It is worth emphasizing that, at the time of the 2004 election, there was no state that had a "minimum" requirement of showing photo ID – in other words, there was no state that required voters to show photo ID in order to cast a regular ballot. For this reason, our report does not measure the impact of laws, like those recently enacted in Indiana and Georgia, which require voters to show photo ID in order to cast a regular ballot without an affidavit exception.

To examine the potential variation on turnout rates associated with each type of voter ID requirements in effect on Election Day 2004, the statistical analysis drew on two sets of data. These were, first, aggregate turnout data at the county level for each state and, second, the reports of individual voters collected in the November 2004 Current Population Survey by the U. S. Census Bureau. Using two different data sets makes it possible to check the validity of one analysis against the other. It also provides insights not possible using only one of the data sets. The aggregate analysis cannot provide valid estimates on the effects of different ID requirements on particular demographic groups (e.g., the old, the young, African-Americans, the poor, or high school graduates). The Current Population Survey data does permit that kind of analysis, although it has the disadvantage of relying on self-reports by respondents about their registration status and experience in the polling place.

To understand legal issues that have been raised in recent litigation over voter ID requirements, we collected and analyzed the few major cases that have been decided so far on this issue. The decisions so far provide some guidance on the constitutional and other constraints as to voter ID requirements.

Summary of Findings

As voter identification requirements vary, voter turnout varies as well. This finding emerged from both the statistical analysis's aggregate data and the individual-level data, although not always for both the maximum and minimum sets of requirements. The overall relationship between the stringency of ID requirements and turnout was fairly small, but still statistically significant.

In the model used with the aggregate data in the statistical analysis, the match signature requirement, the provide a non-photo ID requirement, and the photo ID requirement were all correlated with lower turnout compared to requiring that voters state their names. With the addition of the registration closing data to the aggregate analysis, photo id is no longer a significant predictor of turnout. Signature match and non-photo id remain significant and negative predictors in the model.

The reduction in turnout was not the same for all demographic groups in the citizen voting age population.

The non-photo identification requirement showed the most significant and consistent correlation with reduced turnout. This result may be surprising given the intense debates surrounding photo identification requirements. The effect of photo ID requirements cannot, however, be assessed from the data the statistical analysis examined, since none of the states had laws in 2004 that conditioned voting on presentation of photo ID. Each of the five states that had photo ID as a "maximum" requirement (i.e., the most that voters could be asked to show at the polls) accepted another type of identification or an affidavit as a "minimum" requirement in the 2004 election (i.e., they were allowed to cast a regular ballot with something less than photo ID).

Significant questions about the relationship of voter identification requirements to turnout remain unanswered. The data examined in this project could not capture the dynamics of how identification requirements might lower turnout. If ID requirements dampen turnout, is it because individuals are aware of the requirements and stay away from the polls because they cannot or do not want to meet the requirements? Or, do the requirements result in some voters being turned away when they cannot meet the requirements on Election Day? Other factors that may also be correlated with stricter ID laws – such as less user-friendly voter registration systems – may actually be causing lower turnout. The CPS data do not include the information needed to answer this question. Knowing more about the "on the ground" experiences of voters concerning identification requirements could guide policy-makers at the state and local level in determining whether and at what point in the electoral cycle a concerted public information campaign might be most effective in helping voters to meet identification requirements. Such knowledge also could help in designing training for election judges to handle questions about, and potential disputes over, voter identification requirements.

Our analysis of litigation suggests that the courts will look more strictly at requirements that voters produce a photo ID in order to cast a regular ballot, than at non-photo ID laws. The courts have used a balancing test to weigh the legitimate interest in preventing election fraud against the citizen's right to privacy (protecting social security numbers from public disclosure, for example) and the reasonableness of requirements for identity documents. To provide both the clarity and certainty in administration of elections needed to forestall destabilizing challenges to outcomes, a best practice for the states may be to limit requirements for voter identification to the minimum needed to prevent duplicate registration and ensure eligibility.

The current lack of understanding of precisely how voter ID requirements affect turnout could be ameliorated by requiring the collection and reporting of additional data, including the reasons potential voters are required to cast a provisional ballot and the reasons for rejecting provisional ballots during the 2006 and subsequent elections. Also useful would be the results of surveys of voters on their experiences in meeting voter ID requirements and on what type of ballot they cast.⁵ And, of course, more information is needed on the incidence and varieties of vote fraud, but that inquiry is outside the scope of this report.

Recommendations for consideration and action by the EAC

The dynamics of Voter ID requirements –how more rigorous voter ID requirements may affect the decision by potential voters to go or stay away from the polls-- are not perfectly understood. This lack of understanding should be recognized in the policy process in the states. The debate over voter ID in the states would be improved by additional research sponsored by the EAC.

