaches.

Progress: We have recommended a focus on the debate over Voter ID now underway in the states. To provide a vivid picture of the debate, we have recommended that one panel include legislators on opposite sides of the issue from two different states. Our research identified Mississippi and Wisconsin as two states to focus on, and we have recommended specific legislators from each. We have discussed with staff adding a researcher to the panel to put the debate in Wisconsin and Mississippi in either a national or historic context. We also recommended two researchers from contrasting points of view, to address the effects of Voter ID provisions under HAVA and broader provisions that are now the subject of national debate. EAC staff recommended a panel of two state election directors to address the interaction of Voter ID with HAVA. We are awaiting a decision on our recommendations from EAC staff. We have no reason not to believe that the work is on schedule to be completed in time to organize a productive meeting on July 28.

Challenges: The date and location of this hearing has been changed twice since the beginning of the project. It was originally scheduled to take place in late June, but was rescheduled for July to allow the June hearing to focus on voting machine technology. The regular meeting was rescheduled for July 26 in Minneapolis, and was recently changed to July 28 in Pasadena. The changes in the scheduling of the July meeting have complicated our choice of panelists. More seriously, the changes mean that information from the hearing will not be available as early in the research process as contemplated in the contract. This timeframe will now require the team to summarize the hearing events at the same time that we are drafting the analysis and alternatives paper in early August.

Additionally, while our contract states that the “Contractor shall be responsible for all aspects of planning and conducting this hearing in consultation with the EAC,” we have been asked only to make recommendations of topics and panelists, and the arrangements for the organization of the hearing are in other hands. This lack of clarity has caused some confusion and has delayed invitations to panelists. Thanks to frequent communication with members of the EAC, the process now seems to be working smoothly.

Projection: We believe the work is on schedule for completion in time to recruit the panelists for the July 28 hearing. Preparation of the hearing summary will likely be delayed because of the need to complete the analysis and alternatives paper.
Immediately after announcement of the award of the contract, Eagleton and Moritz began supplementing the core group that had prepared to proposal to building a highly qualified team to undertake the work. That team was in place by mid June, just a few weeks after the contract award.

As described in the proposal, the direction of the project is the responsibility of a five-person committee of faculty and staff from Eagleton and Moritz, chaired by Dr. Ruth Mandel, Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics. Project Director Thomas O’Neill, a consultant to Eagleton, reports to this team and provides day-to-day guidance and coordination for the research. A weekly meeting of all the researchers engaged in the project if the primary means of coordinating the work. We have recently added an internal website to facilitate the review and revision of written materials.

Task 3.1 Update the Work Plan

The first task was completed on time with the submission of a detailed work plan and timeline. EAC staff requested that the work plan be supplemented with a Gantt chart created on MS Project, and we submitted that a few days later.

Peer Review Group

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group (PRG). The EAC indicated at our first meeting in May that it would review our recommendations for members of the PRG. Our initial vision of the PRG was a small group of scholars and representatives of advocacy organizations that would comment on the research design, review drafts of our analyses and reports, and, in general, identify areas of the research that should be strengthened and help us improve the breadth, depth and clarity of reports based on that research.

Progress: Upon reflection, the project team agreed that the PRG should not include representatives of advocacy groups. We concluded, as representatives they would feel obligated to act as advocates for positions already taken by their groups. While advocacy organizations should be consulted as stakeholders during the course of our work, they were unlikely to achieve the goals we had in mind for the PRG as a source of advice on research design, methodology, and analysis. We submitted a revised list of potential members, substantially comprised of academics, to EAC for review.

The EAC responded with suggestions concerning both the balance of the PRG’s membership and the creation of additional committees to review our work. We answered with an analysis of the cost and time involved adopting the EAC’s suggestions as well as with suggestions for a balanced selection of academics for the Peer Review Group. We have not received response on this correspondence from the EAC, and the recruitment of the group is on hold.
Challenges: Communications on this issue with the EAC have not been clear or timely. The PRG should be in place now to comment on our research design while there is still time to refine it. While we are confident in the quality of our work, the wisdom and perspective of the outstanding candidates we have proposed for membership would strengthen the analysis and reports of our work.

Projections: We have effectively brought these challenges to the attention of EAC staff and look forward to a resolution speedy enough to allow recruitment of the PRG’s members before the end of the month. If we meet that goal, the work of the PRG will be about 2 weeks behind the milestones indicated in the work plan.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and a website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law will be merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding provisional voting and voter identification.

Progress: The Moritz team has provided Eagleton staff with samples of the work that they are performing. An Eagleton staff member will be reviewing the content and formats of data from all supporting research and (re-)formatting once the work has been completed. The researchers and staff at Eagleton have created a shared folder on the Institute’s server for the safe storage of work and access for those staff members. All of this work is being reviewed by the project team to ensure that a broad survey is being performed.

Challenges: There are no evident challenges to this task at this time.

Projections: By the end of July 2005, much of the above referenced research will have been completed with respective materials and charts near completion. At that time, staff at Eagleton will review, combine and format all documents and materials in preparation for our final reporting to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: A trial Intranet for the project became available during the week of June 26. The Intranet will facilitate the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.

Progress: After meetings with staff members of Rutgers University Computer Services (RUCS) and subsequent submission of a proposal by RUCS for technical support and hosting of the Intranet and the evaluation of alternative commercial services, the project team decided at its June 26th meeting to publish the Intranet through www.intranets.com.
one of the leading commercial services. This decision was based on lower costs and earlier publication schedules than offered under the RUCS proposal. The Intranet services were evaluated during a free trial period, which demonstrated the ease of design and navigation of the proposed service.

Challenges: There are no immediate challenges to completion of this task by the timeframe specified below.

Projections: Design, testing and publication of initial content of the Intranet service is continuing, with all participants expected to be provided access by July 8, 2005.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Given that the report reflects the first month of the project, several procedures for payment of subcontractors on the project were initiated. Expenses related to those members of the team are not reflected in this report because they have not yet been incurred.

Our contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (732) 932-0165, EXT. 2235.

A detail of expenses incurred from project inception through June 30, 2005, is attached.
Ms. Dyson,

Attached please find the July 2005 Progress Report for the project entitled, “Contract to Provide Research Assistance to the EAC for the Development of Voluntary Guidance on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification Procedures.” If you have any questions regarding any part of this document please contact Tom O’Neill at:

The financial reporting for this project is performed by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting at Rutgers University. A copy of this report was not made available to us in an electronic format. Hard copies of the Progress Report and Financial Report have been Fedex’ed to you this afternoon and should arrive to your attention tomorrow morning. Please let me know if you do not receive this package by tomorrow afternoon.

Thank you for your time, have a great evening.

Best,
Lauren Vincelli

MONTHLY PROGRESS REPORT
JULY 2005

For UNITED STATES ELECTION ASSISTANCE COMMISSION
1225 New York Avenue N.W., Suite - 1100
Washington, DC 20005

August 15, 2005

Prepared by:
Eagleton Institute of Politics
Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey
191 Ryders Lane
New Brunswick, NJ 08901-8557
This report describes our progress from July 1 through July 31, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

The effort this month continued to focus on research for the analysis and alternatives paper, including the compilation of Provisional Voting statutes, regulations, and litigation from the 50 states. We also prepared and delivered testimony at the EAC's regular monthly meeting in Pasadena on July 28.

The data collection, analysis, and compilation are all on schedule. Because of delays in agreeing on the composition of the Peer Review Group with EAC, however, the actual completion and submission of the analysis and alternatives paper to the EAC will most likely be delayed about a week beyond the target date in the work plan. We are scheduled to discuss the draft paper and guidance document prior to submission, with the EAC on September 6, and the final draft cannot be completed until several days after that date.

The document report is divided into 4 sections that cover: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, Project Management, and the Financial Report. Each section references the specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract.

Please direct any questions or comments about this report to Tom O'Neill at:
Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to provisional voting. Work on the first of these must be complete before proceeding to later tasks. Task 3.4 was completed this month.

Task 3.4: Collect and analyze state legislation, administrative procedures, and court cases. Understand the disparities and similarities of how provisional voting was implemented around the country.

LEGISLATION, REGULATIONS, AND LITIGATION

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. This information constitutes the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task. It also will provide a base of understanding for the analysis of states' actual experience with provisional voting in 2004, for which the Eagleton team has lead responsibility.

Description: The Moritz team has created a 50-state chart to summarize information on provisional voting, compiled statutes, case law and administrative procedures regarding Provisional Voting.

Progress: The 50-state (plus District of Columbia) chart created to collect data on provisional voting is complete. We have collected the statutes for all states. State by state summaries of provisional voting have been written for 47 states and D.C. A memorandum summarizing provisional voting litigation is complete. The collection of the documents associated with the litigation is nearing completion.

Challenges: The variety in the form of provisional voting legislation from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: The remaining 3 state summaries of provisional voting will be completed by August 8. Analysis of all the information, data, and survey results concerning provisional voting data will be performed in August.

PREPARATION FOR AND EXPERIENCE WITH PROVISIONAL VOTING

The Eagleton team has researched and compiled a narrative of each state’s experience with provisional voting in 2004. At the end of July the survey of 400 local election officials was nearing its end, and – as of this writing – is now complete with an analysis and report in draft form. We will rely on the survey results to improve our understanding of actual practice in administering provisional voting, including the steps local officials took to prepare for the election.
PROVISIONAL VOTING NARRATIVES

Description: To construct the narratives, a researcher examined newspaper accounts, state websites, and reports from third-party organizations to gather information on the experience with provisional voting in the 2004 election. To organize the information derived from this examination, we created an information system that catalogues information about the states (i.e. whether a state was new to provisional voting, the percentage of provisional votes counted, the method of notifying voters if their vote was counted, etc.) and combined it with Moritz’s collection and analysis of statutes, regulations and litigation.

Progress: The state-by-state database is complete, as is a first draft of all state narratives. This work has been shared with the larger team and is being reviewed currently in preparation for constructing analysis and recommendation of alternative approaches for provisional voting required under Task 3.5.

Work Plan: In the next month, revisions of the narratives will be complete. In addition to this research, we will expand upon vote fraud research and examine further the relationship between instances of vote fraud and ensuing election reforms.

SURVEY OF COUNTY ELECTION OFFICIALS

Description: The Center for Public Interest Polling (CPIP) at Eagleton conducted a national survey of county election officials to measure several aspects of provisional voting. The survey was designed to determine the following factors related to provisional voting at the county (or equivalent election jurisdiction) level:

- The content and quality of instructions provided to county officials by the states;
- The steps taken by county officials to pass information on to poll workers;
- Differences in experience between states new to provisional voting and those that had some form of provisional ballot before HAVA; and
- Recommendations to improve and/or reduce the need for provisional voting.

Progress: The fielding and initial analysis of the survey results are complete.

Work Plan: The information derived from the survey will be considered in drafting the analysis and alternatives document required under Task 3.5.
The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. During the reporting period, we have completed tasks 3.10 and 3.11. The research on Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of provisional voting.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation with regard to Voter Identification Requirements. When complete, this information will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: The Moritz team has compiled statutes on Voter Identification, and will provide a summarized analysis of this research to the project team for review.

Progress: The chart created to collect data on voter identification is complete and is now being reviewed. Voter identification statutes are being collected.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging because of the different terminology used from state to state to codify voter identification issues, and because many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variety from state to state makes creating a snapshot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: Review of the voter identification chart, the collection of the voter identification statutes, and the writing of the state by state summaries will be completed by the end of August.

SUPPLEMENTS TO LEGAL ANALYSIS

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter ID in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of voter ID requirements. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern with more rigorous identification requirements for all voters. We are following these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.

Individual narratives for the states with significant activity in voter ID will provide a resource for understanding the wide range of experience in the 2004 election. The narratives will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud, a focus of the concern with increasing the rigor of voter ID requirements. The next key milestones will be the completion of the state database and drafting the first narratives.

VOTER ID AND TURNOUT ANALYSIS

The second supplemental analysis will provide objective information on a contentious feature of the debate over voter ID in the states: the effects of more rigorous voter ID regimes on voter turnout and the relationship between the voter ID regime and vote fraud. As part of this effort, Eagleton is undertaking a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state’s voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We are creating a database and gathering statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election.

Progress: The collection of data for the Voter ID-Turnout analysis is complete. The assembled database contains population demographic data, voter registration data and voter turnout data from all 50 states, 3113 Counties, and the District of Columbia. It also contains exit poll data from the 50 states, providing demographic data of voter turnout. The analysis of that data is well underway.

Challenges: The initial methodology that was devised to investigate the questions involved in this part of the study proved insufficient, as the necessary data was unobtainable (the Census Bureau has not yet released their 2004 data). After re-developing an appropriate methodology, the necessary data has been assembled, we have resumed the analysis of this data.

Projection: The analysis of the impact that voter identification requirements have upon voter turnout should be completed around mid-August.

Task 3.11 Public meeting on Voter Identification Requirements

Description: In early July, we continued our efforts to identify specific Voter ID topics or issues and panelists who could shed light on them. We recommended a focus on the debate over Voter ID now underway in the states. To provide a vivid picture of the debate, we recommended that one panel include specific legislators on opposite sides of the issue from two different states, Mississippi and Wisconsin. We also discussed adding a researcher to the panel in order to place the debate in a national or historical context. We also recommended a panel of two academic researchers with contrasting points of view, to address the effects of Voter ID provisions under HAVA. In response to our suggestions, EAC staff recommended a panel of two state election directors to address the interaction of Voter ID with HAVA.

By mid-July, the EAC had decided which topics and speakers should be invited, however most of those speakers proved unable to attend.
Progress: Tom O’Neill and Dan Tokaji attended the EAC Public Meeting held in Pasadena on July 28. Their presentations at the meeting described the progress of the research and our developing perspective on how to assess the quality of the provisional voting process in the states and identify possible steps for improvement.

Challenges: The changes in the scheduling of the July meeting delayed and ultimately made it impossible to assemble a panel, from which we could derive substantive insight into voter identification issues as they are playing out in the states. Additionally, due to the date of the hearing, the information from the hearing was not available as early in the research process as contemplated in the contract.

Projection: Preparation of the hearing summary will likely be delayed, due to the team’s focus on preparation of the analysis and alternatives paper.

PROJECT MANAGEMENT

PEER REVIEW GROUP

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group (PRG). The EAC indicated at our first meeting in May that it would review our recommendations for members of the PRG. Our initial vision of the PRG was a small group of scholars and representatives of advocacy organizations that would comment on the research design, review drafts of our analyses and reports, and, in general, identify areas of the research that should be strengthened and help us improve the breadth, depth and clarity of reports based on that research.

Progress: Upon reflection, the project team agreed that the PRG should not include representatives of advocacy groups. We concluded that as representatives they would feel obligated to act as advocates for positions already taken by their groups. While advocacy organizations might be consulted as stakeholders during the course of our work, they were unlikely to achieve the goals we had in mind for the PRG as a source of advice on research design, methodology, and analysis. We submitted a revised list of potential members, substantially comprised of academics, to the EAC for review.

The EAC responded with suggestions concerning both the balance of the PRG’s membership and the creation of additional committees to review our work. We provided an analysis of the cost and time involved in adopting the EAC’s suggestions as well as with suggestions for a balanced selection of academics for the Peer Review Group. In the end, the EAC determined that Eagleton should appoint a balanced Peer Review Group of its own choosing. Initial phone calls were made to all members of that group by the end of July, and written invitations and descriptions of the process have gone to all possible members who had indicated their interest in serving.

Challenges: Communications on this issue with the EAC were not clear or timely. The purpose of the PRG is to review our work, and to comment on our research design, which is well underway. We had planned to have the PRG in place early enough in the project to enable them to provide feedback, including the research design. While we are... confident in the quality of our work, the experience and perspective of the Peer Review Group will strengthen our analysis and recommendations as we find a way to receive its critique in the more limited time now available. The delay in creating the Peer Review Group will result in a delay in the completion of the final draft of the analysis and alternatives paper and in the preliminary guidance document.

Projections: The work of the PRG will be about 2 weeks behind the milestones indicated in the work plan.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and an internal website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law will be merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding provisional voting and voter identification.

Progress: The Moritz team has provided Eagleton staff with all completed work. An Eagleton staff member reviews the content and formats of data from all supporting research and will (re-)format once the work has been completed for the compendium and reports submitted to the EAC. The researchers and staff at Eagleton have created a shared folder on the Institute’s server for the safe storage of work and access for those staff members. All of this work is being reviewed by the project team to ensure that a broad survey is being performed.

Projections: By the end of July 2005, much of the above referenced research has been completed. The entire project team has begun the process of reviewing all work, and will combine and format all documents and materials in preparation for our final reporting to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: All project team members have signed on to the Intranet site. The Intranet facilitates the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.

Progress: Project team members regularly post drafts, completed materials and spreadsheets online for internal review. The intranet has been extremely helpful to team members and serves as an internal website with announcements and important documents readily available to all team members.
FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Our contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (732) 932-0165, EXT. 2235.

A detail of expenses incurred from project inception through June 30, 2005, is attached.
Tom -

Thank you for sharing this list of your Peer Review Group members, to-date. I will share this list with the Commissioners and will be certain to let your know of their feedback, if any.

I will also be back in touch regarding Eagleton's research around voter fraud and the research project EAC will be undertaking this fall, around voting fraud and voter intimidation. The EAC is presently in the process of finalizing a work and staff plan for this project and once it is completed, I will be certain to brief you on it.

In the meantime, EAC staff and several of the Commissioners looks forward to meeting with the Eagleton/Moritz team on September 6 at 1:30 PM.

Karen,

Attached is a report on the status of recruitment of members of the Peer Review Group. We extended 9 invitations. We have four confirmed members, one reluctant turn-down, one who has yet to respond to an initial inquiry, and are awaiting confirmation from 3 others who initially agreed. Please let me know if you need additional information.

INTRODUCTION

This report describes our progress from August 1 through August 31, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

Research on Provisional Voting and a draft of reports on the analysis and alternatives were substantially completed in preparation for the September 6 briefing for the EAC. Important reports such as the National Survey of Local Election Officials’ Experience with Provisional Voting; Statistical Review Provisional Voting in the 2004 Election; State-by-state Narrative of Developments in Provisional Voting; and the compilation of Provisional Voting statutes, regulations, and litigation from the 50 states, were all completed in August.

We made further progress on recruiting a balanced and authoritative Peer Review Group (which, as this report is written, is receiving all the documents listed above for review). Ingrid Reed of Eagleton will coordinate the work of the Peer Review Group. A list of the members of the Peer Review Group is attached.

This report is divided into 3 sections: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, and Project Management. Each section references specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract. The Financial Report will be sent separately by the Rutgers Division of Grant and Contract Accounting.

Please direct questions or comments about this report to Tom O'Neill at:
PROVISIONAL VOTING

Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to provisional voting. Work on the first of these must be complete before proceeding to later tasks. Task 3.4 was completed in August, and Task 3.5 is well underway.

Task 3.5: Analysis and Alternative Approaches. Assess the potential, problems, and challenges of provisional voting and develop alternative means to achieve the goals of provisional voting.

LEGISLATION, REGULATIONS, AND LITIGATION

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. This information constitutes the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task. It has provided a base of understanding for the analysis of states' actual experience with provisional voting in 2004, for which the Eagleton team has lead responsibility.

Description: The Moritz team has created a 50-state chart to summarize information on provisional voting, compiled statutes, case law and administrative procedures regarding Provisional Voting and is near completion with this research.

Progress: We completed the state by state summaries of provisional voting in August. Also complete is a memorandum outlining provisional voting legislative changes since the 2004 election. This material was sent to the EAC as part of the package for briefing on September 6.

Challenges: The variety in the form and frequency of provisional voting legislation from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: The analysis of all the information, data, and survey results concerning provisional voting data will be completed in September, on schedule. The alternatives document should also be complete in September, pending response from the EAC on which direction those alternatives should follow.

PREPARATION FOR AND EXPERIENCE WITH PROVISIONAL VOTING

The Eagleton team has researched and compiled a narrative of each state's experience with provisional voting in 2004. The report findings from the survey of 400 local election officials is now complete. The survey results improve our understanding of actual practice in administering provisional voting, including the steps local officials took to prepare for the election.
PROVISIONAL VOTING NARRATIVES

Description: To construct the narratives, a researcher examined newspaper accounts, state websites, and reports from third-party organizations to gather information on the experience with provisional voting in the 2004 election. To organize the information derived from this examination, we created an information system that catalogues information about the states (i.e. whether a state was new to provisional voting, the percentage of provisional votes counted, the method of notifying voters if their vote was counted, etc.) and combined it with Moritz's collection and analysis of statutes, regulations and litigation.

Progress: A state-by-state narrative of developments in Provisional Voting is complete and has been distributed to the EAC and the Peer Review Group. This work has been crucial to the process of constructing our draft analysis and recommendation of alternative approaches for provisional voting required under Task 3.5.

Challenges: The primary obstacle to constructing the narratives was difficulty in communicating and obtaining necessary information from various state officials. As a result, the narratives underwent multiple revisions in order to incorporate the most up-to-date material available. Had the Election Day Study been available, this task would probably have been simplified considerably.

Work Plan: We completed revisions of the narratives.

SURVEY OF COUNTY ELECTION OFFICIALS

Description: The Center for Public Interest Polling (CPIP) at Eagleton conducted a national survey of county election officials to measure several aspects of provisional voting.

Progress: The analysis of the survey results and findings report are complete.

Work Plan: We used the information from the survey in drafting the analysis and alternatives document required under Task 3.5.
The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. The research on Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of provisional voting, and is becoming the principal focus of our research.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation with regard to Voter Identification Requirements. This collection of material is nearing completion. It will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: The Moritz team has compiled statutes on Voter Identification, and will provide a summarized analysis of this research to the project team for review.

Progress: We are refining the 50 state (plus District of Columbia) chart of data on voter identification. So far collected are voter identification statutes for 35 states. Summaries of the existing voter identification statutes have been written for forty states.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging because of the different terminology used from state to state to codify voter identification issues, and because many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variety from state to state makes creating a snapshot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: The state by state voter identification statute summaries will be completed for the remaining ten states and D.C. and the review of the chart will be completed. Analysis of voter identification data will begin.

SUPPLEMENTS TO LEGAL ANALYSIS

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter ID in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of different voter ID regimes. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern, and a sharp political debate over rigorous identification requirements for all voters. The research follows these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.

Individual narratives for the states with significant activity in voter ID will provide a resource for understanding the wide range of experience in the 2004 election. The narratives will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud, a focus of the concern with increasing the rigor of voter ID requirements. The next key milestones will be the completion of the state database and drafting the first narratives.

VOTER ID AND TURNOUT ANALYSIS

The second supplemental analysis will provide objective information on a contentious feature of the debate over voter ID in the states: the effects of more rigorous voter ID regimes on voter turnout and the relationship between the voter ID regime and vote fraud. As part of this effort, Eagleton is undertaking a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state’s voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We are creating a database and gathering statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election.

Progress: The collection of data for the Voter ID-Turnout analysis is complete. The assembled database contains population demographic data, voter registration data and voter turnout data from all 50 states, 3113 Counties, and the District of Columbia. We have also utilized exit poll data collected on Election Day 2004 as a resource for understanding the demographics of voter turnout. The analysis of that data is underway.

Challenges: The main challenges to this task include gathering the complete set of changes to Voter ID laws over the past 5 years, and then incorporating those changes into a sound statistical methodology.

Projection: We will continue to work towards resolving the methodology issue, and ultimately produce a final report on this subject. The analysis of the impact that voter identification requirements have upon voter turnout should be completed around mid-September.
PROJECT MANAGEMENT

PEER REVIEW GROUP

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group (PRG). The Peer Review Group will review our research and methodology and provide valuable feedback and suggestions for the direction of our work.

Progress: The composition of the Peer Review Group has been determined and the membership has been submitted to the EAC. Additionally, as of the date of this report all PRG members have received their first mailing, which included several reports from our research, and a draft of our analysis and alternatives outline for their review.

Challenges: Our timeline for circulating and discussing our research with the PRG has been compromised due to delays in completing the recruitment of members of the group.

Projections: We are in the process of scheduling our first conference call with PRG members for the week of Sept. 19, 2005.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and an internal website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law is being merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding provisional voting and voter identification.

Progress: At this point in the research process, many documents are complete after a lengthy process of circulating drafts among team members. As we near the end of the Provisional Voting research and move into the Voter Identification research, we will re-evaluate the volume of files contained in the Information System and update the system.

Projections: The entire project team continues to review all project drafts, and will staff members combine and format all documents and materials in preparation for our final reporting to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: All project team members have signed on to the Intranet site. The Intranet facilitates the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.
Progress: Project team members regularly post drafts, completed materials and spreadsheets online for internal review. The intranet has been extremely helpful to team members and serves as an internal website with announcements and important documents readily available to all team members.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Our contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (732) 932-0165, EXT. 2235.

A detail of expenses incurred from project August 1 - August 31, 2005, will be sent under separate cover to: Ms. Dianna Scott, Administrative Officer, EAC.

Subject: October Progress Report

Karen,
Attached is the Progress Report for October. Please note that this report includes an attachment showing how our study classifies each state on key variables, such as counting out-of-precinct ballots, requirements for ballot evaluation, and other variables. It also displays how the data we used differs for some states for the vote counts reported by the Election Day Survey. We believe that our data is more accurate and complete (see for example the data for New Mexico and Pennsylvania).

I look forward to responding to any questions or concerns you or others at the EAC may have.

Tom O'Neill
INTRODUCTION

This report describes our progress from October 1 through October 31, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

In October we focused on finalizing our Provisional Voting analysis paper, including the development of recommendations to the EAC for a draft guidance document and best practices. These policy prescriptions are based on our research and the comments of the Peer Review Group. We completed a careful review of our data to reconcile it with other sources and identify the latest, most reliable information to use in the analysis. (See the attachment to this Progress Report for the details.) The importance of this demanding effort was described in September's Progress Report.

Also in October we revised the schedule for the project in light of the additional time that has been needed for review of earlier drafts by the EAC and the late completion of the Election Day Study. We will seek a meeting with the EAC in the next several weeks to confer about the schedule to complete the project and alternative approaches that could speed the conclusion of our work.

We will submit to the EAC a final draft of our report, a preliminary guidance document, and draft best practices before Thanksgiving. We project that EAC will take 3 to 4 weeks to review and react to that final draft. And we understand that after its review, the EAC will decide if it should move towards issuing a Guidance Document or recommending best practices. If the EAC does decide to issue a Guidance Document on Provisional Voting, the time needed for a review by the advisory boards is likely to delay a public hearing until early February.
This report is divided into 3 sections: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, and Project Management. Each section references specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract. The Financial Report will be sent separately by the Rutgers Division of Grant and Contract Accounting.

Please direct questions or comments about this report to [redacted] or by [redacted].

PROVISIONAL VOTING

Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to Provisional Voting. Work on the first of these must be complete before proceeding to later tasks. Task 3.4 was completed in August, Tasks 3.5 and 3.6 are nearing completion.

Task 3.5: Analysis and Alternative Approaches. Assess the potential, problems, and challenges of Provisional Voting and develop alternative means to achieve the goals of Provisional Voting.

LEGISLATION, REGULATIONS, AND LITIGATION

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. This information constitutes the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task. It has provided a base of understanding for the analysis of states’ actual experience with Provisional Voting in 2004, for which the Eagleton team has lead responsibility.

Description: The Moritz team has created a 50-state chart to summarize information on Provisional Voting, compiled statutes, case law and administrative procedures regarding Provisional Voting and has completed this research.

Progress: We have completed the memorandum outlining Provisional Voting legislative changes since the 2004 election and we are continuing to clarify the laws prior to these changes.

Challenges: The variety in the form and frequency of Provisional Voting legislation from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: The final analysis will be sent to the EAC by Thanksgiving.
PREPARATION FOR AND EXPERIENCE WITH PROVISIONAL VOTING

The Eagleton team has researched and compiled a narrative of each state’s experience with Provisional Voting in 2004. The report findings from the survey of 400 local election officials are now complete. The survey results have proven to be instrumental in shaping our understanding of actual practice in administering Provisional Voting, including the steps local officials took to prepare for the election.

PROVISIONAL VOTING NARRATIVES

Description: To construct the narratives, a researcher examined newspaper accounts, state websites, and reports from third-party organizations to gather information on the experience with Provisional Voting in the 2004 election. To organize the information derived from this examination, we created an information system that catalogues information about the states (i.e. whether a state was new to Provisional Voting, the percentage of provisional votes counted, the method of notifying voters if their vote was counted, etc.) and combined it with Moritz’s collection and analysis of statutes, regulations and litigation.

Progress: We completed a state-by-state narrative of developments in Provisional Voting and distributed it to the EAC and the PRG. This work has been helpful in understanding the context of the data collected on provisional voting from the states.

Challenges: The primary obstacle to constructing the narratives was difficulty in communicating and obtaining necessary information from various state officials. As a result, the narratives underwent several revisions to incorporate up-to-date and reliable information. Now that so many other analyses, including the Election Day Survey, have been released, we were challenged by different interpretations of the same basic facts. But the reconciliation of interpretation and data collection has been invaluable in establishing rigor in our report.

Work Plan: We completed revisions of the narratives incorporating comments from the PRG and addressing any discrepancies between our findings and other interpretations of similar information included in other studies.

PROVISIONAL VOTING STATISTICAL ANALYSIS

Description: During October the Eagleton research team continued to check its statistical analysis, and worked to reconcile the classifications of this analysis (such as states counting only those provisional ballots cast within the proper precinct versus states that counted ballots cast within the proper county) with the classification made in other parts of this study or in other studies (such as the Election Day Study or Electionline reports).

Progress: The effort to double check all of the classifications used in the study is complete. The results of this effort are displayed in the attachment to this progress report, “Characteristics of the Provisional Voting Process -- Classification of the States,” beginning on page 9. Only Delaware and Arkansas remain unclear in regard to one of the measures, and both states have been contacted to receive clarification in this area.

Challenges: The difficulties encountered have been a result of communication delays and time constraints. Some states have been more responsive to our inquiries about their practices than others. Overall, this is not an irresolvable problem but it does slow the process of completion down.

Work Plan: By early-November the final revision of the statistical analysis, which includes full reconciliation of all data within the study, will be complete. The reconciliation of data is displayed in the attachment to this progress report.

SURVEY OF COUNTY ELECTION OFFICIALS

Description: The Eagleton Center for Public Interest Polling (CPIP) conducted a national survey of county election officials to measure several aspects of Provisional Voting.

Progress: The analysis of the survey results and findings report is complete. As a result of the critique by the PRG, the research team is revising and clarifying the descriptions of the survey design and sample selection process to make the research methods more transparent.

Work Plan: We used the information from the survey in drafting the analysis and alternatives document required under Task 3.5. We will include necessary clarifications regarding survey design and sample selection in the final analysis and alternatives document.

Task 3.6: Prepare preliminary draft guidance document.

The report and recommendations now nearing completion constitutes the draft preliminary guidance document. Based on our conversation with the EAC, the draft gives the EAC the option of proceeding with a guidance document or issuing recommendations to the state for best practices, recommendations that would not constitute voluntary guidance. Before proceeding to Task 3.7 (revise the guidance document for publication) or 3.8 (arrange a public hearing on the draft guidance), we will await the EAC’s decision on how to proceed.
VOTER IDENTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. The research on Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of Provisional Voting, and is becoming the principal focus of our research.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation with regard to Voter Identification Requirements. This collection of material is nearing completion. It will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: The Moritz team has compiled statutes on Voter Identification, and will provide a summarized analysis of this research to the project team for review.

Progress: The 50 State (plus the District of Columbia) chart has been completed, the voter identification statutes have been collected for all states and D.C., and summaries of the existing voter identification statutes have been written for all states and D.C.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging because of the different terminology used from state to state to codify voter identification issues, and because many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variety from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: Analysis of voter identification data has begun and will increasingly become the central focus of our work.

SUPPLEMENTS TO LEGAL ANALYSIS

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter ID in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of different voter ID regimes. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern and a sharp political debate over rigorous identification requirements for all voters. The research follows these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.
VOTER ID AND TURNOUT ANALYSIS

The second supplemental analysis will provide objective information on a contentious feature of the debate over voter ID in the states: the effects of more rigorous voter ID regimes on voter turnout and the relationship between the voter ID regime and vote fraud. As part of this effort, Eagleton is undertaking a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state's voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We have created a database and gathered statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election.

Progress: The collection of data for the Voter ID-Turnout analysis is complete. The assembled database contains population demographic data, voter registration data and voter turnout data from all 50 states, 3113 Counties, and the District of Columbia. We have also used exit poll data collected on Election Day 2004 as a resource for understanding the demographics of voter turnout.

Challenges: The analysis of these data had been postponed until the data reconciliation of Provisional Voting is complete. As a result of the extensive revision and data reconciliation efforts aimed at the Provisional Voting section of our work VID had been temporarily placed on hold. We are now beginning data analysis on the impact of voter identification requirements on voter turnout.

Work Plan: The analysis of the impact that voter identification requirements have upon voter turnout should be completed by early December. Early January is our target to deliver the draft report and outline of alternative policies to the Peer Review Group. In mid January, the EAC would receive a draft report and recommendations that take into account the comments of the PRG.

PROJECT MANAGEMENT

PEER REVIEW GROUP

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group (PRG). It reviews our research and methodology and provides valuable feedback and suggestions for the direction of our work.

Progress: Eagleton has stayed in touch with members of the Peer Review Group since the September 21st conference call, and has solicited their final comments on the Provisional Voting research. During October, we telephoned two members who did not participate in the conference call to confirm their commitment to serving as members of the Peer Review Group. Profess Guy Charles affirmed his interest. Professor Pamela Karlan did not return the call. The revisions in the schedule for the project have now made it possible to begin the process of scheduling a meeting of the PRG to consider our draft report and recommendations on Voter Identification Issues. We anticipate that meeting will take place the second week of January.
Challenges: No new challenges were encountered during October.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and an internal website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law is being merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding Provisional Voting and voter identification.

Progress: At this point in the research process, many documents are complete after a lengthy process of circulating drafts among team members. We have reorganized our system by separating final drafts from earlier versions of documents, discarding dated files contained in the Information System, and updating the system as a whole. Upon their completion, new documents continue to be added.

Projections: The entire project team continues to use the Information System which contains the above referenced research, in working toward the preparation for our final reports to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: All project team members have signed on to the Intranet site, and regularly post drafts, completed materials and spreadsheets online for internal review. The Intranet facilitates the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Our contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (732) 932-0165, EXT. 2235.

A detail of expenses incurred from project October 1- October 31, 2005, will be sent under separate cover to: Ms. Dianna Scott, Administrative Officer at the EAC.
ATTACHMENT TO OCTOBER PROGRESS REPORT
Characteristics of the Provisional Voting Process
Classification of the States

Our research on provisional voting divided the various states into several categories to allow an assessment of how different factors may have influenced the process of casting and counting provisional ballots. This analysis was conducted before the release of the Election Day Study, and the categories we used may differ in some respects from its work. The categories analyzed here are:

1. New vs. Old (states that used a provisional ballot before the 2004 election)
2. Use of a statewide database of registered voters vs. no use of a statewide database
3. Counting out-of-precinct ballots vs. not counting out-of-precinct ballots
4. Voter identification requirements
5. Method used to verify provisional ballots
6. Levels of provisional ballots cast and counted

We first assigned states within these categories based on classifications done by Electionline.org in its studies. The Electionline data was the only published information available at the time of our research. We reviewed the Electionline data carefully, and, in select cases, updated it with new, detailed information that had become available after its publication. The changes we made are explained below.

Please note that:
--Idaho, Maine, Minnesota, New Hampshire, Wisconsin and Wyoming were excluded from our analysis. They have election-day registration systems, and did not need to use HAVA-compliant provisional ballots.

--North Dakota does not register voters, so it also was excluded from HAVA requirements and did not use provisional voting.

--Mississippi has not reported its provisional voting results and could not be included in our analysis, though it was compliant in 2004.

--Pennsylvania did not report its totals for the Election Day Study, but we obtained information on Pennsylvania and did include it in our analysis.
New vs. Old States

We classified states as “new” or “old” based on the 2001 Electionline study of provisional voting\(^1\) and condensing its classifications into a single dichotomous variable, new/old with all other cases excluded. The Electionline study divided states into five categories of their use of provisional ballots in the 2000 election:

1. Use of provisional ballots (P)
2. Limited use of provisional ballots (LP)
3. Affidavit ballots (A)
4. No system in place (N)
5. Unnecessary/Not Applicable (U/NA)

We collapsed all of the states listed as using provisional ballots, limited use of provisional ballots or affidavit ballots as “old” states, because the states in all three categories would have been familiar with key aspects of provisional voting. States that had no provisional voting system in place for the 2002 election, and were HAVA compliant in 2004, were listed as “new” states, as 2004 would have been the first year in which they would be offering the option of provisional voting. States that were listed as unnecessary or not applicable were excluded from this study, as they were exempt from the HAVA regulations in 2004 because they either allowed same-day registration or did not register voters.

Rhode Island is the only state categorized as an old state by Electionline that we moved into the list of new states. Electionline’s map shows Rhode Island as a state that used provisional voting in 2000, but in the state description, it is listed as having no system in place. We learned from the Rhode Island Board of Elections that the state had previously permitted potential voters to sign an affidavit if they did not appear on a precinct’s list of registered voters, but felt they were registered to vote. Based on the signed affidavit, the election official would then contact a county official to see if the voter was on a more complete registration list. If the voter’s name was on the complete list, that voter was permitted to cast a regular ballot. As this process did not grant the voter a provisional ballot, but served as a different type of administrative failsafe, we concluded that Rhode Island’s first use of provisional voting was in 2004 and, therefore, classified the state as “new” to the system of provisional balloting.

Statewide List of Registered Voters

The Electionline preview of the 2004 Election\(^2\) was the starting point for compiling a list of states that had a statewide database of registered voters. That study listed 34 States that did not have their statewide database systems complete, and 16 that did, including the District of Columbia. North Dakota does not register voters, so does not need to compile such a database. Electionline’s criterion for concluding that a state had a statewide list was that the state have participation from all jurisdictions in a statewide system. We added Oklahoma to the list of states with statewide databases.

because we found they had met the Electionline criteria by the 2004 election, albeit too late for inclusion in the Electionline survey.

Minnesota has a statewide database but was excluded from the analysis because it did not offer provisional ballots and was exempt from the HAVA requirements.

Out-of-Precinct Ballots

We based our classification of states that allow the counting of ballots cast outside the correct precinct on the data in the 2004 Electionline preview of the 2004 election\(^2\). States that evaluated ballots cast in a precinct where the voter was not registered were categorized as “out-of-precinct.” States that invalidated such ballots were categorized as “In-precinct only.”

Voter Identification

We relied on Electionline studies, including the Voter Identification study[^3] and the 2004 Election Preview, to classify the states on their requirements for voter identification. Each state's categorization is taken directly from the Electionline studies except Hawaii[^4]. The five different, and increasingly rigorous, categories are: Give Name (8 states), Sign Name (14 states), Match Signature (8 states), Provide ID (15 states), and Photo ID (5 states).

[^4]: In 2004, ElectionLine listed Hawaii as requiring identification. Our review of statutes revealed that Hawaii could require photo ID. Since that is the most rigorous form of identification that may be required of voters, we classified Hawaii under this category.

South Dakota complicates the effort to assign each state to a category. It permits voters to sign an affidavit that would allow them to vote without presenting photo ID. While Hawaii did not normally require photo ID, its statutes gave challenged voters the opportunity to respond by producing a photo ID.

Verification Method

We identified four different ways states assessed provisional ballots to determine if they should be counted: signature match, match voter data, signed affidavits, and bringing back identification later. We gathered information about these verification techniques by checking state websites and consulting journalistic accounts. We consulted state legislation to provide further information where needed.

Data Collection
To assemble our data for analysis, we began by using the data on provisional votes cast and counted reported by Electionline. To increase the accuracy of this data, we surveyed each state’s election websites for updated data, and for reported numbers on the county level. We then sent emails to 49 (we excluded Alaska, see below) states and the District of Columbia, requesting updated data on the number of provisional votes cast and counted by county. We received information from 25 states by our cut-off date of August 25, 2005.

* North Carolina lacked clear standards to evaluate provisional ballots and is excluded from this analysis.

26 States 25 States

<sup>5</sup> Alaska was not contacted via email, as the state does not have voting districts comparable to counties in other states and could not be matched with comparable census data.

<sup>6</sup> Maryland reported provisional ballots that were counted per county, but not number cast.

<sup>7</sup> Nebraska reported an incomplete list of provisional ballots cast and counted by county, but designated counties by number, rather than by name.
Data Differences with Election Day Study

The data used in this study differs from the data reported in the Election Day Study for 19 states. The Election Day Study was not completed until well after our statistical analysis of provisional voting was finished, on the schedule laid out in our work plan. Where there are differences, they are typically very small, usually fewer than 100 votes either cast or counted. Of the 9 states that have differences of more than 100 votes cast or counted, 7 have reported their numbers directly to us and can be considered updated data that EDS had not obtained. For one of those states, New Mexico, EDS had incomplete data, and for another, Pennsylvania, EDS had no data at all. The data that we have collected reflects updated numbers from the states that have changed following recounts and litigation that altered how ballots were evaluated.

Dear Commissioners:

The consultants' contracts for EAC's voting fraud and voter intimidation project require Tova Wang and Job Serebrov to work in consultation with EAC staff and the Commissioners "to identify a working group of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation". The contracts do not specify the number of working group members but, as EAC has to pay for the group's travel and we want the size of the group to be manageable, I recommend that we limit the number to 6 or 8. Please let me know if you think that this limit is too conservative.

Attached for your review and comment are two lists of potential working group members for this project. One list was submitted by Job, the other by Tova. Tova and Job have provided brief summaries of each candidate's relevant experience and have placed asterisks next to the names of the individuals whom they particularly recommend. I can provide more extensive biographies of these individuals, if you need them. If EAC agrees that the recommended working group members are acceptable, an equal number may be selected from each list in order to maintain a balanced perspective.

Absent from the attached lists is the name of a representative from the U.S. Department of Justice's Election Crimes Branch. At this time, I am working through the DOJ bureaucracy to determine to what degree Craig Donsanto will be permitted to participate. If he cannot be named as a working group member, we may still be able to use him as a resource.

Please provide your feedback to me no later than Monday, November 28. I am available to meet with you if you would like to discuss this matter further.

*Wendy R. Weiser, Associate Counsel in the Democracy Program at the Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law and an expert in federal and constitutional law, has done a great deal of research, writing, speaking, and litigating on voting rights and election law issues. As part of the Brennan Center’s wide ranging activities in the area of democracy, Ms. Weiser is currently overseeing an analysis and investigation of recent allegations of voter fraud throughout the country.

*Barbara Arnwine is Executive Director of the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, an organization that for four decades has been at the forefront of the legal struggle to secure racial justice and equal access to the electoral process for all voters. Notably, Ms. Arnwine and the organization have led the Election Protection program for the last several years, a nationwide grassroots education and legal effort deploying thousands of volunteers and using a nationally recognized voter hotline to protect voters’ rights on election day.

*Daniel Tokaji, professor and associate director of the Election Law Center at the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University, is one of the nation’s foremost experts in election law and reform and ensuring equality in the voting system. Professor Tokaji frequently writes and speaks on democracy related issues at academic and practitioner conferences, on such issues as voting technology, fraud, registration, and identification requirements, as well as the interplay between the election administration practices and voting rights laws.

Donna Brazile is Chair of the Democratic National Committee’s Voting Rights Institute, the Democratic Party’s major initiative to promote and protect the right to vote created in response to the irregularities of the 2000 election, and former Campaign Manager for Gore-Lieberman 2000 (the first African American to lead a major presidential campaign.) Brazile is a weekly contributor and political commentator on CNN’s Inside Politics and American Morning, a columnist for Roll Call Newspaper and a contributing writer for Ms. Magazine.