The EAC should consider the following actions to improve understanding of the relationship between voter ID requirements and the two important goals of ensuring ballot access and ensuring ballot integrity.

1. Encourage or sponsor further research to clarify the connection between Voter ID requirements and the number of potential voters actually able to cast a ballot that is actually counted.
2. Recommend as a best practice the publication of a "Voting Impact Statement" by states as they assess their voter ID requirements to protect the integrity of the ballot. The analysis will help ensure that efforts to increase ballot security have a neutral effect on electoral participation by eligible voters. The Voter Impact Statement would estimate the number and demographics of 1) eligible, potential voters that may be kept from the polls or permitted to cast a provisional ballot by a stricter ID requirement; and 2) and assess the number of ineligible voters who will be prevented from voting by the stricter ID requirements.

3. Encourage or require the states in the 2006 election and beyond, to collect and report reliable, credible information on the relationship between ballot access and ballot security. EAC should publish an analysis of this information to provide a sound factual basis for the states to consider as they estimate the incidence of the kinds of vote fraud that more stringent ID requirements may prevent. The analysis should describe the dynamics of the voter ID process in preserving the security of the ballot. EAC can also use this information to encourage the states to assess the effectiveness of programs to ensure that all eligible voters have required ID and are permitted to vote in future elections. Well-designed longitudinal studies in the states can show the results of changing voter ID requirements on electoral participation over time. The studies should include precinct-level data to provide the fine-grained analysis that can provide a solid foundation for policy.
 - I. Useful information could be supplied by state-sponsored surveys of voters by local election officials. It would make clear why those who cast a provisional ballot were found ineligible to cast a regular ballot. The answers would illuminate the frequency with which ID issues divert voters into the provisional ballot line.
 - II. Surveys to ask voters what they know about the voter id requirements would also provide useful context for evaluating the effect of various voter ID requirements on electoral participation.
 - III. Spot checks by state election officials on how the identification process works at polling places could provide information on how closely actual practice tracks statutory or regulatory requirements. Such reports should be available to the public.
4. Encourage states to examine the time period allowed for voters who cast a provisional ballot because they lacked required ID to return with their identification. In eleven states, voters who had to cast a provisional ballot because they lacked the ID required for a regular ballot were permitted to return later with their ID. Their provision of this ID is the critical step in evaluating the ballots. The length of the period in which the voter may return with ID is important. In setting the time period for return, which now varies among the states from the same day to about two weeks, states should consider three factors:

the convenience of the voter, the total time allowed to evaluate ballots⁶, and the safe harbor provision in presidential elections.

5. Recommendations to the states from EAC should reflect current judicial trends.

SUMMARY OF RESEARCH

Background and Approach of the Study

Voter ID requirements are just one set of rules governing voting that may affect turnout. Social scientists have long studied how election rules affect participation in elections. The general view today is that the individual citizen makes the choice of whether to vote in a way similar to other decisions that a rational citizen makes, by comparing costs and benefits. The benefits of voting are fairly stable and hard to specify given the remote probability that any one vote will make a difference in an election. But whatever the benefit as perceived by an individual voter, as the costs of voting (for example, time, hassle, acquisition of information) increase, the likelihood that a citizen will vote decrease. Not all groups in the population calculate the cost of participation in the same way, so that election laws (such as registration or identification requirements) may affect different groups differently.

A short summary of some of the social science literature illustrates what may be a broad consensus that the rules of elections affect turnout, but note the important differences in the details of what groups may be most affected.

- Bowler, Brockington and Donovan in "Election Systems and Voter Turnout: Experiments in the United States". The Journal of Politics, 63:3 (August 2001) concluded that electoral systems help shape turnout by altering the benefits perceived by voters. For example, cumulative voting systems have 5% greater turnout than plurality systems
- The effect of registration systems has been the subject of many studies over the last 40 years. Kelley, Ayres, and Bowen in "Registration and Voting: Putting First Things First." American Political Science Review. 61:2 (June 1967) found that local variations in the rate of voting are most directly tied to variations in the rate of registering to vote, and that the rate of registering to vote in localities is most directly related to the laws and administration of the registration process. They concluded that the decline in voting over the past 80 years was due, in part, to the rise of registration laws.

- Brians and Grofman in "Election Day Registration's Effect on U.S. Voter Turnout." Social Science Quarterly. 82:1 (March 2001), found that relaxing registration laws produces higher turnout. In particular, they observed that relaxing registration laws is more likely to promote voter turnout among those with medium levels of income and education, rather than those at the lowest levels. Highton in "Easy Registration and Voter Turnout," Journal of Politics. 59:2 (May 1997), concluded similarly that registration laws affect voter turnout, but also observed that easier registration promotes turnout among those in lower socio-economic status.

- Mitchell and Wlezien. "The Impact of Legal Constraints on Voter Registration, Turnout, and the Composition of the American Electorate," Political Behavior. 17:2 (June 1995) agreed that easier registration promotes higher turnout, but also concluded that higher turnout from easier registration would be unlikely to change the composition of the electorate. Nagler in "The Effect of Registration Laws and Education on U.S. Voter Turnout." American Political Science Review. 85:4 (December 1991) found that registration laws decrease voter turnout by depressing the eligible electorate, but that lower educated people are not disproportionately impacted by these laws. But Rosenstone and Raymond E. Wolfinger in "The Effect of Registration Laws on Voter Turnout." American Political Science Review. 72:1 (March 1978) found that while registration laws did affect both voter turnout and the composition of the electorate, the sharpest effect of these restrictions was felt in the South and among the least educated.

- Squire, Wolfinger, and Glass in "Residential Mobility and Voter Turnout." American Political Science Review. 81:1 (March 1987) found that people who move constitute a major demographic group affected by registration laws. They estimated that altering laws to facilitate voting by recently moved people could increase turnout by 9%. Highton in "Residential Mobility, Community Mobility, and Voter Turnout." Political Behavior. 22:2 (June 2000) also found that people who move have lower turnout than stable residents, and estimated that the decline was more a result of registration laws than a loss of social connections.

- Highton and Wolfinger in "Estimating the Effects of the National Voter Registration Act of 1993." Political Behavior. 20:2 (June 1998) concluded that the Motor Voter laws led to a significant increase in voting; that eliminating voter purges for not voting also increases voting; and that these effects are felt most heavily by the young (under 30) and the mobile (moved within past 2 years). Knack, in "Does 'Motor Voter' Work? Evidence from State-Level Data." Journal of Politics., 57:3 (August 1995), also found that motor voter does lead to increased registration and voting, but that other parts of NVRA of 1993, like mail-in registrations, agency-based registrations, and limitations on voter purges had not been as influential two years after the passage of the act.

While voter ID may not have been the subject of as much research as the registration process, establishing the eligibility of a person to vote has long been part of the electoral process. Voters may have to identify themselves twice in the electoral process: when registering to vote and then when casting a ballot. The pressures felt by the voter arising from the need to check ID, even so simple a check as a signature match, can be greater at the polls on Election Day than at the time of registration. Poll workers may feel under pressure when faced with long lines and limited time.

Voter ID requirements on Election Day

This analysis focuses on ID requirements on Election Day, but with an appreciation that the ID requirements at time of registration and on Election Day are inter-related.⁷ The emphasis in this report is on Voter ID requirements on Election Day and afterwards as election judges evaluate provisional ballots. This is the critical period for the electoral system, the time when ballot access and ballot security are in the most sensitive balance.

The report looks at voter ID issues that go beyond the rather narrow identification requirements in HAVA. Much of the current debate in state legislatures over voter ID ranges beyond HAVA to require more rigorous documentation of identity for all would-be voters, not just those who had not registered in person and are casting a ballot for the first time. Current controversies in the states over voter ID seems to have been sparked in part by the HAVA requirements, but goes beyond those requirements, and sets the context for the analysis here.⁸

We recognize that the previously technical, rather dull subject of voter ID requirements has become fiercely partisan and divisive in many states. The polarization of the debate has raised the stakes over this issue, making dispassionate analysis both more valuable and more rare.⁹ Voter ID is often described as the critical step in protecting the integrity of the ballot, the process to ensure that the potential voter is eligible and, if eligible, is permitted to cast one ballot and one ballot only. Truly protecting the integrity of the ballot, however, requires a perspective that takes in the entire voting process. It demands more than preventing the ineligible from voting, and should also ensure that all those who are eligible and want to vote can cast a ballot that counts. The protection effort must embrace all forms of voting, including absentee ballots, and consider each step in the process from registration through vote counting.

A voting system that requires voters to produce an identity document or documents may prevent the ineligible from voting. It may also prevent the eligible from casting a ballot. If the ID requirements block ineligible voters from the polls at the cost of preventing eligible voters who cannot obtain or have left at home the required forms of identification, the integrity of the ballot may not have been improved; the harm may be as great as the benefit. Ultimately, a normative evaluation of whether a state should adopt a stricter voter ID requirement (and, if so, what particular form that new requirement should take) will weigh value judgments as well as available factual evidence. Nonetheless, this report has proceeded on the premise that increased understanding of the factual evidence relating to the imposition of voter ID requirements, based on available data and statistical analysis of that data, can help inform the policy process.