Wade Henderson is the Executive Director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights (LCCR) and Counsel to the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights Education Fund (LCRCREF), an organization at the forefront of defending voting rights for the last fifty years. Prior to his role with the Leadership Conference, Mr. Henderson was the Washington Bureau Director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)

Robert Bauer is the Chair of the Political Law Practice at the law firm of Perkins Coie, National Counsel for Voter Protection, Democratic National Committee, Counsel to the Democratic Senatorial and Congressional Campaign Committees and Co-Author, Report Deliberative Process Privilege of Counsel to the Senate Rules and Administration Committee in the Matter of the United States Senate Seat from Louisiana in the 105th Congress of the United States, (March 27, 1997). He is the author of United States Federal Election Law, and one of the foremost attorneys in the country in the area of federal/state campaign finance and election laws.

Laughlin McDonald has been the executive director of the Southern Regional Office of the ACLU since 1972 and as the Director of the ACLU Voting Rights Project, McDonald has played a leading role eradicating discriminatory election practices and protecting the gains in political participation won by racial minorities since passage of the 1965 federal Voting Rights Act. During the past two decades, McDonald has broken new ground by expanding ACLU voting rights cases to include representation of Native Americans in various western states, and written innumerable publications on voting rights issues.

Joseph E. Sandler is a member of the firm of Sandler, Reiff & Young, P.C., in Washington, D.C., concentrating in campaign finance and election law matters, and general counsel to the Democratic National Committee. As an attorney he has handled campaign finance and election law matters for Democratic national and state party organizations, Members of Congress, candidates and campaigns. He served as general co-counsel of the Association of State Democratic Chairs, as general counsel for the Democratic Governors' Association and as counsel to several state Democratic parties.

Cathy Cox is serving her second term as Georgia's Secretary of State, having first been elected in 1998. In 2002 she earned re-election with over 61 percent of the vote, winning 146 out of 159 counties. Because of Secretary Cox’s efforts Georgia has become a national leader in election reform. Her initiative made Georgia the first state in America to deploy a modern, uniform electronic voting system in every county.

INTRODUCTION

This report describes our progress from November 1 through November 30, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

In November we completed and submitted our Provisional Voting analysis paper, including recommendations to the EAC for best practices. These policy prescriptions are based on our research and the comments of the Peer Review Group on that research. We completed a careful review of our data to reconcile it with other sources and identify the latest, most reliable information to use in the analysis. The importance of this demanding effort was described in October's Progress Report. We continue to await the EAC's comments on that final draft.

Also in November we revised the schedule for the project in light of the additional time that has been needed for review of earlier drafts by the EAC and the late completion of the Election Day Study. We made a written request to the EAC for a no-cost extension of the contract through the end of February which we understand is likely to be approved before Christmas.

Since the submission of our Provisional Voting report to the EAC on November 28, 2005, our efforts have been entirely aimed at the completion of the voter identification research. We have been advised that EAC will take several weeks to review and react to our final draft on provisional voting. As we await a January meeting on that topic, we are moving ahead...
quickly on the statistical analysis of voter identification data and summarizing the legal research that was completed earlier.

This Monthly Progress Report is divided into 3 sections: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, and Project Management. Each section references specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract. The Financial Report will be sent separately by the Rutgers Division of Grant and Contract Accounting.

Please direct questions or comments about this report to by

PROVISIONAL VOTING

Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to Provisional Voting. Task 3.4 was completed in August, and Tasks 3.5 and 3.6 were completed in November.

Task 3.6: Prepare preliminary draft guidance document.

The report and recommendations which were sent to the EAC on November 28, 2005 recommends against the adoption of a guidance document per se and advises that the EAC adopt its recommendations as best practices. That recommendation followed agreement by the EAC with that course of action. The submission of that report and recommendations, however, constitutes the document required under this task. Before proceeding to Task 3.7 (revise the guidance document for publication) or 3.8 (arrange a public hearing on the draft guidance), we await the EAC's decision on how to proceed.
VOTER IDENTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. The research on Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of Provisional Voting, and is the principal focus of our research at this time.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation with regard to Voter Identification Requirements. This collection of material is nearing completion. It will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: The Moritz team has compiled statutes on Voter Identification, and will provide a summarized analysis of this research to the project team for review.

Progress: The 50 state (plus District of Columbia) chart has been completed, the voter identification statutes have been collected for all states and D.C., and summaries of the existing voter identification statutes have been written for all states and D.C. Moritz has completed its review of voter identification litigation. Moritz and Eagleton have worked together to review the research, clarify the categorization of that research on our charts, and reconcile the data developed in our two different research techniques categorizations.

Challenges: The biggest challenge facing the reconciliation process of research findings, descriptions and categorizations is that it is being done by two different teams (Moritz and Eagleton) who rely on different primary source materials. Despite the necessity this has created to reconcile conflicting data from time to time, the collaboration has also been very beneficial because it has made our research efforts more rigorous.

Work Plan: During December we will conclude our reconciliation and continue analysis of voter identification research, including an analysis of the most important issues and trends in voter identification litigation.

SUPPLEMENTS TO LEGAL ANALYSIS

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter ID in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of different voter ID regimes. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern and a sharp political debate over rigorous identification requirements for all voters. The research follows these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.
During the month of November, we developed narratives to establish how laws were passed, looking at when they were proposed and when they were eventually enacted. In the upcoming month, Eagleton will examine voter registration forms across the states to see what forms of identification are requested from mail-in registrants. The difficulty will be determining the 2004 status of the states.

VOTER ID AND TURNOUT ANALYSIS

Now under way is a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state’s voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We have created a database and gathered statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election. In November, we have analyzed both aggregate- and individual-level data to determine whether there is any relationship between voter turnout and the various forms of voter identification states require.

Progress: Analysis is under way for two data sets: County-level data that includes registration and turnout rates for 2000 and 2004, as well as Census measures and indicators of the type of voter identification requirements that were in existence at the time of the 2004 presidential election. The second data set consists of the voter supplement to the November 2004 Current Population Survey. This data set allows for testing of the same hypotheses at the individual level. Preliminary findings from the aggregate data set suggest that voter ID requirements have their greatest effect at the registration stage, as opposed to the turnout stage. This is a first cut at the data, however, and we will be adding a number of control variables to the analysis to see if the relationship holds.

Challenges: These analyses use hierarchical linear modeling. Because voter identification requirements vary by state, one must pay special attention to other, unseen state-level influences on the data. The models are difficult to run and interpret, so the analyses are time-consuming.

Work Plan: The statistical analyses will continue during the month of December, and a draft of the findings is anticipated by the end of the month.

PROJECT MANAGEMENT

PEER REVIEW GROUP

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group (PRG). It reviews our research and methodology and provides valuable feedback and suggestions for the direction of our work.
Progress: During the month of November, Eagleton contacted the PRG Members on two occasions. First, all members received the final draft provisional voting report that was submitted to the EAC. Further comments are welcome but not expected from the PRG. Second, we have asked PRG members to reserve two dates in mid-January for potential conference call sessions to review the voter identification report.

Challenges: No new challenges were encountered during November.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and an internal website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law is being merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding Provisional Voting and voter identification.

Progress: At this point in the research process, many documents are complete after a lengthy process of circulating drafts among team members. We have reorganized our system by separating final drafts from earlier versions of documents, discarding dated files contained in the Information System, and updating the system as a whole. Upon their completion, new documents continue to be added.

Projections: The entire project team continues to use the Information System which contains the above referenced research, in working toward the preparation for our final reports to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: All project team members have signed on to the Intranet site, and regularly post drafts, completed materials and spreadsheets online for internal review. The Intranet facilitates the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Our contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (732) 932-0165, EXT. 2235.
A detail of expenses incurred from project November 1- November 30, 2005, will be sent under separate cover to: Ms. Dianna Scott, Administrative Officer at the EAC.

Will do. I didn’t have time to review the final version before it went to you guys, but will do so. The last one I read was an improvement over prior drafts.

Subject: Martinez ELJ Submission

Profs. Hasen, Lowenstein, and Tokaji:

Attached please find the submission of the Martinez Submission to the Election Law Journal's Mortiz Edition.

We apologize for turning in this paper late; we have unfortunately been occupied with a series of fast-moving election administration events (largely beyond our control). That said, we believe this to be a strong, well researched piece that makes an important statement, and are proud to submit it for consideration.

We are, of course, open to any edits that you may have to this papers, and as to structure, or footnoting improvements. I will provide your staff with any items that you may need to keep "on file" that are not readily available in the public for the cited material. I have taken the opportunity to do a generic law review style format, but you can obviously alter that as per ELJ's specifications. I have limited the "short cite" format-- because the piece isn't terribly long, but I have attempted to follow the Bluebook as much as possible.

Again, I know that Commissioner Martinez truly appreciates the opportunity to write for the ELJ, and the encouragement that you all have provided him to get this piece done. We welcome your comments, and will be happy to work with you on further improving this piece.

Very truly yours,
Adam Ambrogi
INTRODUCTION

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and

- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC’s Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

In September 2005, the Commission hired two consultants with expertise in this subject matter, Job Serebrov and Tova Wang, to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;

- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;

- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;

- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and

- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

As of the date of this report, the consultants have drafted a definition of election fraud, reviewed relevant literature and reports, interviewed persons from government and private sectors with subject matter expertise, analyzed news reports of alleged election fraud, reviewed case law, and established a project working group.
DEFINITION OF ELECTION FRAUD

The consultants drafted a definition of election fraud that includes numerous aspects of voting fraud (including voter intimidation, which is considered a subset of voting fraud) and voter registration fraud, but excludes campaign finance violations and election administration mistakes. This draft will be discussed and probably refined by the project working group, which is scheduled to convene on May 18, 2006.

LITERATURE REVIEW

The consultants found many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. They found little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud appears to be the report written by Lori Minnite, entitled “Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud”. The most systematic look at voter intimidation appears to be the report by Laughlin McDonald, entitled “The New Poll Tax”. The consultants found that books written about this subject all seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Moreover, the consultants found that reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund’s frequently cited book, “Stealing Elections”.

Consultants found that researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.

- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate; but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.

Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.

Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.

Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Recommendations

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research include a follow up study of allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles. They also suggest that the research should focus on filling the gap between the lack of reports based on methodical studies by social or political scientists and the numerous, but less scientific, reports published by advocacy groups.

INTERVIEWS

The consultants jointly selected experts from the public and private sector for interviews. The consultants' analysis of their discussions with these members of the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities follows.

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.

- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, "dead" voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud, although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.

- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.

- Several people indicate that, for various reasons, DOJ is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. Interviews with DOJ personnel indicate that the Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance in this area. While the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, continues to maintain an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process (including voter suppression), it also has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting.

- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed.

- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.
With respect to DOJ’s Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one’s definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and his office has not pursued any such cases.

Craig Donsanto of DOJ’s Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases DOJ is investigating and the number of indictments his office is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, in addition to pursuing systematic election corruption schemes, DOJ has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so that his agency can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.

- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment.
- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama’s “deceptive practices” bill.
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected as non partisan officials, they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas are a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states’ office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.
Status Report - EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research - May 17, 2006

- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots “for cause” only if it were politically feasible.

- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the proposal in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.

- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

NEWS ARTICLES

Consultants conducted a Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006. A systematic, numerical analysis of the data collected during this review is currently being prepared. What follows is an overview of these articles provided by the consultants.

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.

- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.

- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.
Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms;
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with.

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles, in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters’ registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;
• Poll watchers harassing voters;
• Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;
• Disproportionate police presence;
• Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate; and
• Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from “battleground” states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

“Dead Voters and Multiple Voting”

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials, and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found five such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.
As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia). There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of completed voter registration applications. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case, charges were filed against ten individuals. In another case, a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this Nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem was the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Recommendation

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research should include a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

CASE LAW RESEARCH

After reviewing over 40,000 cases from 2000 to the present, the majority of which came from appeals courts, the consultants found comparatively few applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, the consultants found that no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it appears to them that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

Recommendation

Because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, consultants suggest that subsequent EAC research include a review of state trial-level decisions.

PROJECT WORKING GROUP

Consultants and EAC worked together to select members for the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group that included election officials and representatives of advocacy groups and the legal community who have an interest and expertise in the subject matter. (See Attachment A for a list of members.) The working group is scheduled to convene at EAC offices on May 18, 2006 to consider the results of the preliminary research and to offer ideas for future EAC activities concerning this subject.

FINAL REPORT

After convening the project working group, the consultants will draft a final report summarizing the results of their research and the working group deliberations. This report will include recommendations for future EAC research related to this subject matter. The draft report will be reviewed by EAC and, after obtaining any clarifications or corrections deemed necessary, will be made available to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors for review and comment. Following this, a final report will be prepared.

MR. MARTINEZ: Good afternoon, everybody.

Please continue with your lunch. We are going to get started with the program. And what I am going to do for a quick two or three minutes is just to lay the groundwork if you will and try to let you all know what we are going to attempt to accomplish over the next couple of days. And give you an idea as to what issues we hope to put in front of you et. Cetera.

Again I am Ray Martinez. I am a Commissioner with the U.S. Elections Assistance Commission. I do want you to recognize my esteemed colleague the former Secretary of State of the great State of Colorado and now Commissioner with EAC, Betty Davidson. Madame Commissioner if you will stand up (Applause).

What we hope to accomplish—well, we are here to discuss and get advice, the EAC, to get advice from our Statutory Advisory Boards. We have two main Statutory Advisory Boards created by (inaudible) which is our government statute. One is the Board of Advisors which is meeting up on the second floor and is conducting concurrent meetings doing and hearing exactly the same issues that you all will be hearing about as well.

We have a presenter upstairs and as soon as they are done we switch places and we will run concurrent agenda with the Board of Advisors up stairs.

And of course our second important Advisory Board committee is this great body right here and that is the 110 Member Standards Board.

What we have done in preparing your agenda for this particular meeting is different from what we did in Denver last September. In Denver last September we had a very important issue that we had to put before our two Statutory Advisory Boards and the Board of Advisors met separately for that meeting in a different location.

What we did is focus on the voluntary voting system guidelines back in Denver back in September of last year. We broke up into break out sessions on the various aspects of the BBSG, security, accessibility human factors et cetera. We had a very productive meeting about the voluntary voting system guidelines.

For this particular meeting what you have is an agenda full of Commissions and working EAC research projects. Just about our full research agenda will be presented to you throughout the next two days. And the reason for us to do that is because the EAC--a very important function of the EAC in addition to working as your full partner in implementing the various requirements in HAVA will also be a national clearing house for best practices on election administration. And to be able to fully play and fulfill that role as an agency it is incumbent upon us to commission objective and professional and sound research so we can fully inform our partners in the election community and in the advocacy community, all our stakeholders as to what we find our best practices in election administration.

So you will hear a series of presentations that begin almost immediately as soon as I get off the podium here. They will start to tell you here are the things that we are working. And the goal that we want to try to accomplish in the next day and a half is to get your candid advice of what we are working on.
strongly encourage as much feedback, whether they are positive or challenging. We want to get a sense of direction on the projects we are going to be presenting to you over the next day and a half. So we want to encourage your candid interaction as you hear these presentations and we need to get fully informed as to the direction that we are headed.

So the goal of this meeting is to give you a full briefing of all of our research projects we are working on. If you look at the agenda you will see at the end of the next day and a half, meaning tomorrow afternoon, you will have a two block. And that block can be extended even further if necessary for a plenary session time where you will be able to talk among yourselves as members of the Standards Board and to discuss what you heard from the EAC and if necessary if it is so desired pass resolutions and speak formally as a Standards Board, as an Advisory Board as to your collective opinion about the work that we are doing here.

We truly value the feedback we get from all of you. We don't just meet in a vacuum. I see so many faces out in this room that we at the EAC call on just about every day for advice and for input.

So it is a very unique situation for us to have so many of you that we call upon almost daily to have you all collectively in the same room and to be able to draw from your vast experience and expertise for the next day and a half. We feel very fortunate to have you here. We are very thankful that you have traveled a great distance for many of you to spend the next day and a half with us. Thank you in advance.

So with that let me say I do need to announce anybody that needs to have an interpreter or signage can come and sit in the front row or we will make better accommodations for you to have a better view of the interpreter. This meeting is open to the public as have all of our Standards Board meetings have been. So there is a section in the back where non Standards Board Members are present. However Q and A and actual interaction is limited to the Standards Board members who are present. The members of the public who are here may observe but they may not ask questions or engage in any of the discussions or presentations. It is strictly for the members of the Standards Board.

After we do some quick presentations here for the remainder of our lunch hour this meeting will be turned over to the members of your executive board, meaning your acting chair, Peggy Nighswonger and her colleagues on the Executive Board, will then come up to the head table and begin to work you through the agenda and solicit your feedback.

So with that I will go ahead and ask our first presenter, our current General Counsel, Julie Thompson Hodgkins to come up and give us a brief presentation on our Legal Resources web page. After that we will have three more presentations. And then we will take a break and go into your first Plenary Session. Julie, if you will come up, please.

MS. THOMPSON-HODGKINS: Thank you Mr. Martinez and welcome everyone to Washington D.C. I am so pleased to be the first presenter. To be able to talk about, well, what is a small project for EAC, but one that I hope will bring a lot of value to the election.

Just to briefly give you a little insight into this project I remember the days back when I was a State Election Administrator being general counsel for the Department of Elections in Louisiana thinking it really would be nice to have one source to be able to go to take a look at all of the laws, all of the regulations, all of the cases country wide that dealt with elections.

I remember those days when you got frantic calls from the Legislature wanting to know how another state dealt with provisional voting or casting ballots or absentee voting or what have you and wishing I had a resource.

Actually at the Denver meeting I took a little poll of a few of you asking what you would think about EAC putting together this kind of resource. And it got some support. I brought it to the Commissioners and said, you know, hey what do you think about this? And they thought it was a good idea to.

So what we are doing is putting together a website to provide access for all of you, all the members of the public, to legal materials related to elections. It will provide you with up to date information, current statues, current cases, and in a format that is user friendly.

We decided to start this project with a rather simple focus and that is State and Federal elections. Anything from State Constitutions, Federal Constitutions, Federal law, such as Help America Vote Act, and NVRA, The Voting Rights Act. Certainly the Voting Accessibility for the Elderly and Handicapped, ADA and the rehab act. Anything that we could think of either in the Federal or State arena in terms of Legislation that would impact the elections process.

We are also going to have State Statutes, Constitutions, Administrative Rules and Regs. They will be categorized by state and by topical area. So if you're interested in knowing how California deals with provisional voting you can go to California and take a look at Provisional Voting Statutes or cases. The same thing with voting equipment and various other categories.

However if you are looking for a broader search you will also be able to key in the terms that you're interested in finding and take a look across all of the States to see a sort of panorama of how that particular topic is dealt with.

As far as the cases are concerned we asked our contractor to summarize the cases for you at the beginning so that you didn't have to read the whole case in order to determine whether or not it was something that really applied to your particular situation. You will also have a link to the full text of that decision. We started with a narrow focus and that is State and Federal elections particularly Help America Vote Act and the NVRA, and those issues which would be the most important to you guys as you are implementing HAVA.

As far as the time line is concerned on this project our contractor is just about finished identifying all of the resources that we need to be contained in the data base. They are in the process of summarizing those cases. And we will be populating that data base.

I am thrilled actually today to be able to give you a little bit of a preview of the data base. I hope you guys can see this. The text is a little small.

But these are some screen shots that we have. And this a look into the actual key word search where you would be able to enter in for instance: "Cast Ballot". And pull up cases, statutes, regulations that deal with how various different states are casting ballots. You can also of course, as I told you before, search by category or by state. So there will be a browsing function there that you can go to those into a drop down menu and choose from various different sources.

And this is sort of an example of what the results page would look like. The information that you will be needing.

We are very excited about this. I hope that you guys share the excitement and hope this will be a great resource for you. This is another little screen shot here of browsing a particular record for a single state.

If you have any questions, comments anything that I can answer right now I would be happy to take questions.

MS. LYNN BAILEY: (Georgia) when do you anticipate that project will be available for the public.

MS. THOMPSON-HODGKINS: I believe the tract that the contractor is on right now we should have this up by mid July. They are well into identifying all of the resources. There are quite a number of cases that they have summarized. But we try to ask them to do that on a priority bases, the newest cases first so that we can get that information out to you in that time frame.

BRAD CLARK: (California) Will this be available to a regular EAC website? Will there be a be a link to that legal resources.

MS. THOMPSON-HODGKINS: That is correct. There will be a link to Legal Resources Clearing House or Legal resources. You will be able to just go get that right off the EAC page.

The court Reporter has asked me to tell those who are speaking to identify yourselves so we will know who is speaking. Thank you so much for this opportunity to come and talk to you about this. I will be around for the next day and a half. So if any other questions come up with regard to Legal Resource Clearing House or in regard to anything else please do not hesitate to come and find me.

MR. MARTINEZ: I think Julie actually makes a good point at the end. And that is our staff will be around for the next couple of days. The presentations that you're hearing today at lunch are going to be kind of rushed because we are trying to get you as much information as we can. And we are starting with this lunch hour. But after the lunch hour the presentations that you will have will be issue specific. You will not not have four in a one hour block of time. There will be a time when you will get a ten or fifteen minute presentation with about thirty to forty minutes to ask questions on a particular issue.
So these are the ones we thought we could do rather quickly. But still even so we encourage you to ask to ask questions even if it means we need to readjust our agenda this afternoon.

Okay. Our next presenter-- I am going to ask Karen Lynn-Dyson who is our research manager. Karen manages all of our research agenda. And Karen, why don't you come on up to the microphone if you don't mind. And Karen will introduce our next presenter who will give a very quick, brief, presentation. This project is on the work that we are doing to redesign or to offer more user friendly designs for various products that our presenter will explain to you. Karen come on up.

MS. KAREN LYNN-DYSON: I just want to reiterate what Commission Martinez said in terms of my availability to everyone here over the next couple of days. Am the individual responsible for oversight for all of the agencies research works and projects. I look forward very much to hearing from you all, your concerns, you issues, things you would like to see us addressing or addressing in more detail.

We have with us today Rick Grafe who is the CEO of the American Institute of Graphic Art. This project which the Elections Assistance Commission is contracted for is one that Commissioner Martinez indicated where we are trying to provide to you all a series of best practices on ballot design and on signage. And with these best practices and these exhibits, if you will, of possibilities for approaches to ballot design and polling place signage we will take into consideration literacy, readability, usability alternate languages, braille, audio accessibility and ADA compliance.

The American Institute of Graphic Art is the professional association of design. It has some 17,000 designers working in a variety of communication media. And they through their Design for Democracy which is their non profit affiliate can assist you all, government agencies, in finding national or local professional designers and researchers who can help you on a for hire basis to implement some of these designs.

So with that very brief introduction I am going to Mr. Grafe Korfe go ahead and describe to you all the work they have been doing for the EAC on this contract.

DESIGN FOR DEMOCRACY

MR. RICK KORFE:
All right. Thank you Karen. Again I am Rick Grafe sic. I want to thank you, Karen and also Commissioner Martinez. And I think some of the comments that he made are so very critical to what we want to share with you. That is he talked about the importance of best practices; he talked about the importance of research; and he talked about how critical input is. And I think all of those are reflected in what we are trying to share with you today.

This is going to be very brief. And one of the reasons it is going to be brief is that this isn't really about you listening to me it is really about our me listening to you.

Our project is effective design in election administration (sic) and as Karen pointed out Sign for Democracy is an initiative for AIGA which has been around since 1999.

It eventually focused on clear communication and more thoughtful experiences in public sphere so we can trust in government and increase citizen participation.

The specific project we are working on is aimed at building expertise, or building from our expertise, experience and new research to create models.
for optical scan electronic ballots and also for polling place signage.

Now the exhibits we actually created are under Tab five in your binders. And I mention that because I am going to do something that is a little unusual in talking about design. And that is I am not going to show you the designs because what we really want to do is gain your input. And there is an opportunity for you to look at the work under tab five and get a sense of it. And also in a room right across the hall we have two staff people, user specialists and researchers who are there to gain your input on various of the exhibits that are over there.

So during the next day, well actually two days, we will have the room, again, right across the hall. There is Elizabeth Hare, our Project Director and Mary Kwan who is our experienced strategist and usability specialist strategist. And they both will be over there looking for your input on some the exhibits. The exhibits are things like this. And while they are all drafts the intention is to get your reaction so we can refine them.

I want to mention now a couple of things quickly about designers and try to disavow you of 1 certain preconceptions about about design. What we are 2 talking about here is not people in flip flops and long 3 pony tails who are trying to design this stuff. And we 4 are not talking about arrogant artists wearing all 5 black. What we are talking about are professionals who 6 can take an experience and define and break it down 7 into the small pieces that make an experience, like the 8 voting experience, like the election experience and 9 break it up into segments. And research how people 10 react to information and then craft a solution.

So what we are really talking about is a 11 process, a designing process, a way of thinking about a 12 problem and the election process itself.

We broke it down into identification, 13 orientation, instruction, action, is the voting part, 14 completion. And what you do is you look at the election 15 process and say what are all the pieces and how do 16 people relate to that.

And out of that what we are going to do is we 17 are going to propose to you guidelines that respect a 18 number of issues, that respects a number of issues. It 19 respects HAVA compliance; it will respect need to adapt materials for local applications; it will always to seek to find clarity and simplicity in what we are doing. And it will also reflect the need to respond to the technical requirements of voting equipment.
So right now our approach, and what happened to our project, right now our approach will deal with guidelines on the content, on what information is really needed by people at various stages.
You will deal with the voting system implication of course responding to the technical issues. It will deal with layout systems, the way people work through information. We know patterns that are most effective. And we will share those with you as well as issues of layout that reflect the needs of different technical systems. And also principles of design so that materials being adapted for the local level there are certain principles that you will know to follow.
What you see here are twelve stages in the design process. And I need to mention this again to point out that when you are dealing with a designer you shouldn't just expect them to design a ballot.
You should deal with designers who are actually asking you more about the process of design. And the issues that are highlighted, five and six, gather information and develop prototype ideas is a stage that we are at. With that, that is an important stage.

We need to understand how people need, use information. What information is needed and then you develop prototypes which are like the draft examples you will see across the hall and then you gain greater information.

This is one case were when we talk about testing we are not testing to figure out how well we have done. We are testing to inform what we do. So the idea here is that we have materials for you to react to and it is your reaction that is as critical as it is to what we bring to the project.

I know that for many dealing with this issue isn't traumatic but it is a tough one because ballots have been developed over the years and they have accommodated a huge amount of information, a huge amount of requirements that are very local. And most people in this room, and most people in most of the elections systems, feel very strongly, they feel the issues we are confronting are unique. And they are concerned that all of the challenges they have already faced be accommodated in the outcome.

Let me assure you that that is exactly why we want to hear from you. Understanding what you bring about, what is important, is actually critical for us to be able to adapt to something that you can use effectively at the local level.

One of the advantages of the work we have done. One of the advantages of the work that we have done our election design project team has already worked with election officials in Cook County, Illinois and the state of Oregon. And so in terms of the testing process we have actually have not only the kinds of test that we do in order to perform research, to understand how people can best understand the issues and answer the ballot. But also we have had field testing and post election use. And we bring to the project here not only that experience but also certain things that are true of virtually any information design issue.

And our objective here is useful usable design. And our core team and what we bring to it, among other things, in addition to that experience, we bring what we know from other research in terms of how people use information. And we know that there are certain principles that we will share with you that regardless of how your design evolves that you need to keep in mind and that is the design is not because it makes things look pretty but because it makes things useful. It makes things usable. They are effective. They are clear, they are simple.

These are things like using clear capital letters; not center lining type; keep the number of type variations down; understand information hierarchy; and using graphics to help illustrate points. We will share those things. And that's where we start.

Then we have our own panel of experts and project advisors that advise us and become part of that process of testing. Are we making the right conclusion when we are coming us with certain solutions?

And the next critical aspect is all of you.

That's why we will be here for two days because we need to hear from you the issues that are most important to you and make sure we can accommodate them.

And then of course there are the voters as well. We look to them and their response in two ways. One is through putting together some test situations with prototypical or typical voters in advance and also the outcomes of actual use.

The concept we are taking here is we want to create a design that is simple enough to address exceptional means. And by dealing with the needs at the extremes, the exceptional needs, and making something simple and clear for them we believe we will meet everyone's requirements.

So in this next round of testing that we do we are going to include people from 18 to 21 years of age, 65 to 80 and address the kind of issues that Karen pointed are the object of the issues and that is dealing with literacy issues, readability, usability, alternate languages, braille and audio accessibility and ADA compliance. And then in addition we will try to see what the requirements are for localization, for low experience levels and also for cultural obstacles.

Ultimately again the outcome will be models that are other compliant, capable for local variability, easy to implement and sensitive to technical requirements.

The next stage will be some tests that we will do in the field, task based usability testing. We plane to do it on the east coast, midwest and west coast. And certainly if any of you want to be involved in this be sure to let Elizabeth or Mary know because we have not selected sights yet. And the testing will be putting together, presumably, test labs and bring in volunteers to actually use the information.

I mention we will be in the room across the hall in the McPhearson Square Room, oh, I guess tomorrow is in the Board Room, it is not across the hall. So in the McPhearson Square Room, all day today until 6 o'clock. And tomorrow it will be in the Board Room which is also on this level Board Room one I believe from 10 a.m., to 6 p.m. And you can also respond and even if it is not responding to what you see sharing with us your concerns.

Now what is this? We also want to get your feed back on line. But this is one of those slides from hell. You know you try to come up with a simple solution, especially for designers who talk about simplicity. You try to come up with a simple solution and you get a URL that no one can remember. So we will skip that. We are looking for a survey monkey to do another job.

Next, you can use this link on the Home page of Design for Democracy.org/participate URL there is a link of that on line survey which is going to be available through the end of the month for any of your concerns.
052306 comments on any materials in Tab 5. And again: Design for Democracy.org/participate. And that will be up for ten more days, until the end of the month to gather your comments.

There are the names of Mary and Elizabeth who we be here the next two says seeking your input. And we certainly welcome it in any way or form you choose to get it to us. But it is critical for us to hear from all of you on this in order to accommodate your needs.

Thank you.

MR. MARTINEZ: Any questions on this particular presentation? Okay. Great thank you.

It occurs to me as I was listening to that presentation that perhaps this room could have been designed a little better for our meeting. Howard is that you behind the pillar? I think so. So our apologies for columns that are blocking the view, not that you want to see us up here anyway. But hopefully you can hear us back there, Howard.

What we want to do next, the final presentation both of this presentations on Public Access Portals and Spanish and Asian Language Working Groups that we have assembled will be presented by Edgardo Cortes who is one of our research specialists at the EAC. He will talk to you very quickly about these issues and give you a chance to ask questions.

I also want to say about the previous presentation we reached our to Design for Democracy and to pull together best practices on ballot design and polling place signage et cetera. Based upon the input and urging from many of you out there we actually got a lot of feedback from, in particular, our Board of Advisors, upstairs, that this was a useful project for us to do with a lot of positive feedback from election officials who had worked with Design for Democracy. And we felt they were an important group to bring in. Have them do some templates and some best practice documents that we could put out for your consumption to see if you want to follow up with any of their work. And that is why you heard that presentation.

Okay. The following two presentations very quickly, Edgardo Cortes with the EAC staff:

PUBLIC ACCESS PORTALS & SPANISH & ASIAN LANGUAGE WORKING GROUPS.

MR. CORTES:

Thank you Mr. Vice Chairman. Give me just a minute to set this up.

Good afternoon, everyone, my name is Edgardo Cortes. I have been with EAC since late July of last year. Prior to that I used to run a National Voter Registration campaign that was funded by the government of Puerto Rico as well as did some political consulting work for a couple of campaigns around the country. Probably working with Peggy Sims dealing with all the requirement payments issues, the HAVA funding questions that come in, the College Board Approval Programs, any NVRA issues that come up and so anything I am Peggy's backup for that. So a lot of stuff you send in to us she and I work on getting your responses to.

First thing I am going to talk about is the Public Access Portal Project that we have been working on since last fall. We awarded a contract to Publius.org to conduct a study which will examine and create a best practices document about Public Access Portals. Publius is a non partisan, non profit 501c3 based out of Detroit Michigan. They have been in existence for about ten years now. And actually got their start setting up an information web site like this for the state of Michigan.
The methods up here is essentially from the research that is ongoing, it is kind of a color coded map as to what sorts of web sites by available by state. You can see some of them have state wide sites available. Some just have independent jurisdictions, half sites. Some are county based. And you can also see there are quite a few states that don't have anything set up so far. So those are kind of-- in terms of the research that is a visual representation of what they have looked at so far.

They have from September through December what they did was they went out and started doing an initial search of what web sites were out there and who is running them. And to this point they have identified and reviewed approximately 425 state, county and local web sites that provide information to voters. Of those 425 what they did was, starting in January, they started a more comprehensive look at a much smaller section of those, approximately fifty. What they have done is they are going in an ah, number one, going through the process of looking up information on the site, capturing what information is provided, how it is being provided all those sorts of things.
And then they have also conducted about 100 interviews so far, finance reviews with the administrator that run these sites, with the IG folks. And what they have done in terms of those 50 sites they really went out and got a variety of state, county and local web sites to look at. They focused on urban and rural web sites, you know various that were urban and rural. They looked at as much geographic diversity as possible so that the Best Practices Document that comes out in the end will address some of the regional differences that might exist in terms of how information is presented. And will look at the differences throughout the states.

A couple facts about the web site. The actual first source of these informational web sites actually date back to around 1996, when the Internet, the use was not very wide spread yet. And so they really advanced a lot between then and now.

In terms of their initial research one of the things that they have found to be the most popular function-- when we went into this we really thought that the big questions were people wanting the check their registrations status, their voter registration status. And to know where their polling place was located.

That was one of the reasons we received this project, the kind of internal, initial research that we did to prepare to let this out a contractor indicated that those were the two big questions.

What we actually found is that aside from those, those are very important actually, but one of the things that draws people most to these sites are the sites that have candidate information and sample ballot information on the sites. Which is something they are taking a look at in terms of what ways that can be readily presented to folks. And what they found is that sites that have the usage increases dramatically once that information goes up closer to election time. Once those sites put that information up the usage goes up.

Another interesting thing that we were able to take a look at this year, and it is going into the final report actually, is Louisiana set up a web site to provide voter information to displaced voters. Folks that were displaced after Hurricane Katrina. And they set up this web site so that those folks, prior to the special election in New Orleans, would be able to, from anywhere in the country, go in and access not only the information of, you know, the dates and everything, but were able to get information on the absentee ballot process, were able to download applications for absentee ballots and really provided a lot of information and was kept up to date. So Publius was actually able to, because of the timing of our project was actually able to look at from beginning to end this process and has spoken with folks in Louisiana about it. And that is one of the things we will be dealing with in the final report which we might be able to use in the future for other studies as well.

One of the things that may or may not surprise you is that number one there is a lot of interest at all levels for providing these sites. It is has really been an issue of resources up until now as to whether or not jurisdictions provide these sites and how advanced they are.

One of the things through the phone calls and interviews that they have done with existing sites is a lot of the smaller jurisdictions and the counties have been kind of stalling further development of these sites because there is a lot of concern out there about how the switch to a statewide voter registration list is going to impact states providing this information whether or not it is going to be done at a state level. And kind of remove the need for them to have it at the local level. So that is one of the concerns that has come up during the research as well.

One thing that shouldn't surprise anybody is there is no one promotion strategy for these sites that works. Every location that has them is different as to how they get the word out about them and how they draw people to those sites.

In terms of timing, just go give everybody an idea, they have been doing this research for a while now. They are hoping to-- we are hoping to have the draft document ready by mid to late summer. So July or August we are hoping to have a draft document available which we will-- I will work with the Commissioner to make sure that we are able to distribute that to both the Standards Board and the Board of Advisors for people to be able to look at it, give their feedback before it goes into the final version which we hope if we can get the draft in mid summer and we are hoping that sometime in the early fall we will be able to have a final document out there.

In terms of the time line we realize it is an election year. We realize this information is going out in the fall. One of the things that we realized early on was that even last fall it was to the point where it was pretty much too late for states and jurisdictions to implement the suggestions that were going to come out of this in time to impact this year's elections. So what we are really hoping to get out of this document is that it will be available toward the end of this cycle so that once we get into next year and people start looking toward the '08 Presidential elections. And we have gotten past the HAVA deadlines and everybody's attention starts to shift this information will be out there so that states, and counties and local jurisdictions can take the information in here and be able to implement these sites with enough time to make them functional and work out all the bugs and everything before we move into the election year. So that's what we are looking at in terms of timelines for this project.

I will take questions about both of these after I finish the second topic.
SPANISH AND ASIAN LANGUAGES WORKING GROUPS.

Many of you know there have been a lot demographic changes in the country and a lot of-- particularly in the past decade there is a lot of jurisdictions that have sizeable populations that fall under Section 203 of Voting Rights Act, or who will soon be, and a lot of jurisdictions. And lot of jurisdictions that didn't before now have to provide information in alternative languages.

We have seen it and we realize the issues that come up in terms of jurisdictions that have never dealt with alternative languages or to some of the issues that come up and how can they implement this properly.

Prior to my getting here the work had already started on these projects. It was decided by the Commission that we should-- really what we should do is to bring together some working groups that consist of election administrators, advocacy organizations, different people that deal with the issues that come up and deal with them first hand and let us know what sort of research we can conduct that will help you in that process.

HAVA Section 241, which is the section that talks about the studies of election administrations one of the things that it charges the EAC to do is conduct research on making information most convenient, accessible and easy to use for voters including voters with limited proficiency in the English language. So that is actually in HAVA. And one of our mandates is to go out there and find information to make it easier to provide or to administer elections using alternative languages.

The way we started out was last August we had the first meeting of the Spanish language working group. We had that at the EAC offices. And the reason we chose to deal with the Spanish language first is number one it is largest alternative language that folks are dealing with. Most of the--- the majority of jurisdictions out there that deal with alternative languages have been dealing with Spanish. And that really has been because of the growing population size it has been an issue that a lot of knew jurisdictions have had to deal with. So we wanted to bring that group together and see what sort of things we could do. That was in early August.

The next group we decided to bring together was a group to discuss access to different Asian languages. Under Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act there are actually five Asian languages, Asian and Pacific Islander languages that are covered and that certain jurisdictions have to provide information in those languages. That is Chinese, Japanese, Korean, Vietnamese and Tadowlin (sic). So that working group we actually had at the end of April, so just about a month ago we brought that group together.

We are looking toward the future, hopefully sometime next year to be able to bring together a working group dealing with native American languages.

And that one is going to be really interesting because with a lot of languages we are talking about languages that have no written form, they are all spoken languages. And so that presents a whole additional set of issues when you're talking about administering elections and providing information in an alternative language that you can't write.

So basically what all three of these groups are meant to do is provide the EAC with, or help us in accessing what sort of language specific projects we can conduct as an agency.

Some of the things that have already come up and that we are actually are working towards is number one creating translation dictionaries of election terminology to have a document that would provide a whole list of election terms and provide a translation from English to whatever the alternative language is. The first one we are working on is actually English to Spanish. And so we are also looking towards doing the five Asian languages.

And one of the biggest complaints we have gotten in terms of, and I am sure you have all heard, in terms of trying to provide this information is that the translation services that are out there aren't always the best. And when election information gets translated a lot of time it is a literal translation and the meaning is really lost when you translate it to the other language.

So we are hoping by providing this tool for election administrators it can help you all meet the needs of the communities that you are serving, and the electorate that you serve.

The other project that we actually are working and we hope to have ready by mid summer is providing a translation of the National Voter Registration form. We have the Spanish language version, the updated one already up on our website.
Both the English and the Spanish were recently updated. But the form hasn't been translated into the five Asian languages since the FEC first created the initial voter registration form. So it has been quite a while. And we are hoping to get that done fairly quickly so that those jurisdiction can have voter registration forms available in those languages later this year.

And then finally we are-- one of the roles of these groups is to provide us not only with the feedback but to help us prioritize. I mean there is all these questions all the time for different research projects that you all think would be useful. And by bringing these groups together we are hoping to establish some sort of priority for what we can do short term to get some immediate assistance out there and then look at what we can do long term in terms of these issues.

So that is pretty much what the language groups are doing. So I can take some questions.

MR. MARTINEZ: We can move very quickly for some questions or comments from anybody out there? Any questions or comments about Public Access Portals or the working groups we have assembled, Secretary Kidmeyer.
SECRETARY KIDMEYER: A question in regards to dialects how do you handle dialects even though it is the same language?

MR. CORTES: That is actually one of the things we spent a lot of time on actually during both working groups. The Spanish language translations are the first ones we are working on so I can tell you a little bit about how we are going to handle that.

One of the suggestions we had was to bring together a group of language experts, academics to review the work we are doing in terms of translation. But the other thing that we are doing is we are going to look at what the regional differences are and provide alternative terms to reference the same thing.

For instance the word ballot is translated into Spanish is different if you go to Florida if you go to New York, if you go to California. They all use different terms for that. In the instances were we can provide some sort of standard translation term that everybody understands or alternatively for those were that doesn't exist to provide, you know, multiples translations so that depending on where you're at you can look and see what sort of populations you are coming from.

A lot has to do with country of origin. So providing that information you will be able to go to the list and say well my jurisdiction has a very large Puerto Rican population this is probably the translation form I should use.

MR. MARTINEZ: Other questions please? Yes, John.

JOHN LINDBACK: It is a really basic question. I don't understand the difference between a Public Access Portal and conventional website. Because we have had a ton of information out there on a conventional website. When you talk Public Access Portals what do you mean exactly?

MR. CORTES: It is essentially a voter information website. And what they are looking at is a website were you can go in and get information as far as registration status. It is a polling state locations, candidate information, all those very specific election information.

We do realize that most states do have basic sites, whether it is the Chief Election Officer or the local jurisdictions that have polling place hours and those things. We are really looking at sites that open further and are more interactive in terms of the information that people can pull from them.
MR. MARTINEZ: And some states, I think, have more experience in putting forth what is regarded as Public Access Portals. I am looking at Sarah Ball Johnson who is right next to you because I think Kentucky is one of the states that has been something like this for a while. She is whispering to you right now.

I broke my own rule. When you raise your hand to speak if you can introduce yourself, state your name for the court reporter. And I apologize, Secretary Mary Kiffmeyer and John Lindback from Oregon. Mary Kiffmeyer from Minnesota.

Any other questions or comments on anything that was presented, please.

Okay. Edgardo, thank you very much. I appreciate your work.

Again as a quick background what we are presenting to you over the next day and a half, and what we just started with the first four presentations are research projects that are grounded in some place in our government statute, within HAVA.

We are either wearing a hat of producing a national clearing house of best practices; or we are wearing a hat of having to produce voluntary guidance to help clarify title free requirements. So there are different hats that the EAC will wear statutorily that when we wear the hat we want to wear it in the manner that is consistent with the advice that we get from our statutory boards, and that is you. Again what we do proactively is to try to reach out to all of you, as many as we can individually, throughout the course of our fiscal year, asking you to participate in working groups, many of you have done so, seeking your advice through our fiscal year. We have a chance to get you all in one room once or twice a year to put it all in front of you and solicit your candid feedback. So again I encourage your questions. And it doesn't have to happen in this hour. We can continue this conversation throughout the duration of the next day and a half I am going to turn the mic over, after the break, to your Executive Board and they will commence the official gavel of your Standards Board Meeting. So thank you very much for being here once.
Thank you for what I know will be a productive day and a half. The four Commissioners will be in and out because we have the Board of Advisors going on simultaneously two floors above you we will be alternating in and out. But all four Commissioners will be around for the next couple of days. We look forward, I certainly look forward to engaging in conversation both with the body collectively and all of you individually.

So with that Madam Chair, I have 1:25 if you want to allow for a ten break we can just go five minutes off your schedule. I have 1:25 if we can reassemble at 1:35. Thank you very much.

(Recess from 1:25 to 1:45 P.M.)