Assessing the effectiveness of voter ID as a way to protect the integrity of the ballot should logically include an estimate of the nature and frequency of vote fraud. The EAC has commissioned a separate analysis of the incidence of vote fraud. Consequently, this research does not include consideration of vote fraud nor the possible effectiveness of various voter ID regimes to counter attempts at vote fraud. As a result, our study of the possible effects of voter

ID requirements on turnout cannot take into account how many potential voters who did not turn out under comparatively stricter voter ID requirements might have been ineligible or eligible to vote.

In some states, voters lacking required ID, or who have ID that does not reflect their current address, are able to vote only by casting a provisional ballot.¹⁰ Voter ID requirements that require voters to bring a document to the polls --rather than simply sign their names-- may divert more voters to the provisional ballot. Requiring poll workers to request and check ID, can put stress on the already demanding environment of the polling place. Scrutiny of ID can create lines at the polling places. Further delays can result when voters cast a provisional ballot and fill out the ballot envelope. Voters who cast a provisional ballot because they lack their ID on Election Day, and who then fail to return with the needed document or documents, will have their ballot rejected.¹¹ And, of course, the cost of processing provisional ballots is greater than the cost of regular ballots.

Each of these potential consequences of more elaborate voter identification processes can increase the chance of litigation. Long lines will, at best, discourage voters and at worst make voting seem a hassle, an impression that could keep more citizens (even those with ID) from the polls.

Evaluating the effect of different Voter ID regimes can be most effective when based on clear standards --legal, equitable, practical. The standards outlined here might be described as questions policy-makers should ask about Voter ID requirements. We suggest 7 questions that address important dimensions of the problem.

1. Is the Voter ID system designed on the basis of valid and reliable empirical studies of the incidence of the sorts of vote fraud it is designed to prevent?¹²

¹⁰ For example, the Florida voter ID law adopted after the 2004 election and pre-cleared by the Department of Justice, permits voters who cannot meet the ID requirements to sign an affidavit on the envelope of a provisional ballot, which will be counted if the signature matches that on the voter's registration form.

2. How effective is the ID requirement in increasing the security of the ballot? How well can it be coordinated with a statewide voter database?¹³
3. How practical is the requirement? (Can it be administered smoothly by the staff and budget likely to be made available? How much additional training of polling place workers might be required?) Is it simple enough or can it be defined with sufficient clarity that poll workers throughout the state can administer it uniformly and with a minimum of local interpretation made on the fly under the pressure of Election Day?¹⁴
4. How cost-effective is the system? Does it demonstrably increase the security of the ballot affordably, measured in both monetary and other costs? To improve understanding of the non-monetary component of the costs, conducting a voter impact study might be appropriate. The voter impact study would examine, before the adoption of the regulation, the cost of compliance by the voter (such as the cost in time and money of acquiring a photo ID card), any offsetting benefits to voters, and the possible disparate effects of the regulation on various groups of voters.¹⁵ A thorough, objective impact statement that demonstrated the nexus between the identification regime and the integrity of the ballot could provide protection against inevitable legal challenges.
5. If a side effect of the Voter ID regulation is likely to reduce turnout, generally or among particular groups, is it possible to take other steps to ameliorate the adverse consequences?¹⁶
6. Does it comply with the letter and spirit of Voting Rights Act?
7. The seventh question is the most difficult to answer. How neutral is the effect of the Voter ID requirement on the composition of the qualified and eligible electorate? Might it,

¹³ See the final section of this report for a brief overview of possible effects of a statewide voter database on voter identification issues.

intentionally or unintentionally, reduce the turnout of particular groups of voters or supporters of one party or another without an offsetting decrease in vote fraud?

Voter ID and Turnout

Based on research for this study by the Moritz College of Law, states had one of five types of maximum requirements in place on Election Day 2004. These are shown in Table 1, Voter ID Requirements. The five categories: at the polling place, voters were asked to either: state their names (10 states); sign their names (13 states and the District of Columbia); sign their names, to be matched to a signature on file (seven states); provide a form of identification that did not necessarily include a photo (15 states); or provide a photo identification (five states).¹⁷ Using this information made it possible to code the states according to these requirements, and examine the assumption that voter identification requirements would pose an increasingly demanding requirement in this order: stating one's name, signing one's name, matching one's signature to a signature on file, providing a form of identification, and providing a form of photo identification, however, in all "photo ID" states in 2004, voters without photo ID could cast a regular ballot after signing an affidavit concerning their identity and eligibility or provide other forms of ID). The report refers to this set of ID requirements as "maximum," the most rigorous ID the voter can be asked to present at the polling place in order to cast a regular ballot.¹⁸