MS. NIGHTSWONGER: Okay. Commission Martinez has already welcomes you and I would also like to welcome you to our meeting here of the National Standards Board. And I am only here because Mike left us. He had the nerve to go out on us. And you all probably got that email about him getting a new fantastic job. So he kind of left me hanging out here. So all of you are going to have to be very patient with me today and tomorrow and please don't throw tomatoes.
at me from the crowd. I will try to get someone up here in a few minutes to help keep me in line.

Before we begin to day I guess I should call this meeting to order first of all. I don't have a gavel. I don't know if Adam took it or what happened. I would like to just talk about a couple of ground rules that I'd like to put in place here and that is for our Court Reporter here is going to be taking the minutes, the official minutes of this meeting so we really do need to speak in a microphone when we go to the floor. And we are going to have some roving mics so that you don't always have to get out of your seat. So if you will raise your hand I will call on you and the people carrying the mic will get a microphone to you. And I would like you to address the group with your name and where you are from please. And then you can give your question or whatever. So if you can just try to do that. That way we will know who is talking and what they are saying and we can hear very well.

The first thing we need to do is call the role. So I would like to have Bill Campbell if you would go ahead and do that. If you would respond when he call your name so we can make sure we have a quorum at this meeting.

MS. NIGHTSWONGER I believe we need 56 members for a quorum, so we will figure this out.

MR. CAMPBELL: Is there anyone that did not respond to the roll call?

MS. NIGHTSWONGER: Okay. We have a sufficient number of members to conduct business. We will move ahead.

Before we get started here with some other things on the agenda I would like to introduce the Executive Board if I could. Probably most of you know who they are but I'd like them to stand so you can make sure you know what their face looks like in case you want to bombard them with a problem or an issue that you're having.

Actually is the room okay? I want to ask that. Is anyone too hot or too cold or do we care that they are uncomfortable?

So if I could just have you stand when I call your name. First of all Indiana Secretary of State Todd Rokita. And Vermont's Secretary of State Deborah Markowitz. Oregon Director of Elections John Lindback. Kentucky Executive Director Sarah Ball Johnson. City Clerk of Woburn, Massachusetts Bill Campbell who is up here with me. And Clark County Registrar of Voters, Harvard Lomax. And last but not least, even though he came last Natchitoches Clerk of the Court, Louie Bernard. And Louie do you want to come up. You have something to say. I am almost afraid to call him to the table. So that's your Executive Board. And I really appreciate all of them and the help they haven given me. Now you know what they look like in case you have forgotten since Denver.

MR. BERNARD: I was asked to be the chaperon for the Executive Board when we were first elected. I was not here last night. I have nothing to do with last night. I don't know what they did and I don't want to know what they did.

It is very good to see all of you. I couldn't come in until this morning. Beverly Kauffman and I flew up together from Houston. We just happened to meet up, it is good to be here and see all these familiar faces again.

As most of you know Ray Martinez has announced that he will be leaving the EAC in June. I am personally very pleased about that because anyone who has worked with Ray, you know how pushy he can be (laughter). For almost two years we all have had the honor and privilege to work with this tireless and selfless man. And we all better people for and a better EAC for him having come our way.

I don't know about you, I sense in this country a partisanship that almost strangles everything we try to do. Our Commissioner since the day I came in here at the meeting in Houston. I've always been amazed how they seem to get along and work together with one another. I have no doubt that behind closed doors when we go home they may holler and scream but there is an outward appearance that lets try to respect each other and accomplish accomplish something for the entire group. And I think that is a good thing to do.

Ray Martinez has been at the heart of all that is positive, that has happened with EAC in this relatively short period of time.

He is one of the four, what I call one of the four T-Rex's at the EAC but the endearing quality about Ray is that he doesn't know he is one of those.
He is a man of great humility. He is a man of great sincerity and he is someone more than anything else respects someone's point of view.

Where I come from the nicest thing that can be said about a man is that he is truly a gentleman.
And I think without question, despite if you agree with everything that Ray has said or done, that Ray Martinez is truly a gentleman.

Ray, the Executive Board and the Standards Board would like to wish the very best in all that comes down your way in the future we want to give to you our heartfelt appreciation for all you have done for us.

I think it would be a shame for anybody to be a part of any organization and leave without being able to say they made a difference. I don't think Ray Martinez has anything to worry about when it comes to having made a difference at the EAC.

So I will close it by allowing Peggy to present this plaque. And Ray I just want to tell you that on behalf of all of us it is not an original blessing but it is something that I feel is very appropriate as you leave, the old Irish blessing, we would all say to you:

"May the Road rise to meet you.

May the wind be always at your back.
May the sun shine warm upon your face.
May the rain fall softly upon your fields.
And until we all meet again may the Lord.
052306

Hold you in the palm of His hand."

Ray, would you come forward you. (Applause).

Presented to Ray Martinez III for selfless and exemplary service to the Elections Assistance Standards Board, our heartfelt thanks for going the extra mile for America's voters this 23rd day of May 2006, by a very appreciative Executive Board.

MR. MARTINEZ: Thank you very much. I am going to get out of your way quickly. I can not thank you, Louie, for the wonderful words and my thanks to all of the members of the Executive Board. I have had the distinct privilege of working very closely now for the past year that I feel like I am a close friend with each and every one of them for a very long time now. I am so appreciative.

And you know I am still the Commissioner for at least a few more weeks and I am going to savor every moment of it because has been truly for me the most fulfilling professional experience in my life.

In my household growing up in south Texas public service meant something. And I am proud to say to my family and all my friends that I have tried to fulfill that. So I thank you very much. It is with genuine sincerity it has been a privilege for me, a real privilege and honor, to work with all of you. So thank you very much now get to work.
Page 56

(Appplause).

MS. NIGHSWONGER: Thank you Commissioner.
The first order of business is we need to appoint a Parliamentarian. And Julie has been so kind to do that for us in the past. She too has left us. I don't know what is going on here. Everyone is leaving us.

So I would like to open this up. I am sure many of you are Parliamentarians and would love the opportunity to sit up here beside me and keep me in line. So is there anyone who would like to do that today? Don't be shy. We know who you are. Some on.

MR. BERNARD: I think they are being shy.
I know there is someone out there who can do it. You don't want me.

MS. NIGHSWONGER: Anybody? I really do need help, honest. Secretary Kiffmeyer, oops she is still deciding here. Thank you so much for volunteering, if you will come up and take the seat on my left. Are you right handed.

MS. KIFFMEYER: Either hand will do.
MS. NIGHSWONGER: Thank you so much.

The next thing on our agenda here, and I think all of you got an agenda I hope. They were in your books. If you need an agenda please raise your hand we can get you one for today's meeting. As we look down over the agenda we are going to do a little bit of Board business here. And then following that we will move into some presentations from the EAC.

If we can move ahead with the agenda the chair will entertain a motion to adopt the agenda if we could first.

MS. BARTHOLOMEW: I so move.

MS. NIGHSWONGER: All in favor?

(Aye).

MS. NIGHSWONGER: Opposed? I hear no opposed, Okay. The Aye's have it and we have an agenda.

As for the minutes in your book, behind Tab 4 I believe it is we have a synthesis of the Denver meeting. I don't know about you but I probably would like to look over those a little bit. And I was wondering if we can postpone talking about the minutes until tomorrow sometime. That would give you tonight to look over the minutes of the synthesis of what was done in the Denver meeting.

I think that would be better. There is quite Page 58 a lot for you to read after just picking up your books.
So we will postpone that on the agenda until tomorrow that would work better.

Okay. You all have your books. And I think the books are pretty self explanatory. Everything is tabbed and put together very nicely. So we will be working from the agenda. As you notice all of the presenters have information in our books. And you will find them behind the tabs as indicated in your book.

Right now we do have some discussion about our bylaws when we were in Denver last year as many of you probably remember. And we actually adopted our bylaws when we were in Denver. But I am going to ask Kevin Kennedy if he would come up. Kevin worked on the original bylaws committee, or whatever that committee was called, when we were trying to establish bylaws.

And I would like him to give us a brief presentation on sort of what is going on and the history.

I know many of you are new to our Board because someone has left and you have been appointed to this position and you may not even know some of the things that have gone on in the past. So Kevin if you would just give us a brief presentation about that I would appreciate it.
MR. KENNEDY: Thank you. First I would like to welcome Peggy to this new position. And challenge her during the course of this meeting to pronounce the name of the New Mexico Secretary of State and the Travis County clerk (laughter).

MS. NIGHSWONGER: I have been working at it.

MR. KENNEDY: The minutes-- I'm sorry. The bylaws are set up behind Tab 2. And as Peggy said were adopted at the last meeting. The minutes provide a very good summary of the fact that we had three motions to change those bylaws. All three of those bylaws failed. So what you see in front of you are the bylaws. I would like to draw your attention to a few sections of that so that your familiar with it because as a new organization. I think this tells you how we are going to operate. It is a point of reference. One of the motions that failed dealt with Section 23 on authority, page one on how to treat non-partisan members of the Commission of the Standards Board.

I'd also want to make sure you are familiar with the Procedures of Nominating of new members of the Board, members of the Executive Board that are set out on page 2 of the materials under Section 4. Section C of the bylaws themselves, the Chair, on page 3 certain duties of a client, we have two standing committees according to the bylaws. One is a nominating committee. So there will be some action on that towards the end of the year. And our President will appoint a Chair for that committee and the Board will find members.

The same is true of the bylaws committee. A Chair will be appointed in the interim. And committee members will volunteer for that. That is in Section 4F, on page 3.

The final thing we had some questions that failed at the last meeting dealing on how we establish quorum. And whether or not we use proxy votes. And if you look at Section 5-- I'm sorry, Section 6 on page 8 it describes the voting procedures.

Section 7 proposes how we handle the actual bylaws for the committee. And with Section 7 I will point out the committee wants us to is establish and be charged with developing a forum. My experience of working with this group in the last year in putting a these bylaws together is that there is no shortness of ideas on how to come up with rules and regulations. One of the proposals is there will be a sample form so that we can have a very orderly process in doing this.
I think it is very important for all of the members to take the time to review the materials that are on pages one through ten before the next meeting, if you have ideas on changes to the bylaws. In terms of that my guess is that the Bylaws Committee will have a form in place.

And what I would like to do for my final comment before is there any questions is to point out these initial set of bylaws would not have happened if it were not for Joanne Armbruster, Bill Campbell, Tonni Bartholomew, Howard Sholl all made dedicated attempts to review these bylaws, make suggestions and edit the initial document that was put together by Julie Horowits (sic) so with that unless there are any questions that is my summary.

MS. NIGHSWONGER: I think I might before take questions from the floor. I think a little apology to the Executive Board I believe we asked for people who had an interest in working on the bylaws committee to indicate that somehow while we were at the Denver meeting. And we never really formally asked for that. So I would just indicate that right now that if you want to look at our bylaws and propose any changes we do need a committee to work on that. So I would really like you to let me know if you have any interest in doing that because I think it is our job to appoint a Bylaws Committee. Seven members?

   MR. KENNEDY: Seven members.

   MS. NIGHSWONGER:
So if you have an interest on working on bylaws I would really challenge you to let me know that. You can email me. My email address is in the book. And I would be happy to hear you about that. Any questions for Kevin?

   MS. Nighswonger: One thing that I failed to mention. It was just a little housekeeping thing. In the book where the members are listed. Behind Tab 3. I want you all to really take a good look at that list and also the bios for all of the members of the Standards Board because I think there are some people who think that maybe they were left out, or maybe their bio isn't correct, or it is an old one. Anyway please look at that while you're here at this meeting and make sure that everything on your information is correct.
Read your bio. And if there are any changes to anything on that page or in that section I would suggest you get hold of Adam. You can email Adam at the EAC and he will get those changes made before we send out anymore mailings or meet again. So it you will take a look at that that will be great.

Okay. I think I would like to call Commissioner Martinez to the front again. He is going to review and present the Standards Board charter. And we can talk about that little bit.

MR. MARTINEZ: Thank you, Madam Chair.

One person, and actually I believe you have heard his name over and over again, but needs to be properly introduced is Adam Ambrosi(sic) who is my special assistant and who had helped to pull together all of the logistics and all of the preparations for this meeting. He has done a terrific job. He did it in Denver. Adam is your point of contact for anything that you need. He will be floating around here for the next couple of days and will be available to help in any way. So that is who Adam Ambrosi is.

The Charter that we took up, the Federal Advisory Act, governs advisory committees to Federal agencies. It requires that we adopt a charter in the next couple of days.
MS. NIGHSWONGER: If you don't have a copy of the charter it is outside on the table.

MR. MARTINEZ: Adam can you get a stack of copies and make them available.

MS. NIGHSWONGER: Maybe we can them pass out.

MR. MARTINEZ: Right.

MS. NIGHSWONGER: I am sorry. I meant to do that.

MR. MARTINEZ: Yes I should have done that.

But we have them up front and Adam will get a stack and walk down the center isle here and pass them out.

The Charter, Madam Chair, is required under the Federal Advisory Committee Act and it essentially,
I have a copy of one in front of me this is the Charter that governed the authority of this Advisory Committee for the past two years. And it simply has to be readopted. It is required to be readopted. And we readopt it every two years. And you have reached the two year mark.

Essentially the Charter reiterates it just takes the authority and responsibilities that come straight out of our governing statute which is the Help American Vote Act puts it into a Charter type of format and says, here are your responsibilities, here is how we are going to carry out those responsibilities. It is a pretty straightforward document. And we will ask that you all will allow for the Charter to be adopted once again.

And, Madam Chair, of course, if there is any questions or if there is a desire to wait until your plenary session tomorrow in case anybody has any questions or concerns obviously I don't think that is a problem from our perspective. It is just before you leave here at the close of business tomorrow we obviously need to readopt your Charter. As it is now about to expire. Thank you. Back to you Madam Chair.

MS. NIGHSWONGER: Thank you, Commissioner. I need a motion.

MS. VIGIL-GORON: Rebecca Vigil-Gorom from the State of New Mexico. I make a motion for adoption if there is no objection from the other members.

MR. KENNEDY; I will second that motion. I am Kevin Kennedy.

MS. NIGHSWONGER: All in favor?

(Ayes from the audience).

MS. NIGHSWONGER: Opposed? Motion carries.

MR. MARTINEZ: Thank you very much.
MS. NIGHSWONGER: I'm sorry. I am out of order. We did not have discussion. Too late the motion carried.

Would like to introduce my secretary, Joe Meyer. I am so nervous about this you all conduct theses meetings a lot on a local level. This is not like we do in Wyoming. We take a sot gun and when someone is out of order we just shoot it. (laughter) I guess that would go over big here.

Okay. Next item on our agenda is the election of our Executive Board vacancy. With Mike leaving that left a vacancy on the Standards Board and on the Executive Board. Now when we went to figure out how to figure out how to fill this vacancy nothing was very clear about that in our Bylaws. So there is something for you to do.

So what the Board talked about-- many of you, or all of you, should have received emails from Adam with the names of the people who are interested in filling that vacancy. What the Executive Board talked and decided to do because we didn't have a nominating committee either, which is something that we need to appoint and get a nominating committee before our next meeting. We decided to go ahead and throw that out for people to put their names in for that position. We did have four people that showed interest for that position. And I believe Adam set their bios out, that are over there on the table. That is another thing that is on the table. So if you don't have them with you maybe raise your hand and we can get you a copy of that also.

What we decided to do is take these names-- I would like the four people who did submit their names and their bio to give us a two or three minute introduction to themselves so that we will know their face and know who they really are. And I am going to give them that opportunity. And then we would like to pass out a paper ballot. And we are going to let all the voting members vote for one person that he would like to fill this vacancy on the Executive Board. And we have a very responsible Counting Board that is going to handle those ballots for us. Did everyone get a copy of the bios?

MR. CAMPBELL: Can I say something?

MS. NIGHSWONGER: Yes, Bill, you can say anything that you want.

MR. CAMPBELL: The bylaws do provide a method by which a method is filled. And that is the Executive Board Interim appointment. But we, as an Executive Board, have discussed this. We took the message and hold closely the message that we received when we were first appointed or elected as an Executive Board and that is we never want the full Board to feel that we are trying to usurp any authority. And although you have delegated it to us we decided the best practice although it was only a four or five month period was actually wait to hold the position vacant and have the full election take place today.

So the by laws do have a provision that it didn't have to have sufficient information to allow us to set up that election today. We have a Nominating Committee and deadlines to next February. So I hope you understand how we got here and how we tried to limit the selection process without limiting the selection process and that the Bylaws Committee will know that one of their first tasks is to try to work out how this interim election will be can be made.

MS. NIGHSWONGER: Secretary Markowitz?
MS. MARKOWITZ: I am sorry for not thinking about this morning at our Executive Board meeting preparing for this today. But under Roberts Rules in order to have a paper ballot for elections we need to have a vote to do so. So I will actually so move.

Page 69
MS. NIGHSWONGER: It is in the regular bylaws already.

MS. MARKOWITZ: Oh, good so it's in the regular bylaw. But thank you. Anyone else on our board want to make any comments about how we came to this process?

Okay. If not I'd like to introduce the four people. And if you would just step to the microphone. First I am going to call Carol Johnson who is the Deputy City Clerk from Manchester, New Hampshire. Anything you want to say, you can tell us about yourself.

MS. JOHNSON: Good afternoon, my name is Carol Johnson. I am from Manchester, New Hampshire and I am the local election official. I have been in this municipal business for 29 years, hopefully I don't look it. So I have been around for a while. I am a certified municipal clerk. I have been involved in the City Clerk's Office since 1988. It was not my first introduction to elections but that is where I started helping run them for the city.

I guess somebody said to me very nicely in the hallway a little while ago that with every great act there are some unattended consequences which is why I responded to the email.
My bio is not contained in the book which is why I am mentioning that although I have been around for a couple of years. I am a certified municipal clerk. I have worked as the mediator, if you will, with the state and a lot of local election officials in the process of delving out the processes that Howard has brought us.

And the reason for responding to all of that was I think local election officials are the ones that frequently advise State because we are in the nitty gritty and we are in with the details of it. And we frequently work with other municipal and local election officials and help get through the process in a positive manner which is not always easy talk but usually we can get there.

The Standards Board is very much that. It is in an advisory capacity but the devil is in the detail. And I think this is the Board that needs to focus on those details for the EAC. So with that I will part company because we have a lot on our agenda today.

Thank you.

MS. NIGHSWONGER: Thank you, Carol. Okay, Sandi Wasolowski. I hope I said that correctly Sandi is the Franklin City Clerk. She is from Franklin,
MS. WASOLOWSKI: Thank you. I am Sandi Wasolowski. You pronounced it pretty close.

I am the Director of Clerk Services, City Clerk for the city of Franklin, Wisconsin. As a local election official I represent 1850 local election officials in the state of Wisconsin. I have been involved in the administration of election since 1976. So for some 30 years that has been my desire my strong field.

I have been on the Standards Board since its inception. I briefly was the State of Wisconsin elections director and HAVA coordinator. I was-- I returned to the city of Franklin after a new months of doing that for the state. The weather in Washington has taken my throat and voice.

You can see on the bio that I have been involved with the state of Wisconsin HAVA State Plan Committee. I was a former member of the SVRS, the State Regulation Administration Steering Committee. I was-- I am still on the Standards Board for the state of Wisconsin. I am a member of the International Institute of Municipal Clerks. I am also a member of the Wisconsin Municipal Clerks Association. I am the past president of the Metro Milwaukee Municipal Clerks.
I would be honored to fill the unexpired term of Mike. And I will be brief and that is it.

MS. NIGHSWONGER: Thank you. You all have weird names, Ed Szczesniak, they are worse than my name Ed is from New York. He is Onondaga County Commissioner of Elections for Syracuse.

MR. SZCZESNIAK: Thank you. Good afternoon. The reason I responded positively I was selected and I was honored by back in 2003, January, to be selected to be as a local official on this Standards Board.

What I have attempted to do over the years is attend every meeting and be as active as I can in this particular group. I think it is a meaningful role for a very meaningful organization, the Election Assistance Commission in terms of the revolutionary impact it is having on elections administrations across this country.

Being from New York as you see I feel a little overwhelmed by three women and myself on this floor of candidates here. But what I want to say is rather than read through all my notes I have been involved in all levels from the local town level as a candidate, as a party official right through county level, state level and national level in terms of involvement in the party as well with elections.

I think I have a fair understanding what it looks like at the County level. And I happen to be from New York State. But we have had the distinction of being the only state that has had DOG lawsuit against it to enforce HAVA. And I won't take responsibility for the lawsuit. But I know the difficulty that you all are going through in terms of trying to make this work. And the time lines that Congress has set for us to try to make this work.

I think that participating in things like the Standards Board goes a long way toward making sure everyone understands how things are happening at the local level to make this thing happen. I think our mission, if there is one, is to have a can do attitude to make this system work whether it is through Best Practices or whatever. We can share that knowledge and do it right at the county level as well as the state level and of course it all becomes the Federal level.

So with that I would honored if you would consider me to be the replacement for the unexpired term. Thank you very much.
MS. NIGHSWONGER: There are other people trying to get rid of me, too. Last but not least, Tonni Bartholomew, is the City Clerk of Troy, Michigan.

MS. BARTHOLOMEW: Thank you very much for letting me have this opportunity to speak to you. I too am very interested in this Directors position on the Executive Board. I am a local clerk for a Municipality of about 90,000 people. I do everything from recruit people to code the devices. I have been involved at various levels in the State. I do instructions for the MNL as well as the Michigan Tactical Association and I have been involved on various advisory boards for the state of Michigan. I am currently Voter File Advisory Board. I was on the JEC for the State Devices for the State of Michigan.

If you talk to people from Michigan they will say I am a very detailed person. I am all about all about code standards and laws and if it says do it they we do it. I think I can lend that kind of expertise from my experience which I am much older than I look, I have been involved with elections since 1986,'87. And I would really like the opportunity to serve you and serve the people of the United States.

MS. NIGHSWONGER: Thank you, Tonni. How many of us can say we are older than we look?

Okay. If there is no objections we will proceed with the lucky new candidate to join us on this Executive Board. Oh yes, did we get the ballots past out? Would you pass the ballots out please and while you are doing that I want to remind you to vote for one, please do not over vote or under vote, vote for one. And if you can you can fold your ballot in half once. I am going to have Sarah and John collect the ballots. Sarah I am going to ask you to take this side of the room, on my right. John if you will collect the ballots on the left side of the room please. Todd would you like to get the map? So if you will mark your ballot and fold it in half they will pick up your ballot. And then we will have a group of people who will be counting the votes and we will announce to you on one of our breaks who the lucky person is.

Oh, yes, is there anyone in the room that did not respond to the first roll call? That is one thing I
I want to ask you. Julie as been running around trying to track down her luggage. That is always a hard thing.

Sara John and Todd are going to be picking up the ballots and I would like to remind you that voting members only will be marking the ballots. Polls are officially closed.

Again I would like to remind you before we close this session of our meeting I would just like to remind you if you are interested in serving on a nominating committee before the next meeting we will have to utilize a nominating committee in order to get-- Phil I believe there are two more positions on our Board that will be vacant by people-- Oh, three? One State and two local. If you're interested in serving on a nominating committee I would appreciate getting information about that so we can do this process appropriately at our next meeting.

Thank you so much. And we will move on into the next portion of our meetings. If I can get Commissioner Martinez' attention. He is in the hallway there. We will move on to our next report on Getting a report on Provisional Voting. So will the panel who going to be talking on Provisional Voting if you can.
come on up here we will give you our seats.

MR. MARTINEZ: We will move into our next presentation. We are, by my watch, about 11 minutes off schedule right now. So we will make up the time during break, or at some point we will figure out how to do that. I know some of you had plans after the meeting is over to get out of the hotel and so forth. So we will try to honor our agenda as closely as possible.

Out next pane will give us an important presentation on Provisional Voting. The Help America Vote Act requires as all of you know that the EAC at a minimum consider the development of voluntary guidance on any of the Title 3 requirements the Title 3 requirements of course for those of us with voting systems that require section 301, State Wide Voter Registration Voter Data Basis and Voter ID for certain voters that are in Section 303 and Section 302 which is Provisional Voting and Poling Place Signage. So in looking at that mandate that the EAC developed Voluntary Guidance on Provisional Voting, we felt we needed to commission some sound research and analysis on the issue of provisional voting.

We turned for that task to the Eagleton--

Tom, forgive me is it Eagleton Institute, yes, I almost lost it there, at Rutgers University. And in turn Eagleton Institute also brought in Moritz School of Law at the Ohio State University and thus we have Professor Edward Foley.

Tom O'Neil is the Project Manager, the lead consultant, if you will, to the EAC for the study that has been conducted on provisional voting. They will give you the details. We have been working with Tom now for perhaps the last eight or ten months perhaps longer than that. Lots of discussions about the issue. Tom will present, as well as professor Ed Foley who is the director of Election Law at Moritz program, an expert, well known national expert on election law issues covering the whole gamut of election law from redistricting to election administration.

We are very pleased to have their participation in this project. And particularly please to have them here today to present the draft product of what they have been working on and to answer your questions. What we have asked our presenters to do is give you an audio visual presentation that will be short and to the point we hope. After which our counsel Julie Thompson-Hodgkins is here. She is listed as the resource person and she will lead the discussion upon.

the end of the presentation. And we hope that you will be-- that you will not be shy in asking questions and give us your opinions and advice on the work product you are about to hear about.

With that, Tom, I will give you the podium.

DISCUSSION: DRAFT REPORT ON PROVISIONAL VOTING

Presenters: Thomas O'Neill, Provisional Voting/ Voter Identification Tim Vercellotti, Eagleton Institute.
Edward Foley, Election Law @ Moritz School of Law.

MR. O'NEIL: Thank you Commissioner Martinez, I am happy to be here. We regard the presentation we are making at this meeting as phase of our research. We are going to be presenting our final draft, report and recommendations. And we hope that it will elicit from you comments and questions that will become part and parcel of our research efforts to understand the dynamics of provisional voting in 2004 and going forward. And we hope that the states have much to learn from one another in the provisional voting process and that we can do something to act as a catalyst in that mutual learning exercise that all of you are engaged in here as members of this Board.
As Commissioner Martinez said we are looking at provisional voting. We have been working on this project just shy of a year. And today you're to see the sum of what we have concluded and our recommendations to the EAC. In term what we are recommending to the EAC is that they make recommendations for Best Practices to States and localities to improve the functioning of the provisional voting system.

Commissioner Martinez described the parties that are doing this, the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers State University in New Jersey, the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University which is well known for the website it maintains on election law all around the county.

Ed Foley and I are happy to be up here on the podium but we represent a larger group. This is the project management team. The principal investigators Dr. Ruth Mandel, the Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics. With us here today, from the Project Management Team, are Ingrid Reed, Ansa Cadgie from the Moritz College of Law and one of our lead researchers Tim Bersollti, Assistant Director from the Center of Public Interest Polling that undertook the survey of local election officials on which some of our findings are based.

We proceeded by looking at six questions that the EAC raised with us. And those questions are displayed on this slide they are basic, they are important and some of them I have to tell you are very hard indeed to answer.

How do states prepare for HAVA's Provisional Voting Requirements? How did preparation and performance vary between states that previously had some form of provisional ballot and those that did not?

We will be coming back to that issue several times via this report. And so we have developed a short hand for it. We call them Old states and New States. And I hope you will bear with me. If you come from one of those Old States we don't mean it personally.

How did litigation effect the implementation of provisional Voting? How effective was provisional voting in enfranchising qualified? Did state and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots? Did local election officials have a clear understanding on how to implement provisional voting?

To answer those questions we undertook several steps. Our aim being throughout this to provide the EAC with a strategy to engage the states in a continuing effort to strengthen the provisional voting process and increase the consistency, this is important, increase the consistency by which provisional voting was administered. Particularly consistency within the State as opposed to consistency on the States.

We surveyed 400 local election officials. We reviewed the EAC election day survey. We analyzed the states experience with provisional voting mostly on a statistical basis. We collected the provisional voting statutes and regulations for each State in the country. And in fact part of our deliverables to the EAC was a continuum of those statutes and regulations. And they will all be on one CD rom for easy access. And we analyzed the litigation that took place concerning provisional voting issues in 2004.

Summary of findings, again looking at this consistency issue which is so important. There was considerable variation among the States. HAVA allows the States considerable latitude in how to implement provisional voting including deciding who beyond the required categories of voters should receive provisional ballots. And how to determine which 052306 provisional ballots should be counted. We had just shy of two million ballots cast in 2004 and 63 percent of them were counted.

Now the variation of among the States is enormous. The percentage of provisional ballot in the total vote varied by a factor of a thousand. From as high as seven percent in Alaska to Vermont's six one thousands of one percent. Now that's like the lobster production between Maine and Utah. You don't find that large a difference among States on measures like this.

So there is an enormous variation.

And the portion of the provisional ballots counted varied significantly from 96 percent in Alaska to 6 percent in Delaware. We don't need to tell you is that the percentage of total votes cast rises in terms of provisional votes being a greater that becomes more and more significant in closer elections. If the election margin of victory is two percent but seven percent in provisional ballots that is a very different scenario than if one percent was of ballots are provisional but the victory was ten percent.

There are some sources of the variation among the States. Number one that jumped out at us was experience. The share of provisional ballots in the total vote was six times greater in states that had 20 used provisional ballots before than in States where 21 the provisional ballot was new before.
22 MR. VERCHELLOTTI: It is good to be an old 23
24 MR. O'NEILL: In the 25 states, 25 States
25 that had experience with provisional balloting 18 were 26 new.
27 Administrative arrangements. Simple
28 administrative differences also I think go a long way
29 in explaining the variation in the use of provisional 30 ballots.
31 The time to evaluate ballots. How much time
32 after the election do you give officials to determine 33 whether a provisional ballot should be counted? States
34 that provided less than a week, counted a little bit
35 more of a third of the provisional ballots counted.
36 States that permitted more than two weeks counted 61
37 percent. That time factor is important.
38 And voter registration data basis. States
39 with voter registration data basis, and there were only 40 a few of them in 2004, counted an average of only 20'
41 percent of the provisional ballots cast. States without 42 those data basis counted twice that number.
43 MR. FOLEY: If I can just underscore these two

22 points that you're going to hear throughout this presentation the importance of both of them. In other words the time to evaluate the ballots increasing the accuracy is a very important finding. And it leads to an issue on how to trade off the value of accuracy verses speed or completeness of finality of the election. And we will be talking ore about that.

Likewise another theme that will run throughout this presentation is the important relationship between the provisional voting system as one component of an overall election system with the registration data basis. Those two subsystems if you will are very much integrated as you know.

And they will be increasingly integrated under HAVA and under centralized voter data basis.

MR. O'NEILL: Now turning from looking at variation across States to variation within States.

We gathered county election-- provisional ballot data for 20 States. Had we been able to get data from all of the States at a county level the ranges and variation I am reporting to you might be wider than what we found. So bear that in mind. The rate of counting provisional ballots within the same State varied by as much as 90 to 100 percent among counties in the State. The resources available to administer provisional voting varied significantly within the same State.

The election day study found that staffing problems appeared to be particularly acute in jurisdictions in the lower income and education category. Small rural jurisdictions, large poor urban jurisdictions have higher rates of inadequate training for poll workers. The jurisdictions in poorer areas reported more inactive voter registrations and more provisional ballots cast. Richer areas had more poll workers per polling place and reported lower rates of staffing problems per precinct.

There are other effects that go beyond what is going on at the State other than scio-economic. Some reports from the states suggest possible sources of lack of consistency. You know Iowa cast some provisional not signed in the assigned precincts. Even thought the States policy was to count only those ballots cast in the correct precinct. So you could see how that would enlarge the variation among counties in the percentage of provisional votes that were cast.

Similar kinds of free lancing were going on in Washington state.

MR. FOLEY: Another theme that we found. There is a difference between the rules on the books and the rules as they were enforced in practice. And that obviously is of concern potentially in respect to litigation when we get to that point.

MR. O'NEILL: Turning to from this sort of summary in terms of what the variation was all about to some of the details of the answers we developed in each of the questions that were put to us by the EAC.

First how did States prepare for the provisional voting requirement? Most election officials we talked to in our survey received provisional voting instructions from State government. But the type and amount of that instructions varied very widely across the States. Almost all of them provided training or written instruction to precinct public poll workers. Only in about one in ten made available to poll workers the voter registration data base. Equally rare was training or written procedures... for poll workers to understand how provisional ballots would be evaluated.

Second question, how did preparation and performance vary between States, the old States and the new States? The local election officials in the old States felt more confident about exercising their responsibilities for provisional voting. As we earlier 18 States were new to provisional voting, 25 others had experience.

The New State officials I thought they did not receive enough information more frequently and felt and felt more funding was necessary to educate voters about, their rights to cast a provisional ballot.

Ballot.

Local Officials in the old states counted more ballots, were better prepared to direct voters to their correct precincts with maps and other types of information. And regarded provisional voting as easy to implement.

Officials from new states were more likely to believe that voters needed more information where to vote and to feel that provisional voting created unnecessary problems. There was much less if a response than from officials in the old states.
Mr. Foley: One could abstract from that provisional voting is a dynamic process. It is not static, it's not that HAVA created provisional voting and now we have it and we are done. There is a learning curve here. It is not an all or nothing situation. There are shades of gray involved. Sometimes it is sold as a safety mechanism, or fail safe. But the ability for it to perform as a fail safe is dependant on various factors. It's not automatic.

Mr. O'Neill: Question three: How did litigation effect the implementation of provisional voting?

Litigation before the election clarified voters rights. To sue in federal Court to remedy violations of HAVA; to receive provisional ballots even though they wouldn't be counted; have the voters be directed to the right precinct. And most of the litigations occurred too late to influence how states implemented provisional voting in the year 2004. Even with that finding I think it is a fair assessment to say that pre election litigation was more successful in changing the dynamic of at least the rules. And to clarify what the rules were going into election day. And therefore could be perceived as having some utility in the process. Post election litigation only invited
052306

6 more complexity, more problems, more uncertainty and 7 usually unsuccessful from the litigants perspective and 8 obviously for complicated from the administrative 9 perspective as well.

10 How effective was provisional voting in 11 enfranchising qualified voters?
12 And I suggested at the outset some of these 13 questions were very hard to answer. And this was among 14 the hardest. To know the answer to how effective was 15 provisional voting in providing that fail safe that Ed 16 just mentioned and you show up and your not on the 17 registration rolls how effective is getting that 18 provisional to you? Ideally to know that we have to 19 know the decisions that were made in 200,000 precincts 20 around the country. And we would have to know the 21 criteria that the evaluators of provisional ballot used
22 when the process came to them to decide which ones

1 counted and which ones didn't. And there is a 2 considerable element of individual eccentricity in 3 making these decisions. It is hard to predict and 4 therefore we had to look for a more abstract way to 5 have some kind of number to attach effectiveness. If 6 that batter hits the ball one third of the time as it 7 comes across the plate it is .333. So we are aiming for something not quite as precise as Ted Williams 405 but something that would at least put us in the order of magnitude.

We know that 1.2 million voters, or about one percent of the turnout, got to vote by provisional ballot who otherwise would have been turned away. But what is the denominator of that? What do you divide into? Well in 2000 the CalTech MIT voting technology estimated that two and a half million to four million votes were lost in the 2000 Presidential election because of registration mix ups or confusion at the polling place.

Now registration mix up and confusion at the polling place are pretty good description of what is going to put someone in the line for provisional ballot instead of to get on the regular machine. So 1.2 million voters casting a provisional ballot and maybe two and a half to three million figure in the number of them who were there but didn't get one, we figure that provisional balloting might just have been 50 percent effective in 2004. It's an approximation but it indicates something I think we all will agree about which is there is room for improvement.

Indeed legislative activity in the states following the 2004 election leads us to believe that the states themselves recognized that they were not satisfied with the effectiveness of their provisional voting systems and made efforts to improve that through legislation.

Question five: Did state and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots?

Again this is a topic of considerable interest. As we have already talked about there was little consistency among states and within states. That the use of provisional ballots was not distributed evenly across the country. In fact six states accounted for two thirds of all the provisional ballots cast. The share of provisional ballots in the total vote was six times greater in experiences states than in new states. The more rigorous the state's voter ID requirements the smaller percentage of provisional ballots that were counted. And new states with registration data bases counted 20 percent of the ballots past. Those without data bases counted more than double that rate, 44 percent.

MR. FOLEY: And I can add to that. The most common reason why a provisional ballot was not counted in most states it was reported that the provisional voter was not a registered voter. That was the reason given. What is poorly understood unfortunately at this point is what underlies the reason why that voter was not registered according to the system, yet that voter attested that to believing he or she was registered by HAVA. And what our research has shown, as Tom just suggested, is that there is a considerable variation both among states and within states as the method for checking whether nor note the provisional voter is registered.

The methods and the processes that the system uses to try to verify whether this ballot should count varied considerably. And there is very little rule guidance as to what that methodology should be. So an important part of our presentation today is the need to better understand that and to develop more guidelines. The theme here is there is just a lot of difference just about the mechanics on how to go about determining whether this voter is even an eligible.

MR. O'NEILL: Continuing on with the consistency question.

States that allowed out of precinct ballots counted 65 percent of the provisional ballots cast.

States that recognized only ballots cast in the proper precinct counted 42 percent. In old states the difference was greater than that 52 percent were counted in states requiring new district ballots and 70 percent were counted in those allowing other precinct ballots.

This aspect of the consistency issue takes us back to the time question. Fourteen states permitted less than a week to evaluate provisional ballots, they counted 35 percent of the ballots. Fifteen states between one and two weeks, they counted 47 percent of the ballot. And 14 states that permitted more than two weeks they counted 61 percent of the ballots. Just the administrative handling of the ballots makes a difference in the performance of the state.

Conclusions with this? The states have latitude on how they meet under the HAVA requirements.
A considerable degree of variation among the states are to be expected. And here is the interesting observation about that. If the variation among the states reflects differences in their political cultures it is likely to persist. If it reflects a learning curve for the new states figuring out how to do this provisional ballot thing then consistency among the states is likely to be achieved much more quickly than if some states have a fundamental philosophic objection to the concept of the provisional ballot.

Questions six: Did local election officials have a clear understanding on how to implement provisional voting?

What we did was ask the local officials themselves to characterize understanding. From a sample of about 400 of them around the country eight out of ten reported receiving instructions from state government; four out of ten, only four out of ten I should say, felt poll workers needed more training to understand their responsibilities.

Moving back now from asking the local officials themselves for some kind of objective evaluation on how the process was managed. The lack of consistency among and within states indicates the differences in how our election officials understand their responsibilities and managed the 2004 election.

In thinking through this body of information we have to recognize the existence of inconsistency of understanding between the states and within the states. Particularly of concern are the inconsistencies within a state. And that we need to forge away to approach this as a learning experience, a way to understand and explain the rules by which each state governs
And we will phrase this as a set of questions. Does the provisional ballot system distribute, collect, record and tally provisional ballots with sufficient accuracy as to be seen as procedurally legitimate by both supporters and opponents of the winning candidate. That is the acid test here.

Second: Does the provisional balloting system place administrative demands on local jurisdictions that are realistically related to the staff and other resources available to fulfill those demand?

Third: Is the variation within state great enough to cause concern that the system might not be administered uniformly from county to county.

MR. FOLEY: I just want to act on Tom's point about the acid test of legitimacy. The reason why clarity is so important to that is again because the provisional votes matter as you know when there is a close race and when there is a dispute about what to do with these ballots. Should they be verified or not? And if the rules for that process are unclear and disputable that casts everything in doubt. It casts the process in doubt; it casts the results of the election in doubt. So clarity is the first and most important value for bringing legitimacy to the process. Because it will be a process that unfolds after election day in the heat of the moment. And to avoid litigation, and particularly destabilizing litigation, clarity has to be the first priority.

MR. O'NEILL: In looking for clarity a place the states often turn to is the history of litigation. Litigation coming out of the 2004 election clarified the right of voters to receive provisional ballots even though the election officials were certain they would not be counted. And lawsuits prompted election officials to take better care in instructing precinct officials on how to notify voters about the needs and go to the correct precinct in order to cast a countable ballot. Those are the issues of clarity like we have just been discussing.

We recommending to the EAC that it recommend as Best Practices to states the promulgation of clear standards for evaluating provisions ballots. And provide training for the officials who will apply those ballots. We believe they should provide materials to local jurisdictions. To train polling workers on such procedures as how to locate polling places for potential voters who show up at the wrong place. And to think that the only permissible requirement to obtain a provisional ballot is an affirmation by that voter standing in front of a local election official that that voter is registered in the jurisdiction and eligible to vote in an election for federal office. And poll workers need the training to understand their duty to give those voters a provisional ballot.

MR. FOLEY: And on that point, on the voters affirmation, it's their sincere belief that they think that they are registered. The polling place is not the time or place to verify eligibility in determining whether the voter is correct or not.

And in that sense as a working rule, as a practical matter given long lines in a high turn out election, you know if a voter asks for provisional ballot they really ought to get one. Then you can figure out what to do with it later the one question that can be asked is: Do you really think you are registered? If they think they are registered they should get that provisional ballot. It should not be a complicated process to administer provisional voting at the precinct.

There maybe complexities that are unavoidable after election day. And again it might be best to minimize those complexities as we get into. But it is very, very important to stream line the process at the polling place itself. And so it should be virtually automatic that if a voter says: I think I am entitled to vote; that they get the provisional ballot.

MR. O'NEILL: We believe the general way the states can most effectively pursue improvements in the provisional voting process is to take a quality improvement approach.

Defining quality begins in asking how well the system works now. But figuring it out to how open it is to error, recognition and correction. And by asking how well our provisional voting process is connected to the other parts of the machine that they need to be well characterized to the registration and voter identification names. So to do all that requires a systematic quality improvement program that starts by collecting data that is not now generally available. The data collected should insure a list of the specific reasons why provisional ballots were not counted; measures of variance among jurisdictions, counties or even precincts; a hard look at the time actually required to evaluate the ballots by jurisdiction and then comparing that to what the statute or regulation allows in that state. If it is simply unrealistic what kind of changes are needed? And an accurate and timely report on provisional votes cast and counted by jurisdiction down to the precinct level so you can spot anomalies and take a look at where more poll worker training may necessary to get them up to the standard you would like the entire state operate at.

MR. FOLEY: Just to give an example of this. Most of you know about Washington State's experience with its gubernatorial election in 2004. That illustrated several things about this process. One of which was this issue is the provisional voter registered? And in some localities the answer came back yes, and this was not true by the way of only Washington State, this occurred in other states in lower profile races. So the answer comes down back "no, we have looked at our data base, our files and we don't have this voter as a registered voter." Then the question arises well they are not in the system but did you go back to the original voter registration card and see for whatever reason that card for a new registrant was not entered in the system in the run up to this particular election? Sure enough it turned out there were a substantial number of voters in Washington state, and elsewhere, that had submitted timely registration forms; that had submitted timely registration forms; had submitted procedurally proper registration forms and they should have been in the system but were not through no fault of their own. That's the very thing that a provisional voting fail safe is supposed to protect against. But it couldn't protect against it if the only checking mechanism is to go back to the data base as opposed to going back to the original voter registration card. The reason why the poll book, the precinct official has, didn't the registered voter is because they weren't in the system to begin with. So there was a match between what the poll book said and what the system said but the misstep was getting that card entered in the system in the first place given the high volume of new registrations filed at the deadline.
The courts ordered those forms to be entered into the system and ordered those provisional ballots to count several weeks after the election had already be certified.

So here is an example of where the methodology used and the process used determined what does it mean to be a registered voter really matters which is why there has to specific standards on that.

And that gets into the finality point, or the timing point that we have already talked about. If it takes, five, six, eight weeks to add those hundreds of voters to the certified total you run up against serious deadlines. You have past certification deadlines. In some cases you have past inauguration deadline. You have past the Federal so called safe harbor deadline for Presidential races.

So there was an ability to increase accuracy that had outcome determinative effects in terms of who was the winner of the governor's race in Washington. That final certification occurred two days before New Year's Eve. So again accuracy verses timing is a these that needs to be evaluated as you specify what are best practices for implementing the evaluation process.