Election laws in several states offer exceptions to these requirements if potential voters lack the necessary form of identification. Laws in those states set a minimum standard – that is the minimum requirement that a voter may be required to satisfy in order to vote using a regular ballot. States can be categorized based on the minimum requirement for voting with a regular ballot. In 2004 the categories were somewhat different compared to the maximum requirement, in that none of the states required photo identification as a minimum standard for voting with a regular ballot. That is, voters who lacked photo ID would still be allowed to vote in all states, if able to meet another requirement. Four states required voters to swear an affidavit as to their identity (Florida, Indiana, Louisiana, and North Dakota). The five categories for minimum requirements were: state name (12 states), sign name (14 states and the District of Columbia), match one's signature to a signature on file (six states), provide a non-photo identification (14 states), or swear an affidavit (four states). The analysis also examined this array of minimum identification requirements to assess how they correlated with turnout: state name, sign name, match signature, provide non-photo identification, and, given the potential legal consequences for providing false information, swearing an affidavit. As noted above, no state had a “minimum” requirement of showing photo ID. This analysis therefore cannot estimate the effect of laws, such as those recently enacted in Indiana and Georgia that require voters to show photo ID in order to cast a regular ballot without an affidavit or other exception.

We recognize the difficulties in summarizing each state's voter ID requirements. The problem is illustrated by the number of footnotes to Table 1 below. The variety of statutory and regulatory details among the states is complex.

Moving beyond the statutes and regulations, we also recognize that the assignment of each state to one category may fail to reflect actual practice at many polling places. As in any system run by fallible humans, the voter ID process is subject to variation in practice.¹⁹ Voters may have been confronted with demands for identification different from the directives in state statutes or regulation. It seems reasonable to conclude, however, that while actual practices may vary, the variance is around each state's legal requirement for ID. The analysis of the effect of state requirements on turnout must be viewed with some caution. We believe that the categories used in this report provide an acceptable level of discrimination among voter identification regimes.

¹⁹ One state election official told us that, “We have 110 election jurisdictions in Illinois, and I have reason to believe [the voter ID requirements] are administered little bit differently in each one. We wish it weren't that way, but it probably is.”

⁸ Texas voters must present a current registration certificate. Those without a certificate can vote provisionally after completing an affidavit.

Relationship of Voter ID requirements to Turnout

The statistical analysis examined the potential variation in turnout rates based on the type of voter identification required in each state on Election Day 2004 using two sets of data: aggregate turnout data at the county level for each state, as compiled by the Eagleton Institute of Politics, and individual-level survey data included in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau.

The statistical analysis examined turnout among U.S. citizens of voting age in both the aggregate and the individual-level data. Determining citizenship status in the individual-level data simply involved restricting the analyses to individuals who identified themselves as citizens in the November 2004 Current Population Survey. (Those who said they were not citizens did not have the opportunity to answer the supplemental voting questions contained in the Current Population Survey.)

Findings of the statistical analysis

The analysis looked at the voter identification requirements in two ways, as a continuous variable and as a series of discrete variables. As a continuous variable the maximum voter identification requirements are ranked according to how demanding they were judged to be, with photo ID as the most demanding requirement. As discrete variables, the statistical analysis assume that stating name is the least demanding ID requirement and compare each other requirement to it.

The analysis treating the requirements as a continuous variable offers some statistical support for the premise that as the level of required proof increases, turnout declines. Averaging across counties in each state, statewide turnout is negatively correlated with maximum voter identification requirements ($r = -.30, p < .05$). In considering the array of minimum requirements, with affidavit as the most demanding requirement, however, the correlation between voter identification and turnout is negative, but it is not statistically significant ($r = -.20, p = .16$). This suggests that the relationship between turnout rates and minimum requirements may not be linear. Breaking down the turnout rates by type of requirement reveals in greater detail the relationship between voter identification requirements and voter turnout.

This table displays the mean turnout using the aggregate county level data for each state in 2004.

The aggregate data show that 60.9 percent of the estimated citizen voting age population voted in 2004. Differences in voter turnout at the state level in 2004 varied based on voter identification requirements. Taking into account the maximum requirements, an average of 64.6 percent of the voting age population turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 58.1 percent in states that required photo identification. A similar trend emerged when considering minimum requirements. Sixty-three percent of the voting age population turned out in states requiring voters to state their names, compared to 60.1 percent in states that required an affidavit from voters. Given the lack of a clear, consistent linear relationship between turnout and minimum identification requirements, however, we opted to treat the voter identification requirements as a series of dichotomous variables in subsequent analyses.²¹

Voter identification requirements are just one factor that may affect voter turnout. Multivariate models that take into account other predictors of turnout can paint a more complete picture of the relationship between voter identification requirements and turnout. This analysis estimated the effects of voter identification requirements in multivariate models that also took into account the electoral context in 2004 and demographic characteristics of the population in each county. While the model takes account of several important variables, statistical models do not capture all the messiness of the real world. It is a simplification of a complex reality, and its results should be treated with appropriate caution.