MR. O'NEILL: The heart of this quality approach for improving the provisional voting process is to access each stage of the provisional voting process. Before the election the better the voters understand their rights and obligations the easier the system will be to manage and the more legitimate the appearance of the process.

At the polling place? Avoiding error at the polling place will allow more voters to cast a regular ballot and all others who requested cast a provisional ballot. In the evaluation process the clarity of the criteria for evaluating voter eligibility is critical to a sound process for deciding which of the cast provisional ballots should be counted.

And post election we believe the best practice is for states to consider how to complete, as Ed was just saying, all the steps in the evaluation of ballots and challenges to that determinations within the five weeks available in Presidential elections it is important top provide timely information to voters about the disposition of their provisional ballot. For instance having cast a provisional ballot this time are they now registered for future elections. They should know that. If not what do they need to do to be covered?

As I said at the opening we look at this briefing as an opportunity to continue our research by hearing from you. The detailed examination of each stage in the provisional voting process we hope can lay the foundation that each state needs to improve its system.

Efforts to improve provisional voting may be most effective as a part of a broader effort to strengthen voting systems. Collecting and analyzing data about those systems will enable states to identify which aspects of the registration and electoral process are most important into the provisions voting process. Responsible officials can then look to their registration system, their identification requirements, poll worker training, as ways to reduce the need for voters to cast their ballot provisionally and evaluate them consistently. Thank you and we are looking forward to our discussion.

MR. FOLEY: Likewise. Thank you.

And just one more general remark to share with you before turning it over for questions and so forth. If 2004 was a learning experience in terms of the provisional voting process. And we saw stresses imposed on that system and we were asking could the provisional voting process handle the stresses of a close election and the demands put on it. I think right now, two years later in 2006 we are in an interesting situation because there has been reaction to 2004, as Tomb said. There has been new legislation. Some of that new legislation has alleviated some of the stresses that were imposed onto the provisional voting system, having increased its ability to be the fail safe that HAVA and Congress spoke of. But some of the legislation and some of the developments candidly put more stresses on the provisional voting system. It is possible that as we go forward in elections this Fall and in the future we will see higher rates of provisional ballots past, not lower rates more demands in terms of how to evaluate them. Some of this again is maybe good and important for understandable reasons, but as the data bases get rolled out and as there are complexities in terms of rolling out the data bases that may cause more questions to be asked about the eligibility of a registered voter. And that may cause that voter to cast a provisional ballot whereas in the past the question would not have been raised and would have cast a regular ballot.

Likewise in the states without the voter ID requirements those new requirements may raise questions.
about eligibility causing more votes to be cast as provisional votes in stead of regular votes.

So that has created a rather interesting phenomenon and that HAVA said from a voting rights perspective, if you will, said we saw the situation in which a voter went to vote, turned up at the voting place on election day believing that they were entitled and then finding that they were purged, sometimes erroneously purged, and they were turned away. So what provisional voting was designed to do is to make sure no one was ever turned away like that. They could at least cast a provisional ballot and then we could ask questions.

Some of the new legislation and some of the new demands being put on the system have instead of saying this is really for the voter. They are saying this a reason to check eligible voters and therefore instead of using a provisional ballot to give the voter an opportunity so that they are not cast away we are going to use this provisional ballot so that the voter doesn't case a regular ballot. We are going to put them in the question mark category rather than the yes category which is different than putting them in the question mark category rather than the no category. But as that happens more questions marks get raised so more stress gets put on the system. Thank you.

MS. HODGKINS: Thank you Mr. O'Neill and Professor Foley. Members of the Standards Board we have about 35 minutes until the end of this session for your discussion, comments. I know many of you have questions about perhaps the methodology, their conclusions maybe experiences you would like to share. I am going to be here to make sure this is an orderly process. And as you had in your previous session there are several hand held mics that are around the room. If you will indicate to me that you're interested in making a statement will recognize you and then we bring a mic to you and let you speak. Please do remember to identify yourself before you start speaking Mr. Szczesniak?

MR. SZCZESNIAK: Yes. I guess through from the presentation I got the sense that many states as part of your survey have coworkers make the determination as to whether or not the provisional ballot was a good deal or not; is that correct, or was I misunderstanding something.

MR. O'NEILL: We did not mean to imply that.

MR. SZCZESNIAK: That's good because it didn't make any sense to me.
MR. FOLEY: It is after determination. And sometimes it's two after the facts that the process gets wrapped up. Sometimes it is two weeks. So there is considerable variation on how long the boards take to process the provisionals.

MR. O'NEILL: Another comment is many people that do put that out are the old states. But it is truly a fail safe provision and we focus that in the training of the inspectors, poll workers so they understand that nobody leaves the polling place without having had the opportunity to vote either on the machine, by court order or by provisional ballot.

MR. SZCZESNIAK: But many people cast a ballot thinking they are registered voters and they aren't. There is a requirement that we do not put in our poll box any inactive voters whether active or not.
Many people who show up at the right place but they just can't. We give them the affidavit and we check them out and give them a chance.

Some reason they are not counted is that people have moved within out jurisdiction. They are in the right church and the wrong pew. They are still eligible to vote but now with the new requirement and because of federal lawsuits says right church wrong pew that's okay. But if they are in the wrong church they just can't be counted. So we tell them to go to the right polling place if they want to get counted.

MS. HODGKINS: Mr. Kennedy?

MR. KENNEDY: Kevin Kennedy from Wisconsin. I have a question about the methodology in the sense that you have 43 states that do not include the six states with election day registration?

MR. O'NEILL: That is correct, yes.

MS. HODGKINS: Yes, ma'am behind Al.

MS. ROUST: Sue Roust from South Dakota. On page eight of your handout at the top that says: "EAC should recommend to the states that they" and one of the bullet points is: "Make clear the only permissible requirement to obtain a provisional ballot is an affirmation that the voter is registered in the jurisdiction and eligible to vote in a federal election."

Are you saying that you feel that the EAC should recommend that on that question of do you have to be at the right precinct or you just have to be eligible to be registered anywhere in the jurisdiction. Are you saying that the EAC should come down on the side that if you go to the wrong precinct that your registered somewhere in that jurisdiction that you should be allowed to vote or that your provisional ballot should count?

MR. FOLEY: Well first of all it is our understanding in examining the case law that has developed on this that HAVA itself does not require the states to adopt the so called wrong precinct you count the ballot rule.

So it couldn't be mandated as a matter of what HAVA requires. In terms of-- if EAC considers itself in a position to provide best practice type recommendations that aren't necessarily HAVA requirements then it could be considered whether or not as a policy matter is there something advisable. And actually in reference to the New York litigation it seemed that a middle step position is that if a state is going to allow for multiple precincts to exist within the same location and the voter shows up at the correct location but ends up in the wrong line at that location could that be considered attributable to administrative error as opposed to voter error? That was the holding of the New York case. So that the voter should get the benefit of the doubt if they go to the right place even if they ended up in the wrong line. And we thought as a policy matter that was appropriate to recommend as best practices. Beyond that probably it makes sense to say that as a matter of Federalism in federal law it's really up to the state whether to go beyond that.

MS. HODGKINS: Mr. Clark.

MR. CLARK: Bradley Clark from California.

I was just curious. How you on methodology how you selected your 400 jurisdictions to survey?

MR. O'NEILL: It was a stratified random sample we looked for size, a mix of size, a mix of urban and suburban and then selected randomly from within that. We have our poll director here if you would like more details.

MS. HODGKINS: Mr. Sholl.

MR. SHOLL: Howard Sholl from Delaware. I have a few comments.

First of all in your analysis you seemed to forget there are different types of provisional ballots. By that I mean in Delaware we had 300 and some odd provisional ballots that were cast between 400,000 people and you were saying we were doing a very good job. Well, actually if you would count our fail safe if someone changes an address instead of sending them to a different a different polling or giving them a provisional ballot we made every effort to qualify them and let them vote normal. So instead of having 6 percent rate that we counted you count the 6 or 7 thousand change of addresses that we did at the polling place we ended up counting 95 percent of our so called provisional ballots.

So there is a difference of what a state calls a provisional ballot. You will find that it varies across the country and that could effect your analysis to some degree.

Second of all. You are very correct information needs to be distributed to the election officials and their friends. It also needs to go to the media who consistently misrepresented what provisional voting was. The media in the Philadelphia market said you can vote anywhere you want to. Well that wrong in Pennsylvania, that was wrong in Delaware and I don't know about New Jersey. But people picked up information from elsewhere in the country and misrepresented it to their populations. So the media needs a heck of a lot of education about what provisional voting is so they don't misrepresent it to the voter, because we can't counter what the media blitz misrepresents.

MR. FOLEY: Well that underscores what we were saying were A this is a dynamic evolving process and not static. We couldn't agree more with that point.
Secondly we agreed very much as Tom said that there were challenges, methodological challenges in terms of finding the right data, evaluating the right data, and one theme in our recommendation, and you know-- besides we are a snapshot or synopsis of the larger report. But one theme is that a very helpful role that the EAC can play is that of data collection, data consistency in terms of terminology or data classification of data. So we hope that through this cycle of empirical studies is just the first in a series of cycles of empirical studies that increase knowledge and increase understanding of the mechanics of the process.

MR. O'NEILL: Can I respond also.

MS. HODGKINS: Sure.

MR. O'NEILL: Mr. Sholl you said that there are different kinds of provisional ballots in Delaware.
Is there more than one category of provisional ballot that you report? Or are there some sorts of things that provisional ballots aren't really provisional ballots as we have been referring to? When you talk about qualifying voters for instance to make sure that they can vote a regular ballot?

MR. SHOLL: Howard Sholl from Delaware.

No, we call a provisional ballot exactly what it is: it is a provisional ballot. It's the last chance to vote. So that's what we report, we don't report fail safe, what we call fail safe voting call. We update your address at the polling place, we verify the registration and we let them vote it. That's not in our lingo a provisional ballot. But it is in the lingo of other states what a provisional ballot is.

So when you're looking at Delaware versus Ohio versus California you're looking at apples and oranges.

MR. O'NEILL: Thank you.

MR. HODGKINS: The lady in the back and then we will come over here for Mr. Lomax.

MS. ANDERSON: Sharon Anderson from Minnesota.

My question is about limiting the study to 43 states that do not now have election day registration, and I guess North Dakota doesn't have registration at. I am curious about studying those EDR states in the future. And the reason that I ask that is I have spent my entire 27 years in the county office is riveted with election day registration. And certainly on election day in those EDR states is moving that whole decision making process to election day. And one of the slides that you were showing is training between the poll workers makes a big difference, I can assure you that makes a huge difference when you are an EDR state. So my question is based in the thought that perhaps perhaps things to be learned from EDR states that could improve the provisional ballot process.

MS. HODGKINS: Mr. Lomax?

MR. LOMAX: Harvey Lomax, Clark county, Nevada.

I guess your sources of variation you listed is the experience of the state and how long a time the state has given to resolve the provisional ballot. Yet I would suggest kind of piggy backing on what Howard said that the laws of the state-- if you take the laws of California and Nevada and look it the laws of who past the provisional ballot. They drive (sic) more the number of provisional ballots cast, how long it takes to resolve those issues and how many are going to be excepted. And most of that has to do with how people changes in address and if you allow changes in address up to the last minute.

In Nevada for instance no changes in address are allowed. So all we are dealing with are they registered or are they not registered. That's pretty much it. So it doesn't take us as long. And you're going to have a much higher rejection rate.

Just on the side a different issue. I can also speak loud and clear not all voters who show up and attest that they are registered voters even begin to qualify. In Nevada a high tourism state down there in Las Vegas in the 2004 elections we had people from all over the country insisting they had a right to vote in Nevada. And we let them vote provisionally and we didn't count them.

MR. FOLEY: And we are by no means suggesting that provisional votes should be counted if in fact the provisional voter was not properly registered voter. And in fact one of the problems that occurred in the state of Washington was the erroneous inclusion of provisional voters, of some provisional ballots in the final certified total that should not have been included. They were included prior to the evaluation process. So there are two possible errors. There is the exclusion of one that should have been validated. And the other kind of error is the inclusion of those that should not have been validated. In a well designed system we try to minimize both types of error.

MR. O'NEILL: Let me supplement that a little bit.

I think what is driving our recommendation is anybody that comes in and affirms that he or she is registered and eligible to get a provisional ballot is driven by the pressures on the poll workers on election day. And we gladly not see those poll workers time taken up by sort of a quasi traditional process in deciding whether any particular voter really deserves a provisional ballot. Everybody should get it and sort out later when you have a matter of weeks rather than matter of hours. That is the burden of our argument.

MS. HODGKINS: The gentleman in the blue shirt?

MR. TERWILLIGER: Bob Terwilliger from the state of Washington.

I hear categorizations of states by the way the they verify (inaudible) the ballot. You talk about a voters affidavit and current ID as if they exclusive. In the state of Washington we actually use three.
determine whether or not they get a mechanical ballot. The only thing we don't have is to return with your ID. If we have an affidavit on the envelope we check the signature. We also verify that he or she is an actual registered voter which to is three of the four that you list there.

MR. O'NEILL: We will clarify that.

MR. MILLER: Paul Miller also from the state of Washington.

And I was interested in your comments about going back and checking against the actual original registration card for a couple of reasons.

One the practical administration implications of that. And two because you cited Washington state specifically in regards to that. And I think that there may be possibly some misunderstanding as to what came out of the 2004 gubernatorial election in that regards.

First of all as a practical matter what I understand you to say is we ought to be going back and checking all of our voter registration cards to make sure we didn't inadvertently miss one or more. Obviously in King County where they have 1.2 million registered voters, as an administrative matter that is an impossibility.
Two, what I am understanding you to refer to actually is a little more complex; but, raises some additional questions I think you might want to investigate in your survey which is what can be remedied in voters registration when either the provisional affidavit is incomplete or when the original voter registration form is incomplete. If the person, for example, didn't sign the voter registration form they can't be made inactive registered voter. Can that be remedied with a provisional ballot and a signature verification if the address was an invalid address and couldn't be precincted can we give them a provisional ballot? Those are some of the kinds of issues that did come out and we were forced, in Washington, to clarify those kinds of questions.

MR. FOLEY: Those are really important questions. And absolutely that's where clarify is the primary value. It's much more important to have an answer to that question ahead of time that it matters what the answer is. So if the issue is a missing address we should ahead of time what the consequences of that missing address is. It either counts or it won't count. But at least you know the rule ahead of time So I absolutely agree with that.

MR. O'NEILL: And I believe the court case you are referring to is the Judge ordered King County to seek signatures for provisional when they hadn't signed the provisional ballot. That's my understanding of the decision in that case. My guess is that was the court case you were referring to.

MR. FOLEY: Well there were multiple cases as you know. And one piece of good news on this I do think the HAVA requirement of statewide centralized voter registration data bases will help because I think a well designed data base will always archive any retained historical records with respect to registered voter. In the event of a purge or in the event of some action on that registered voter you can go back and archive the history. And that will minimize to a considerable degree issues about the validity of the status should they arise in the context of a provisional ballot.

But there is still a question of the point of intake question. In other words until you get that registrant within the system, in the centralized data base there is a gap and we have seen it. It is not just in Washington. There are gaps in terms of forms delivered to DMV that are not transferred timely to the Board of Elections, who bears the burden of that risk?
Of course there is a different burden of risk if the form is delivered to one of the third party groups. And they make a mistake. I am not saying that all risks should be borne by the state. Some risk should be borne by the voters. Some risks maybe should be borne by the system. But the most important issue is to clarify ahead of time is who bears the risk of a missed form, and under what circumstances?

MS. HODGKINS: The gentleman in the back and then we will go to Mr. McCormack.
REGIS YOUNG: Regis Young from Pennsylvania.
You made several points about educating the polls workers throughout your presentation. But nowhere did you mention educating the news media. I am following up on what Howard mentioned before especially in Pennsylvania in 2004 the news media kind of took over our election by advertising and saying it doesn't matter if you're registered or not just go vote. It doesn't matter where you live just go vote to your nearest polling place. And I was wondering did you gather any statistics on your survey in Pennsylvania? We had a low percentage of counting the provisional ballots because of that. It was too late for us to get to the the news media to change.

I think it should be noted that on the national level the news media should be trained right down to the local newspapers.

MR. O'NEILL: They usually resist training.
MS. HODGKINS: Okay. Mr. Lindback and then Secretary Markowitz.

MR. LINDBACK: John Lindback, I am Director of Elections in Oregon.

You know we are one of those odd ball states where we do things very differently and it effects your study I am sure. One of those states that make you rip your hair out.

One of the things we found with implementation of state wide voter registration program is in a primary election last week is it appears that the number of provisional ballots went dramatically down because of our statewide voter registration system. It sort of strikes me that your research team lists us as a moving target in regards to the dynamics of elections changing in this country. And I sympathize with. And I am wondering if you could go back for a second to your slide on your quality improvement program because I have a question about that.

MR. O'NEILL: Tell me when.

MR. LINDBACK: That one. As election officials we get told we ought to do a lot of things. And in fact I have gotten kind of used to it. Ever since 2000 we have to do this and we have to do that we have to do a lot of things that are very good ideas. Rarely do we get a suggestion are we told how to do it. And a cost effective in a efficient way. And I am looking specifically for example at time required to evaluate ballots by jurisdiction.

When we get into that level of detain and data collection I need to hire a full time person to collect that data at election time. I don't have the budget to do that or the resources to do it and that kind of thing.

I think we are appreciated as election officials when folks from the academic world do studies and make recommendations. We don't only need recommendations on what we ought to do as to how we ought to do it and how we can do it in a cost effective and efficient way. I think if you folks would look at that specifically with request to these four suggestions because to me they look expensive and overwhelming is some respects when we are trying to collect the data.

MR. FOLEY: I hope we were sensitive to that.
we tried to be, maybe not sufficiently, but we wrestled with the notion of trying get specific. And there are downsides to getting too specific on some of these issues, particularly as to what date should this be done by. It also relates to a larger theme which I theme which I as an academic.

I think requires a dialogue between people who are implementing election law in practice as administrators and then people who are studying it. And a real genuine back and forth ongoing dynamic dialogue because what would it take to build an optimal provisional voting system is not an easy task just in terms of identifying the values. And there are trade off values, there is a trade off between accuracy and finality not to mention not to mention budgets and expenses. And I think it is unfair to election officials that the media in particular and public rhetoric demands more than is achievable. It is sort of an expectation that the system is going to be perfect that provisional voting is going to be that automatic fail safe.

I think one of the education functions that hopefully the EAC can play given its public profile is that there needs to be more sophisticated understanding that a well designed system can't promise too much. And it can work without the-- cars, you know well designed cars sometimes break down but we don't think the car was poorly designed because you have to take it to the shop every few years. And it may be that a well designed election system, you know, is still well designed it still functions appropriately given the budget and so forth even though it has glitches here and there.

I don't think the public is not quite at that point in the conversation, and hopefully our process and the EAC can help with that understanding.

MR. O'NEILL: We agree with the thrust of your comments I believe somewhere in here we have a bullet point that calls for an assessment of cost effectiveness of the kinds of regulations you set up to improve and evaluate provisional ballots.

You will find also here a specific reference to the check list that has been using, Colorado to 9 record the reasons provisional ballots were not 10 excepted with a simple three letter code and will allow 11 you to go back at the end of the election and process 12 and evaluate why persons are getting into the 13 provisional ballot line and why they are failing to 14 have their ballots evaluated and counted. It will give 15 you a check on the functioning of many parts of the 16 system.
17 And many of these pieces of information are 18 collected for other purposes. You know how many 19 provisional ballots are cast. You know how many are 20 counted. But they are not necessarily compiled in a way
21 that allows you to analyze the data at leisure once
22 the election is over. So in general what we are calling

23 for is using the data for two purposes; to call the 24 election and after it is all over to analyze why the 25 system worked the way it did in that particular 26 election. Your right it is a moving target and each 27 year will be a little different.
28 MS. HODGKINS; Secretary Markowitz? And Adam 29 if you wouldn't mind the gentleman on the front row
30 will be next and secretary Ruggiero will have the last 31 word.
32 MS. MARKOWITZ: Secretary of State, Deborah Markowitz from Vermont.

I like to go back to the comments from Delaware. As you continue to study this issue you look at what the goal of provisional balloting is and then evaluate how it is working state by state. Vermont is your lowest participant in provisional voting and that's because our-- we actually do something better than that like Delaware where we have affidavit voting. So somebody comes in-- and we have a terrible problem with motor voter, and I don't know about the rest of the other states, but routinely there are thousands of people who never make it on the voter rolls because those registration forms aren't filled out correctly and don't get to us or don't get to the right place and really, in most cases, through no fault of the voter. So for many years and we are called an old state with provisional balloting and we have resolved by allowing somebody to swear or affirm that they were registered and we simply add them to the check list on election day and allow them to vote.

In Vermont provisional voting is reflected in two things: One was town clerks or election officials who misunderstood provisional voting and used it instead of the activating list and we should have a lower number than that. Or there were people from Connecticut who come to Vermont and think they have a right to vote in any polling place because they are Americans. So we should say that we have something better that allows them to have an actual ballot.

MR. FOLEY: Oh, absolutely. Like Tom said and I will definitely repeat. A large number of provisional ballots cast in a jurisdiction is by no means necessarily a good thing. And a large number of provisional ballots counted is not necessarily a good thing because maybe those folks should have gotten an actual ballot in the first place, if it was determined that they were registered voters why weren't they voting a regular ballot.

Now, again, a fire extinguisher is good. It is good to have safety measures. It is good to have fire extinguisher if there is a fire that you have to put out. It would be nice to avoid the first in the first place. And some of the academic research that we drew upon was efforts to have improvements in registration systems that would avoid the need for provisional voting and put less stress on the on provisional voting precisely because provisional voting is after election day when the litigants want to gain the system. In other words in a post election environment there is inevitably going to be extra stress if the election is close. So it would be much, much better if you could reduce the number of provisional ballots cast and have those be actual ballots if that is a feasible thing. So that's why we talk about the relationship between the provisional voting system as a subsystem, with the data bases another subsystem. It is an important component and it is provided by HAVA and it is good to have fire extinguishes. But one needs and overall assessment of the totality of the states election system really to be able to evaluate its component that is provisional voting.

MR. BLEVINS: Don Blevins, Lexington, Kentucky. I have got a couple of things. Number one you say that everybody should get a provisional ballot. And the application, if we decide to put it in place, is not a good thing. We only allow a provisional ballot for federal elections only. And given that there is no such thing really as a federal election. There is an election day in America where we elect officers of a all levels of government including six cities where half a dozen people get together and decide they want to have a little city. So for those of us who administer elections on the local level we have to absorb the entire scheme of officers and issues that are on the ballot. So in our state the way we put it in place in a perfect situation we would never count a provisional ballot. We have it orchestrated so that that truly is a last resort. On the other hand we want the voters to be able to vote in all election issues and races that they are eligible to vote in. And when they choose the provisional ballot route they have opted out of that. So that is not necessarily the best route to go.

We have a statewide data base. We have had it for a long time. We have a leg up on the states that don't have that. And we have a telecommunications system that allows us check the registration. The size of the population of the state plays a roll we have four million people, two million registered voters.
They top that in Los Angeles county in California. So I can tell you from my administration we would have to look at this in a different context by virtue of sheer volume.

The second thing I want to point out to you is that I think the biggest over simplification that was in HAVA was this idea that we are not training poll workers well enough. Or we are not training the public well enough. I don't think the federal government has got enough money to train the electorate out there on how to do this voting. So the burden of the election on the county. When people talk about.

Educating poll workers I hear what I think must be a two, three or four day training session. And you're lucky if you get them in for 30, 40 minutes.
They have the attention span of a kindergartner. So this is over glorified and under appreciated that these poll workers are volunteers and get paid poorly. And until there is some heat built up on the state to put up more money poll workers were are we going to get that?

Another thing that HAVA wants is we are supposed to teach them a sensitivity about disabled. We are supposed to teach them about provisional ballots.
we have to teach them about state law and all this. You know, I don't know about anybody else but we get a them for two hours we have performed a miracle. So this idea of training being the answer to everything I think you are going to find between academics and practice there is a big over simplification difference.

MR. FOLEY: I think we are very much in the arena because it is because of that complexity and difficulty that out point about the practical rule of thumb is to give them a provisional ballot. And I stress that is when the poll workers are in a position to say I am in a position were I can not give this voter standing in front of me, or a would be voter, a regular ballot. Something has caused me to make the determination that they can't vote a regular ballot. They are not on my list; they don't have the right ID whatever. If at that point the voter says I don't want to go home empty handed I would like to vote a provisional ballot because I believe I am eligible it is at that point that our recommendation is don't take time to worry about that. You have too much on your mind poll worker. At that point you know you're not going to let them in the regular booth or regular ballot give them a provisional ballot. So it is not giving them a provisional ballot instead of letting them vote regularly. That is not an issue.

MR. O'NEILL: I did not follow one part of your comment, maybe you can straighten it out for me. You said you don't like the issue of the provisional ballot in Kentucky. And if you do the person who get it doesn't get to vote in a local election. That's the part I didn't understand.

MR. BLEVINS: We chose to make the provisional ballot only for federal elections. We went with HAVA in that regard that it only applied to federal elections.

MR. O'NEILL: I understand. Thank you.

MR. BLEVINS: And we did that for several reasons that may not make a lot sense here. Voter fraud, and vote ban and those sort of things.

MR. O'NEILL: You're talking to someone from New Jersey.

MS. HODGKINS: Thank you Mr. Blevins.

Secretary Rokita.

MR. ROKITA: I have a couple comments and a couple of questions if you can bear with me.

First of all for the record I also agree that there is much more relationship between this subject and ERA than to your research currently. And I would suggest doing a little more research in that regard. For example when EAC requires that full service agencies to continue to accept voter registrations it's a great thing. But you're also at the same time right after the election and if you would the election coming up after registering it might be driving more people to the polling place like NVRA requires only to have them cast a provisional ballot because the registrant won't let us pass. So issues like that I think might be right for some of your discussions.

What data point did you specifically come up to conclude that if someone is in the right polling site, all be it not the right precinct, that their ballot should count?

MR. FOLEY: It was a core decision, correct.

MR. ROKITA: I understand. Just for example a photo ID, I will use that as an example, are you saying that there is a coral effect between the time allowed to count a provisional ballot and the rate-- are you saying there is a causal effect and the rate of counting that provisional ballot and voter ID are you saying it causal?

MR. FOLEY: No. We found correlation if you will, I don't have the time but I could go into this more. But I don't think we are making a finding on causation.

MR. ROKITA: Well, if it is not causal I guess my point would be, so you can respond, what value is it to be in this report?

MR. O'NEILL: The existence of the correlation between having less time to evaluate ballots and with fewer ballots being excepted it is an indication to us that something is going on. We don't know exactly whether it is causative or merely highly correlated.
But whatever it is it makes it worth while looking at the time period allowed to evaluate ballots and try to figure out if it is causing it. And you can do that for instance by finding out are there a bunch of ballots that you never got to at the end of the process, the process was only three days long. It is worthy of further investigation.

My own suspicion is that the arrow of causality does flow that way but it is only a suspicion.

MR. FOLEY: And there would be reasons to look at the timing issue even if that data didn't exist. I mean it maybe anecdotal but I mean I keep referring to Washington but half of the Washington governor's race the process for evaluating the ballots shut down on the same date in 2004 as a matter of state law that the federal Supreme Court in Bush vs. Gore shut down the counting process in 2000, the current governor would be a different incumbent. So the fact that the process took longer than the five weeks that federal law allows for Presidential elections shows that timing can be outcome determinative.

And I simply wanted to share that knowledge with all of you as you determine for your own races what is the appropriate time table to utilize before bringing the process to conclusion.

MR. O'NEILL: And my recommendation for the EAC is that they be very careful with this research were things are not causal or currently suspicions that we say that.

I think at the outset with some of these subjects, and I am usually the first on up to bat, but some of the other subjects that we are going to deal with maybe the same way, maybe not. But these issue these themes are not conducive to very easy data gathering. I must have said that ten times here. And maybe it has to stop right there or slow down right there. Maybe there is value in just saying that, rather than try to fit a square peg in a round hole where these potential conclusions or these correlations that you're saying could be taken by the public as conclusion or causality when there really is none.

MS. HODGKINS: Thank you. Mr. Martinez, we do apologize for running this session over time but--

MR. MARTINEZ: That was great. We were looking for the kind of discussion we had today. It's very valuable to us. We are on the record and we can come back and really consider the comments. We really do appreciate them all and are looking for this kind of discussion.

I am speaking for myself and not the EAC in saying this. I think there is strong sentiment at the EAC, at least from my perspective, to evaluate in very sound and deliberative manner, Mr. Secretary, the kinds of reports of reports that were presented to you. Keep in mind these reports are from our consultants to the EAC and we are sharing them with you. These were not EAC reports that we have adopted and are presenting to you for final analysis.

There is a complete difference in those areas and that's why we took these extremely important steps to show you what the consultants have brought to us and sharing it with you at this stage in the development so we can then honor that importance to deliberate and contemplate very thoroughly before we embrace whether it is voluntary guidance or best practices. So we are... very much in that period. I encourage it for the rest of the discussions we are going to discuss.

All right. We are going to take a quick break our next topic will be Research on Poll Worker Recruitment.

Madam Chair, it is 4:20 and I am calling for a 15 minutes break or so. Reassemble in 15 minutes, please.

(Recess taken at 4:20 p.m., and reconvened at 4:40).

MR. MARTINEZ: We are starting again. We have one more session left. I know it has been a long afternoon full of a lot of information. We have one session left for today and tomorrow we will hit you again with a long session.

What we are going to do today is give you a presentation regarding another one of our contracted research projects and that is pertaining to poll worker recruitment, training and retention for poll workers who are generally used at the polls but targeted specifically as well to college poll workers, to the population of college poll workers.

We have a couple of consultants that we have hired that have done some tremendous work and want to share the results of that work. What I am going to do is ask Karen Lynn Dyson who we all heard before. She is our project research manager at the EAC and has been with us for quite some time now to stand up and give us a quick introduction of our project consultants and anything else she might want to say.

However I forgot I am supposed to recognize your chair, Peggy Nighswonger who wants to give you a quick piece of information, Madam Chair.

MS. NIGHSWONGER: Okay. I am just going to tell you that 66 ballots were counted successfully. So please welcome Tonni as our new Executive Director. We are leaving right after this session.

MR. MARTINEZ: Congratulations. Karen Lynn-Dyson will make the introductions and we will get to the last presentation of the afternoon.

MS. LYNN-DYSON: Commissioner Martinez just mentioned that I have been with the EAC for some time and I could swear either he said or Chairman Boyer said I have been here for years. He said a lifetime.

I am pleased to introduce two of our contractors Abby Horn who is to my immediate right. And Abbey is the Assistant Director for the Center for Election Integrity at Cleveland State University.
leads the Center as Acting Assistant Director and she came to the Center as a democracy for the United States for International Development and did a lot of work all over the world, primarily in Central America related to democracy and citizenship.

The Center for Election Integrity at Cleveland State University is a partnership of the Cleveland Marshall College of Law and the Massey, Goodman, Levine College of Urban Affairs. She draws upon the long-standing expertise from those colleges in electoral and regulatory law, public education and civic education. The Center for Election Integrity provides research, training, consultation to assist Ohio in becoming a national leader in transparent, legal, efficient and accurate elections. It is three organizations dedicated to three interconnected missions: To assist Ohio in becoming the national leader in elections; to help assure the citizens trust that their elections are fair, lawful and accurate and to undertake scholarly studies and offer recommendations on election administration and legal reform at the state, local and international level.

Again Abby is overseeing the Cleveland State's efforts related to college poll worker.

recruitment and training and retention.

Jennifer Collins-Foley to Abby's right is an attorney who has provided democracy development around the world since 1989 working with election administrators, civic organizations and political parties in the former Soviet Union, Central Asia and the Middle East.

Jennifer has served in the Elections Administration Community since 1996, spending seven years as Assistant Registrar of Voters of LA County. She now serves as an Election Administration Consultant. And has worked in recent years with us and on this project with IFES. And IFES for those of you who don't know was established in 1987 as a non governmental, non partisan, non profit organization. IFES has provided assistance to current elections, the rule of law, civil society and good government in more than a hundred countries including the US. IFES is headquartered in Washington with offices in nearly 30 countries and it specializes in technical assessments, poll worker training programs, technical observations, election commission management reviews and election equipment and commodities procurement systems.

IFES is the contractor for the Elections
Assistance Commission is doing work on the general poll worker recruitment and training and retention project. So with that I am going to turn it over to Jennifer who is going to make her presentation that will last for about 15 minutes. And then Abby will go for about 15 minutes. And then I will open it up for questions. Thank you.

RESEARCH ON POLL WORKER RECRUITMENT AND RETENTION (INCLUDING COLLEGE POLL WORKERS)

Presenters: Jennifer Collins-Foley, IFES.

Abby Horn, Cleveland State University
Karen Lynn-Dyson, EAC.

MS. COLLINS-FOLEY: First off I want to say it is an honor it is to work on this project because I am a self proclaimed poll geek. And to be part of a team that gets to look at these issues for 15 months and actually get paid for it. And talk to hundreds of election places across the country it's really neat. And I have been having a lot of fun with it.

Went over a little bit of where the project came from, of course it stems from a Help America Vote Act that is such an important program and is the heart
We were awarded this project in September 2005 and it goes until the end of this year 2006, a fifteen month applied research project. We are working under IFES, International Foundation Election Systems, and it has been terrific working with them. It is a fantastic international program offering technical systems to jurisdictions in the US, and visa versa offering models from the US to international partners.

I am President of an organization called the Poll Worker Institute which is a relatively new non profit focusing on poll worker issues in the US, and we have a Board that is quite active. Conny McCormack is on the Board; Beverly Kauffman from Harris County Texas and Lynn Shadman from Washington D.C. And we are also very fortunate to have the League of Women Voters working on this project as well. I don't have to introduce the League I guess.

What we have been working on these past 13 months is we have been partners with Cleveland State University to compile 50 state laws as they apply to poll workers to compile field tested practices in poll worker recruiting, training and retention. We pulled together a working group to give us guidance over the course of this program.

We conducted some focus groups with the League of Women Voters project earlier this year. We are developing a how to practical guide book which we will talk about in a few minutes. And I hope you have the job table of contents that was supposed to have been distributed to you earlier today. We will be conducting some pilot projects to test the guidebook.

I won't go too much into the compilation of state laws because Abby is going to talks about that more in a bit.

The three things we found really impacted the ability to have innovative poll worker programs were age requirement, obviously if you want to bring high school or college students in that can sometimes can be an impediment. Residency requirement become an issue if the poll worker can only serve in that precinct. They can start more innovative programs like corporate or college. And being required to be nominated by your political party can also achieve programs that are a little more out of the box.

We were very fortunate to partner with the National Association of Counties. They were going to do an intensive survey of counties on poll worker practices. So we worked with them to have their survey be as helpful to us as it could be in terms of collecting practices. We also went to some fabulous programs or collection of practices that had been put together by NEMS, by NASED, by IACREAT, the Election Center and the EAC. So we began pulling together practices that we thought were bordering on successful. Some of them were not so successful, bordering on best practices but certainly in the successful realm. Early on we started pulling together our guidebook and then of course together with NECO Survey we were thrilled that we got three hundred responses out of three thousand counties.

Before I was in this project I used to think a ten percent response rate that is terrible. But that is really good when you are doing research. And our research people was thrilled with that. And of course it has given us fabulous stuff to work from. So we are
I am going to be putting out some results soon. And it is going to be great on who is doing what kinds of practices; who doing what kind recruiting. We also pulled together a great working group to guide us through the projects. I should have mentioned earlier IFES and the poll workers we pulled together were a terrific group for consultants to work on this project. All retired or current election officials who really had some field tested practices to share.

And on our working group we had State Election Directors, two local election directors from large and small jurisdictions from large and small jurisdictions, Academic advisor a research advisor, an adult learning advisor and a training expert form the private sector. So we really were able to pull together some good folks to help us look at whether these programs we were compiling really are successful. We also were fortunate to have advocates from the multi lingual and voters with Disabilities community. We have tried to call in as many (inaudible) as we can in addition to the NECO survey we are really trying to find out what is going on out there and pulling in some practices, and our working group pulling some information from them. We also pulled together a round table with volunteers. Not all of us consider poll workers volunteers, in some places they do.

They gave us some pretty good thoughts on when you are working with volunteers apparently there is a growing trend in what we call episodic volunteers which means you get all your volunteering done in one big chunk. So really you would think that poll workers would follow that trend.

All you need to do is ask. And they said if you don't mind us telling you, your election officials don't ask the right questions if you're really going coworkers as volunteers. Uncle Sam needs you they tell us is a bomb. They advised us to think more about your community needs you on election day to serve in this place and this is what you are going to be doing. They said the more specific the request the better. So you're going to hear feedback from people who, like the Points of Light Foundation, people who are really in the field of volunteerism.

We talked to and interviewed training experts. A lot of you know Ray Hawkins and Robert Lovejoy (sic) absolute opinion leaders in the field. They gave us some terrific feedback. We had voters with Disability round table talk about some practices on recruiting poll workers with disabilities. And also some pieces that are going to go in our guidebook that are really good for sensitivity training. Getting your poll workers to go out there and, you know, really make polls set up the best way to accommodate these folks.

The League of Women Voters in an amazing two or three month period did 19 focus groups in 17 jurisdictions. Obviously they were trying to compile strategies and also to underscore some potential put falls. They came back with some shocking survey analysis which is that election officials do work on shoe string budgets. I was amazed to know that. They also said that election officials had limited staff, and also that the election environment system historically had little need for change. Those of you or started transitioning from punch card voting back in the 60's will welcome the change. I am not supposed to side with the focus group results.

Now some current reasons for change include a course of Help America Vote Act, bringing in new technology that will have big impacts on poll workers. The increase of public scrutiny of election administrators obviously we all under the microscope now. And that means our poll workers are under the microscope. Razor thin margins of electoral victories in recent elections. Obviously the candidates know who their voters are, and if they lose it must be our fault, or the poll workers fault. And finally the anticipated demographic changes that have served as agents for change. And this is everything from increasing needs to have more bilingual poll workers that kind of thing. So lots of change going on there.

The most common recruiting practices include word of mouth, personal networks, referrals, more people are paying more money. Lead poll workers in some places are selecting their own team. And some other very common recruiting practices, flyers, posters, adds. Check boxes on voter registration forms. This is traditionally you put something out there as an election official and the voter, the potential poll worker contacts you.

Some of the more innovative recruiting methods are where you find the partner and the partner gets you your poll workers and gets you-- instead of one poll worker they get you multiple poll workers. These programs include what we call county poll worker programs, also called governmental private sector, also called corporate poll worker programs, high school college student programs, civic organization programs and bilingual poll worker programs.

One thing that came out of the focus groups is that it is generally more difficult to recruit poll workers from lower income areas and very wealthy areas. And for those of you who have read or will read our guidebook you will see that the chapter that says: "Tips for Recruiting Poll Workers in Low Income Areas" is blank. And that's because we actually haven't found very many good tips. We have spoken to literally dozens of election officials in low income areas, that have to recruit for low income areas including me in Los Angeles, and we are drawing a blank. There really are not too many successful tips. We are getting there. We are talking to churches. If anybody has any ideas I am listening so please do let me know. Another thing that the focus group found is it is especially difficult to get technological savvy poll workers in economically disadvantaged areas.

When we put this in our guidebook we are going to say: "Well, you have two choices you can kill yourself trying to find tech savvy people in those precincts or you shut them down". So our guidebook we are really trying to be very practical.

Strategies that met with mixed results included recruiting a partnership of political parties.

Obviously there are practices out there of how many have this in their state law that you have to work with political parties. And the reality is that election officials have told us that this is mostly a bomb. Very few election officials have said: "Oh this is a fabulous recruiting technique." Most people have said this is the biggest pain in the neck ever. The people we get we can't place them, they are dead by the time-- I mean no disrespect. I mean very mixed results on this particular type of recruiting. Offering split shifts is another thing we found. First thing a voter on the street, a potential poll worker will say: "Well if I was offered split shifts I would be glad to do it." Then they find out that you-- that they have to find their partner because Hello we are not going to find their partner for them on the split shift and they quit. Or they say: "Do I have to share my stipend? There is no way I am doing that." So you know the perception is okay if we just this practice everything will be great. The reality is a little different. And our guidebook goes into some of these nuances.

And one things that has become a kind of undertone of our whole project is that there is, you know, strategies that give you the balmies (sic). Like you know we always talk laughingly about the breathing test. If they are breathing we will hire them. And those strategies really go by the wayside in the time when we are using new technologies and we are under the microscope and there are all these tight elections. We really need to be working on strategies that provide the best poll poll workers not just enough poll workers.

Some successful messages that the League came back with from their focus groups are based on the person you ask you need to ask is it a family; is it a neighbor is it somebody calling person to person asking some kind of connection. The more specific you can be the better. And stress the benefit to the community.

Key findings on poll worker training. We found that in the focus groups and also in the NECO (sic) Survey and also in talking to literally hundreds of election workers across the country there is a trend from moving away from talking head training more to hands on roll playing, setting up a full poll worker station, a full mock polling place and the training and allowing as much hands on as possible. And one interesting thing that we found in both the survey and the focus groups is that paying poll workers to attend training dramatically increases the people who turn out for your training programs.

I am going to read this because I think it is important: "The most important theme is--" You're supposed to read from your power point." That is one of the things that we learned when we were just developing our conflict chapter in the manual. You're not supposed to read from your manual but it is a good quote you are allowed to. "The most important thing to arise from the discussions of all the state holders is there is no magic bullet. There is not a one size fits all solutions for every jurisdiction or for reaching out to every population. Election officials must experiment to find the right balance for their jurisdictions needs." I am sure that does not surprise any of you. We all know everybody has had different site jurisdictions, different demographics, different support from your bosses, different size staffs. And so because this is a kind of a theme of our project.

Our guidebook has become what we call a recipe book. Let me share with you this is what I call my Betty Crocker Cookbook. And in our guidebook we actually do have practices that are the very basic, boiling an egg. And you know the hamburger version of recipe books. And in our guidebook we have some very basic practices such as word of mouth, or putting up a poster at the polling place. And this is the diet cookbook it's an Oprah cookbook. This is an analogy for the smaller jurisdictions that needed a different kind of recipe because they are trying to stretch their calories further sort of speak. Then you have the connoisseurs cookbook. So there are pieces of the guidebook that are a little bit more for a jurisdiction that is really trying to be cutting edge and wants to do all sorts of fancy new things, new ways of recruiting, new ways of training, fancy power points.
All of, you know, more hands on training. They have more money to pay for more in-depth training for some of their poll workers, some of their trouble shooters type of thing. And then we also have-- I have my little New York cookbook. This is to show that we were really ambitious in trying to get models from as many jurisdictions of different sizes and different resources as possible around the country. I promise you this is the end of my little cookbook schmeel.
So if you look at our table of contents you will see that we hope to have covered the whole realm of practices that are out there. We have called our, book successful practices. We didn't say they were best practices and what we tried to do as we talked to practitioners across the country, as we were gathering their thoughts on their programs and their practices and their tools we asked them Okay that's great but is this sustainable? Is this something you can keep doing for years to come? Or is this a one time things where you had a bunch of money and you have a fabulous employee who can champion it? Is it measurable? Is it something you can say okay this actually did have an impact of getting better poll workers or having people retain the training pieces better. And we also asked them is it replicable? Is it something that could only happen in your county? Or is it something that really can be shared with other counties, and they won't have to reinvent the wheel? Then what we did is when we found out, we got the responses, their nuance responses about their practices, and so in our book we also talk-- for each practice we have, we discuss the benefits of the practice, the pitfalls and challenges because we don't want other people to reinvent the wheel. Some tips for in making it happen in your jurisdiction. And we are also providing a methodology of whether it can work long term for you.

That's what the guidebook is. What the guidebook is not is it is not magic bullet. Obviously you're not going to read this guidebook and say: "okay, if I do all this good stuff I am going to have no problems getting fabulous poll workers. We are going to do the training and be brilliant on election day. What we hope is that you will pick and choose and really come out with some good stuff to chew on.