The model also took into account such variables as:

- Was the county in a presidential battleground state?
- Was the county was in a state with a competitive race for governor and/or the U.S. Senate?
- Percentage of the voting-age population in each county that was Hispanic or African-American²²
- Percentage of county residents age 65 and older
- Percentage of county residents below the poverty line

Another contextual factor to consider is voter registration requirements, such as the deadline for registration. As states set the deadline farther away from Election Day, the task of remembering to register to vote becomes more challenging. Thus our model takes into account the number of days between each state's registration deadline and the election.

The dependent variable in each model was voter turnout at the county level, with turnout calculated as the percentage of the citizen voting-age population that voted in the 2004 election.

The results of this modeling suggest that voter identification requirements such as signature matching, a non-photo ID or a photo ID are associated with lower turnout than in states that required voters to simply state their name, holding constant the electoral context and demographic variables.

Contextual factors, such as whether the county was in a battleground state or whether that state had a competitive race for governor and/or U.S. Senate, were associated with increased voter turnout. The time between the closing date for registration and the election was correlated with a slight negative effect on turnout. As the percentage of Hispanics in the county's population increased, turnout declined. The percentage of senior citizens in the county and household median income were associated with higher turnout. The percentage of African-Americans in the county did not have a significant effect in the model. The percentage of senior citizens in the county and household median income showed a positive correlation with turnout. In this aggregate model, the percentage of African-Americans in the county was not associated with a significant difference in turnout.

The relationship of the minimum voter identification requirements to turnout was not demonstrated. None of the dummy variables for voter identification requirements were statistically significant. Being a battleground state and having a competitive statewide race were significant and positive, as was the percentage of senior citizens in the county and household median income. The percentage of Hispanics in the county's population continued to be associated with reduced turnout, as was the number of days between the closing date for registration and the election.²³

Analysis of the aggregate data at the county level generates some support for the hypothesis that stricter identification requirements are correlated with lower turnout. For the maximum requirements, a signature match, non-photo identification or photo identification were correlated with lower turnout in 2004, compared to requiring that voters simply state their names.

Aggregate data, however, cannot fully capture the individual demographic factors that may figure into the decision to turn out to vote.²⁴ Voter identification requirements could have a relationship to the turnout of particular groups of voters, in ways that county-level aggregate data on turnout would not capture. To explore the effects of voter identification requirements on turnout more completely, it is important to examine individual-level data as well.

Individual-level Analysis

Individual-level turnout data exists in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau. The Census Bureau conducts the CPS monthly to measure unemployment and other workforce data, but the bureau adds a battery of voter participation questions to the November survey in even-numbered years to coincide with either a presidential or midterm Congressional election.

One of the of the CPS is the sheer size of the sample. The survey's Voting and Registration Supplement consisted of interviews, either by telephone or in person, with 96,452 respondents.²⁵ The large sample size permits analyses of smaller groups, such as Black or Hispanic voters or voters with less than a high school education. The statistical analysis in relying on the CPS is based on reports from self-described registered voters. Omitted are those who said they were not registered to vote, as are those who said they cast absentee ballots because the identification requirements for absentee ballots may differ from those required when one votes in person. Eliminated from the sample are respondents who said they were not U.S. citizens; the questionnaire design skipped those individuals past the voter registration and turnout questions in the survey. In addition to the voter identification requirements, the models include other socioeconomic, demographic, and political environment factors that might have influenced turnout in 2004.²⁶ The dependent variable in these analyses is whether a respondent said he or she voted in the November 2004 election.²⁷

²⁴ For example, previous research has found that education is a powerful determinant of turnout (Wolfinger and Rosenstone 1980, but see also Nagler 1991).²⁴ Married people also are more likely to vote than those who are not married (Alvarez and Ansolabehere 2002; Alvarez, Nagler and Wilson 2004; Fisher, Kenny, and Morton 1993).

In the model, three of the voter identification requirements have a statistically significant correlation with whether survey respondents said they had voted in 2004. That is, compared to states that require voters only to state their names, the requirement to sign one's name, provide a non-photo ID, or photo ID in the maximum requirements or affidavit in the minimum is associated with lower turnout.

Of the other state factors, only the competitiveness of the presidential race showed a significant, correlation with increased turnout. In terms of demographic influences, African-American voters were more likely than white voters or other voters to say they had cast a ballot, while Asian-Americans were less likely than white or other voters to say they had turned out. Hispanic voters were not statistically different from white or other voters in terms of reported turnout. Consistent with previous research, income, and marital status all were positive predictors of voting. Women also were more likely to say they voted than men. Among the age categories, those ages 45 to 64 and 65 and older were more likely than those ages 18 to 24 to say they voted. Respondents who had earned a high school diploma, attended some college, graduated from college or attended graduate school were all more likely to say they voted than those who had not finished high school.