It is not a poll worker management program. We really had to step back from doing some of the management pieces because that's going to be in the EAC Management Guidelines for one thing. It wasn't part of our contract. Although we did cheat a little bit, we couldn't help ourselves we put in a chapter on Poll trouble shooters because although we are not technically poll workers we all know that they can be a fantastic saving grace on election day.

What we really hope is that this is not a static document. We are really hoping that all of you will think about ways that once this guidebook hits the streets, maybe at the end of this year, early next 1 year, that it will be, you know, disseminated as much as possible. Think about maybe having it discussed at lunches and conferences, on IACREAT conferences. Think about maybe at your state associations summer meetings. We are hoping that some of our workers can be on a speaker circuit to get out there and introduce them to folks that can't come to meetings like this. And if you can think about that we would ask you to do that in your feedback form.

We also have not yet, if any of you got the electronic copy of this, we haven't yet put in some of the models we have gotten because people are still getting us electronic models. We really would like to have as many models as possible. So if you can send us things electronically we really appreciate it. We haven't it in the book yet because then if becomes difficult to share it. And it would have blown out your systems, you know, if we sent it to you that way. But we are looking for more models. And we are going to be testing-- I am going to wrap this up because Karen just stood up. That is my sign to wrap this up.

We are going to be testing this guidebook in three pilot jurisdictions this summer. We are going to be going to be going to Hamilton County, Ohio, to Santa Fe New Mexico and to Milwaukee, Wisconsin. So we will be seeing if this guidebook really works. As as we go through changing or updating the guidebook to fit the realities of the jurisdictions that we are working with we definitely will be very happy to have more ideas more models from you all. So please look at that feedback form and provide us with, you know, some good stuff to put in here.

MS. HORN: I am Abergail Horn with the Center for Election Integrity from Cleveland State University. Thank you very much for having me today. It has been a real pleasure working with the EAC and an honor getting to speak to you all of you today.

I came to this not as a poll worker junkie or geek, I believe Jennifer said. But I have to admit that since working on this since October I guess I have to describe myself as a poll worker geek as well. But it is a proud term and we had a lot of fun with it.

Again, the Center for Election Integrity pulls expertise from the law school as well as the Urban Affairs College that has a focus on public administration so we really have a nice (inaudible) going. College students are in the learning mold. They are tech savvy. They tend to be young and more energetic. They are generally physically fit and can set up heavy equipment, carry things around. They tend to have more flexible schedules and this is my favorite, but no proven over time, but this is a hypothesis that if you hook them now you have them for the future. Not necessarily as a poll worker. But if you get them engaged now in a real way within the democratic process, within the electoral process they will see the value of it and they will become physically engaged individuals throughout their lifetime. So that is part of it and that's why I became part of the program. But it is not a panacea, it is not a solution for every jurisdiction for the entire nations shortage of poll workers. There are a bunch of hurdles and I am going to go into them in more detail both legal hurdles as well as structural and circumstantial.

The three main ones are students are often not registered to vote in the same state or in the county or sometimes were necessary in the precinct where they are living and where the college is. And that can be a problem. They generally do not want to work, nor do they want to commit to work for more than one election. " I know what my schedule is this semester and I am not signing up for anything that says I have to work more than this one". And indeed although they are flexible classes and assignments can get in the way and they can get in the way at the last minute about working on a full day schedule. That is why we put an emphasis in our guidebook in trying to get a university wide policy of excused absences for anyone who is going to be working as a poll worker. And that is something to work on as they get going.

Our project is set up in the same way that Jennifer's is in terms of having a project working group and having focus groups. We have a seven person team; three elections officials, three professors and indeed college students who are all providing us really wonderful feedback on the work as we move along.

We set out to collect what began from initial work to be best practices but we quickly included that to become effective strategies. We were really lucky. We had a wonderful pool of things to start looking at which was in 2004 the EAC provided grants to 15 different colleges and non profits to run college poll worker programs. So we looked at those really carefully, talked to most of them and got a really good sense of what worked for them and what didn't. We went on and looked at lots of different surveys and other materials. In fact Jennifer was a wonderful resource for us and fed us whenever she heard about college poll worker programs in different shapes and forms. And we have been following up in collecting lots of different examples. And please if you have any send them my way. My email will be at the end of this presentation. You may have it in your packet already, I'm not sure it already.

But, surprisingly, there are very few structured programs. And a lot of people look to colleges and Universities in getting students to be poll workers but they don't have ongoing relationship with a particular college or university with a structured program in place. Not a lot of overtime programs. And that's what we really focused on in our guidebook which is to develop a long term relationship between the election jurisdiction and the college or university.

We had four things for the focus groups and most of them we did. One with students who had worked as poll workers and one who did not. Overall their findings reiterated what we had already found through our research so that was great. We mainly talked to the students about incentives for being a poll worker and hurdles. And we pulled that all together.

The next part of the project was pulling together the state statutes requirements. We looked at the statutory law in all 50 states territories etcetera related case law, anything pertaining to college poll workers popped us as well as where applicable in some states that we had to also look at the administrative code and the state constitution and of course at times they were in conflict with each other. But that is just to be expected.

We then really-- it took a long time to confirm all the data that we had. And send out to all of the states their particular information trying to get confirmation. We're just about there. And if you happen to notice any errors in there let us know. We are in an ongoing cleaning up process of the data.

And then there is always this issue of the fact that sometimes practice at the local level is not quite equal with what the policies say. And that is true in many, many cases. And sometimes, quite frankly, that is a good thing because the policies were pretty new and if practiced exactly as they are written often times it would be really hard to get college students to work. And I will go into those later.
The state statues. We collected all the information and several more but I thought these were the more interesting ones so I stuck them up there.
Each state, we have a three or four page information sheet and that all will be available on the EAC website when this project is all done. You can click on the page and see various requirements for poll workers. We have synthesized that into a chart that is in our guidebook, and I believe you have a copy of the guidebook.

This leads me to the actual guidebook which some of you may have. I have a few color versions with me so if you're really excited about college poll workers and want to see the color version let me know and I will give you one of those.

One issue that we struggled with in writing is that we are writing for two different audiences. And I would love feedback from any of you on that in that we are writing for both elections officials who want to figure out to develop a program with college students.
As well as for college and university representatives who want to get their students more integrated. So they are really two very different audiences. And at times that can be challenging.

We have three different sort of call out boxes that you will notice in the handbook. We suggest handing these out prior to election day. And to consider using the students they make really great temporary election workers as things get hectic.

A how-to box for example we have one on how to develop a course reading, a big emphasis in the book is incorporating poll work into a class curriculum either has a service learning assignment or as extra credit. Or developing a whole course around the idea of citizenship. We have suggested reading that you might use to build a course around.

Ignore at your own risk for example one of the color boxes is designing equipment materials for college students be careful not to inadvertently insult your older veteran poll workers. You don't want to say we really need young smart people.

And there is a table of contents for the guidebook is a campus champion that is something we have put emphasis on. You really need to find somebody at the college or university who is going to be that champion a person who is really going to get out there put the word out and make it happen. At the same point you also need to have a strong liaison with the Election office.
Now I want to talk about retention and sustainability in college poll worker programs. We see that we are not able to retain these students. At most you're going to get a student for four years. And most likely you're not going to get the same student for their four years of college. But the emphasis is really on having sustainable programs. What you want to know is that you have this ongoing relationship that you work on and instruct with the local college or university. So that you can count on having 200 students every year. They may be different faces and have to go through the training and so on. But you know that you have those bodies and that your partner at the college is going to come through for you. And indeed they are going to be quality poll workers.

There are examples of various programs that we talk about in the guidebook. They really come in different shapes and sizes Professor Ken built it into the curriculum as a service assignment. As I explained that is great. It might pull in 25 to 30 students in the class that way.

Campus wide recruiting campaign posts a lot of information. A lot of the EAC grantees followed this model they might have gotten 150 students by just getting the word out.
22 provides five extra credits. At large universities they have ten political science classes each one with 200 students. It's a pool of 2000 potential students all offered five extra credit points. They bring in 250 students easily to be poll workers. I just added this one the university sent out a mass email. That is not really a program that is an ongoing relationship but in fact it can work because in Cleveland in a recent primary I ended up contacting the President of Cleveland State and a community college and a four year college and they all sent out massive emails to their students. Faculty and staff saying they needed people who could come and work at the elections. And they got a huge turnout despite the fact it was the week of finals.

We are going to be running three pilot projects that are basically designed to field test our guide book. The criteria there is having strong interest from the election official and from the school. We are really excited in conducting this project.

Some major findings just a few of them. The emphasis in these programs is developing that relationship. We are talking about having sustainable program you want to have the time for relationships building. And on the colleges side if you want to incorporate it into curriculum and into classes you have to get your faculty at least a semester before. They are going to be tweaking their curriculum and they need that time ahead to make that a reality. It is really important to start early to get everyone on board because if you're going to have a university wide policy of excused absences on election days of poll workers you better get working nine or ten months ahead of time in order for it to go through the university system.

Let's see, Jennifer mentioned you don't want to see Uncle Sam needs you but with college students really stressing the important in your message that they play that this is not just some boring game but that in fact explaining the importance of poll workers which is in the democratic process students find interesting and indeed motivates them. That said skip down to my last point which are the two best incentives which by far blew out every other incentive you could possibly think of.

First one is money and the second one is extra credit. So if you can work it through a college or university and professors to build it into their curriculum, fabulous. The students eat that up. And again students are cash starved.

Training on campus indeed should be very hands on, role playing, lots of questions. In our focus groups students complained about not being-- feeling intimidated to ask questions. So lots of question and answers. And emphasis on the etiquette and intergenerational communication.

Again off year elections are not sexy, it's going to be easiest to get college students engaged for the Presidential elections. But that said, indeed there are many examples of students working primary. And other students working in between presidential elections. It is not impossible but you need to recognize that.

In getting students you will be surprised how often or an assignment will pop up just a week before when you thought you had everybody signed up and they can't work on election days. So getting that commitment from the University or college is really important. Quickly on the legal impediments. Indeed most states require poll workers to be registered voters of the state, usually of the county and in fact usually a resident of the precinct that they are going to be working in. Now again that policy practice issue comes into play there a lot. That can be a big problem for a poor college student. Sometimes they don't want to change their registration from their home town to where they are at college. And then on the flip side some states restrict college students from registering to vote in their college town. That can also be a big legal impediment.

Political affiliation: Only six states don't provide require some sort of political affiliation. Now at the county level they are not necessarily relying on political party lists to get their poll workers. And the time requirements as I mentioned students really don't want to commit to more than one election so if they are required to sign on the line to work for two straight years every election they are going to balk.

And please sent me your ideas if you know of any projects out there I would love to hear about them.
And as you read through it any comments about format or language I would be more than happy to receive them any questions?

MR. BERNARD: Louie Bernard, Louisiana.

I wanted to ask Jennifer did you find somewhere that a split shift program that was really working. And B., was it the responsibility for the poll worker to find the partner or the election official?

MS. COLLINS-FOLEY: Interestingly enough we really tried to find a split shift program that really worked and we haven't found one. We found that most jurisdictions have tried it and given it up entirely. I talked to five different jurisdictions in Virginia last week. They said try this city or try Arlington I finally gave up. And then there are some that keep it just for the sake of showing that they are flexible. For example in Los Angeles County we found that poll workers don't want to do it. They don't want to find their own partner and they don't want to split the stipend. But we had to keep offering it just so we could say that we do. So we have a contract, you know and especially we found is that election officials are very reluctant to do this because you compromise the integrity of the process. What happens if the other person doesn't show up? That is the key thing for elections officials is that integrity issue. And we found that even the jurisdictions that had tried it and given it up would never allow the lead poll worker to split a shift. That was one thing that was constant. So we had in our guidebook that was a big chapter and we moved it into a one pager. It is out there and people do it with limited success. We kept it in there and there is a whole big section of the pitfalls and challenges so that nobody had any doubt that it was not the most successful practice.

MS. MARKOWITZ: Deborah Markowitz, Vermont. In Vermont we only use split shifts. The chief election official is there all day. And one of the things we recommend is that the people who count the votes, we hand count, except in eighty precincts and we recommend that the people who count are never the same people who sat there all day because it is hard to be precise at the end of the day. And we recommend for that late shift starting at three or four in the afternoon to school teachers. And that maybe useful for you for LA of some of these hard to places. Or they are people who work as bank tellers. They are very good at counting and are very precise. It is interesting although our chief election official in every polling place stays the same because you need continuity. But that is the only person that we recommend be there all day.

MS. FOLEY: I will definitely look into that because we are about to do a case study on your program.

MS. MARKOWITZ: You should also look at the fact that our polls open up at five in the morning. So it is a long day.

MS. JOHNSON: Carol Johnson, New Hampshire. We also do split shifts in our community in Manchester. And we do it quite successfully as well. We also have an interesting problem with people showing up for training sessions. We do a two hour training session before every single election. We have had as many eight elections in an 18 month period. What we found was as an incentive showing up we changed the ordinance that provides payment. So if they show up at the training session they get more money than if they don't show up at the training.

MS. FOLEY: I definitely will come up there as well. One of the things that is going to be in our guidebook is a discussion of the money and how there is this trend for add on's people had their base...
stipends. And then you can have all these little add-ons seem to be a trend. And we are hoping this could be used by election officials in their budgeting process. They have to go to their bosses and say hey we are at the low end of the spectrum we need to give our poll workers a raise for picking up supplies extra.

MS. BOWERS: Marilyn Bowers, South Carolina.

We were almost successful this year in getting legislation past to allow registered voters within the state to expand to the use of college students but got it knocked down. We will try again.

I don't know if anyone has thought about doing online training for poll workers I got the idea because I had do a course because I was with the EAC during activation. And we did online training. We went through the training chapter by chapter, took the test and received notice that you were certified.

When I checked into some programs that were out there they are very expensive initial cost plus yearly cost and the logistics of training large numbers prior to every election which our law requires it takes a lot of classes to do all those elections. You could reach a larger number of people by certifying them through a computer course.

MS. FOLEY: In the guidebook we have a whole chapter on online training. And we are adding models of training that is bringing in a vendor. And also we are doing home grown versions. We are also doing—in the jurisdictions that are doing their normal training classes and using the online training as a refresher. And we are also focusing on jurisdictions that are doing their entire training online with some heavy emphasis on evaluating, whether this is effective or not. Are they getting their teenage sons go through and answer the questions. There is some good stuff in there. And again if anybody has models we are looking for them. But we have some good stuff already.

MS. KIFFMEYER: Mary Kiffmyer from Minnesota.

First of all I just wanted to mention that National Associations of Secretary's of State regularly send out surveys. Our national association can reach immediately into many states and within the states. This is something that may make it a little easier to find out where some of this things are. It could be a good resource for you. Only because even in Minnesota we have election training program and video brochures. I have not see the references here but I just wanted to suggest that maybe before you add on's or something to use our national association. We could be a resource to help you gather some information and data. Maybe make some of those contacts you will be hearing about.

MS. FOLEY: Thank you.

We as well pay the part time workers. We choose to pay them a high rate. And we find that by doing that we can not only get housewives but we can get high school students. We use a lot of high school students that come in at 3 o'clock. We also do the add on pay for cell phone usage.

MS. LYNN-DYSON: One of the things I have not circled, Jennifer is you gave folks your contact information.

MS. FOLEY: One contact that you can use is IFES. Org.

And it is also on your feedback form at the table of contents that was a hand out.

MS. LYNN-DYSON: I think as the Election Assistance Commission moves forward through the summer on these pilot projects it will be-- and we actually get to the Fall get to the point with these manuals and the college and the general poll worker manuals and also with our materials that you have heard about this afternoon with our ballot design and polling place signage it will be extremely helpful to our agency and to me to have feedback on marketing and distribution of these materials.

We are very proud of them. We are pleased that we have them. They also represent a good deal of investment on the part of our agency and your federal government. So these documents will do no one no good if they are just sitting on our website and we are not going-- and people are not downloading them. Even in terms of actual production the old fashioned way and sitting on peoples book shelves collecting dust. So it would be very helpful to me to hear from you all about marketing and distribution of these products.

My email address is: Klynndyson@EAC.com so let me hear from you about our venues, setting, Mary mentioned mass. We certainly anticipate this summer through IACREAT and NASED and NEC meetings getting the word out. But I'd like to hear if you have any other ideas for us.

MR. MARTINEZ: Thank you very much for a very successful session. We are done for the afternoon. I am going to turn the mic over to MS. Nighswonger and let her any final remarks. Tomorrow we have a continental breakfast that starts at 8 a.m., I am told they should be set up at 7:35. We will start our first session promptly at 8:30. Tomorrow's topics are very important. We start with a presentation on management guidelines and we go throughout the morning until 4:30 on important subjects that we are doing research on. And I can't think of any other announcements to end our day. Madam Chair?

MR. NIGHSWONGER: All right. I just want to thank all off the staff for their help, the interpreters we appreciate their long day. And also our court reporter. And I think if there are no objections we will adjourn for the evening. (Thereupon, the above meeting was adjourned for the evening at approximately 5:35 o'clock, p.m.)
CERTIFICATE OF COURT REPORTER

I, Pauline Jansen, court reporter in and for the District of Columbia, before whom the foregoing meeting was taken, do hereby certify that the meeting was taken by me at the time and place mentioned in the caption hereof and thereafter transcribed by me; that said transcript is a true record of the meeting.

QUESTIONS RAISED BY THE EAC

1. How did states prepare for HAVA’s provisional voting requirements?

2. How did preparation and performance vary between states that had previously had some form of Provisional Ballot and those did not?

3. How did litigation affect the implementation of Provisional Voting?

4. How effective was provisional voting in enfranchising qualified voters?

5. Did State and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots?

6. Did local election officials have a clear understanding of how to implement provisional voting?
TO ANSWER THOSE QUESTIONS

- Surveyed 400 local election officials
- Reviewed the EAC's Election Day Survey
- Analyzed states' experience with provisional voting:
  - use of statewide registration database
  - treatment of out-of-precinct ballots
  - use of different approaches to voter ID
  - consistency
  - time period allowed for ballot evaluation
- Collected provisional voting statutes and regulations
- Analyzed litigation
Variation among the states

- In 2004 nationwide about 1.9 million provisional ballots cast, 1.2 million, or just over 63%, were counted.

- The percentage of provisional ballots in the total vote varied by a factor of 1,000 -- from a high of 7% in Alaska to Vermont's 0.006%.

- The portion of provisional ballots cast that were counted ranged from 96% in Alaska to 6% in Delaware.
Some sources of variation among states

Experience
Share of provisional ballots in the total vote was 6 times greater in states that had used provisional ballots before than in states where the provisional ballot was new.

Administrative Arrangements
Time to evaluate ballots
-- States that provided less than one week counted an average of 35.4% of their ballots.
-- States that permitted more than 2 weeks counted 60.8%.

Voter registration data bases
-- States with voter registration databases counted an average of 20% of the provisional ballots cast.
-- States without databases counted 44%. [1]
Variation within states

Rate of counting provisional ballots varied by as much as 90% to 100% among counties in the same state.

Resources available to administer provisional voting varied.---The Election Day Study found that staffing problems appeared to be particularly acute for jurisdictions in the lowest income and education categories.
--Small, rural jurisdictions and large, urban jurisdictions reported higher rates of an inadequate number of poll workers.
--Jurisdictions in poor areas reported more inactive voter registrations and more provisional ballots cast.
--Richer areas had more poll workers per polling place and reported lower rates of staffing problems per precinct.
1. How did states prepare for HAVA's provisional voting requirements?

Most election officials received provisional voting instructions from state government. The type and amount of instruction received varied widely across the states.

Almost all provided training or written instruction to precinct-level poll workers on how to administer provisional ballots.

- Only about 1 in 10 made available to poll workers a voter registration database.

- Almost equally rare were training and written procedures for poll workers on the counting of provisional ballots.
2. How did preparation and performance vary between states that had previously had some form of provisional ballot and those that did not?

Local election officials in the “old” states felt more confident.

18 states were new to provisional voting; 25 others had experience.

“New” state officials felt:

-- Voters did not receive enough information about where to cast a provisional ballot in order to be counted.
-- More funding was needed to educate voters about their rights to cast a provisional ballot.

Provisional ballots in “old states”: more than 2% of the total vote, 4 times the proportion in “new” states.

Counting provisional ballots in the final vote, the “old” states averaged 58% nearly double the average (33%) in “new” states.
Question 3: How did litigation affect the implementation of Provisional Voting?

Pre-election litigation clarified voters' rights to:

- Sue in federal court to remedy violations of HAVA
- Receive provisional ballots, even though they would not be counted
- Be directed to the correct precinct
- Most pre-election litigation occurred too late to influence how states implemented provisional voting.
4. How effective was provisional voting in enfranchising qualified voters?

Provisional ballots enfranchised 1.2 million voters, or 1.01% of turnout, who otherwise would have been turned away.

The number of voters who could be helped by provisional voting may be about 2.5 – 3 million. Provisional voting might be about 50% effective.

There is room for improvement.

Legislative activity gives evidence that states were not satisfied with the effectiveness of their provisional voting systems.

Those voting with provisional ballots in states with experience were enfranchised more frequently than those in the “new” states.
Question 5: Did State and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots?

Little consistency existed among and within states. The use of provisional ballots was not distributed evenly across the country. A few states accounted for most of the ballots cast.

Share of provisional ballots in the total vote was six times greater in experienced states than in new states.

More rigorous the state’s Voter ID requirements the smaller the percentage of provisional ballots that were counted.

“New” states with registration databases counted 20% of the ballots cast. Those without databases counted more than double that rate (44%).
Question 5: Did state and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots?

In-precinct versus out-of-precinct states had different outcomes.

States that allowed out-of-precinct ballots counted 56% of the provisional ballots.

States that recognized only ballots cast in the proper precinct counted an average of 42% of provisional ballots cast.

In “old” states, this difference was greater.

52% of ballots cast were counted in states requiring in-district ballots, 70% were counted in those allowing out-of-precinct ballots.
Question 5: Did State and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots?

States that provide a longer the time to evaluate provisional ballots counted a higher proportion of those ballots.

14 states permitted less than 1 week: 35.4%
15 states permitted 1 – 2 weeks: 47.1% 14 states permitted more than 2 week: 60.8%

Effect felt most strongly in states where more than 1% of the overall turnout was of provisional ballots.

Less than 1 week: 58.6%
1 – 2 weeks: 65.0%
More than 2 weeks: 73.8%.
Question 5: Did State and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots?

Conclusions
States have latitude in how they meet HAVA requirements.
A considerable degree of variation among the states is to be expected.
If that variation stems from differences in political culture among the states, it is likely to persist. If it reflects a learning curve for “new” states, consistency may increase more quickly.
Question 6: Did local election officials have a clear understanding of how to implement provisional voting?

8 out of 10 county-level elections officials reported receiving instructions from their state government.

4 out of 10 local election officials felt poll workers needed more training to understand their responsibilities.

Objectively, how well did the process appear to be managed?

Lack of consistency among and within states indicates wide differences in understanding by election officials.

The number of states that have amended statutes on provisional voting to include poll worker training is a sign of dissatisfaction with the level of understanding in 2004.
RECOMMENDATIONS TO THE EAC

BEST PRACTICES
The importance of clarity

EAC should emphasize the importance of clarity in the rules by which each state governs provisional voting. Does the provisional ballot system:

1. Distribute, collect, record, and tally provisional ballots with sufficient accuracy to be seen as procedurally legitimate by both supporters and opponents of the winning candidate?

2. Place administrative demands on local jurisdictions that are realistically related to the staff and other resources available?

3. Display variation within the state great enough to cause concern that the system may not be administered uniformly from county to county?
Lessons of litigation for achieving clarity

Look to litigation from the 2004 election to shape new statutes or regulations that will increase the clarity of provisional voting procedures, increase predictability, and bolster confidence in the system.

1. Litigation clarified the right of voters to receive provisional ballots, even though the election officials were certain they would not be counted.

2. Lawsuits prompted election officials to take better care in instructing precinct officials on how to notify voters about the need to go to the correct precinct in order to cast a countable ballot.
EAC should recommend to the states that they:

- Promulgate clear standards for evaluating provisional ballots, and provide training for the officials who will apply those standards.

- Provide materials for local jurisdictions to train poll workers on such procedures as how to locate polling places for potential voters who show up at the wrong place.

- Make clear that the only permissible requirement to obtain a provisional ballot is an affirmation that the voter is registered in the jurisdiction and eligible to vote in an election for federal office.

  -- Provide poll workers the training they need to understand their duty to give those voters a provisional ballot.
EAC should recommend quality improvement

Begin a systematic quality improvement program by collecting data on the provisional voting process. Data collected should include:

- Specific reasons why provisional ballots were not counted
- Measures of variance among jurisdiction
- Time required to evaluate ballots by jurisdiction
- Provisional votes cast and counted by jurisdiction
Assess each stage of the provisional voting process

Before the election
• Clear information for voters on websites and in sample ballots.
• Training materials in every jurisdiction make poll workers familiar with the options available to voters.

At the polling place
• Design of provisional ballot.
• Estimate supply of provisional ballots needed at polling places.

Evaluating provisional ballots
• Define and adopt a reasonable period for voters who lack ID or other eligibility information bearing to provide it.
• A voter’s provisional ballot should count so long as the voter cast that ballot at the correct polling site even if at the wrong precinct within that location.
• Follow written procedure or checklist to record why a provisional ballot is rejected.
Assess each stage of the provisional voting process

Post-election

Best practice is for states to consider how to complete all steps in the evaluation of ballots and challenges to those determinations within the five weeks available in presidential elections.

Provide timely information to voters about the disposition of their provisional ballot.

-- Are they now registered for future elections?
-- If not, what they need to do to become registered?

DISCUSSION AND QUESTIONS

May 2006
Tom/Karen:

Here is an email from Dan Lowenstein (presenter in LaJolla and co-editor of Election Law Journal) who made some suggestions on names for the voter fraud work we are trying to do. Perhaps a call to Bruce Cain at Berkeley would be appropriate.

Karen, what do you think?

Ray,

Before I read Rick's message, Steve Ansolabehere was the first name that came to my mind. This assumes you are looking for part-time, not full-time consultants. I would categorize Steve as very moderate left. I am not certain he is Democrat but would be very surprised to learn he is not. But the main thing about him is that he calls things as he sees them. So if you found a Republican with the same characteristics, that would be ideal. Charles Bullock of the University of Georgia would be a possibility. (Actually, I'm not sure of his party either, but I think he may be a Republican.)

I would also suggest you talk to Bruce Cain in the Institute of Governmental Studies at Berkeley. He is very savvy and knows more political scientists than Rick and I do.
When I have questions about the political science profession, he's usually the person I go to. His phone number is 510-642-1739. He is also going to be running a UC office in Washington, so he will be more or less living there for the indefinite future. He is someone you ought to get to know.

Subject: Re: Follow-up

We are now editing articles for our next issue, which is due out in October. We need to get everything to the printer for this issue in mid-July. So we'd need something from you by early July if it were to make it into that issue. Our deadlines after that are about three months later for each issue.

As far as researchers, I give my highest recommendation to Steve Ansolabehere of MIT, who has already done a bit of research on this issue. He is truly one of the top political scientists in the country working in this field, and he is careful and very fair (I don't know whether I'd count him as "left" or "right").

Dan may have other ideas.

Rick / Dan:

Thanks for the follow-up. As I mentioned to Dan in La Jolla, I do want to commit to doing a paper for ELJ. Aside from my own interest in election law and election administration, I think it is important for your readers to gain a better understanding of the role of the EAC and all that we are doing, particularly in the area of voting system standards and certification. Please tell me what the new deadline is and I will make sure to get you an outline of my intended submission, and of course, a timely draft for your consideration. Thanks again to both of you for the continued opportunity.

On a related note, in Section 241 of HAVA, Congress gives the EAC a laundry list of possible research topics related to improving the process of election administration. Among the suggested topics are the following:

"(6) Nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office;
(7) Identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation."

In order to get this research project started, the EAC would like to engage two research consultants who could bring some level of knowledge and expertise to the table and help the commissioners to come to an agreement on the framework and/or scope of such a research project. Rather than sending something out on the listserve, I thought I would directly solicit your opinions about any names in the academic field that you think we ought to consider. The reason we are looking to employ two consultants is because we would like to achieve a political balance -- one from the left, and one from the right, so to speak. Any thoughts you have on this would be greatly appreciated.

In his note regarding the Eagleton contract, Hans has raised some of the same concerns I raised from the beginning of any discussions I had regarding this contract with our staff, and at our first formal meeting with Eagleton. In reviewing their work product from time to time, I continue to have concerns about a lack of balanced input and have repeatedly voiced them with staff and with Eagleton. I did this when the initial peer review group was proposed and again during their presentation at our meeting in Pasadena (the outreach slide in their public presentation showed outreach to seven groups, of which only one could be considered conservative-leaning). Now, as I have just had the opportunity to read their July progress report, it appears that Eagleton seems to be going into a larger analysis of the voter fraud issue than was authorized in the contract. My suspicion is that Dan Tokaji is injecting his views into this to dismiss or diminish the concerns some people may have about voter fraud. I could be wrong, but his previous writings lead me to believe otherwise.

I only found one mention of voter fraud in the contract with Eagleton. It is in Section 3.5 regarding provisional voting, where it discusses “minimizing opportunity for voter fraud.” Yet, on page 4 of the July progress report from Eagleton, in describing their work plan for the next month it states: “we will expand upon vote fraud research and examine further the relationship between instances of vote fraud and ensuing election reforms.” This clearly seems to be going beyond the mandate we gave them as I thought they were going to be looking at voter fraud relating to provisional voting (as the contract calls for), not voter fraud as it relates to election reforms. While voter fraud was never mentioned in the contract regarding the voter ID issue, page 5 of their July report indicates that their narratives “will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud.” In addition to this, page 6 describes a look into the “relationship between voter ID regime and vote fraud.”

Voter fraud is clearly an issue that is perceived differently from the Right and from the Left. I have struggled with determining what a clear definition of voter fraud is myself, and therefore want to obtain various perspectives and good analysis on this issue before I formulate a solid conclusion in my mind. It has been my understanding all along that the whole voter fraud/voter intimidation issue is going to studied by the EAC using a balanced group of consultants—not Eagleton and Moritz, who are likely to focus on just on the number of prosecutions of voter fraud, rather than the complaints made or the fact that many election officials are frustrated that some prosecutors don’t take their complaints about voter fraud seriously. I am not convinced at this point that we will get a balanced and objective study from Eagleton/Moritz on voter fraud. I am puzzled on why they seem to be expending a significant portion of their time on this and would want to know if we somehow authorized them to do more research into the voter fraud issue.

On page 7 of their July report Eagleton indicates that communications with the EAC on the Peer Review Group “were not clear or timely.” I would like to know what this refers to. Also, I may have missed it, but do not recall seeing the final list of who is serving as the Peer Review group.

The August 15th copy of the July report that I received from Karen did not include the attachment of the financial report of expenses incurred. I would like to see that attachment.

Outside of our NIST work, this contract represents our largest single outside expenditure of our operational funds. Any single expenditure of $500,000+ needs to be closely monitored. I, for one, am not going to sign off on any report that appears to have been written from a biased viewpoint, especially one that doesn't appear to be interested in hearing from conservative organizations or right-leaning researchers, or seems to minimize any input from them. I've already had questions from congressional staff and others on why we picked Eagleton and Moritz, as they are perceived by some as biased against Republicans. I assured the critics that we have insisted all along on an objective study from Eagleton. An unbalanced or biased study from them will not only hurt my credibility, but also that of the EAC. I’m not suggesting that we stop their work, but I do want Tom and Julie to inform them in no uncertain terms that we will not accept a report that does not seriously consider all viewpoints on provisional voting and the voter ID issue, and that any study or interpretations they present to us reflect a diversity of opinions on these subjects. We also need for staff to determine whether their considerable work into the voter fraud area is authorized in the contract. We should not be paying for and receiving work we did not authorize.

The contract clearly calls for "alternative approaches" on voter ID requirements and "alternatives" on provisional voting. I agreed to support this contract to Eagleton because I was assured that we would receive a variety of approaches from their work, and not just those from a liberal perspective.

Subject: Eagleton

Paul:

I am directing this email only to the commissioners, because I don't think we should air our disagreements among staff until we have at least had a chance to discuss controversial issues with each other in person. It appears from Gracia's email that we will have a chance to do so next week in Denver.

In the meantime, I feel compelled to respond to your email regarding Eagleton.

(1) As I stated last night in my email to Hans, we have an on-going responsibility to monitor the expenditure of all our federal funds, including to government contractors who are contractually obligated to deliver unbiased research. However, I will remind you that we did not contract with Eagleton merely to provide a compilation of state laws and procedures. Rather, we contracted with Eagleton (and indirectly with Moritz through Eagleton) to provide both research AND analysis of provisional voting and voter ID. Invariably, the analysis portion of their final product will be from a professional (and institutional) perspective, and will NOT represent any one researcher's personal point of view. If it does, then Eagleton and Moritz risk damaging their credibility not just with the EAC, but with other federal government agencies which undoubtedly contract with their respective institutions on other projects. I doubt seriously that either institution would risk such damage and allow one team member to inject bias into the work. Moreover, the peer review group that is (or has) been assembled by Eagleton is designed to cure any lingering concerns about potential institutional or personal bias...Eagleton has been responsive to your feedback on this issue, to the point where they have removed all perspective representatives of the advocacy community on the peer review group (because they felt they could not achieve political "balance" from the advocacy groups). If there is some person (or persons) which you would like to see Eagleton include in the review group, it is my understanding that such inclusion is but a mere phone call away.

(2) You will recall that at our meeting last week, I raised the exact same concern about the Eagleton progress report, and asked for clarification from staff regarding the details of this particular work (i.e., fraud) on the part of Eagleton. I expect staff (or us directly) to ask questions of Eagleton (as we would any contractor) and determine if their work in this area is within the scope of work (and contract) we all agreed to. If it isn't then we re-direct them, just as we have done, for example with Kim Brace and EDS.

(3) Finally, I must express my disappointment, Paul, regarding your comments on Professor Tokagi that you chose to include in your email. While I may disagree with Hans on his particular analysis of the perceived personal bias of this contract, at least his allegations regarding Professor Tokagi's potential bias are grounded in fact (and he recited them as such in his email). You, on the other hand, have chosen to accuse Professor Tokagi of manipulating the work on this project based on your "suspicion." With all due respect, that unfortunate accusation borders, in my view, on a breach of professional decorum and I cannot let it go without response.

We clearly have some political issues that are increasingly being injected into nearly every discussion at the EAC table. I have stated both to you and Gracia individually that I believe this trend in part represents a "maturity" of the EAC and I am not uncomfortable with it. However, if we are going to bring accusations of subjectivity and bias to the table, then I will expect that such a filter will be applied across the board to ALL projects undertaken by the EAC, and that such a filter will be based solidly on fact, and not on innuendo, personal hunches or suspicions.
I send this email, as always, with the highest degree of respect and friendship toward you. And yet, my disappointment is evident in your comments regarding an esteemed and respected member of the legal academic community (and someone whom I regard as a personal friend.)

I look forward to our continued discussion on this matter. And as for the substance of Hans' concern regarding Moritz, I stand by my email which I sent to everyone last night.

Since we are about to hire Tova Wang (and two others) to be our consultants/researchers on the voter fraud study, I thought I would give you a heads-up about a well-written commentary that Tova just published. It is attached below. Paul's newfound political "fervor" still has me riled-up, needless to say. Hope your travels are going well.

ID and Voting Rights
Laws requiring voters to present very specific forms of ID are becoming the voting rights barrier of the 21st Century.

Tova Andrea Wang
August 29, 2005

Laws requiring all voters to present very specific forms of identification before exercising their right to vote are rapidly becoming the voting rights barrier of the 21st Century. Last Friday, the Department of Justice approved a new Georgia law requiring every voter to show a government-issued photo ID. The Department of Justice was required to review the measure and "preclear" it because that state is covered by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. Although many legal scholars and voting rights advocates had argued the Department should deny its implementation because it would lead to disenfranchisement of minority voters, the Department evidently did not agree. Indiana passed similar legislation this year, and several groups have sued the state on the grounds that it violates the Voting Rights Act.

Next up is Arizona. Last week, after months of resisting, the governor of Arizona signed off on a plan for implementing Proposition 200, which required identification from all voters. Arizona's new rule is that all voters must show government issued photo identification or a tribal identification to vote. Alternatively, the voter may present two current pieces of identification from a narrow list of potential documents that show the voter's name and current address, such as a utility and phone bills.

The most problematic provision is this: if the voter is not able to present a government issued photo ID or these two documents to the satisfaction of the poll worker, that voter is simply disenfranchised, asked to leave the polling place without casting a ballot. The voter may not even cast a provisional ballot. For example, if the voter brings a gas bill and a water bill, but the poll worker decides the water bill is not "dated within ninety days of the election," that person will be absolutely denied the right to vote. In addition to being a violation of the Help America Vote Act's mandate that any voter who shows up at the polls and believes he or she is registered and eligible to vote must be given a provisional ballot, this raises serious voting rights issues.
As a group of preeminent voting rights scholars have argued in Georgia, under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, a covered jurisdiction may not implement a change in its election laws or practices unless the jurisdiction demonstrates the change will be free of any racially discriminatory purpose or effect. The objective of Section 5 "has always been to insure that no voting-procedure changes would be made that would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise."

As in Georgia, Arizona—especially given the possibility of a complete denial of the vote—has not met that burden of proof. It is up to the state to demonstrate that the ID requirement, which contemplates complete disenfranchisement of certain voters, will not have a discriminatory impact. So, for example, has the state examined whether most voters have or have easy access to the necessary documents? Have state officials investigated what groups are likely to lack the kinds of identification required? Since the law puts the burden on the state, the state must undertake these types of inquiries before it is permitted to go forward with this scheme—for there is a great deal of evidence indicating that it is indeed minorities who lack even one form let alone two forms of the types of identification contemplated.

The difficulty is that the poor and minorities are least likely to own motor vehicles and possess a driver's license—the most commonly accepted form of identification. Indeed, in 1994, the U.S. Department of Justice found that African-Americans in Louisiana were 4 to 5 times less likely to have government-sanctioned photo ID than white residents. As a result, the Department denied pre-clearance for that state's proposed photo ID requirement because it "would lead to retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise."

The evidence continues to mount. A June 2005 study by the University of Wisconsin found that less than half (47 percent) of Milwaukee County African American adults and 43 percent of Hispanic adults have a valid drivers license compared to 85 percent of white adults outside Milwaukee. One Arizona county reported in February that it was forced to reject nearly 75 percent of new voter registration forms for failure to provide adequate proof of citizenship.

Furthermore, for those who do not have the kinds of up-to-date non-photo ID necessary—and many minority and urban voters, for example those who live in multiple family dwellings simply will not—getting identification from the government will present costs and burdens for voters who simply want to exercise their constitutional right to vote. A certified copy of a birth certificate costs from $10.00 to $45.00, depending on the state; a passport costs $85.00; and certified naturalization papers cost $19.95. It may not be so very easy for people who work more than one job or have small children to take the time during business hours, drive to a Department of Drivers Services, and wait on line to get necessary identification. Indeed, most of the state's offices are open 8:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. Monday through Friday. Has the state researched the potential disparate impacts on getting non-photo ID? If not, it has not met its burden under the Act.
There has been a great deal of controversial discussion over the Voting Rights Act recently because some sections—including Section 5—are due to expire. The Act was passed in order to eliminate procedures aimed at the disenfranchisement of particular groups. That it is still necessary is being demonstrated today in Arizona and Georgia.

I took a telephone call this morning from Paul Vinovich. He had attempted to reach Gracia, but since she was not here, he asked Sheila if I was in the office so he spoke to me.

Paul was very upset with comments that Tova Wang had made at yesterday's AEI's meeting in which she basically indicated that voter fraud did not exist in the USA. He asked how a person who believes that voter fraud does not exist—or not seem at least willing to listen to both sides—can be hired by the EAC to do a study on voter fraud/voter intimidation. I explained to Paul (as I have now had to explain to many others) that Tova was "balanced" on the study with Job Severbrov. He did not know Job but was well-aware of Tova's positions and was concerned that her public comments indicate that she will not be fair in looking at this issue. I explained to Paul that we were monitoring the work of our consultants on this study and no report would be issued publicly without the support of at least three commissioners. I sent him some background information on Job. I think this study will need close monitoring.

I am suggesting that we have our 9:30 discussion tomorrow to cover a couple of things:

1. The four of us need to spend some "quality" time together. Tomorrow will be a good time to pin down the earliest date when we will all be in DC and can devote a 1/2 day or so to discuss election of officers, etc. Perhaps on tomorrow we can develop an agenda for those discussions.

2. Defining balance for the make-up of the Working Group for our Voter Fraud/Intimidation project.
For our private time discussions, I propose that we add the composition of the Voter Fraud/Voter Intimidation Working Group to our list of topics to discuss.

As you will recall, we did not complete the discussion because Paul was not able to participate.
Peg:

Following is the guidance that the commissioners are providing with respect to the composition of the working group for the Voter Fraud/Voter Intimidation project and the selection process.

8 Member Working Group

Participants to be chosen by the two consultants in consultation with you. There are two slots that will require consensus. If consensus can't be reached, then you should make the decision. If there is real disagreement among the three of you, then the commissioners will make the selection.

The participation process prescribed below provides for political balance. As always, we ask that the group be diverse with respect to participation of men, women and minorities.

4 people from the Academic, Legal and Advocacy sectors - 2 to be chosen by Tova and 2 to be chosen by Job. We support your recommendation that there be at least one academic in the working group to help advise and comment on the construct of the database and you should provide that guidance to Tova and Job.

2 State Level Election Officials - 1 selected by Tova and 1 selected by Job

1 Nonpartisan local election official (selected by you or by consensus among the 3 of you)

1 Representative from DOJ - you had recommended a man who was retired from the Voting Section or perhaps someone else with similar credentials to be selected by you or by consensus among the three of you. We assume that Craig Dosantos (sp) will participate in this project as an "advisor" and therefore would not take up a slot on the working group.

I will be on travel on Friday (tomorrow), however please feel free to call me on my cell should you have questions or need additional clarification.

Many thanks for your terrific work.

Paul:

I've taken a shot at a draft agenda, but we have much work to do on this item. As you will see, my current vision, at least with regard to the Standards Board, is to have a series of presentations regarding all of our research projects, particularly those in which written draft reports will be ready for consideration, such as the provisional voting study and the voter ID study. However, there are too many research projects on the plate right now, and not enough time in a day and a half to be able to present all of them to both the Standards Board and BOA (not to mention "fatigue factor" if we overload these folks during this meeting). So, I've had to prioritize.

Anyway, attached is what I have come up with, and at the very bottom of the draft agenda, you will see the research projects that I left off the list. Next steps are for you to develop a similar draft agenda for the BOA, and I would suggest that you do something similar for the BOA, such that we will have concurrent session going on (Standards Board in one room, BOA in another)...for example, when the briefing for provisional voting is taking place for the SB members, you can be having a concurrent session for the BOA in another room on voter ID. Then we switch. (Same type of format for Day 2). This will allow us to have concurrent sessions going on simultaneously but we'll have to coordinate the schedule of these sessions. In the current draft agenda, I have the two boards coming together in the afternoon of the second day, but we may want them to start with a joint plenary session and end with a joint plenary session (though that is tough because they each have group-specific business to conduct when they first arrive -- at least the Standards Board does, such as adoption of permanent bylaws).

Anyway, this is still VERY MUCH a work in progress, so I welcome your feedback. Also, I think we need to get Tom and Karen involved in this discussion very soon, and then kick it over to the other commissioners for their input once you and I have agreement on a rough draft. After that, I will then want to send it to Peggy Nighswonger so that she can share it with the Executive Board to get their input before it goes final.

I'll wait to hear back from you.