While the probit models provide statistical evidence for the relationship of voter identification requirements and other variables to turnout, probit coefficients do not lend themselves to intuitive interpretation.²⁸ Table 3 below shows predicted probabilities (calculated from the probit coefficients) of voting for each level of voter identification requirements while holding all other independent variables in the models at their means.²⁹

Taking into account that signature matches were not a predictor of turnout, the differences in predicted probability decline from stating one's name to providing a photo identification or affidavit. Voters in states that required photo identification were 2.7 percent less likely to vote than voters in states where individuals had to give their names.³⁰ In terms of the minimum requirement, voters in states that required an affidavit at minimum were 4 percent less likely to turn out than voters in states where they had to give their names.

The differences were more pronounced for those lower in education. Constraining the model to show predicted probabilities only for those with less than a high school diploma, the probability of voting was 5.1 percent lower in states that required photo identification as the maximum requirement and 7 percent lower in states that required an affidavit as the minimum requirement compared to states where stating one's name was the maximum or minimum requirement.

³⁰ The voter turnout percentages may seem disproportionately high compared to the turnout rates reported in the aggregate data analysis. It is important to consider that the turnout rates in the aggregate data were a proportion of all citizens of voting-age population, while the turnout rates for the individual-level data are the proportion of only registered voters who said they voted.

REVISED FINAL D R A F T

Race and ethnicity have generated particular interest in the debate over voter ID requirements.³¹ The analysis using the aggregate data shed no light on the association between voter ID requirements and turnout for African-American and Hispanic voters. But in the models using the individual data, some significant relationships emerged for African-American, Hispanic and Asian citizens. For the entire population, the signature, non-photo identification and photo identification requirements all were associated with lower turnout compared to the requirement that voters simply state their names. These correlations translated into reduced probabilities of voting of about 3 to 4 percent for the entire sample, with larger differences for specific subgroups. For example, the predicted probability that Hispanics would vote in states that required non-photo identification was about 10 percentage points lower than in states where Hispanic voters gave their names. The difference was about 6 percent for African-Americans and Asian-Americans, and about 2 percent for white voters.

The model also showed that Hispanic voters were less likely to vote in states that required non-photo identification as opposed to stating one's name. Hispanic voters were 10 percent less likely to vote in non-photo identification states compared to states where voters only had to give their name.

Varying voter identification requirements were associated with lower turnout rates for Asian-American voters as well. Asian-American voters were 8.5 percent less likely to vote in states that required non-photo identification compared to states that require voters to state their names under the maximum requirements, and they were 6.1 percent less likely to vote where non-photo identification was the minimum requirement.

Conclusions of the Statistical Analysis

The statistical analysis found that, as voter identification requirements vary, voter turnout varies as well. This finding emerged from both the aggregate data and the individual-level data, although not always for both the maximum and minimum sets of requirements. The overall relationship between ID requirements and turnout for all registered voters was fairly small, but still statistically significant.

³¹ Incorporating discrete variables for Hispanics, African-Americans, and Asian-Americans into one model carries the implicit assumption that the remaining variables, including education and income, will influence each of these groups in a similar manner in terms of deciding whether to vote. These assumptions are not always born out by the data (see Leighley and Vedlitz, 1999.) To isolate the effects of voter identification and other variables on voter turnout within specific racial and ethnic groups, the sample is divided into sub-samples and the model re-run to calculate the data discussed and shown in Tables 5, 6, and 7 in Appendix C.

The signature, non-photo ID, and photo ID requirements were all correlated with lower turnout compared to the requirement that voters simply state their names. That the non-photo identification requirement was the most consistent in terms of statistical significance across the groups is intriguing given the intense debates surrounding photo identification requirements.

Significant questions about the relationship between voter identification requirements and turnout remain unanswered. The data examined in the statistical analysis could not capture the dynamics of how identification requirements might lower turnout, nor could they rule out that other attributes of a state's electoral system might explain the statistically significant correlations that the study found. If ID requirements dampen turnout, is it because individuals are aware of the requirements and stay away from the polls because they cannot or do not want to meet the requirements? Or, do the requirements result in some voters being turned away when they cannot meet the requirements on Election Day , or forced to cast a provisional ballot that is not ultimately counted? The CPS data do not include measures that can answer this question. Knowing more about the "on the ground" experiences of voters concerning identification requirements could guide policy-makers at the state and local level in determining whether and at what point in the electoral cycle a concerted public information campaign might be most effective in helping voters to meet identification requirements. Such knowledge also could help in designing training for election judges to handle questions about, and potential disputes over, voter identification requirements.

Litigation Over Voter ID Requirements

A handful of cases have challenged identification requirements in court in recent years. In general, requirements that voters provide some identifying documentation have been upheld, where photo ID is not the only acceptable form. Whether laws requiring photo ID will be upheld is more doubtful. To date, only two cases have considered laws requiring voters to show photo ID (Common Cause v. Billups and Indiana Democratic Party v. Rokita).. Cases challenging the mandatory disclosure of voters' Social Security numbers on privacy grounds have yielded mixed results.