MEMORANDUM

TO: MEMBERS OF EAC STANDARDS BOARD
FROM: PEGGY NIGHSWONGER, CHAIR, EXECUTIVE BOARD
       RAY MARTINEZ, EAC COMMISSIONER
DATE: APRIL 10, 2006
SUBJECT: UPCOMING MEETING OF STANDARDS BOARD, MAY 23-24, 2006

The next meeting of the EAC Standards Board (to be held jointly with the EAC Board of Advisors) will be held in Washington, D.C. on Tuesday, May 23 and Wednesday, May 24, 2006 at the Hamilton Crown Plaza hotel. We hope you will be able to attend this important meeting, which will focus on consideration and discussion of a number of ongoing election administration research projects currently underway by the EAC. Additionally, there will also be a discussion regarding recent work conducted by the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) regarding voter verifiable audit trail. (Please see the draft agenda attached for additional information.)

As was the case with our previous meetings of the EAC Standards Board, the EAC will pay the cost of travel, hotel and a Federal per diem for any member of the Standards Board wishing to attend the May 2006 meeting. Upon receipt of this memorandum, please contact the EAC’s travel agent, Adventure Travel, at (877) 472-6718 to make your travel arrangements. Additionally, if you have any questions or need assistance in making your travel plans, please call __________________________ (email address is ________________).

Thank you in advance for you willingness to join us in Washington, D.C. We look forward to seeing you soon.

Tamar:

Don't worry about responding to this email, as I know you have to pay attention in class.

I questioned the length of the search term list and also thought that there would be ways to combine some of the search terms. It has been awhile since I have done a Westlaw search, however, which is why I need your input during the teleconference. Yes, I recognize that going through the list of search terms and printing off or saving the resulting references will take time. I'll need you to provide that feedback to our consultants so that we all are on the same page.

Devon has not done a Nexis search before; but, if EAC has access to that database, she is willing to conduct that search. The work would go along with other help she is providing. She will be sorting through my huge files of press clippings on voting fraud, will PDF the sorted clippings, and drop the PDF files onto CDs for our consultants' review.

Peg,

Correct me if I'm wrong, but I think I omitted sending you these specific summaries that are based on complex cases that could not be adequately described within the confines of the nexis article excel spreadsheets. If we can, these should be included, probably on the disc. Sorry.

Summary of Wisconsin Voting Irregularities November 2004

Instances of Illegal Voting, Milwaukee:
A probe led by U.S. Attorney Steve Biskupic and Milwaukee County District Attorney Michael McCann found about 200 cases of illegal felon voting and at least 100 cases of other forms of illegal voting in the city of Milwaukee. Of these, 14 were prosecuted:

10 were instances of felons voting while on probation or parole:
5 are awaiting trial. (one of them is DeShawn Brooks)
1 has been acquitted
1 has been found guilty in trial (Kimberly Prude)
3 have reached plea agreements (Milo Ocasio)
[names: Ethel M. Anderson, Correan F. Edwards, Jiyto L. Cox, Joseph J. Gooden]

4 were instances of double voting:
1 produced a hung jury (Enrique Sanders)
1 was found incompetent to stand trial and his case was dismissed
1 initially pleaded guilty but now wants a trial.
1 is awaiting trial.

Two of those accused of double voting were driven to multiple polling places in a van, but the identity of the driver of the vehicle is not known, and the DA does not suspect conspiracy.

In addition to these, four people were charged with felonies in the Milwaukee County Circuit Court; two cases were filed against people accused of sending in false registration cards under the auspices of the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now; the other two were felons who voted illegally.

Instances of Illegal Voting, Statewide:
The Legislative Audit Bureau, a nonpartisan research agency, released its analysis of state-wide 2004 election results in September 2005. The agency reviewed the names, addresses, and birthdates of over 348,000 individuals credited with having voted in November 2004, from the electronic voter registration records of 6 cooperating municipalities, and compared them to lists from the Department of Corrections of felons serving sentences on election day, and to lists from the municipalities (to check up on... double-voting) and to lists from the US Social Security Administration. LAB’s search revealed 105 “questionable” votes:

- 98 ballots cast by ineligible felons, 57 of which were in Madison, 2 in Waukesha, 15 in Eau Claire, 16 in Appleton, 1 in the Village of Ashwaubenon
- 2 instances of double-voting (one in Madison, one in Waukesha).
- 4 votes counted despite the voter’s having died two weeks or less before the election.
- 1 case in which a 17-year-old voted in Madison.

The LAB referred the names of these people to the appropriate District Attorney for prosecution, and several cases are awaiting trial.

It should be noted that this study is not a complete survey of election returns state-wide in Wisconsin; the LAB’s analysis is based on the voting records of the six municipalities that provided the LAB with sufficient information to conduct this study.

It should also be noted that the LAB discovered significant error in the data provided them by these municipalities, including:

- 91 records in which the individual’s birthdate was incorrectly recorded as later than November 2, 1986
- 97 cases in which a person was mistakenly recorded as having voted twice
- More than 15,000 records were missing birthdates, making it more difficult to determine voter eligibility by comparing these records to lists of felons and deceased persons.

General Findings
Both reports (the Legislative Audit Bureau’s and the report of the Joint Task Force on Election Reform convened in Milwaukee) that did in-depth studies of the Wisconsin election returns in 2004 found that there was no evidence of systematic, wide-spread fraud. As the above statistics indicate, there are very few cases in which an individual intentionally voted illegally, and the majority of the discovered instances of fraudulent voting involved felons who were unaware that they were committing a crime. Certainly the number of fraudulent votes, intentional and unintentional, is dwarfed by the amount of administrative error – and the amount of potential there was for fraud.

Registration Irregularities

8 Borowski, Greg J. “State audit digs up wider vote problems; Thousands of voters on rolls more than once.” Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel. September 17, 2005
Duplicate Registrations: In the data from the six participating municipalities, LAB found 3116 records for individuals who appear to be registered more than once in the same municipality (0.9% of the records they reviewed). These duplications were primarily the result of name changes, in which the registrar neglected to remove the old name from the registration list, previous addresses that were not deleted, and misspellings and other typographical errors.

Deceased Voters: the LAB study found 783 persons who were deceased, but whose records had not been eliminated from the registration lists. Most of the municipalities participating in the survey rely on obituaries and notifications from family members to purge their voter registration lists of deceased voters.

Felons: Comparing a list of felons from the Department of Corrections to their voter registration data lists, LAB found 453 felons who were registered to vote. This is largely because, although municipal clerks are informed of federal felony convictions, they have no way of obtaining records on state felony convictions.

In fall 2002, one of South Dakota’s Senators, Democrat Tim Johnson, was up for re-election, and was engaged in a very close race with his Republican challenger, John Thune. Both parties were engaged in a massive voter registration effort, and registered over 24,000 new voters in the five months between the June primary and the November election, increasing the number of registered voters in the state from around 452,000 to 476,000.\footnote{Kafka, Joe. “More people registered to vote.” \textit{Associated Press State and Local Wire}. October 29, 2002.}

A month before the election, several counties reported irregularities in some of the voter registration documents they’d received. In response to these reports, South Dakota Attorney General, Mark Barnett, with the state US Attorney and the FBI, launched an investigation.\footnote{Kafka, Joe. “Voter registration fraud being investigated.” \textit{Associated Press State and Local Wire}. October 11, 2002.} Because of the importance of the race in determining the partisan balance of power in the Senate, the voter registration discrepancies got a good deal of national press, including a number of editorials accusing American Indians of stuffing ballot boxes.\footnote{“Barnett: No evidence that fraud affected vote.” \textit{Associated Press State and Local Wire}. Sioux Falls, South Dakota. November 21, 2002.} The following allegations were also picked up by out-of-state newssources, including Fox News and the Wall Street Journal:

- Supporters of Thune, who lost the election by 524 votes, collected 47 affidavits from poll watchers claiming voting irregularities.
- Allegations were made that three individuals were offered money by Johnson supporters to vote.

Barnett, who was alerted to the affidavits when he read an early media report that referred to them, stated that these allegations were either false or didn’t warrant concern. “Most of the stuff that’s in those other 47 affidavits are the kind of problems that we see in every election. People parking too close to the polling place with a sign in their window, people shooting their mouths off at the polling place. The kind of things that local election officials generally do a pretty good job of policing.”\footnote{Kafka, Joe. “Woman charged in voter-fraud case, other claims false.” \textit{Associated Press State and Local Wire}. Pierre, South Dakota. December 14, 2002.} The allegations of voter bribery were false.

Though most of the allegations of fraud that were filed turned out to be false, Attorney General Barnett’s investigation did uncover two cases of voter registration fraud:

- The most high-profile case was that of Becky Red Earth-Villeda. Ms. Red Earth-Villeda was hired by the state Democratic party to register voters on the American Indian reservations. She was charged with 19 counts of forgery. No fraudulent voting was associated with Ms. Red Earth-Villeda, nor was there any evidence that fraudulent voting occurred in the state. All charges were dropped in January 2004, when, in court, it was determined by the state handwriting specialist that Ms. Red Earth-Villeda had not forged the signatures.

Lyle Nichols. Mr. Nichols was arrested for submitting five forged voter registration cards to his county office. He was working for an organization called the Native American Voter Registration Project, and was paid $3 for each registration. The five charges were dropped after Mr. Nichols pleaded guilty to possession of a forgery, and was sentenced with 54 days in jail, which is how much time he'd already spent there because of the charges.

In October 2004, just before the general election, eight people working for a campus GOP Get-out-the-Vote organization resigned their positions after they were accused of submitting absentee ballot requests that had not been notarized properly. Because many of these ballot requests had already been processed and the ballots themselves had been cast, county auditors decided not to pursue the issue.

Besides this incident, there were no reports of voter registration or voting irregularities in the run-up to the November 2004 election, as there were in 2002. However, as with the primary and special elections in June 2004, there were complaints about voter intimidation from American Indians attempting to vote, as well as difficulties with the adoption of the state's new photo identification regulations (after the 2002 election, the state legislature passed more stringent requirements about the kind of identification voters would need to provide at the polls.)

Incidents:

Voter Intimidation: The Four Directions Committee, an organization dedicated to helping American Indians register to vote and get to the polls, got a temporary restraining order on several Republican supporters who, they alleged, had been setting up video equipment outside of polling places on American Indian reservations and following around American Indians who voted early and recording their license plates.

Vote Buying: A Republican election monitor from Virginia, Paul Brenner, claimed that Senator Tom Daschle's campaign was paying people to vote. Local county auditors believe Brenner started the rumor himself. As there was no evidence for either side, the claims were not taken seriously.

Summary of Election Irregularities in Washington State 2004

The 2004 Washington state gubernatorial election was decided by one of the narrowest margins in American electoral history; 261 votes – less than a millionth of the 2.8 million votes cast statewide - separated the leading candidate, Republican Dino Rossi, from his competitor, Democrat Christine Gregoire. The state law-mandated recount that followed brought the margin down to 42 votes, and the subsequent hand recount ordered by the state Democratic Party gave Gregoire the lead, with 129 more votes than Rossi.

The race was so close that the parties decided to go to court to dispute the tally – the Republicans wanted the election results set aside and to have a revote; the Democrats sought a court-legitimated win. Each side set out into the field to find a way to swing the election in their favor. The trial and accompanying investigation, which lasted through the spring of 2005, revealed a litany of problems with the state’s election system:

- The process by which absentee ballots are matched to the voters who requested them led to discrepancies between the number of absentee ballots received and the number of votes counted.¹
- After the final certification of the election results, King County discovered 96 uncounted absentee ballots, Pierce county found 64, and Spokane County found eight; all had been misplaced following the election, but there was no mechanism for reconciling the number of absentee ballots received with the number counted.²
- Hundreds of felons who were ineligible to vote were able to cast ballots because they were not aware that they needed to apply to have their voting rights reinstated.³
- The system for verifying the eligibility of voters who had cast provisional ballots was found to be questionable.⁴
- Due to poll worker error, about 100 provisional ballots were improperly cast, and a hundred more were counted, though they were not verified as having been cast by eligible voters.⁵

The trial also revealed that most of these problems were the result of understaffing and human error.⁶ In total, 1,678 ballots were proven to have been cast illegally, but none of these votes was subtracted from the candidates’ totals because no evidence was produced in court as to how each individual voted.⁷ Further, despite the scrutiny that the election returns revealed, and the extensive discussion of voter fraud throughout the investigation, just eight cases of voter fraud were discovered:

- 4 people were accused of casting absentee ballots for their deceased spouses.
- A mother and daughter were charged with the absentee ballot of the mother’s husband who had died earlier in the year
- 1 man cast the ballot of the deceased prior resident of his home.
- A homeless resident of Seattle cast two ballots, one in the name of Dustin Ocoilain.

Plus, I found a few typos on the nexis analysis. Sorry about this.

Major Vote Buying Cases Summary

Between 2001 and 2006, allegations and convictions for vote buying and conspiracies to buy votes were concentrated in three states: Illinois, West Virginia and Kentucky.

In East St. Louis, Illinois, nine individuals, including a former city council member and the head of the local Democratic Party, Charles Powell, Jr., were convicted or pled guilty to vote buying and conspiracy to commit election fraud during the 2004 general election. The government's conspiracy case was almost entirely based on taped conversations in which the defendants discussed buying votes for $5 and whether this would be adequate. Federal prosecutors alleged that the vote buying was financed with $79,000 transferred from the County Democratic Party shortly before the election, although county officials have not been charged. Four defendants were convicted of purchasing or offering to purchase at least one vote directly, while Democratic Party chairman was only convicted of conspiracy. Earlier, three precinct officials and one precinct worker pled guilty to buying votes for $5 or $10 in that same election.

Eastern Kentucky has witnessed a series of vote buying cases over the last several years. The most recent revolved around Ross Harris, a Pike County political fundraiser and coal executive, and his associate Loren Glenn Turner. Harris and Turner were convicted in September 2004 of vote buying, mail fraud, and several other counts. Prosecutors alleged Harris and Turner conspired to buy votes and provided the necessary funds in an unsuccessful 2002 bid for Pike County district judge by former State Senator Doug Hays. Harris supplied nearly $40,000, Turner laundered the money through straw contributors, and the cash was then disbursed in the form of $50 checks ostensibly for 'vote hauling', the legal practice of paying campaign workers to get voters to the polls which is notorious as a cover for buying votes. Harris attempted to influence the race on behalf of Hays in order to get revenge on Hays' opponent for a personal matter.

A grand jury initially indicted 10 individuals in connection with the Harris and Turner case, including Hays and his wife, and six campaign workers. Of the remaining defendants, only one, Tom Varney, also a witness in the Hays case, pled guilty. The others were either acquitted of vote buying charges or had vote buying charges dropped. Prosecutors have announced that their investigation continues into others tied to Harris and may produce further indictments.

The Harris case follows a series of trials related to the 1998 Knott County Democratic primary. Between 2003 and 2004, 10 individuals were indicted on vote buying charges, including a winning candidate in those primaries, Knott County judge-executive Donnie Newsome, who was reelected in 2002. In 2004 Newsome and a supporter were sent to jail and fined. Five other defendants pled guilty to vote buying charges, and three were acquitted. The primary means of vote buying entailed purchasing absentee votes from elderly, infirm, illiterate or poor voters, usually for between $50 and $100. This resulted in an abnormally high number of absentee ballots in the primary.\(^7\) Indictments relating to that same 1998 primary were also brought in 1999, when 6 individuals were indicted for buying the votes of students at a small local college. Five of those indicted were convicted or pled guilty.\(^8\)

Absentee vote buying was also an issue in 2002, when federal prosecutors opened an investigation in Kentucky's Clay County after an abnormal number of absentee ballots were filed in the primary and the sheriff halted absentee voting twice over concerns.\(^9\) Officials received hundreds of complaints of vote-buying during the 2002 primary, and state investigators performed follow up investigations in a number of counties, including Knott, Bell, Floyd, Pike, and Maginoff.\(^10\) No indictments have been produced so far.

So far, relatively few incidents of vote-buying have been substantially identified or investigated in the 2004 election. Two instances of vote buying in local 2004 elections have been brought before a grand jury. In one, a Casey County man was indicted for purchasing votes in a local school board race with cash and whiskey.\(^11\) In the second, the grand jury chose not to indict an individual accused of offering to purchase a teenager's vote on a local proposal with beer.\(^12\)

An extensive vote buying conspiracy has also been uncovered in southern West Virginia. The federal probe, which handed down its first indictment in 2003, has yielded more than a dozen guilty pleas to charges of vote buying and conspiracy in elections since the late 1980s. As this area is almost exclusively dominated by the Democratic Party, vote-buying occurred largely during primary contests.

The first phase of the probe focused on Logan County residents, where vote buying charges were brought in relation to elections in 1996, 2000, 2002 and 2004. In an extraordinary tactic, the FBI planted the former mayor of Logan City, Tom Esposito, as a candidate in a state legislative race. Esposito's cooperation led to guilty pleas from the Logan County Clerk, who pled guilty to selling his vote to Esposito in 1996,\(^13\) and another man who took money from Esposito for the purpose of vote buying in 2004.\(^14\)

Guilty pleas were also obtained in connection with former county sheriff Johnny Mendez, who pled guilty to buying votes in two primary elections in order to elect candidates including himself. In 2000, with a large amount of funding from a prominent local lawyer seeking to influence a state delegate election for his wife, Mendez distributed around $10,000 in payments to voters of $10 to $100. Then, in the 2004 primary, Mendez distributed around $2,000 before his arrest. A deputy of Mendez', the former Logan police chief, also pled guilty to a count of vote buying in 2002.

Prosecutors focusing on neighboring Lincoln County have alleged a long-standing vote-buying conspiracy extending back to the late 1980s. The probe identified Lincoln County Circuit Clerk Greg Stowers as head of a Democratic Party faction which routinely bought votes in order to maintain office. Stowers pled guilty in December 2005 to distributing around $7,000 to buy votes in the 2004 primary. The Lincoln County Assessor, and Stowers' longtime political ally, Jerry Allen Weaver, also pled guilty to conspiracy to buy votes. These were accompanied by four other guilty pleas from party workers for vote buying in primaries. While most specific charges focused on vote buying in the 2004 primary, defendants also admitted buying votes as far back as the 1988, 1990, and 1992 primaries.

The leading conspirators would give party workers candidate slates and cash, which workers would then take to the polling place and use to purchase votes for amounts between $10 and $40 and in one instance, for liquor. Voters would be handed the slate of chosen candidates, and would then be paid upon exiting the polling place. In other cases, the elected officials in question purchased votes in exchange for non-cash rewards, including patronage positions, fixed tickets, favorable tax assessments, and home improvements.

The West Virginia probe is ongoing, as prosecutors are scrutinizing others implicated during the proceedings so far, including a sitting state delegate, who may be under scrutiny for vote buying in a 1990 election, and one of the Lincoln county defendants who previously had vote buying charges against him dropped.

Nexis Search Articles Analysis

Note: The search terms used were ones agreed upon by both Job Serebrov and Tova Wang and are available upon request. A more systematic, numerical analysis of the data contained in the Nexis charts is currently being undertaken. What follows is an overview.

Recommendation: In phase 2, consultants should conduct a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

Overview of the Articles

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

1. Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters
2. Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased
3. Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

1. Registering in the name of dead people
2. Fake names and other information on voter registration forms
3. Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms
4. Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses
5. Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported on included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places.
- Improper demands for identification
- Poll watchers harassing voters
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters
- Disproportionate police presence
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from “battleground” states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

“Dead Voters and Multiple Voting”

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations
Turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking of voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person taking criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found 5 such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations in three particular jurisdictions as detailed in the vote buying summary. There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area. All of these cases are concentrated in the Midwest and South.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction... of voter registration forms. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case charges were filed against ten individuals. In one case a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem has the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker’s possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples’ votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Brennan Analysis Voter Fraud Report FINAL.doc Fed Crime Election Fraud (JS).doc
Analysis of the September 15, 2005 Voter Fraud Report Submitted to the New Jersey Attorney General

By The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law and Dr. Michael McDonald of George Mason University

General

A September 15, 2005 Report submitted to the New Jersey Attorney General included lists of purportedly illegitimate votes in New Jersey in the 2004 general election, including lists of 10,969 individuals who purportedly voted twice and lists of 4,756 voters who were purportedly dead or incarcerated in November 2004. For the present Analysis of the Report, the lists of voters submitted to the New Jersey Attorney General, as well as a copy of the New Jersey county voter registration files were obtained, and an initial investigation of the report’s claims was conducted. The analysis shows that the lists submitted are substantially flawed.

The Analysis is based on methodology only: its authors did not gain access to original documents related to registration or original pollbook records; only recently were copies of the counties’ original registration data files acquired and compiled, which contain some notable gaps; and the lists submitted to the Attorney General contain significant errors and little documentation, which complicated the analysis. Nonetheless, the analysts say that information collected is sufficient for generally assessing the quality of evidence presented to support the September 15 report. Analysis of the suspect lists reveals that the evidence submitted does not show what it purports to show: cause for concern that there is serious risk of widespread fraud given the state of the New Jersey voter registration rolls.

These suspect lists were compiled by attempting to match the first name, last name, and birth date of persons on county voter registration files. Entries that supposedly “matched” other entries were apparently deemed to represent the same individual, voting twice. This methodology was similar to the method used in compiling the notoriously inaccurate Florida “purge lists” of suspected ineligible felons in 2000 and 2004. As Florida’s experience shows, matching names and birth dates in the voter registration context can easily lead to false conclusions – as was almost certainly the case here.

This Analysis reveals several serious problems with the methodology used to compile the suspect lists that compromise the lists’ practical value. For example, the data used in the Report from one county appears to be particularly suspect and anomalous, and may have substantially skewed the overall results. In addition, middle initials were ignored throughout all counties, so that “J_____ A. Smith” was presumed to be the same person as “J_____ G. Smith.” Suffixes were also ignored, so that fathers and sons – like “B_____ Johnson” and “B_____ Johnson, Jr.” – were said to be the same person.

Underlying many of the entries on these lists, and similar lists compiled in Florida and elsewhere, is a presumption that two records with the same name and date of birth must represent the same person. As explained in this analysis, this presumption is not consistent with basic statistical principles. Even when votes appear to have been cast in two different cities under the same name and birth date, statistics show that voter fraud is not necessarily to blame. With 3.6 million persons who voted in the 2004 election in New Jersey, the chance that some have the same name and birth date is not far-fetched.

Analysis of the Claim of Double Voting by 4,497 Individuals

Attempts to match data on one list to data on another list will often yield “false positives:” two records that at first appear to be a match but do not actually represent the same person. The natural incidence of “false positives” for a matching exercise of this scale – especially when, as here, conducted with relatively little attention to detail – readily explains the ostensible number of double votes.

1,803 of these 4,397 records of ostensibly illegal votes seem to be the product of a glitch in the compilation of the registration files. These records reflect two registration entries by the same person from the same address, with a notation next to each that the individual has voted. For example, 55-year-old W____ A. Connors, living at 253 B____ Ave. in a New York commuter suburb, is listed on the data files with an (erroneous) first registration date in 1901 and a second registration date in 1993; Mr. Connors is thus represented twice on the data files submitted. Each of these entries also indicates that W____ A. Connors at 253 B____ Ave voted in 2004. There is no credible indication, however, that Mr. Connors actually voted twice; indeed, given the clearly erroneous registration date on the files, it is far more likely that data error is to blame for the doubly logged vote as well.

More plausibly, the bulk of these 1,803 records may be traced to irregularities in the data processing and compilation process for one single county: the Middlesex County registration file accounts for only 10% of registered voters in the state but 78% of these alleged double votes. The suspect lists themselves contain an acknowledgment that the problem in Middlesex is probably not fraud: 99% of these Middlesex voters are labeled on the lists submitted to the Attorney General with a notation that the record is “less likely” to indicate an illegal double vote.

Another 1,257 entries of the 4,397 records probably represent similar data errors – also largely driven by a likely glitch in the Middlesex County file, which is also vastly over represented in this category. These records show ever-so-slight variations in records listed with the same date of birth at the same address: for example, the same first and last names, but different middle initials or suffixes (e.g., J____ T. Kearns, Sr., and J____ T. Kearns, Jr., both born the same day and living at the same address; or J____ E. Allen and J____ P. Allen, born the same day and living at the same address).

Approximately 800 of the entries on the list likely represent different people, with different addresses and different middle initials or suffixes. For example, W____ S. Smith, living in a northern New Jersey town, and W____ C. Smith, living in another town two hours away, share the same date of birth but are not the same person. Nor are T____ Brown, living in a New York commuter suburb, and T____ H. Brown, Jr., living in a small town over an hour west, despite the fact that they also share the same birth date. About three-quarters of the entries in this category reveal data that affirmatively conflict – for example, a middle initial (“W____ S.”) in one case, and a different middle initial (“W____ C.”) in another, listed at different addresses. There is absolutely no good reason to conclude that these individuals are in fact the same, when the available evidence indicates the contrary.

For approximately 200 of the entries in this category, however, less information is available. These entries show a middle initial (“J____ W. Davis”) in one case, and no middle initial (“J____ Davis”) in another – again, at different addresses. The lack of the middle initial is ambiguous: it could mean that one of the J____ Davis in question has no middle name, or it could mean that the middle initial was simply omitted in a particular registration entry. Although these entries involve less conclusive affirmative evidence of a false match than the entries noted above, there is still no good reason to believe that “J____ W. Davis” and “J____ Davis,” at different addresses, represent the same person.

Of the individuals remaining, there are serious concerns with the accuracy of the dates of birth. Seven voters were apparently born in January 1, 1880 – which is most likely a system default for registrations lacking date-of-birth information. For 227 voters, only the month and year of birth are listed: this means only that two voters with the same name were born in the same month and year, an unsurprising coincidence in a state of several million people.

That leaves approximately 289 votes cast under the same name and birth date – like votes cast by “P____ S. Rosen,” born in the middle of the baby boom – but from two different addresses. It may appear strange, but there may be two P____ S. Rosens, born on the same date in 1948 – and such coincidences are surprisingly common. For any one person, the odds of someone else having the same name and birth date is small. But because there are so many voters in New Jersey, a sizable number will have the same name and birth date simply by chance. In a group of just 23 people, it is more likely than not that two will share the same birthday. For 40 people, the probability is 90%. Many, if not most, of the 289 alleged double votes of persons registered at different addresses most likely reflect two separate individuals sharing a first name, last name, middle initial, and birth date.

The September 15 Report makes much of the raw potential for foul play based on the unsurprising fact that there are voters who appear on the New Jersey registration rolls more than once. As noted above, many of the names identified reflect two different individuals and not simply duplicate entries. But there is no doubt that there are duplicate entries on New Jersey’s registration rolls. It is well known that voter registration rolls contain “deadwood” – registration entries for individuals no longer living at a given address or deceased. There is no evidence, however, that these extra registrations are used for widespread illegal voting. Moreover, the problem of deadwood will soon be largely resolved: both the National Voter Registration Act of 1993 and the Help America
Vote Act of 2002 require states to implement several systems and procedures as of January 1, 2006, that will clean the voter rolls of duplicate or invalid entries while protecting eligible voters from unintended disfranchisement.
The Federal Crime of Election Fraud
By Craig Donsanto

In The Federal Crime of Election Fraud, Donsanto addresses the role of the United States Department of Justice in matters of election fraud. Specifically, it answers the most frequently asked questions concerning the federal law enforcement role in election matters. Particularly, what sort of election-related conduct is potentially actionable as a federal crime, what specific statutory theories apply to frauds occurring in elections lacking federal candidates on the ballot, what federalism, procedural, and policy considerations impact on the federalization of this type of case, and how Assistant United States Attorneys should respond to this type of complaint.

Donsanto indicates that as a general rule, the federal crime of voter fraud embraces only organized efforts to corrupt the election process itself: i.e., the registration of voters, the casting of ballots, and the tabulation and certification of election results. Moreover, this definition excludes all activities that occur in connection with the political campaigning process, unless those activities are themselves illegal under some other specific law or prosecutorial theory. This definition also excludes isolated acts of individual wrongdoing that are not part of an organized effort to corrupt the voting process. Finally, Donsanto points out that mistakes and other gaffs that inevitably occur are not included as voter fraud. Where mistakes occur on a significant enough level to potentially affect the outcome of an election, the appropriate remedy is an election contest brought by the loser seeking civil judicial redress through the appropriate state election contest process.

Along with the limits discussed above, prosecuting election fraud offenses in federal court is further complicated by the constitutional limits that are placed on federal power over the election process. The conduct of elections is primarily a state rather than a federal activity.

Donsanto lists four types of election fraud: schemes to purposely and corruptly register voters who either do not exist, or who are known by the putative defendant to be ineligible to vote under applicable state law; schemes to cast, record or fraudulently tabulate votes for voters who do not participate in the voting act at all; schemes to corrupt the voting act of voters who do participate in the voting act to a limited extent; and, schemes to knowingly prevent voters qualified voters from voting.

Donsanto lists four situations where federal prosecution is appropriate: Where the objective of the conduct is to corrupt the outcome of a federal elective contest, or where the consequential effect of the corrupt conduct impacts upon the vote count for federal office; Where the object of the scheme is to discriminate against racial, ethnic or language minority groups, the voting rights of which have been specifically protected by federal statues such as the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. section 1973 et seq.; Where federalization is required in order to redress longstanding patters of electoral fraud, either at the request of state or local authorities, or in the face of longstanding inaction by state authorities who appear to be unwilling or unable to respond under local law; and, Where there is a factual basis to believe that fraudulent registration or voting activity is sufficiently connected to other forms of criminal activity that perusing the voter fraud angle will yield evidence useful in the prosecution of other categories of federal offense.

Donsanto lists four advantages to federal prosecution: voter fraud investigations are labor intensive. Local law enforcement agencies often lack the manpower and the financial resources to take these cases on; voter fraud matters are always politically sensitive and very high profile endeavors at the local level. Local prosecutors (who are usually themselves elected) often shy away from prosecuting them for that reason; the successful prosecution of voter fraud cases demands that critical witnesses be examined under oath before criminal charges based on their testimony are filed. Many states lack the broad grand jury process that exists in the federal system; and, the defendants in voter fraud cases are apt to be politicians - or agents of politicians - and it is often impossible for either the government or the defendant to obtain a fair trial in a case that is about politics and is tried to a locally-drawn jury. The federal court system provides for juries to be drawn from broader geographic base, thus often avoiding this problem.

Several prosecutorial theories used by United States Attorneys to federalize election frauds are discussed. These include: schemes by polling officers to violate their duty under state law to safeguard the integrity of the election process by purposefully allowing void ballots to be cast (stuffing the ballot box), or by intentionally rendering fraudulent vote tallies which can be prosecuted as civil rights violations under 18 U.S.C. sections 241 or 242; schemes to stimulate or reward voter registration by offering or giving voters things having monetary value violate the “payment for registering” clause of 42 U.S.C. section 19731(c); schemes to register voters fraudulently through providing election officials materially false information about the voter's eligibility for the franchise; and, schemes to obtain and cast ballots that are materially defective in nonfederal elections can still be prosecuted under 18 U.S.C. section 1341. There are also some other federal statutes involved in election fraud cases such as 18 U.S.C. section 597 that prohibits making expenditures for the specific purpose of stimulating voters to cast ballots for candidates seeking the federal offices of Senator, Congressman or President and 42 U.S.C. section 1973i (e) that prohibits voting more than once in elections where federal candidates are on the ballot.

Donsanto lists four questions used by prosecutors in evaluating the credibility of election complaints: does the substance of the complaint assuming it can be proven through investigation - suggest a potential crime; is the complaint sufficiently fact-specific that it provides leads for investigators to pursue; is there a federal statute that can be used to federalize the criminal activity at issue; and, is there a special federal interest in the matter that warrants federalization rather than deferral to state law enforcement.

All federal election investigations must avoid the following: non-interference in elections unless absolutely necessary to preserve evidence; interviewing voters during active voting periods; seizing official election documentation; investigative activity inside open polls; and prosecutors must adhere to 18 U.S.C. section 592, prohibiting the stationing of armed men at places where voting activity is taking place.
Finally, Donsanto indicates that election crimes based on race or language minority status are treated as civil rights matters under the Voting Rights Act.

votebuyingsummary.doc
Major Vote Buying Cases Summary

Between 2001 and 2006, allegations and convictions for vote buying and conspiracies to buy votes were concentrated in three states: Illinois, West Virginia and Kentucky.

In East St. Louis, Illinois, nine individuals, including a former city council member and the head of the local Democratic Party, Charles Powell, Jr., were convicted or pled guilty to vote buying and conspiracy to commit election fraud during the 2004 general election. The government’s conspiracy case was almost entirely based on taped conversations in which the defendants discussed buying votes for $5 and whether this would be adequate. Federal prosecutors alleged that the vote buying was financed with $79,000 transferred from the County Democratic Party shortly before the election, although county officials have not been charged. Four defendants were convicted of purchasing or offering to purchase at least one vote directly, while Democratic Party chairman was only convicted of conspiracy. Earlier, three precinct officials and one precinct worker pled guilty to buying votes for $5 or $10 in that same election.

Eastern Kentucky has witnessed a series of vote buying cases over the last several years. The most recent revolved around Ross Harris, a Pike County political fundraiser and coal executive, and his associate Loren Glenn Turner. Harris and Turner were convicted in September 2004 of vote buying, mail fraud, and several other counts. Prosecutors alleged Harris and Turner conspired to buy votes and provided the necessary funds in an unsuccessful 2002 bid for Pike County district judge by former State Senator Doug Hays. Harris supplied nearly $40,000, Turner laundered the money through straw contributors, and the cash was then disbursed in the form of $50 checks ostensibly for ‘vote hauling’, the legal practice of paying campaign workers to get voters to the polls which is notorious as a cover for buying votes. Harris attempted to influence the race on behalf of Hays in order to get revenge on Hays’ opponent for a personal matter.

A grand jury initially indicted 10 individuals in connection with the Harris and Turner case, including Hays and his wife, and six campaign workers. Of the remaining defendants, only one, Tom Varney, also a witness in the Hays case, pled guilty. The others were either acquitted of vote buying charges or had vote buying charges dropped. Prosecutors have announced that their investigation continues into others tied to Harris and may produce further indictments.

The Harris case follows a series of trials related to the 1998 Knott County Democratic primary. Between 2003 and 2004, 10 individuals were indicted on vote buying charges, including a winning candidate in those primaries, Knott County judge-executive Donnie Newsome, who was reelected in 2002. In 2004 Newsome and a supporter were sent to jail and fined. Five other defendants pled guilty to vote buying charges, and three were acquitted. The primary means of vote buying entailed purchasing absentee votes from elderly, infirm, illiterate or poor voters, usually for between $50 and $100. This resulted in an abnormally high number of absentee ballots in the primary. Indictments relating to that same 1998 primary were also brought in 1999, when 6 individuals were indicted for buying the votes of students at a small local college. Five of those indicted were convicted or pled guilty.

Absentee vote buying was also an issue in 2002, when federal prosecutors opened an investigation in Kentucky's Clay County after an abnormal number of absentee ballots were filed in the primary and the sheriff halted absentee voting twice over concerns. Officials received hundreds of complaints of vote-buying during the 2002 primary, and state investigators performed follow up investigations in a number of counties, including Knott, Bell, Floyd, Pike, and Maginoff. No indictments have been produced so far.

So far, relatively few incidents of vote-buying have been substantially identified or investigated in the 2004 election. Two instances of vote buying in local 2004 elections have been brought before a grand jury. In one, a Casey County man was indicted for purchasing votes in a local school board race with cash and whiskey. In the second, the grand jury chose not to indict an individual accused of offering to purchase a teenager's vote on a local proposal with beer.

An extensive vote buying conspiracy has also been uncovered in southern West Virginia. The federal probe, which handed down its first indictment in 2003, has yielded more than a dozen guilty pleas to charges of vote buying and conspiracy in elections since the late 1980s. As this area is almost exclusively dominated by the Democratic Party, vote-buying occurred largely during primary contests.

The first phase of the probe focused on Logan County residents, where vote buying charges were brought in relation to elections in 1996, 2000, 2002 and 2004. In an extraordinary tactic, the FBI planted the former mayor of Logan City, Tom Esposito, as a candidate in a state legislative race. Esposito's cooperation led to guilty pleas from the Logan County Clerk, who pled guilty to selling his vote to Esposito in 1996, and another man who took money from Esposito for the purpose of vote buying in 2004.

Guilty pleas were also obtained in connection with former county sheriff Johnny Mendez, who pled guilty to buying votes in two primary elections in order to elect candidates including himself. In 2000, with a large amount of funding from a prominent local lawyer seeking to influence a state delegate election for his wife, Mendez distributed around $10,000 in payments to voters of $10 to $100. Then, in the 2004 primary, Mendez distributed around $2,000 before his arrest.\footnote{Mendez confined to home for year Ex-Logan sheriff was convicted of buying votes" Charleston Gazette, January 22, 2005.} A deputy of Mendez’, the former Logan police chief, also pled guilty to a count of vote buying in 2002.\footnote{Ex-Logan police sentenced for buying votes" Associated Press, February 15, 2005.}

Prosecutors focusing on neighboring Lincoln County have alleged a long-standing vote-buying conspiracy extending back to the late 1980s. The probe identified Lincoln County Circuit Clerk Greg Stowers as head of a Democratic Party faction which routinely bought votes in order to maintain office. Stowers pled guilty in December 2005 to distributing around $7,000 to buy votes in the 2004 primary. The Lincoln County Assessor, and Stowers’ longtime political ally, Jerry Allen Weaver, also pled guilty to conspiracy to buy votes.\footnote{"Clerk says he engaged in vote buying" Charleston Gazette, December 30, 2005.} These were accompanied by four other guilty pleas from party workers for vote buying in primaries. While most specific charges focused on vote buying in the 2004 primary, defendants also admitted buying votes as far back as the 1988, 1990, and 1992 primaries.

The leading conspirators would give party workers candidate slates and cash, which workers would then take to the polling place and use to purchase votes for amounts between $10 and $40 and in one instance, for liquor. Voters would be handed the slate of chosen candidates, and would then be paid upon exiting the polling place. In other cases, the elected officials in question purchased votes in exchange for non-cash rewards, including patronage positions, fixed tickets, favorable tax assessments, and home improvements.\footnote{Lincoln clerk, two others plead guilty to election fraud" Charleston Daily Mail, December 30, 2005.}

The West Virginia probe is ongoing, as prosecutors are scrutinizing others implicated during the proceedings so far, including a sitting state delegate, who may be under scrutiny for vote buying in a 1990 election, and one of the Lincoln county defendants who previously had vote buying charges against him dropped.\footnote{Next phase pondered in federal vote-buying probe" Associated Press, January 1, 2006.}
Great -- thanks so much and apologies for the false alarm.

Dear Nathan,

Here is the information that you requested.

Secretary Rokita was recommended by one of our consultants, Job Serebrov, to participate in the Voting Fraud - Voter Intimidation Project Working Group. This working group will last for one day and it will be held in Washington, DC. The purpose of this working group is to bring together experts and representatives of organizations that are knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation in order to foster a discussion on related issues and preliminary research.

The following are a list of the other potential participants; Barbara Arnwine, Robert Bauer, Craig Donsanto, Mark Hearne III, David Norcross, Kathy Rogers, and Barry Weinberg

We are hoping to hold this meeting in May, between the 1st and the 19th (excluding the following dates; 4, 5, 6, 7, 13, 14). Please let me know any and all of the dates that would be the most convenient for Secretary Rokita.

Best,

Dear Meeting Participants,

Thank you for confirming your participation in the upcoming Voter Fraud/Voter Intimidation Working Group Meeting in Washington, D.C. This meeting will take place at our office from 1:00 PM to 5:30 PM on Thursday May 18th, 2006.

The Election Assistance Commission (EAC) will cover the cost of your flight, the cost of your hotel room and provide you with a daily per diem. The cost of the airfare and the hotel stay will be paid directly by the EAC, as long as you book your travel through Adventure Travel.

To coordinate your flight and hotel stay, please contact Marvin Brokaw of Adventure Travel at (205) 444-4800, ext. 3501. Please note that the eligible dates of the hotel accommodation include the evenings on May 17th and May 18th. Once you have contacted him and you have received the itinerary via e-mail you must forward me a copy immediately so that I can complete a travel authorization form.

I have included two attachments with this email; the first attachment is a letter that contains important information that you will need to know before calling the travel agent and the second attachment provides some general information that should help you get around the city during your trip.

In addition to your travel itinerary, I will also need the following information by the close of business this Friday May 12, 2006 in order to complete your travel authorization:

Full Name:
Title:
Entity for whom you work:
Address to Which the Reimbursement Check Will Be Mailed:
Work Telephone:
Fax Number:
Social Security #: (if uncomfortable e-mailing this, feel free to call me):

Feel free to contact me with any questions.

Per Diem Letter VFVI.doc Logistics Sheet VFVI.doc
Dear Meeting Participant:

On behalf of the entire U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC), I would like to thank you for agreeing to attend the Voter Fraud/Voter Intimidation Working Group Meeting on May 18th, 2006.

The EAC will pay for your roundtrip airfare and hotel, and based on your dates of travel to attend our meeting and will pay a daily per diem to cover meals not provided by EAC and incidental expenses (M&IE). Car rental costs or mileage incurred through the use of a rental car are not reimbursable, as well as costs associated with redcaps, baggage delivery, long distance telephone calls, pay per view cable, room service, laundry service, and wet bars. These charges, if used, must be borne by you at the time services were rendered. Ground transportation (ex. metro, bus, taxi), hotel parking, airport parking, and any mileage incurred using your privately owned vehicle will be reimbursed.

The EAC will provide hotel accommodations. If you are traveling from one of the following States than you are authorized for a two-night hotel room stay in Washington D.C.; Georgia, Indiana, Missouri, New Mexico and Texas.

The per diem rates listed below provide a guide for you to use in order to calculate your per diem for your stay. A discounted per diem rate is applicable if any travel occurs on that day. For example, if you arrive on May 17th and leave on May 18th, both of these days will be considered travel days and you will receive the discounted rate. I will provide you with a travel reimbursement form at the meeting.

The current federal per diem rates are as follows;

- Meals & Incidentals Expenses (M&IE) = $64 per day (the discounted rate for the first and last day of travel is $48)
- Mileage for Personally Owned Vehicle = $.445 per mile

If you have any questions, please do not hesitate to contact me at (202) 566-2377 or via email at dromig@eac.gov.

I have attached the list of the working groups participants. Peggy, you may want to double check this list incase I have left anyone out.

In place of name tags we just used the tent cards for the APIA working group. This seemed to be effective because it was easier to identify the person who was speaking but we could use both.

Meeting Participants for VFVI Working Group.doc

Peggy,

In preparation for the logistics of this week's working group, I need to know how many people to expect for the meeting. Also, if you still need me to make name tags, I will need a list of attendees and the Avery label size.

Also, I will need help from Laiza on the table tents, or we can see if she has the time to help with that.

Thanks!

Sounds great. It did seem to work just fine for our Asian Language group. Is there going to be a transcriptionist? If so, has anyone taken care of that?

Did you still want to provide the cookies or snacks, or shall I get that from Cafe Mozart (where I am planning to get the coffee). I can just buy a few boxes of cookies for the break.

I think our number will be about 21 (with the Working Group members, consultants, possible EAC Commissioners and staff, and the court reporter). I'll have a better idea of the final list after I brief Commissioners tomorrow morning. Devon noted that they used only tent cards for the Asian Language Working Group. That might be sufficient for this group and would cut back on some of the work we have to do in preparation. --- Peggy

You are welcome!

Adventure Travel should send you all of your travel information once they verify the travel authorization. If you do not receive your itinerary by Monday morning please let me know.

It is a good idea to carry your travel authorization with you at the airport because occasionally (although very rarely) some of our guests have been asked to show their authorization numbers.

Let me know if you have any other questions.

Thank you, Devon. I have not heard from the travel agency since I picked the travel times, and do not have an itinerary, nor hotel information. The last time I traveled to the EAC I did not receive this form till afterwards. Is there something I may need this for in advance or during my travel?

Overview of Current Research Project

- Current research performed Tova Wang and Job Serebrov
  - the current research has been a challenge because of the need for the information to be collected and analyzed in a scientific manner
    - especially when working the "perception" of intimidation
  - Both consultants cross-checked each others work in order to maintain a bipartisan balance
  - Literature was anecdotal, not much follow-up on the articles
  - No interviews with DA’s and only one interview with a judge
  - Absentee ballots seemed to be the biggest problem
  - The articles found that most of reported vote buying is concentrated in the Midwest and the South
  - Very little non-citizen voting, dead voting and impersonation was reported

Purpose of Current Working Group

- To provide background information for current research
- To brainstorm for potential research ideas

Talking Points of Working Group

- Discussion of value of research because of the language of section 241 of HAVA; where is the methodology?
- History of the definition of “fraud”
- Most voter fraud happens outside of the polling centers
- Research must address existing problems, not perceived problems
- Intimidation is a subset of suppression, and considered to be physical or economic threat and/or coercion
- Suppression that is not a form of intimidation is intended to interfere with voting rights and the election process without physical or economic threat and/or coercion
- Department of Justice primarily investigated individual cases of voter fraud
- Risk analysis can be used as an indicator of legitimacy for the need to allocate funding to research in the area of voter fraud
- Current statewide database list will be useful in the deterrence of voter fraud
Ideas for Future EAC Activities

- Bipartisan observers/poll watchers
  - Used in the collection of data
  - Used to deter fraud
- Surveys
  - Survey of state laws
    - Specific states
  - Survey of local election officials
  - Voter surveys (this suggestion was rejected by the panel)
  - Survey state election offices
  - Survey use of administrative complaint procedures
- Follow up on initial reports of fraud/intimidation from the survey of news articles
- Better poll worker training
- Longer hours for polling centers
  - Including hours on weekends
- Fewer polling center locations
  - More qualified poll workers
- Absentee balloting process
  - Methodology of “for cause” absentee voting
- Risk-analysis for voting fraud
  - Who?
  - What part of process?
    - ease of use
  - Which elections?
- Broaden scope of interviews to local officials and district attorneys
- Analysis
  - Phone logs from toll-free lines for election concerns
  - Federal observer reports
  - Local newspapers
  - State District Court Cases
  - Determination of challenging a voter at the polls (in some states there is little or no cause required to challenge a voter's eligibility)
- Academic statistical research
- Search and match procedures for voter registration list maintenance and voter fraud identification (subject to confirmation)
- Election courts
- Model statutes

I understand that EAC hired a court reporter for the Asian Language Working Group meeting. I would like to do the same for the May 18 Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group meeting, but I did not include funds in my budget for this service. Peggy,
I spoke to the people who usually handle the EAC court reporting. They charge $9.00 per page with an average of 40 pages per hour. This service would cost about $1800.00.

The turn around time for the transcript is 10 to 15 days. The transcripts comes in a bound paper copy and an electronic copy.
I can also check around for different prices.

Peggy,

A possible hotel suggestion for Job might be the Sheraton College Park in Beltsville, MD. They have room availability for the nights of the 17th and the 18th for $159.00 a night.

They have what is called the Sheraton Sweet Sleeper Bed. More information at:

This hotel is a little out of the way but the members of the Asian Language Working Group and others have stayed there. The hotel does offer a shuttle to and from Reagan airport and the metro.

Devon:
One of our consultants noted that there are several sections appear to be missing from the 2004 DOJ training binder. She wasn't sure if it is because of what DOJ sent over to EAC or a problem in the photocopying. From what she can see, some of the table of contents is missing and tabs 14, 15, 16, 17, 21, 23 and 26 are all empty. I think we must have provided the T of C because I don't see one in the binder. Can you please retrieve the binder and check this out for me? Thanks! --- Peggy

Did Barbara Arnwine's office indicate who they propose to send in her place? --- Peggy
Peggy,

I just spoke to Nathan Cane (Secretary Rokita's assistant). He did not have any new information but they are going to have a scheduling meeting tomorrow morning and he will ask specifically about the afternoon of May 18th. I also reminded him to find out any of the days that he was not available or any of the days that he had could attend the meeting in the morning or the afternoon.

Thanks,

Devon

Thats good. I'm probably just getting crazy, trying to make sure everything is perfect. Devon, maybe you can check? Otherwise I'll check it when it comes. Thanks. And be well Peg.

I think you did send this --- or is this a revised version of one you sent earlier? It should be on the CD in the packet you should receive today. (Can't check that right now as I am at the clinic.) If I put anything on the CD that you want to highlight at the meeting, let me know and we'll make copies for those attending.

I don't think I sent this to you either. Can we hand it out at the meeting as an addendum? It's another summary that would have gone in the news article section. I'm usually so organized, I'm very embarrassed. Too many things! Thanks

Dear Tova,

I am working with Peggy Sims in order to set a date for the Voting Fraud/Voter Intimidation Project Working Group. I have been trying to reach Barbara Arnwine in order to find out which days in May she is potentially available to attend this meeting but all of my attempts have been unsuccessful.

I would appreciate any help that you could provide in this matter.

Sincerely,

Mr. Gordon,
Per our conversation, EAC chair Donetta Davidson asked our IG to review the circumstances surrounding both the voter ID and vote fraud and voter intimidation projects. Go here for more info, which includes some of the inquiries we’ve gotten from Congress about these projects.

I’m already working on your request, and I will keep you apprised of my progress. Call if you need anything or have questions about the material you just picked up.

Subject: Your FOIA request

Hello Greg,
Just following up from our conversation yesterday -- your FOIA request regarding emails b/w staff and commishes and Tova Wang and Job Serebrov is ready. I can have someone walk it over if you want. Also, don't forget to send your other request, which as I understood it is emails/correspondence b/w DOJ and EAC commissioners and staff regarding vote fraud and voter intimidation. If that's the case, I'll go ahead and start pulling this info.

Thanks. If you need to call me my number is 202-566-3103.
Just wanted to let you know that I called her today to tell her that I would be sending some responsive documents per her FOIA request about the vote fraud project that were not included in my previous response. Mostly these are emails that were not provided to me before, as well as a few memos and letters that were also not provided.

She said she was getting ready to send an appeal based on the belief that I did not provide her all of the emails and relevant letters, memos, and other documents. She noted that most of the emails involved only two EAC staffers. I explained that the new documents I was sending would include emails from additional staffers. However, I believe the bulk of what she has includes CCs of other staffers, so another search would only turn up duplicates, but I will verify that.

Wendy also asked about all of the attachments in the emails. I told her it would have taken many months to print all of those out and make the determination whether they were releasable under FOIA. She offered to identify the attachments they would like to see, and I told her that would be helpful. She also noted that in my letter, I estimated that she was received about 1,500 pages. She said they counted and there were only 800. I told her I estimated the page count, and she accepted that.

I asked her if she would consider holding off on the appeal until she received the additional documents, as they may satisfy her appeal. She agreed, and I told her I would send everything by the end of next week. She also requested that I send a scanned copy. I explained that only one of our scanners was working, and that it did not have the capacity to scan huge files.

I will keep you apprised...

Curtis,

In reference to FOIA requests about the vote fraud and voter intimidation and voter ID projects, and whether EAC should respond while the Office of Inspector General reviews circumstances surrounding these projects, I have come to a decision regarding this issue. After speaking with EAC's general counsel and reviewing your response to the chair's questions about communication during your review, I conclude that as EAC's FOIA officer, I must continue to follow the law and respond to FOIA requests regarding these topics. I will certainly provide copies of my responses to your reviewers and answer any questions you have. However, per your recommendation, I will decline answering questions from the media and the public until your review is complete. Please let me know if you have questions, and I appreciate your cooperation and counsel in this matter.

Subject Re: Need your help ASAP

Jeannie:

I did not receive your request in time to type responses on my blackberry by 2 PM, given the information needed. Here are the answers to your questions:

1. Why did we only contact DOJ officials regarding the accuracy of their interviews?

As far as I know, we didn't contact DOJ officials about this except in response to concerns they had previously expressed to us. Also, I don't believe we ever allowed DOJ to edit the summaries. (I certainly didn't.) I believe the consultants and I discussed the idea of having all the interviewees review their respective interview summaries, but the consultants objected to the idea and there were concerns that the all of the money remaining available was needed to complete the final report.

Craig Donsanto, Election Crimes Branch, saw the summary of his interview among the documents provided to the Working Group (prior to the meeting of that group), and pointed out an important factual error. The summary, as originally written, portrayed DOJ as switching from the prosecution of conspiracies to the prosecution of individuals. I was present at this interview and this was not what Craig had said, nor is it supported by the information available on the election crimes pursued by that branch. DOJ continues to pursue conspiracies and, in addition, has begun to pursue individuals (specifically, double voting, felon voting and alien voting) in an effort to deter others from election crime.

To my knowledge, John Tanner, Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, had not seen the consultants' full summary of his interview; but he expressed concern to Tova Wang and EAC about the consultants' characterization of the interviews with Donsanto and him that had been included in the May 2006 status report. Per HAVA requirements, the Voting Section is represented on the Advisory Board. Tanner pointed to the following errors:

- First, the consultants stated that DOJ was not pursuing voter suppression cases. Tanner responded that "[t]he Department has brought two 11(b) cases, one of the two in this Administration. The focus of DOJ activity has shifted, in fact, to voter suppression as there are fewer cases over voter dilution (challenges to at-large election systems, etc.) being brought by anyone as the number of jurisdictions with at-large election systems has shrunk dramatically. This Administration has, in fact, brought far more voter-suppression cases ... than ever in the past, including a majority of all cases under Sections 203 and 208 of the Act, and such key recent Section 2 cases as US v. City of Boston and US v. Long County, Georgia."

- Second, the consultants implied that DOJ is not pursuing instances of unequal implementation of ID rules. Tanner's response was that "[c]hallenges based on race and unequal implementation of ID rules are indeed actionable and we have brought lawsuits, such as in Boston and Long County; we have not identified instances of such discrimination in which we have not taken action."

Tanner also pointed to the consultants' refusal during the interview to define what they meant by "voter intimidation", which Tanner suspected did not jibe with the meaning of the term in federal prosecutions and probably contributed to misunderstandings. (Federal voter intimidation prosecutions require the threat of economic or physical harm.)

By the way, both of these officials are career attorneys, not political appointees. They have years of service at DOJ, working under a number of different administrations.

2. Exactly what did we change and why?

In the case of the Donsanto interview summary, I spoke with our consultants and asked them to make the correction. At first, they both refused. Later, they revised the summary to be a little less blatant, but the implication that there had been a complete change in approach remained. We revised the summary to clearly indicate that prosecution of conspiracies continues. The revised paragraph is on page 4 of the published summary. We also added an intro paragraph similar to other interview summaries submitted by the consultants to summarize the enforcement authority of the Election Crimes Branch and to distinguish it from the Voting Section, Civil Rights Division.

In the case of the actual John Tanner interview summary, we added an intro paragraph similar to other interview summaries submitted by the consultants to summarize the enforcement authority of the Voting Section and to distinguish it from the Election Crimes Branch. We also moved the consultants’ note about the refusal to share certain internal working papers to the end of the summary because it seemed to distract from the main interview points if left as an introduction.

Making the distinction between the Election Crimes Branch and the Voting Section is important. The Voting Section brings cases involving "systemic" discrimination because federal voting statutes focus on discriminatory action by local governments. It is criminal statutes that involve malfeasance by individuals and that are enforced by the Election Crimes Branch through Us Attorneys’ offices. The difference is key to understanding federal election law enforcement.

Interview with Craig Donsanto, Director, Elections Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, U.S. Department of Justice
January 13, 2006

The Department of Justice's (DOJ) Election Crimes Branch is responsible for supervising federal criminal investigations and prosecutions of election crimes.

Questions

How are Prosecution Decisions Made?

Craig Donsanto must approve all investigations that go beyond a preliminary stage, all charges, search warrant applications and subpoenas and all prosecutions. The decision to investigate is very sensitive because of the public officials involved. If a charge seems political, Donsanto will reject it. Donsanto gives possible theories for investigation. Donsanto and Noel Hillman will decide whether to farm out the case to an Assistant U.S. Attorney (AUSA). Donsanto uses a concept called predication. In-other-words, there must be enough evidence to suggest a crime has been committed. The method of evaluation of this evidence depends on the type of evidence and its source. There are two types of evidence---factual (antisocial behavior) and legal (antisocial behavior leading to statutory violations). Whether an indictment will be brought depends on the likelihood of success before a jury. Much depends on the type of evidence and the source. Donsanto said he “knows it when he sees it.” Donsanto will only indict if he is confident of a conviction assuming the worst case scenario – a jury trial.

A person under investigation will first receive a target letter. Often, a defendant who gets a target letter will ask for a departmental hearing. The defendant’s case will be heard by Donsanto and Hillman. On occasion, the assistant attorney general will review the case. The department grants such hearings easily because such defendants are likely to provide information about others involved.

The Civil Rights Division, Voting Rights Section makes its own decisions on prosecution. The head of that division is John Tanner. There is a lot of cooperation between the Voting Section and the Election Crimes Branch.

Does the Decision to Prosecute Incorporate Particular Political Considerations within a State Such as a One Party System or a System in which the Party in Power Controls the Means of Prosecution and Suppresses Opposition Complaints?

Yes. Before, the department would leave it to the states. Now, if there is racial animus involved in the case, there is political bias involved, or the prosecutor is not impartial, the department will take it over.

Does it Matter if the Complaint Comes from a Member of a Racial Minority?
No. But if the question involves racial animus, that has also always been an aggravating factor, making it more likely the Department will take it over.

What Kinds of Complaints Would Routinely Override Principles of Federalism?

Federalism is no longer big issue. DOJ is permitted to prosecute whenever there is a candidate for federal office on the ballot.

Are There Too Few Prosecutions?

DOJ can’t prosecute everything.

What Should Be Done to Improve the System?

The problem is asserting federal jurisdiction in non-federal elections. It is preferable for the federal government to pursue these cases for the following reasons: federal districts draw from a bigger and more diverse jury pool; the DOJ is politically detached; local district attorneys are hamstrung by the need to be re-elected; DOJ has more resources – local prosecutors need to focus on personal and property crimes—fraud cases are too big and too complex for them; DOJ can use the grand jury process as a discovery technique and to test the strength of the case.

In U.S. v. McNally, the court ruled that the mail fraud statute does not apply to election fraud. It was through the mail fraud statute that the department had routinely gotten federal jurisdiction over election fraud cases. 18 USC 1346, the congressional effort to “fix” McNally, did not include voter fraud.

As a result, the department needs a new federal law that allows federal prosecution whenever a federal instrumentality is used, e.g. the mail, federal funding, interstate commerce. The department has drafted such legislation, which was introduced but not passed in the early 1990s. A federal law is needed that permits prosecution in any election where any federal instrumentality is used.

Other Information

The Department has held four symposia for District Election Officers (DEOs) and FBI agents since the initiation of the Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative. In 2003, civil rights leaders were invited to make speeches, but were not permitted to take part in the rest of the symposium. All other symposia have been closed to the public. (Peg will be sending us the complete training materials used at those sessions. These are confidential and are the subject of FOIA litigation).

There are two types of attorneys in the division: prosecutors, who take on cases when the jurisdiction of the section requires it; the US Attorney has recused him or herself; or when the US Attorney is unable to handle the case (most frequent reason) and braintrust attorneys who analyze the facts, formulate theories, and draft legal documents.
Donsanto provided us with three case lists: Open cases (still being investigated) as of January 13, 2006 — confidential; election fraud prosecutions and convictions as a result of the Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative October 2002-January 13, 2006; and cases closed for lack of evidence as of January 13, 2006.

If we want more documents related to any case, we must get those documents from the states. The department will not release them to us.

Although the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate complaints of fraud, the number of cases that the department is investigating and the number of indictments the department is pursuing are both up dramatically.

Since 2002, the department has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters, and double voters than ever before. Previously, cases were only brought against conspiracies when there was a pattern or scheme to corrupt the process rather than individual offenders acting alone. For deterrence purposes, charges were not brought against individuals—those cases went un-prosecuted. This change in direction, focus, and level of aggression was by the decision of the Attorney General. The reason for the change was for deterrence purposes. The Attorney General decided to add the pursuit of individuals who vote when not eligible to vote (noncitizens, felons) or who vote more than once.

The department is currently undertaking three pilot projects to determine what works in developing the cases and obtaining convictions and what works with juries in such matters to gain convictions:

1. Felon voters in Milwaukee.
2. Alien voters in the Southern District of Florida. FYI — under 18 USC 611, to prosecute for “alien voting” there is no intent requirement. Conviction can lead to deportation. Nonetheless, the department feels compelled to look at mitigating factors such as was the alien told it was OK to vote, does the alien have a spouse that is a citizen.
3. Double voters in a variety of jurisdictions.

The department does not maintain records of the complaints that come in from DEOs, U.S attorneys and others during the election that are not pursued by the department. Donsanto asserted that U.S. attorneys never initiate frivolous investigations.

According to the new handbook, the department can take on a case whenever there is a federal candidate on the ballot.
Interview with John Tanner, Director, Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, U.S. Department of Justice

February 24, 2006

The Department of Justice’s (DOJ) Voting Section is charged with the civil enforcement of the Voting Rights Act, the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act (UOCAVA), the National Voter Registration Act (NVRA), and Title III of the Help America Vote Act (HAVA).

Note: Mr. Tanner’s reluctance to share data, information and his perspective on solving the problems presented an obstacle to conducting the type of interview that would help inform this project as much as we would have hoped. Mr. Tanner would not give us any information about or data from the section’s election complaint intake records; data or even general information from the Interactive Case Management (ICM) system; its formal process for tracking and managing work activities in pursuing complaints and potential violations of the voting laws; and would give us only a selected few samples of attorney observer reports; reports that every Voting Section attorney who is observing elections at polling sites on Election Day is required to submit. He would not discuss in any manner any current investigations or cases the section is involved in. He also did not believe it was his position to offer us recommendations as to how his office, elections, or the voting process might be improved.

Authority and Process

The Voting Section, in contrast to the Public Integrity Section as Craig Donsanto described it, typically focuses only on systemic problems resulting from government action or inaction, not problems caused by individuals. Indeed, the section never goes after individuals because it does not have the statutory authority to do so. In situations in which individuals are causing problems at the polls and interfering with voting rights, the section calls the local election officials to resolve it.

Federal voting laws enforced by the section only apply to state action, so the section only sues state and local governments — it does not have any enforcement power over individuals. Most often, the section enters into consent agreements with governments that focus on poll worker training, takes steps to restructure how polls are run, and deals with problems on Election Day on the spot. Doing it this way has been most effective — for example, while the section used to have the most observers in the South, with systematic changes forced upon those jurisdictions, have made it so now the section now does not get complaints from the South.

The section can get involved even where there is no federal candidate on the ballot if there is a racial issue under the 14th and 15th Amendments.

When the section receives a complaint, attorneys first determine whether it is a matter that involves individual offenders or a systemic problem. When deciding what to do with the complaint, the section errs on the side of referring it criminally to avoid having any because they do not want civil litigation to complicate a possible criminal case.

When a complaint comes in, the attorneys ask questions to see if there are even problems there that the complainant is not aware are violations of the law. For example, in the Boston case, the attorney did not just look at Spanish language cases under section 203, but also brought a Section 2 case for violations regarding Chinese and Vietnamese voters. When looking into a case, the attorneys look for specificity, witnesses and supporting evidence.

Often, lawsuits bring voluntary compliance.

Voter Intimidation

Many instances of what some people refer to as voter intimidation are more unclear now. For example, photographing voters at the polls has been called intimidating, but now everyone is at the polls with a camera. It is hard to know when something is intimidation and it is difficult to show that it was an act of intimidation.

The fact that both parties are engaging in these tactics now makes it more complicated. It makes it difficult to point the finger at any one side.

The inappropriate use of challengers on the basis of race would be a violation of the law. Mr. Tanner was unaware that such allegations were made in Ohio in 2004. He said there had never been a formal investigation into the abusive use of challengers.

Mr. Tanner said a lot of the challenges are legitimate because you have a lot of voter registration fraud as a result of groups paying people to register voters by the form. They turn in bogus registration forms. Then the parties examine the registration forms and challenge them because 200 of them, for example, have addresses of a vacant lot.

However, Mr. Tanner said the department was able to informally intervene in challenger situations in Florida, Atkinson County, Georgia and in Alabama, as was referenced in a February 23 Op-Ed in USA Today. Mr. Tanner reiterated the section takes racial targeting very seriously.

Refusal to provide provisional ballots would be a violation of the law that the section would investigate.

Deceptive practices are committed by individuals and would be a matter for the Public Integrity Section. Local government would have to be involved for the voting section to become involved.

Unequal implementation of ID rules, or asking minority voters only for ID would be something the section would go after. Mr. Tanner was unaware of allegations of this in 2004. He said this is usually a problem where you have language minorities and the poll workers cannot understand the voters when they say their names. The section has never formally investigated or solely focused a case based on abuse of ID provisions. However, implementation of ID rules was part of the Section 2 case in San Diego. Mr. Tanner reiterated that the section is doing more than ever before.

When asked about the section’s references to incidents of vote fraud in the documents related to the new state photo identification requirements, Mr. Tanner said the section only looks at retrogression, not at the wisdom of what a legislature does. In Georgia, for example, everyone statistically has identification, and more blacks have ID than whites. With respect to the letter to Senator Kit Bond regarding voter ID, the section did refer to the perception of concern about dead voters because of reporting by the Atlanta Journal-Constitution. It is understandable that when you have thousands of bogus registrations that would be concerns about polling place fraud. Very close elections make this even more of an understandable concern. Putting control of registration lists in the hands of the states will be helpful because at this higher level of government you find a higher level of professionalism.

It is hard to know how much vote suppression and intimidation is taking place because it depends on one’s definition of the terms—they are used very loosely by some people. However, the enforcement of federal law over the years has made an astounding difference so that the level of discrimination has plummeted. Registration of minorities has soared, as can be seen on the section’s website. Mr. Tanner was unsure if the same was true with respect to turnout, but the gap is less. That information is not on the section’s website.

The section is not filing as many Section 2 cases as compared to Section 203 cases because many of the jurisdictions sued under Section 2 in the past do not have issues anymore. Mr. Tanner said that race based problems are rare now.

NVRA has been effective in opening up the registration process. In terms of enforcement, Mr. Tanner said they do what they can when they have credible allegations. There is a big gap between complaints and what can be substantiated. Mr. Tanner stated that given the high quality of the attorneys now in the section, if they do not investigate it or bring action, that act complained of did not happen.

Recommendations
Mr. Tanner did not feel it was appropriate to make recommendations.

Note: Mr. Tanner’s reluctance to share data, information and his perspective on solving the problems presented an obstacle to conducting the type of interview that would help inform this project as much as we would have hoped. We did not have access to any information about or data from the section’s election complaint in-take phone logs or data or even general information from the Interactive Case Management (ICM) system—its formal process for tracking and managing work activities in pursuing complaints and potential violations of the voting laws. Only a selected few samples of attorney-observer reports were provided, reports that every Voting Section attorney who is observing elections at poll sites on Election Day is required to submit. Mr. Tanner would not discuss any current investigations or cases the section is involved in.
As far as I know, you are absolutely correct! Julie did the bulk of the rewrite and used my analyses of the preliminary info submitted by our contractors. I know that I had no contact with the administration regarding this study. --- Peggy

Hillman Statement on the release of the voting fraud report 12.01.06 (DRAFT).doc STATEMENT BY ELECTION ASSISTANCE COMMISSIONER GRACIA HILLMAN ON
"THE EAC REPORT ON VOTING FRAUD AND VOTER INTIMIDATION STUDY"

Washington, D.C. – December 7 – Today the Election Assistance Commission (EAC) voted on the findings of the "Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Study" and accepted recommendations to conduct a comprehensive study to assess all claims, charges and prosecutions of voting crimes. This report, which was largely based on anecdotal information, was months in development and is the result of two independent researchers' assessment of what characterizes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the United States.

Today's vote sets in motion the EAC's acceptance of the researchers' and subsequent working group's core recommendation that the matter of voting fraud and voter intimidation deserves more than just an anecdotal assessment, but rather a "comprehensive survey and study of the information available from investigatory agencies, prosecutorial bodies and courts on the number and types of complaints, charges and prosecutions of election crimes" based on "hard data on complaints, charges and prosecutions".

While I would have liked this report to have been made to the recent 2006 mid-term elections, I am confident that the EAC is on the right path toward next steps which include:

1) A comprehensive survey/study on voting fraud and voter intimidation based on hard data by the end of calendar year 2007, and
2) By mid-2008, a set of standards/best practices for state election officials and prosecuting authorities to use in assessing legitimate claims and bringing them to justice.

For the EAC's full report and news release on the "Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Study" please visit www.eac.gov.
I do not have anything. Thanks.

Subject Re: FOIA Request

Jeannie:
I haven't had any relevant emails with Job or Tova that occurred after the batch I gave you in response to the Brennan Center FOIA. I last heard from Tova in August 2006 and included that message in the stuff I sent you earlier. Job and I corresponded in February 2007 about how his pay had been reported (what amounts were reported in which tax year). As there was no discussion of the research project itself, I don't think that is relevant.

If you could reuse the information I provided last time, I would really appreciate it. (It took me hours to pull that together and I would rather not have to repeat that.) I think the stuff I sent you earlier also included correspondence with Working Group and other folks outside of the EAC, which would need to be culled... --- Peggy

Dear Ms. Layson:

This is an official request under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C., 552 as amended.

I am writing on behalf of McClatchy Newspapers to request copies of all emails between Job Serebrov and Elections Assistance Commission staff or members and all emails between Tova Wang and commission staff or members pertaining to a voter fraud study the two were contracted to perform for the EAC.
In the event that this request results in research or copying, McClatchy Newspapers requests a public interest fee waiver because the material being sought is likely to be used in a newspaper story. We would argue strongly that there is a significant public interest in our reviewing the material being sought. As the nation's second largest newspaper group with 32 daily newspapers and a new service serving 400 newspapers, McClatchy easily qualifies as acting in the public interest.

If possible, I would appreciate your expediting this request, especially any emails transmitted after the draft report was submitted, because of the obvious topical import of these documents.

Should this letter prompt questions, please feel free to phone me at 202-383-0005. Thanks for your assistance.

Sincerely,

Gregory Gordon

The stated purpose of the EAC's recently released "fraud report" was not to draw conclusions about fraud, but determine how the subject should be studied by the EAC. As such, it would inappropriate for the EAC to make unsupported conclusions regarding fraud in its preliminary report. Such speculative statements would only serve to compromise its future effort to study this matter in an nonpartisan fashion.
Take a look at these and see if you agree that the changes are technical.

Summaries of Interviews with Donsanto-Tanner redacted-revised.doc
The Department of Justice's (DOJ) Election Crimes Branch is responsible for supervising federal criminal investigations and prosecutions of election crimes.

Questions

How are Prosecution Decisions Made?

Craig Donsanto must approve all investigations that go beyond a preliminary stage, all charges, search warrant applications and subpoenas and all prosecutions. The decision to investigate is very sensitive because of the public officials involved. If a charge seems political, Donsanto will reject it. Donsanto gives possible theories for investigation. Donsanto and Noel Hillman will decide whether to farm out the case to an Assistant U.S. Attorney (AUSA). Donsanto uses a concept called predication. In other words, there must be enough evidence to suggest a crime has been committed. The method of evaluation of this evidence depends on the type of evidence and its source. There are two types of evidence—factual (antisocial behavior) and legal (antisocial behavior leading to statutory violations). Whether an indictment will be brought depends on the likelihood of success before a jury. Much depends on the type of evidence and the source. Donsanto said he “knows it when he sees it.” Donsanto will only indict if he is confident of a conviction assuming the worst case scenario—a jury trial.

A person under investigation will first receive a target letter. Often, a defendant who gets a target letter will ask for a departmental hearing. The defendant's case will be heard by Donsanto and Hillman. On occasion, the assistant attorney general will review the case. The department grants such hearings because such defendants are likely to provide information about others involved.

The Civil Rights Division, Voting Rights Section makes its own decisions on prosecution. The head of that division is John Tanner. There is a lot of cooperation between the Voting Section and the Election Crimes Branch.

Does the Decision to Prosecute Incorporate Particular Political Considerations within a State Such as a One Party System or a System in which the Party in Power Controls the Means of Prosecution and Suppresses Opposition Complaints?

Yes. Before, the department would leave it to the states. Now, if there is racial animus involved in the case, there is political bias involved, or the prosecutor is not impartial, the department will take it over.

Does it Matter if the Complaint Comes from a Member of a Racial Minority?

No. But if the question involves racial animus, that has also always been an aggravating
What Kinds of Complaints Would Routinely Override Principles of Federalism?

Federalism is no longer big issue. DOJ is permitted to prosecute whenever there is a candidate for federal office on the ballot.

Are There Too Few Prosecutions?

DOJ can't prosecute everything.

What Should Be Done to Improve the System?

The problem is asserting federal jurisdiction in non-federal elections. It is preferable for the federal government to pursue these cases for the following reasons: federal districts draw from a bigger and more diverse jury pool; the DOJ is politically detached; local district attorneys are hamstrung by the need to be re-elected; DOJ has more resources—local prosecutors need to focus on personal and property crimes—fraud cases are too big and too complex for them; DOJ can use the grand jury process as a discovery technique and to test the strength of the case.

In U.S. v. McNally, the court ruled that the mail fraud statute does not apply to election fraud. It was through the mail fraud statute that the department had routinely gotten federal jurisdiction over election fraud cases. 18 USC 1346, the congressional effort to "fix" McNally, did not include voter fraud.

As a result, the department needs a new federal law that allows federal prosecution whenever a federal instrumentality is used, e.g. the mail, federal funding, interstate commerce. The department has drafted such legislation, which was introduced but not passed in the early 1990s. A federal law is needed that permits prosecution in any election where any federal instrumentality is used.

Other Information

The Department has held four symposia for District Election Officers (DEOs) and FBI agents since the initiation of the Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative. In 2003, civil rights leaders were invited to make speeches, but were not permitted to take part in the rest of the symposium. All other symposia have been closed to the public.

There are two types of attorneys in the division: prosecutors, who take on cases when the jurisdiction of the section requires it; the US Attorney has recused him or herself; or when the US Attorney is unable to handle the case (most frequent reason) and braintrust attorneys who analyze the facts, formulate theories, and draft legal documents.

Cases
Donsanto provided us with three case lists: cases still being investigated as of January 13, 2006 – confidential; election fraud prosecutions and convictions as a result of the Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative October 2002-January 13, 2006; and cases closed for lack of evidence as of January 13, 2006.

If we want more documents related to any case, we must get those documents from the states. The department will not release them to us.

Although the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate complaints of fraud, the number of cases that the department is investigating and the number of indictments the department is pursuing are both up dramatically.

Since 2002, the department has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters, and double voters than ever before. Previously, cases were only brought against conspiracies to corrupt the process rather than individual offenders acting alone. For deterrence purposes, the Attorney General decided to add the pursuit of individuals who vote when not eligible to vote (noncitizens, felons) or who vote more than once. The department is currently undertaking three pilot projects to determine what works in developing the cases and obtaining convictions and what works with juries in such matters to gain convictions:

1. Felon voters in Milwaukee.

2. Alien voters in the Southern District of Florida. FYI – under 18 USC 611, to prosecute for “alien voting” there is no intent requirement. Conviction can lead to deportation. Nonetheless, the department feels compelled to look at mitigating factors such as was the alien told it was OK to vote, does the alien have a spouse that is a citizen.

3. Double voters in a variety of jurisdictions.

The department does not maintain records of the complaints that come in from DEOs, U.S attorneys and others during the election that are not pursued by the department. Donsanto asserted that U.S. attorneys never initiate frivolous investigations.

According to the new handbook, the department can take on a case whenever there is a federal candidate on the ballot
Interview with John Tanner, Chief, Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, U.S. Department of Justice

February 24, 2006

The Department of Justice’s (DOJ) Voting Section is charged with the civil enforcement of the Voting Rights Act, the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act (UOCAVA), the National Voter Registration Act (NVRA), and Title III of the Help America Vote Act (HAVA).

Authority and Process

The Voting Section, in contrast to the Public Integrity Section as Craig Donsanto described it, typically focuses only on systemic problems resulting from government action or inaction, not problems caused by individuals. Indeed, the section never goes after individuals because it does not have the statutory authority to do so. In situations in which individuals are causing problems at the polls and interfering with voting rights, the section calls the local election officials to resolve it.

Federal voting laws enforced by the section only apply to state action, so the section only sues state and local governments – it does not have any enforcement power over individuals. Most often, the section enters into consent agreements with governments that focus on poll worker training, takes steps to restructure how polls are run, and deals with problems on Election Day on the spot. Doing it this way has been most effective – for example, while the section used to have the most observers in the South, with systematic changes forced upon those jurisdictions, the section now does not get complaints from the South.

The section can get involved even where there is no federal candidate on the ballot if there is a racial issue under the 14th and 15th Amendments.

When the section receives a complaint, attorneys first determine whether it is a matter that involves individual offenders or a systemic problem. When deciding what to do with the complaint, the section errs on the side of referring it criminally to avoid having any civil litigation complicate a possible criminal case.

When a complaint comes in, the attorneys ask questions to see if there are even problems there that the complainant is not aware are violations of the law. For example, in the Boston case, the attorney did not just look at Spanish language cases under section 203, but also brought a Section 2 case for violations regarding Chinese and Vietnamese voters. When looking into a case, the attorneys look for specificity, witnesses and supporting evidence.

Often, lawsuits bring voluntary compliance.

Voter Intimidation
Many instances of what some people refer to as voter intimidation are more unclear now. For example, photographing voters at the polls has been called intimidating, but now everyone is at the polls with a camera. It is hard to know when something is intimidation and it is difficult to show that it was an act of intimidation.

The fact that both parties are engaging in these tactics now makes it more complicated. It makes it difficult to point the finger at any one side.

The inappropriate use of challengers on the basis of race would be a violation of the law. Mr. Tanner was unaware that such allegations were made in Ohio in 2004. He said there had never been a formal investigation into the abusive use of challengers.

Mr. Tanner said a lot of the challenges are legitimate because you have a lot of voter registration fraud as a result of groups paying people to register voters by the form. They turn in bogus registration forms. Then the parties examine the registration forms and challenge them because 200 of them, for example, have addresses of a vacant lot.

However, Mr. Tanner said the department was able to informally intervene in challenger situations in Florida, Atkinson County, Georgia and in Alabama, as was referenced in a February 23 Op-Ed in USA Today. Mr. Tanner reiterated the section takes racial targeting very seriously.

Refusal to provide provisional ballots would be a violation of the law that the section would investigate.

Deceptive practices are committed by individuals and would be a matter for the Public Integrity Section. Local government would have to be involved for the Voting Section to become involved.

Unequal implementation of ID rules, or asking minority voters only for ID would be something the section would go after. Mr. Tanner was unaware of allegations of this in 2004. He said this is usually a problem where you have language minorities and the poll workers cannot understand the voters when they say their names. The section has never formally investigated or solely focused a case based on abuse of ID provisions. However, implementation of ID rules was part of the Section 2 case in San Diego. Mr. Tanner reiterated that the section is doing more than ever before.

When asked about the section's references to incidents of vote fraud in the documents related to the new state photo identification requirements, Mr. Tanner said the section only looks at retrogression, not at the wisdom of what a legislature does. In Georgia, for example, everyone statistically has identification, and more blacks have ID than whites. With respect to the letter to Senator Kit Bond regarding voter ID, the section did refer to the perception of concern about dead voters because of reporting by the Atlanta Journal-Constitution. It is understandable that when you have thousands of bogus registrations that there would be concerns about polling place fraud. Very close elections make this even more of an understandable concern. Putting control of registration lists in the hands of the states will be helpful because at this higher level of government you find a higher level of professionalism.

It is hard to know how much vote suppression and intimidation is taking place because it depends on one’s definition of the terms – they are used very loosely by some people. However, the enforcement of federal law over the years has made an astounding difference so that the level of discrimination has plummeted. Registration of minorities has soared, as can be seen on the section’s website. Mr. Tanner was unsure if the same was true with respect to turnout, but the gap is less. That information is not on the section’s website.

The section is not filing as many Section 2 cases as compared to Section 203 cases because many of the jurisdictions sued under Section 2 in the past do not have issues anymore. Mr. Tanner said that race based problems are rare now.

NVRA has been effective in opening up the registration process. In terms of enforcement, Mr. Tanner said they do what they can when they have credible allegations. There is a big gap between complaints and what can be substantiated. Mr. Tanner stated that given the high quality of the attorneys now in the section, if they do not investigate it or bring action, that act complained of did not happen.

Recommendations
Mr. Tanner did not feel it was appropriate to make recommendations.

Note: We contend that Mr. Tanner’s reluctance to share data, information and his perspective on solving the problems presented an obstacle to conducting the type of interview that would help inform this project as much as we would have hoped. We did not have access to any information about or data from the section’s election complaint intake phone logs or data or even general information from the Interactive Case Management (ICM) system-its formal process for tracking and managing work activities in pursuing complaints and potential violations of the voting laws. Only a selected few samples of attorney-observer reports were provided, reports that every Voting Section attorney who is observing elections at poll sites on Election Day is required to submit. Mr. Tanner would not discuss any current investigations or cases the section is involved in.
They already have, and asked me not to share it and to delete it.

John, Based on the 6 article Layson sent and the others that I distributed over the weekend, I conclude this: We lost the battle, but won the war.

I am concerned about the news that Rush Holt's election reform bill would make the EAC permanent. Perhaps we could arrange to talk to him during the 2 week House Easter break and make some suggestions about how the EAC should be restructured before it is made permanent. (Ray Martinez would, I believe, have much to contribute on that topic.)

Subject your questions

Pam,
Per your question, Congressman Hinchey requested that the following be sent to the House Appropriations Committee, Subcommittee on Financial Services and General Government: EAC’s assessment report on CIBER, Inc., the draft report submitted to EAC regarding voter fraud and intimidation, and the draft report submitted to EAC concerning voter identification. The assessment report on CIBER, Inc. and the final culmination of the voter fraud and intimidation research - Election Crimes: An Initial Review and Recommendations for Further Study -- are available at www.eac.gov, but we also provided hard copies to the committee.

Regarding the voter ID research project, as I mentioned at our Feb. public meeting EAC Chair Donetta Davidson requested that staff review the initial research provided by Eagleton and produce a final report, which would include recommendations for further study on this subject. However, we provided the Committee the initial information Eagleton provided to EAC.

Regarding the voter fraud and intimidation research, we provided the Committee EAC's final report and all of the information provided by the consultants. At a May 2006 public meeting of our Standards Board and Board of Advisors, the EAC project manager for this research presented a staff update on the project. Go here to view the public meeting agenda, page 3. The update the project manager gave at this public meeting has been made available to anyone who asked for it, and I've attached it for your review. The final culmination of this project can be found here. Go to page 24, where you will find links to attachments, which provide the data reviewed by the consultants. The commissioners adopted this report, including four recommendations for further study at a public meeting in Dec. 2006. The final report includes all of the recommendations put forth by the consultants as well the research they provided. (Consultants provided 16 suggestions for further study. See pages 16-22.)

Please let me know if you would like to speak with EAC Chair Davidson if you need sound or something for attribution. She'd also be glad to discuss our approach for these research projects. Again, my direct number is 202-566-3103 or you can reach me on my cell after 5:30.

Status Report on the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research Project

May 17, 2006
INTRODUCTION

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and

- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

In September 2005, the Commission hired two consultants with expertise in this subject matter, Job Serebrov and Tova Wang, to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;

- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;

- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;

- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and

- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

As of the date of this report, the consultants have drafted a definition of election fraud, reviewed relevant literature and reports, interviewed persons from government and private sectors with subject matter expertise, analyzed news reports of alleged election fraud, reviewed case law, and established a project working group.
DEFINITION OF ELECTION FRAUD

The consultants drafted a definition of election fraud that includes numerous aspects of voting fraud (including voter intimidation, which is considered a subset of voting fraud) and voter registration fraud, but excludes campaign finance violations and election administration mistakes. This draft will be discussed and probably refined by the project working group, which is scheduled to convene on May 18, 2006.

LITERATURE REVIEW

The consultants found many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. They found little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud appears to be the report written by Lori Minnite, entitled “Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud”. The most systematic look at voter intimidation appears to be the report by Laughlin McDonald, entitled “The New Poll Tax”. The consultants found that books written about this subject all seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Moreover, the consultants found that reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund’s frequently cited book, “Stealing Elections”.

Consultants found that researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.

- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate; but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
• There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.

• Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.

• Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.

• Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Recommendations

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research include a follow up study of allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles. They also suggest that the research should focus on filling the gap between the lack of reports based on methodical studies by social or political scientists and the numerous, but less scientific, reports published by advocacy groups.

INTERVIEWS

The consultants jointly selected experts from the public and private sector for interviews. The consultants' analysis of their discussions with these members of the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities follows.

Common Themes

• There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.

• There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, "dead" voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud, although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.

- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.

- Several people indicate that, for various reasons, DOJ is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. Interviews with DOJ personnel indicate that the Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance in this area. While the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, continues to maintain an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process (including voter suppression), it also has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting.

- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat - will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed.

- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.
With respect to DOJ’s Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one’s definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and his office has not pursued any such cases.

Craig Donsanto of DOJ’s Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases DOJ is investigating and the number of indictments his office is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, in addition to pursuing systematic election corruption schemes, DOJ has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so that his agency can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.

- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment.
- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama’s “deceptive practices” bill.
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected as non partisan officials, they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas are a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states’ office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.
Status Report - EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research - May 17, 2006

- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots "for cause" only if it were politically feasible.

- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the proposal in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.

- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines.

NEWS ARTICLES

Consultants conducted a Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006. A systematic, numerical analysis of the data collected during this review is currently being prepared. What follows is an overview of these articles provided by the consultants.

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.

- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.

- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.
Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms;
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with.

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles, in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters’ registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;
• Poll watchers harassing voters;
• Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;
• Disproportionate police presence;
• Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate; and
• Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from “battleground” states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

“Dead Voters and Multiple Voting”

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials, and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found five such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.
As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia). There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of completed voter registration applications. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case, charges were filed against ten individuals. In another case, a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this Nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem was the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Recommendation

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research should include a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

CASE LAW RESEARCH

After reviewing over 40,000 cases from 2000 to the present, the majority of which came from appeals courts, the consultants found comparatively few applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, the consultants found that no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it appears to them that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

Recommendation

Because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, consultants suggest that subsequent EAC research include a review of state trial-level decisions.

PROJECT WORKING GROUP

Consultants and EAC worked together to select members for the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group that included election officials and representatives of advocacy groups and the legal community who have an interest and expertise in the subject matter. (See Attachment A for a list of members.) The working group is scheduled to convene at EAC offices on May 18, 2006 to consider the results of the preliminary research and to offer ideas for future EAC activities concerning this subject.

FINAL REPORT

After convening the project working group, the consultants will draft a final report summarizing the results of their research and the working group deliberations. This report will include recommendations for future EAC research related to this subject matter. The draft report will be reviewed by EAC and, after obtaining any clarifications or corrections deemed necessary, will be made available to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors for review and comment. Following this, a final report will be prepared.

Pam,

Per your question, Congressman Hinchey requested three documents be sent to the House Appropriations Committee Subcommittee on Financial Services and General Government: EAC’s assessment report on CIBER, Inc., the draft report submitted to EAC regarding voter fraud and intimidation, and the draft report submitted to EAC concerning voter identification. The assessment report on CIBER, Inc. and the final culmination of the voter fraud and intimidation research – Election Crimes: An Initial Review and Recommendations for Further Study -- are available at www.eac.gov, but we also provided hard copies to the committee.

Regarding the voter ID research project, as I mentioned at our Feb. public meeting EAC Chair Donetta Davidson requested that staff review the initial research provided by Eagleton and produce a final report, which would include recommendations for further study on this subject. However, we provided the Committee the initial information Eagleton provided to EAC.

Regarding the voter fraud and intimidation research, we provided the Committee EAC's final report and all of the information provided by the consultants. At a May 2006 public meeting of our Standards Board and Board of Advisors, the EAC project manager for this research presented a staff update on the project. Go here to view the public meeting agenda, page 3. The update the project manager gave at this public meeting has been made available to anyone who asked for it. The final culmination of this project can be found here. Go to page 24, where you will find links to attachments, which provide the data reviewed by the consultants. The commissioners adopted this report, including four recommendations for further study at a public meeting in Dec. 2006. The final report includes all of the recommendations put forth by the consultants as well the research they provided. (Consultants provided 16 suggestions for further study. See pages 16-22.)

Please let me know if you would like to speak with EAC Chair Davidson if you need something for attribution. She'd also be glad to discuss our approach to both of these research projects. Again, my direct number is 202-566-3103 or WASHINGTON – The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) has voted unanimously to launch a comprehensive, multi-year study focused on voter identification laws. After concluding that initial research covering only one election cycle was not sufficient to draw any conclusions, the Commission declined to adopt a report based on the initial research, but to release all of the information to the public. The information is available at www.eac.gov.

“Many new voter identification laws have been enacted recently, and the Commission began working to determine the impact of these new laws,” said EAC Chair Donetta Davidson. “However, after careful consideration of the initial research conducted by our contractor, the Commission decided this important issue deserves a more in-depth research approach and that it should be examined beyond only one election cycle. The bottom line is that the research raises more questions than provides answers.”

EAC’s strategy for moving forward is based upon an examination of the initial research and the testimony and discussion about this research project at the Commission’s February 8, 2007 public meeting. For more information about the public meeting agenda, transcript, and testimony go to http://www.eac.gov/Public_Meeting_020807.asp.

EAC’s future research on this topic will be expanded to include more than one election cycle, environmental and political factors, and the numerous changes in state laws and regulations related to voter identification requirements that have occurred since 2004. EAC comprehensive research approach will undertake the following activities:

- Conduct an ongoing state-by-state review, reporting and tracking of voter identification requirements. This will include tracking states’ requirements which require a voter to state his or her name, to sign his or her name, to match his or her signature to a signature on file, to provide photo or non-photo identification or to swear an affidavit affirming his or her identity.

- Establish a baseline of information that will include factors that may affect or influence Citizen Voting Age Population (CVAP) voter participation, including various voter identification requirements, the competitiveness of a race and certain environmental or political factors. EAC will use some of the information collected by Eagleton as well as additional data from the states to develop this baseline.

- Convene a working group of advocates, academics, research methodologists and election officials to discuss EAC’s next study of voter identification. Topics to be discussed include methodology, specific issues to be covered in the study and timelines for completing an EAC study on voter identification.
• Study how voter identification provisions that have been in place for two or more Federal elections have impacted voter turnout, voter registration figures, and fraud. Included in this study will be an examination of the relationship between voter turnout and other factors such as race and gender. Study the effects of voter identification provisions, or the lack thereof, on early, absentee and vote-by-mail voting.

• Publish a series of best practice case studies which detail a particular state’s or jurisdiction’s experiences with educating poll workers and voters about various voter identification requirements. Included in the case studies will be detail on the policies and practices used to educate and inform poll workers and voters.

EAC is an independent bipartisan commission created by the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA). It is charged with administering payments to states and developing guidance to meet HAVA requirements, implementing election administration improvements, adopting voluntary voting system guidelines, accrediting voting system test laboratories and certifying voting equipment and serving as a national clearinghouse and resource of information regarding election administration. The four EAC commissioners are Donetta Davidson, chair; Rosemary Rodriguez, Caroline Hunter and Gracia Hillman.

###
EAC Study of Voter Identification Requirements

Background

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) authorizes the United States Election Assistance Commission (EAC) to conduct periodic studies of election administration issues. In May 2005, EAC contracted with Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey through its Eagleton Institute of Politics ("Contractor") to perform a review and legal analysis of state legislation, administrative procedures and court cases, and to perform a literature review on other research and data available on the topic of voter identification requirements. Further, the Contractor was asked to analyze the problems and challenges of voter identification, to hypothesize alternative approaches and to recommend various policies that could be applied to these approaches.

The Contractor performed a statistical analysis of the relationship of various requirements for voter identification to voter turnout in the 2004 election. Drawing on its nationwide review and legal analysis of state statutes and regulations for voter identification, the contractor compared states with similar voter identification requirements and drew conclusions based on comparing turnout rates among states for one election – November 2004. For example, the turnout rate in 2004 in states that required the voter to provide a photo identification document was compared to the turnout rate in 2004 in states with a requirement that voters give his or her name in order to receive a ballot. Contractor used two sets of data to estimate turnout rates: 1) voting age population estimates and 2) individual-level survey data from the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau.

The Contractor presented testimony summarizing its findings from this statistical and data analysis at the February 8, 2007 public meeting of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission. The Contractor's testimony, its summary of voter identification requirements by state, its summary of court decisions and literature on voter identification and related issues, an annotated bibliography on voter identification issues and its summary of state statutes and regulations affecting voter identification are attached to this report and can also be found on EAC's website, www.eac.gov.

EAC Declines to Adopt Draft Report

1 In 2004, three of the states that authorized election officials to request photo identification allowed voters to provide a non-photo ID and still vote a regular ballot and two others permitted voters who lacked photo ID to vote a regular ballot by swearing and affidavit.
2 The July 2004 estimates for voting age population were provided by the U.S. Census Bureau. These data did not differentiate between citizens and non-citizens; because these numbers include non-citizens, the Contractor applied the percentage of citizens included in voting age population statistics in 2000 to the U.S. Census Bureau estimated voting age population in 2004. Thus, 2004 estimates of voting age population include persons who are not registered to vote.
3 The Current Population Survey is based on reports from self-described registered voters who also describe themselves as U.S. citizens.
EAC finds the Contractor's summary of States' voter identification requirements and its summary of state laws, statutes, regulations and litigation surrounding the implementation of voter identification requirements, to be a first step in the Commission's efforts to study the possible impact of voter identification requirements.

However, EAC has concerns regarding the data, analysis, and statistical methodology the Contractor used to analyze voter identification requirements to determine if these laws have an impact on turnout rates. The Contractor used a single election's statistics to conduct this analysis. The two sets of data came from the Census Bureau and included persons who were not eligible to and did not vote. The first analysis using averaged county-level turnout data from the U.S. Census showed no statistically significant correlations. So, a second analysis using a data set based upon the Current Population Survey (which was self-reported and showed a significantly higher turnout rate than other conventional data) was conducted that produced only some evidence of correlation between voter identification requirements and turnout. Furthermore, the initial categorization of voter identification requirements included classifications that actually require no identification at all, such as "state your name." The research methodology and the statistical analysis used by the Contractor were questioned by independent working and peer review groups comprised of social scientists and statisticians. The Contractor and the EAC agree that the report raises more questions than provides answers. Thus, EAC will not adopt the Contractor's study and will not issue an EAC report based upon this study. All of the material provided by the Contractor is attached.

Further EAC Study on Voter Identification Requirements

EAC will engage in a longer-term, more systematic review of voter identification requirements. Additional study on the topic will include more than one Federal election cycle, additional environmental and political factors that effect voter participation, and the numerous changes in state laws and regulations related to voter identification requirements that have occurred since 2004.

EAC will undertake the following activities:

- Conduct an ongoing state-by-state review, reporting and tracking of voter identification requirements. This will include tracking states' requirements which require a voter to state this or her name, to sign his or her name, to match his or her signature to a signature on file, to provide photo or non-photo identification or to swear an affidavit affirming his or her identify.

- Establish a baseline of information that will include factors that may affect or influence Citizen Voting Age Population (CVAP) voter participation, including various voter identification requirements, the competitiveness of a race and certain environmental or political factors. EAC will use some of the information collected by Eagleton as well as additional data from the states to develop this baseline.

• In 2007, convene a working group of advocates, academics, research methodologists and election officials to discuss EAC's next study of voter identification. Topics to be discussed include methodology, specific issues to be covered in the study and timelines for completing an EAC study on voter identification.

• Study how voter identification provisions that have been in place for two or more Federal elections have impacted voter turnout, voter registration figures, and fraud. Included in this study will be an examination of the relationship between voter turnout and other factors such as race and gender. Study the effects of voter identification provisions, or the lack thereof, on early, absentee and vote-by-mail voting.

• Publish a series of best practice case studies which detail a particular state's or jurisdiction's experiences with educating poll workers and voters about various voter identification requirements. Included in the case studies will be detail on the policies and practices used to educate and inform poll workers and voters.
No problem. Just let me know if I can be of further assistance or if you'd like to discuss this with the EAC chair.

Attached, please find my edits. My intention was to try to explain in English how the Contractor conducted the study in the 2nd graph of the background statement. I realize I left some information out; for example, how he ran the numbers based on maximum and minimum id requirements. I am open to any suggestions on how to better describe what they did; however, despite reading the report and Appendix C many times, I am still do not understand exactly how the study was conducted. I think we should run the 2nd graph by the Contractor to ensure its accuracy.

EAC Statement on Future Study of Voter Identification Requirements

Background

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) authorizes the United States Election Assistance Commission (EAC) to conduct periodic studies of election administration issues. In May 2005, EAC contracted with Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey through its Eagleton Institute of Politics ("Contractor") to perform a review and legal analysis of state legislation, administrative procedures and court cases, and to perform a literature review on other research and data available on the topic of voter identification requirements. Further, the Contractor was asked to analyze the problems and challenges of voter identification, to hypothesize alternative approaches and to recommend various policies that could be applied to these approaches.

The Contractor performed a statistical analysis of the relationship of various requirements for voter identification to voter turnout in the 2004 election. The contractor compared states with similar voter identification requirements and drew conclusions based on comparing turnout rates among states for one election--November 2004. For example, the turnout rate in 2004 in states with a photo identification requirement was compared to the turnout rate in 2004 in states without a requirement that voters sign their name in order to receive a ballot. Contractor used two sets of data to estimate turnout rates: 1) voting age population estimates and 2) individual-level survey data from the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau. The contractor and the EAC agree that the report raises more questions than provides answers.

The Contractor presented testimony summarizing its findings from this statistical and data analysis at the February 8, 2007 public meeting of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission. The Contractor's testimony, its summary of voter identification requirements by State, its summary of court decisions and literature on voter identification and related issues, an annotated bibliography on voter identification issues and its summary of state statutes and regulations affecting voter identification are attached to this report and can also be found on EAC's website, www.eac.gov.

EAC Recommendations for further study and next steps

EAC finds the Contractor’s summary of States’ voter identification requirements and its summary of state laws, statutes, regulations and litigation surrounding the

1 The July 2004 estimates for voting age population were provided by the U.S. Census Bureau. Because these numbers include non-citizens, the Contractor reduced the numbers by the same percentage the U.S. Census Bureau estimated non-citizens in 2000. Estimates of voting age population include persons who are not registered to vote.

2 The Current Population Survey is based on reports from self-described registered voters who also describe themselves as U.S. citizens.

implementation of voter identification requirements, to be a first step in the Commission’s consideration of voter identification requirements.

However, EAC has concerns regarding the research and statistical methodology the Contractor chose to employ in order to analyze voter identification requirements and the potential variation in turnout rates based on the type of voter identification requirements. EAC is not adopting the report submitted by the Contractor and, therefore, is not releasing the report.

EAC will engage in a longer-term, more systematic review of voter identification requirements. Additional study on the topic will include more than one Federal election cycle, additional environmental and political factors that effect voter participation, and the numerous changes in state laws and regulations related to voter identification requirements that have occurred since 2004.

EAC will undertake the following activities:

EAC will use some of the information collected by Eagleton as well as additional data from the states to develop this baseline.

- Convene, by mid-2007, a working group of advocates, academics, research methodologists and election officials to discuss EAC’s next study of voter identification. Topics to be discussed include methodology, specific issues to be covered in the study and timelines for completing an EAC study on voter identification.

Hello all,

A columnist from the WaPo has asked for info about both the voter ID and the fraud and intimidation reports. This was prompted by the accusation that the president was concerned that the fired prosecutors were not aggressively pursuing voter fraud cases. She had heard that we were refusing to release this information, so I am trying to demonstrate otherwise, as well as show that we have discussed these projects numerous times in public meetings. Please take a look at my draft email to her and let me know if you have any suggestions. She needs to hear back from me by 4 p.m. Thanks for your help with this.

Ms. Cocco,

Per your questions, go here to view the testimony regarding voter ID from our Feb. 2 public meeting. As I mentioned, at this meeting EAC Chair Donetta Davidson requested that staff review the initial research provided by Eagleton and produce a final report, which would include recommendations for further study on this subject. Currently, staff is working to finalize the voter ID report.

Regarding the voter fraud and intimidation research, at a May 2006 public meeting of our Standards Board and Board of Advisors, the EAC project manager for this research presented a staff update on the project. Go here to view the agenda, page 3. The document you referred to was the update the project manager gave at this public meeting, and it has been made available to anyone who asked for it. The final culmination of this project can be found here, and links to the attachments provided by the consultants are available by going to page 24 of this report. The commissioners adopted this report at a public meeting in Dec. 2006.

As a small agency of 23 employees, including the four commissioners, it is necessary for the agency to contract with consultants to gather the initial data for these projects. After EAC receives the initial data, the agency reviews the data for accuracy and then releases a final report.

Hello, Peg.

I thought you might be interested in the fraud report that Project Vote just released.

Widespread "voter fraud" is a myth promulgated to suppress voter participation, according to a new Project Vote report released today. "The Politics of Voter Fraud" finds that fraudulent voting, or the intentional corruption of the voting process by voters, is extremely rare. Yet, false or exaggerated claims of fraudulent voting are commonly made in close electoral contests, and later cited by proponents of laws that restrict voting. The report is authored by Lorraine Minnite, Ph.D., Barnard College, Columbia University.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR 40

THE POLITICS OF VOTER FRAUD
KEY FINDINGS

• Voter fraud is the “intentional corruption of the electoral process by the voter.” This definition covers knowingly and willingly giving false information to establish voter eligibility, and knowingly and willingly voting illegally or participating in a conspiracy to encourage illegal voting by others. All other forms of corruption of the electoral process and corruption committed by elected or election officials, candidates, party organizations, advocacy groups or campaign workers fall under the wider definition of election fraud.

• Voter fraud is extremely rare. At the federal level, records show that only 24 people were convicted of or pleaded guilty to illegal voting between 2002 and 2005, an average of eight people a year. The available state-level evidence of voter fraud, culled from interviews, reviews of newspaper coverage and court proceedings, while not definitive, is also negligible.

• The lack of evidence of voter fraud is not because of a failure to codify it. It is not as if the states have failed to detail the ways voters could corrupt elections. There are hundreds of examples drawn from state election codes and constitutions that illustrate the precision with which the states have criminalized voter and election fraud. If we use the same standards for judging voter fraud crime rates as we do for other crimes, we must conclude that the lack of evidence of arrests, indictments or convictions for any of the practices defined as voter fraud means very little fraud is being committed.

• Most voter fraud allegations turn out to be something other than fraud. A review of news stories over a recent two year period found that reports of voter fraud were most often limited to local races and individual acts and fell into three categories: unsubstantiated or false claims by the loser of a close race, mischief and administrative or voter error.

• The more complex are the rules regulating voter registration and voting, the more likely voter mistakes, clerical errors, and the like will be wrongly identified as “fraud.” Voters play a limited role in the electoral process. Where they interact with the process they confront an array of rules that can trip them up. In addition, one consequence of expanding voting opportunities, i.e. permissive absentee voting systems, is a corresponding increase in opportunities for casting unintentionally illegal ballots if administrative tracking and auditing systems are flawed.

• There is a long history in America of elites using voter fraud allegations to restrict and shape the electorate. In the late nineteenth century when newly freed black Americans were swept into electoral politics, and where blacks were the majority of the electorate, it was the Democrats who were threatened by a loss of power, and it was the Democratic party that erected new rules said to be necessary to respond to alleged fraud by black voters. Today, the success of voter registration drives among minorities and low income people in recent years threatens to expand the base of the Democratic party and tip the balance of power away from the Republicans. Consequently, the use of baseless voter fraud allegations for partisan advantage has become the exclusive domain of Republican party activists.
• The historically disenfranchised are often the target of voter fraud allegations. Fraud allegations today typically point the finger at those belonging to the same categories of voters accused of fraud in the past – the marginalized and formerly disenfranchised, urban dwellers, immigrants, blacks, and lower status voters. These populations are mostly found among those still struggling for full inclusion in American life.

• Better data collection and election administration will improve the public discussion of voter fraud and lead to more appropriate policies. We need better data, better election administration, transparency and more responsible journalism to improve public understanding of the legitimate ways in which electoral outcomes can be distorted and manipulated. This will help ensure that new laws and rules to prevent fraud are narrowly targeted to solve legitimate problems rather than used as a strategy to shape the electorate for partisan advantage.
INTRODUCTION

The claim that voter fraud threatens the integrity of American elections is itself a fraud. It is being used to persuade the public that deceitful and criminal voters are manipulating the electoral system. No available evidence suggests that voters are intentionally corrupting the electoral process, let alone in numbers that dilute and cancel out “the lawful votes of the vast majority of Americans.” The lack of evidence is not due to a failure to codify voter fraud as a crime, nor is it due to the inability or unwillingness of local law enforcement agencies to investigate or prosecute potential cases of voter fraud. In fact, when we probe most allegations of voter fraud we find errors, incompetence and partisanship. The exaggerated fear of voter fraud has a long history of scuttling efforts to make voting easier and more inclusive, especially for marginalized groups in American society. With renewed partisan vigor fantasies of fraud are being spun again to undo some of the progress America has made lowering barriers to the vote.

The purpose of this report is to disentangle the myth from the reality and to separate the politics of voter fraud from legitimate administrative concerns about the integrity of the electoral process. To make the argument, we present a usable definition of voter fraud, discuss the problem of evidence, and explain how and why the dynamics of electoral competition drive the use of baseless fraud claims in American politics. We present several contemporary examples to illustrate how poor election administration and voter mistakes are misleadingly labeled “fraud.” Recent allegations against voter registration campaigns highlight the need for an analysis sensitive to the partisanship and race and class issues just beneath the surface of most voter fraud claims. The last section of the report makes policy recommendations for improving public understanding and removing the canard of voter fraud from the election reform debate. The appendix discusses what to look for in evaluating voter fraud allegations.

THE POLITICS OF VOTER FRAUD
DEFINING VOTER FRAUD

Conceptual clarity is important in evaluating evidence of fraud. We begin with a discussion of what voter fraud is and what it is not. The first problem in defining voter fraud is that as a crime, it defies precise legal meaning. In fact, there is no single accepted legal definition of voter fraud. We have fifty different state electoral systems and fifty state criminal codes governing the administration of elections, plus a federal code that applies in national elections, and no uniform standards. In fact, some states do not actually criminalize 'voter fraud,' although they all criminalize acts that are commonly lumped together under the term, such as illegal voting, providing false information to register to vote, and multiple voting. The legal incoherence contributes to popular misunderstandings.

We need a basic definition of voter fraud that cuts through the confusion without violating the way voter fraud is diversely treated in state and federal law. We can start with the U.S. Department of Justice's definition of election fraud and apply it to election crimes committed by voters. The Justice Department defines election fraud as "conduct that corrupts the process by which ballots are obtained, marked, or tabulated; the process by which election results are canvassed and certified; or the process by which voters are registered." Voter fraud is a sub-intentional corruption category of election fraud, or the intentional corruption of the electoral process by voters.

This covers knowingly and willingly giving false information to establish voter eligibility, and knowingly and willingly voting illegally or participating in a conspiracy to encourage illegal voting by others. Apparent acts of fraud that result from voter mistakes or isolated individual wrongdoing or mischief making not aimed at corrupting the voting process should not be considered fraud, though sometimes these acts are prosecuted as such. All other forms of corruption of the electoral process and corruption committed by elected or election officials, candidates, party organizations, advocacy groups or campaign workers fall under the wider definition of election fraud.

Voter fraud is the intentional corruption of the electoral process by voters.

2 There are many examples of states that criminalize what we think of as voter fraud without calling it voter fraud. Georgia, for example, has no election code offense for "voter fraud," but it does provide stiff penalties for "repeat voting" and "voting by unqualified elector." See, for example O.C.G.A. § 21-2-560 et seq. In New Hampshire, the crime of voting more than once is called "wrongful voting." See, N.H.R.S. § 63-659.34. In Alaska, voter impersonation, voting more than once, and registering to vote without being entitled to register are all simply called "voter misconduct." See, Ala. Statutes § 15.56.040 et seq.

3 Craig C. Donsanto and Nancy Stewart, Federal Prosecution of Election Offenses, 6th Edition, U.S. Department of Justice, Criminal Division, Public Integrity Section (January 1995), 21 (herein cited as "DOJ Manual").

4 Fraud is commonly defined as "deception deliberately practiced with a view to gaining an unlawful or unfair advantage" (emphasis added). See Webster's Revised Unabridged Dictionary, Version published 1913 by the C. & G. Merriam Co. (Springfield, Mass.), under the direction of Noah Porter, D.D., LL.D. Criminal intent is a feature of the election crime codes of most states and the federal system, although a showing of intent is not always required to obtain a conviction for some forms of voter fraud such as "alien voting" (voting by a non-citizen).

5 The proper venue for challenging mistakes that may have affected the outcome of an election is to follow state statutory procedures for an election challenge or contest. See, Barry H. Weinberg, The Resolution of Election Disputes: Legal Principles That Control Election Challenges (Washington, D.C.: IFES, 2006).

6 This definition of voter fraud is simpler and more coherent than others offered. See, for example, U.S. Election Assistance Commission, Election Crimes: An Initial Review and Recommendations for Future Study (December 2006), 13-16; available online Allegations of "voter fraud" should be analyzed to determine 1) who is alleged to have committed the fraud, and 2) which stage of the electoral process is alleged to have been corrupted. This approach will go a long way toward clarifying whether electoral integrity is being breached and what needs to be done to secure the process (see the appendix for further discussion of how to identify fraud).

Moreover, although it is simple, it preserves the meaning of "fraud" in the electoral context as outlined by the Justice Department. The Department's manual for training U.S. Attorneys in investigating and prosecuting election crimes divides "election frauds" into two categories, one that involves the participation of voters and another that does not. Those election fraud crimes involving the participation of voters include vote buying schemes, absentee ballot frauds, voter intimidation schemes, migratory-voting (or floating-voter) schemes, and voter "assistance" frauds, in which the wishes of the voters are ignored or not sought. See, Donsanto and Stewart (1995), 22-24. Acts of voter intimidation which are included in the election fraud definitions offered in both the EAC Report and the DOJ Manual are excluded here. While the intimidation of voters certainly corrupts the electoral process, it is a crime that more directly involves the deprivation of rights guaranteed by law and for that reason should be treated separately from acts of deceit.
VOTER FRAUD AND THE PROBLEM OF EVIDENCE

How prevalent is voter fraud? A 2005 U.S. Senate Republican Policy Committee report claimed that "voter fraud continues to plague our nation's federal elections, diluting and canceling out the lawful votes of the vast majority of Americans" (emphasis added). This would be shocking if it were true. But the Committee made it without providing a single piece of evidence to support or clarify the claim. It cited no surveys, no statistics, no studies, no credible evidence whatsoever to back up its warning that election results are routinely distorted by fraud in the United States.

Evidence of voter fraud like all other crimes comes from law enforcement efforts to combat it
The Committee cited no data because there is very little to cite. Evidence of voter fraud like evidence of other forms of criminal behavior is primarily produced by law enforcement efforts to detect and prosecute it. And the available evidence here suggests that voters rarely commit voter fraud. As in the case of all other kinds of crime, it is simply unacceptable to allege law breaking without providing at least some supporting evidence.

What is that evidence? At the national level, a major new project at the U.S. Department of Justice, the Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative (BAVII) has resulted in only a handful of convictions. According to the Attorney General, since the inception of the program in 2002, "we've made enforcement of election fraud and corruption offenses a top priority." The result? Government records show that only 24 people were convicted of or pleaded guilty to illegal voting between 2002 and 2005, an average of eight people a year. This includes 19 people who were ineligible to vote, five because they were still under state supervision for felony convictions, and 14 who were not U.S. citizens; and five people who voted twice in the same election, once in Kansas and again in Missouri.

7 U.S. Senate Republican Policy Committee (2005).
8 The idea that voter fraud is first and foremost a crime reaches substantially the federal concept of election fraud which "applies only to activity that is appropriately remedied through criminal prosecution, as distinguished from other less severe remedies such as election contest litigation or administrative relief." See, Craig C. Donsanto, "The Federal Crime of Election Fraud," prepared for the Russian election reform website, Democracy.Ru, n.d.; available online at www.democracy.ru/english/library/international/eng_1999-11.htm.
9 On the origins of BAVII, see Jeffrey Toobin, "Annals of Law: Poll Positions," The New Yorker (September 20, 2004). Very little information about the program's overall scope and performance has been released by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section; annual press releases announce the numbers of investigations and convictions obtained, and the Public Integrity Section's annual reports to Congress briefly discuss some of the cases, but efforts to acquire more information about the program have been stymied by the Criminal Division's failure to respond to a Freedom of Information Act request filed in July 2005. Nevertheless, it is difficult to imagine that the Department would withhold information about closed cases of deceitful voters, and therefore likely that the limited information it has released so far is all there is.

In addition, the BAVII uncovered several vote buying schemes that have resulted in the convictions or guilty pleas of about 30 people, though most of those convicted were party and election officials, candidates for public office and elected officials, and in one case, the commander of a local VFW post. The vote buying cases involved a handful of elections in the Appalachia regions of eastern Kentucky and West Virginia, East St. Louis, Illinois and Caldwell County, North Carolina.

The available state-level evidence of voter fraud, culled from interviews, reviews of newspaper coverage and court proceedings, while not definitive, is also negligible. There are no reliable, officially compiled, national or even statewide statistics on voter fraud. Even though many criminal acts associated with "voter fraud" are classified as felonies, voter fraud fails to appear in the F.B.I.'s uniform crime reports. There are no publicly available criminal justice databases that include voter fraud as a category of crime. No states collect and publish statistics on voter fraud.

The lack of evidence is not due to a failure to codify voter fraud as a crime

If fraud is such a persistent concern of those who run elections, government agencies responsible for election administration should collect statistics on it, as they do in other serious matters, certainly other crimes. It is not as if the states have failed to detail the ways voters could corrupt elections. There are hundreds of examples drawn from state election codes and constitutions that illustrate the precision with which the states have criminalized voter and election fraud.

If we use the same standards for judging voter fraud crime rates as we do for other crimes, which is to calculate the incidence of crime from law enforcement statistics on arrests, indictments and convictions, we must conclude that the lack of evidence of arrests, indictments or convictions for any of the practices defined as voter fraud means very little fraud is being committed relative to the millions of votes cast each year in state, local and federal elections.

12 Lori Minnite and David Callahan, Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud (New York: Demos: A Network for Ideas and Action, 2003). The author is engaged in a more thorough analysis of state-level voter fraud data and investigations which will be published in her forthcoming book. To date, the findings only confirm Minnite and Callahan's earlier conclusions.

13 This is an urgent concern. Law professor Spencer Overton persuasively argues for a more empirical cost-benefit approach to evaluating the value and constitutionality of new restrictive photo identification voting requirements. As Overton notes, this approach is hampered by the lack of systematic data on fraud. See, Spencer Overton, "Voter Identification," Michigan Law Review 105(2007), 631-682.

14 The California Secretary of State's Office compiled information on electoral fraud cases referred to its office from 1994 to 2003. The data were analyzed in an unpublished conference paper (see, R. Michael Alvarez and Frederick J. Boehmke, "Contemporary Election Fraud: A Quantitative Analysis of Election Fraud Cases in California," paper prepared for Election Fraud Conference, Center for Public Policy and Administration, The University of Utah, and the Caltech/MIT Voting Technology Project, Salt Lake City, Utah, September 29-30, 2006; available online at www.vote.caltech.edu/events/2006/FraudConf/AlvBmk-paper.pdf), but they are not publicly available.

THE POLITICS OF VOTER FRAUD
Examples Of How States Criminalize “Voter Fraud”

- In Texas, a person can be convicted of a third degree felony if he or she “votes or attempts to vote in an election in which the person knows the person is not eligible to vote; knowingly votes or attempts to vote more than once in an election; or knowingly impersonates another person and votes or attempts to vote as the impersonated person.”

- California’s election code has dozens of provisions that prohibit illegal activity associated with elections. It prohibits fraudulent registration, including registering under a false name, registering under a false address, and registering a non-existent person. It makes it a felony for a person to vote in an election that he or she is not entitled to vote in, to vote more than once, or impersonate another voter. Moreover, it is a felony in California to “give, offer, or promise any office, place, or employment, or promise to procure or endeavor to procure any office, place, or employment to or for any voter, or to or for any other person, in order to induce that voter at any election to vote or not vote for a particular candidate.”

- Pennsylvania law gives the power to monitor elections to county boards of elections, and imposes a substantial number of penalties on people engaging in election fraud. Giving or receiving money in exchange for voting a certain way in an election can bring up to seven years in prison and $15,000 in fines. Any person convicted of perjury “regarding any material matter or thing relating to any subject being investigated, heard, determined or acted upon by any county board of elections, or member thereof, or by any court or judge thereof, judge of election, inspector of election, or overseer” can receive up to five years in prison and a $10,000 fine. Any person voting when they are not registered to vote, or voting more than once can be punished the same.

- Nineteenth century language in the Alabama Constitution disqualifies from voting “all idiots and insane persons” and those convicted of crimes like murder, arson, and rape, but also wife battering, bigamy, sodomy, miscegenation and vagrancy. It also disqualifies from voting any person convicted of “selling or offering to sell his vote or the vote of another, or of buying or offering to buy the vote of another, or of making or offering to make a false return in any election by the people or in any primary election to procure the nomination or election of any person to any office, or of suborning any witness or registrar to secure the registration of any person as an elector.”

- In Minnesota, it is a felony to submit more than one absentee ballot, assist another in submitting more than one absentee ballot, or alter another’s absentee ballot in any way.

The lack of evidence of voter fraud is not due to law enforcement agencies ignoring their duties

Even if crime reports underestimate true crime rates because some crimes go unreported or undetected, or because criminal behavior is sometimes addressed by means other than prosecution, crime is still measured as a function of law enforcement efforts to address it. Under the rule of law, enforcement efforts establish the core evidence of crime. It is difficult to conceive of whole categories of criminal behavior that go almost completely undetected or ignored by law enforcement officials at all levels of government across the U.S. today. And yet, those who believe there is a lot of voter fraud despite the lack of evidence frequently fall back on this argument. When confronted they charge the paucity of evidence is due to the government’s failure to undertake the investigations and prosecutions that would produce it. A more plausible explanation is that voters are not committing fraud, leaving little to investigate or prosecute.

The lack of evidence of voter fraud is not due to the inability of law enforcement agencies to pursue voter fraud investigations

Some argue that local officials are ill-equipped to detect voter fraud and poorly motivated to pursue investigations and prosecutions of voter fraud given their lack of expertise and resources and the public’s demand for attention to more serious or violent crimes. If election crime, perhaps like international securities fraud or organized crime, were beyond the ken of local officials to investigate, then we might expect a dearth of prosecutions and little evidence of voter fraud. This is another explanation offered by those who argue that there is a lot of fraud despite the lack of evidence. Local officials, the argument goes, can’t or won’t prosecute fraud for a variety of reasons. The detection and prosecution of voter fraud, however, is not beyond the ken of local officials. In fact, as the Justice Department manual on how to investigate and prosecute election crime argues, “there are several reasons why election crime prosecutions may present an easier means of obtaining convictions than do other forms of public corruption.” They are, 1) “election crimes usually occur largely in public,” 2) “election crimes often involve many players,” and 3) “election crimes tend to leave a paper trail.” Without any evidence to support it, the notion that local law enforcement officials are unable or unwilling to investigate or prosecute voter fraud lacks merit. But, as the saying goes, if you repeat a rumor enough times people will start to believe it.
“FRAUD” THAT IS NOT FRAUD

A review of hundreds of news reports on voter fraud appearing over a recent two year period found that with few exceptions, fraud allegations and cases reported in the press were limited to local electoral contests and individual acts, and fell into three basic categories:

1) unsubstantiated or false allegations of voter fraud made by the losers of close elections.\(^\text{18}\)

2) mischief; and,

3) claims that later turn out to be based on cases of voter error or administrative mistakes, not fraud.

Here are some examples:

Examples of fraud alleged by election losers

- Pittsburgh City Council President Bob O’Connor lost a close primary race to incumbent Mayor Tom Murphy and charged voter fraud cost him the election. Pittsburgh election officials allowed the two campaigns to review balloting while monitoring each other. Mayor Murphy’s campaign found 81 ineligible voters in a sampling of 71 of the city’s 404 precincts. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette reviewed Murphy’s data and found only three clearly improper ballots. The O’Connor campaign claimed it found 142 votes cast by people whose voter registration cards were missing but would not share its data with the Post-Gazette for independent verification.\(^\text{19}\)

- The Pasco County Canvassing Board of Port Richey, Florida, denied a request for a recount filed by Bob Leggiere who lost to the incumbent by nine votes. Leggiere claimed that voter fraud and II ballots that did not register a vote for mayor were the cause of his defeat. He charged that owners of a gambling boat operation voted illegally because their boat, which was their legal residence, was outside the city limits, suggesting that “because of their gambling boat interests, they have attempted to take control of the city elections.” The canvassing board informed Leggiere that he needed to file a protest with the board or a complaint in court, which he declined to do.\(^\text{20}\)

Examples of fraud as mischief

- A Ventura County, California woman was arrested and charged with voter fraud when her ex-husband noticed the names of two of their underage children on a list of registered voters in the March 2000 primary and turned her in. The woman was charged with fraudulently registering her 10- and 15-year old daughters, one of her daughter’s friends, her ex-husband who was already registered, and a number of fictitious people.\(^\text{21}\)

• Prosecutors in West Palm Beach, Florida agreed not to charge a woman who registered her poodle, "Cocoa Fernandez," as a Republican on the condition that the woman stay out of trouble for a year. She averted a third-degree felony charge carrying a maximum 5-year prison term and a $5,000 fine.22

• A story appeared in the Marquette University student paper that 174 of 1,000 students surveyed said they voted more than once in the November 2000 presidential election. Another 170 claimed to have voted for write-in candidates, but the official canvass of the voting precincts surrounding the Marquette campus recorded only 12 write-in votes for president. One student told ABC News, the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel and the Marquette student paper that he voted four times. He later recanted when a list of voters from his precinct did not include his name at all. The Milwaukee County District Attorney said he had no evidence of any student voting more than once. The student who told the media he voted four times was later charged with selling other students fake Ohio drivers licenses he printed using his dorm room computer.23

Examples of fraud as voter error

• The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel conducted a two-month review of 203,000 votes cast in Milwaukee and found that 361 felons still under state supervision cast votes in 2000. This was in violation of an "often misunderstood state law" that disqualifies felons on probation or parole from voting. Ninety percent of the 361 illegal votes were cast by African Americans living in central city neighborhoods, most with convictions for welfare fraud, forgery and other property offenses. The newspaper reasoned that the illegal votes probably went to Al Gore, since 92 percent of African Americans in the state voted for Gore. They estimated that if disqualified felons elsewhere in the state voted illegally at the same rate obtained in Milwaukee, as many as 1,100 illegal votes could have been cast statewide, a significant number given Gore's margin of victory was only 5,708 votes. None of the illegal voters contacted by the paper knew they were prohibited from voting, and a review of parole and probation procedures suggested they were never informed.24 Charges were filed against three people but later dropped when prosecutors couldn't prove those charged knew they were breaking the law.

• A voter inadvertently filled out five ballots in a local election in Montgomery County, Texas. "It (the five ballots, sic) was just handed to me and I just put them in the box," said the culprit, 52-year old Ruben Jones, "I wasn't paying attention." An election judge allowed one of Jones' votes to count resulting in a tie at 83 votes each between two candidates who were then forced into a run-off. Fraud was charged. The city attorney acknowledged the judge's mistake but could not overturn his decision to allow one of the votes to count. There was no provision in Texas election law for overruling an election judge on such matters.25

Examples of cases of administrative incompetence and mistakes leading to misplaced allegations of voter fraud in St. Louis and Milwaukee are discussed in detail below.

THE POLITICS OF VOTER FRAUD CLAIMS

There are many reasons why electoral reform is difficult to achieve, chief among them the benefits the status quo bestows on politicians in charge of making the rules. Voting rights advocates working to expand the electorate and make voting easier for more citizens must also overcome recurring arguments that reform will encourage more voter fraud. Indeed, the specter of voter fraud has been manipulated by elites to restrict and shape the electorate for nearly two centuries.

The Late Nineteenth Century and the “Good Government” Defense

The electoral reforms of the Progressive era dismantled Populist voting majorities and reflected the reformers’ class and anti-immigrant biases. Following the turmoil of the election of 1896 when new immigrants, struggling farmers, and wage workers flooded into the electorate, wealthy elites pressed for tighter regulation of the electoral process. They promoted personal voter registration systems that had the effect of de-mobilizing the poor and working classes. The reformers’ rhetoric fastened on fraud and the need to eliminate it in order to protect ‘the Democracy.’ The perception of fraud and widespread electoral corruption gave their efforts moral ballast which obscured the class conflict at the center of the struggle for the vote.

For Progressive era elites, voter registration was good government and universal voting was directly associated with corruption and voter fraud. Municipal reformers drawn from the ranks of the new middle and upper class professional strata assumed the lower classes possessed inferior moral capacities that produced unscrupulous behavior in politics. They wrestled control of government away from the older political machine organizations by imposing administrative reforms on the electoral process. These reforms deliberately privatized and personalized the social act of voting in order to undercut the machine’s capacity to mobilize majorities through ethno-religious and other group-based appeals.

28 After the Civil War, the electorate was demobilized in different ways in the North and South. Black disenfranchisement was pursued through the use of violence and terror; and institutionalized through the re-writing of Southern state constitutions between 1890 and 1910. Mississippi pioneered the “Southern system” of burdensome residency requirements, periodic registration, poll taxes, literacy and “understanding” requirements, and exacting disqualification provisions, all designed to strip black men of the vote without reliance on overt racial classifications (Cunningham (1991), 377). There is a large scholarly literature on this subject. See, for example, classic works by V.O. Key, Southern Politics in State and Nation. (New York: A.A. Knopf, 1949); and J. Morgan Kousser, The Shaping of Southern Politics: Suffrage Restriction and the Establishment of the One-Party South, 1880-1910 (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1974). On efforts to reshape the electorate outside of the South during this period, see, Walter Dean Burnham, “The Appearance and Disappearance of the American Voter,” in Walter Dean Burnham, The Current Crisis in American Politics (New York: Oxford University Press, 1983); and Paul Kleppner, Who Voted? The Dynamics of Electoral Turnout, 1870-1980 (New York: Praeger, 1982). For a fascinating account of how nineteenth century voters behaved at the polls on Election Day, see Richard Franklin Bensel, The American Ballot Box in the Mid-Nineteenth Century (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004).
Much has been written about the colorful and varied forms of political corruption in the nineteenth century.\textsuperscript{29} The debate over the extent of fraud among scholars, however, has failed to settle the question of whether it accounted for the extraordinarily high levels of turnout that disappeared with the adoption of personal voter registration systems.\textsuperscript{30} Nor is it certain that the new voter registration laws were responsible for reducing the election fraud they were aimed at eliminating. But, election fraud documented by the reformers usually involved organized efforts by election officials and politicians, not by the voters who were the intended target of restrictive reforms like voter registration.\textsuperscript{31}

Nevertheless, voting rights have been won. Most of the conditions that once gave rise to what we would characterize as fraudulent practices today, such as ballots produced and distributed by the political parties, have changed. In the nineteenth century, election fraud was sometimes perpetrated by partisans acting together to steal elections. Local party organizations competed for voters and controlled votes through patronage, and the stakes were high. In those days, parties, patronage and fraud were intertwined. Today, local party organizations are weak to nonexistent, in part because their access to patronage has all but disappeared. They no longer control lucrative franchises, run police and fire departments, set utility rates or build large-scale public works. The demise of local parties and patronage over the last century has undermined the logic and eroded the means of committing voter fraud.

The Civil Rights Era and Beyond

With each significant effort to protect and extend the right to vote, opponents have argued that the expansion of the franchise, whether through federal protections for voting rights or through reduced structural barriers to the franchise, would lead to more voter fraud. The threat of fraud was taken up by congressional opponents of the Voting Rights Act of 1965; it was raised in the conflict over extending the Act during the first Reagan Administration; and again, in more recent debates over the National Voter Registration Act.\textsuperscript{32} It is the very success of these reforms that explains why fraud claims have re-emerged as a principle form of voter intimidation. The victories of the civil rights movement make it no longer easy or acceptable to suppress voting through the use of terrorism or violence, or with a poll tax or a literacy test. Today the intimidation is more subtle.

The dynamics of electoral competition in a two-party plurality system also contribute to the resurgence of the specter of voter fraud. When elections are close, the logic of competition drives opponents to fierce conflict. The winner in a two-party system needs only one vote more than his or her opponent; 51 percent of the votes wins it all, 49 percent wins nothing. Competing parties in close elections fight hard to maximize their chances of winning that 51 percent because the closer the election, the fewer the number of voters that are needed to shift victory to one party or the other. Tight elections produce the biggest pay-off for the smallest shifts in vote share.

Blumin, Rude Republic: Americans and Their Politics in the Nineteenth Century (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2000); and Tracy Campbell, Deliver the Vote: A History of Election Fraud, an American Political Tradition – 1724-2004 (New York: Carroll & Graf, 2005).

Theoretically, parties or campaigns can produce a shift by expanding votes for themselves or constraining votes for their opponents, or even pursuing both practices at the same time. But expanding the vote carries higher risks for incumbents. Elected officials try to preserve the majorities that elect them and are wary of the threat new voters pose. Both parties, therefore, are wary of expansion. Since the success of the Voting Rights Act prohibits them from carving out their majorities in ways that directly violate laws protecting voting rights, they shape and manage their electorates by more subtle means, through the rules that govern the electoral process. Both parties seek to control, enforce and bend electoral rules to their advantage. As the political scientist, E.E. Schattschneider once observed,

In politics as in everything else it makes a great difference whose game we play. The rules of the game determine the requirements for success.... and go to the heart of political strategy.34

For example, today, Republican party officials and incumbents support restrictive interpretations of the rules governing voter qualifications when they anticipate that tightening access to the vote will hurt their rivals. They insist that the votes of legitimate, qualified voters are threatened by the votes of ineligible voters, justifying their support for restrictive identification requirements.35 The Democrats resist these efforts when they think the new rules will threaten their own party base; but if the new rules aren't likely to threaten the base, the Democrats, whose elected officials share the same interest in a stable, predictable electorate as their Republican colleagues, compromise and endorse new restrictions. The Democrats' concession to the inclusion of an identification requirement for first time voters who register to vote by mail in the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA), in the face of widespread opposition on the part of voting rights advocates, is a case in point.36 New HAVA voter identification requirements apply to a diffuse category of new voters whose party loyalties were unknown and therefore in adding this rule at the national level, neither party could claim an uncontested advantage or disadvantage. In the partisan wrangling over the bill, the important questions about the extent of voter fraud and the effectiveness of new rules in combating it were lost.

Given the particular party and competitive dynamics of the current period, the use of baseless voter fraud allegations for partisan advantage has become the exclusive domain of Republican party activists.

33 Or a plurality when the occasional third party candidate is in the race.
35 U.S. Senate, Republican Policy Committee (2005).
In a competitive electoral environment it is easier and safer for the parties to try to stabilize the base and reduce the opposition’s support than it is for either to recruit new voters. Given the particular party and competitive dynamics of the current period, the use of baseless voter fraud allegations for partisan advantage has become the exclusive domain of Republican party activists.