Non-photo identification. For the most part, courts have looked favorably on requirements that voters present some form of identifying documents if the photo identification is not the only form accepted. In Colorado Common Cause v. Davidson, No. 04CV7709, 2004 WL 2360485, at *1 (Colo. Dist. Ct. Oct. 18, 2004), plaintiffs challenged a law requiring all in-person voters to show identification (not just first-time registrants). The court upheld this requirement against a constitutional challenge. Similarly, in League of Women Voters v. Blackwell, 340 F. Supp. 2d 823 (N.D. Ohio 2004), the court rejected a challenge to an Ohio directive requiring first-time voters who registered by mail to provide one of the HAVA-permitted forms of identification, in order to have their provisional ballots counted. Specifically, the directive provided that their provisional ballots would be counted if the voter (a) orally recited his driver's license number or the last four digits of his social security number or (b) returned to the polling place before it closed with some acceptable identification (including reciting those identification numbers). Id. This was found to be consistent with HAVA.

Photo ID. Since the 2004 election, two states have adopted laws requiring photo identification at the polls in order to have one's vote counted, without an affidavit exception: Georgia and Indiana.³² Both these requirements were enacted in 2005 and both have been challenged in court. The Georgia law required voters attempting to cast a ballot in person present a valid form of photographic identification. O.C.G.A. § 21-2-417. On October 18, 2005, the District Court granted the plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction, enjoining the application of the new identification requirements on constitutional grounds. In granting the injunction, the court held that plaintiffs' claims under both the Fourteenth Amendment (equal protection) and Twenty-Fourth Amendment (poll tax) had a substantial likelihood of succeeding on the merits at trial (Common Cause v. Billups, Prelim. Inj. 96, 104). In January 2006, Georgia enacted a modified version of its photo ID law, which the court has not yet ruled on. In the other state that has enacted a photo ID requirement (Indiana), legal challenges have also been filed. (Indiana Democratic Party v. Rokita and Crawford v. Marion County Election Board). On April 14, 2006, the district court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, concluding that plaintiffs had failed to produce evidence showing that the state's ID law would have an adverse impact on voters. Another case of significance, for purposes of photo ID requirements, is American Civil Liberties Union of Minnesota v. Kiffmeyer, No. 04-CV-4653, 2004 WL

³² Indiana's law does allow voters without ID to cast provisional ballots, and then to appear before the county board of elections to execute an affidavit saying that they are indigent and unable to obtain the requisite ID without payment of a fee. But in contrast to other states, voters cannot cast a ballot that will be counted by submitting an affidavit at the polls, affirming that they are the registered voter and are otherwise eligible to vote.

Privacy. In Greidinger v. Davis, 988 F.2d 1344 (4th Cir. 1993), the court struck down on due process grounds a Virginia law requiring disclosure of voters' social security numbers for voter registration. The social security numbers recorded in voter registration lists had been disclosed to the public and political parties that had requested the lists. The court found that the requirement to give the social security number effectively conditioned rights on the consent to an invasion of privacy. It concluded that this public disclosure of the social security numbers was not necessary to achieve the government's interest in preventing fraud. On the other hand, in McKay v. Thompson, 226 F.3d 752 (6th Cir. 2000), the court rejected privacy challenges based on both the Constitution and federal statutes, to a Tennessee law requiring social security numbers for voter registration since 1972. 226 F.3d at 755. Second, the NVRA only permits requiring the minimum amount of information necessary to prevent duplicate voter registration and to determine eligibility. The distinction appears to be between the use of Social Security numbers for internal purposes only, which was deemed permissible, and the disclosure of those numbers to the public which was not.

These decisions suggest that the courts will carefully scrutinize the evidence, where states require that voters produce a photo ID in order to cast a regular ballot. The courts have used a balancing test to weigh the legitimate interest in preventing election fraud against the citizen's right to privacy (protecting social security numbers from public disclosure, for example) and the reasonableness of requirements for identity documents. To provide both the clarity and certainty in administration of elections needed to forestall destabilizing challenges to outcomes, these early decisions suggest that best practice may be to limit requirements for voter identification to the minimum needed to prevent duplicate registration and ensure eligibility.

Developments since 2004

REVISED FINAL D R A F T
For review by the EAC's Advisory Boards

Since the passage of HAVA, with its limited requirements for voter identification, and following the 2004 election, debate over voter ID has taken place in state legislatures across the country. That debate has not been characterized by solid information on the consequences of tightening requirements for voters to identify themselves before being permitted to cast a regular, rather than a provisional, ballot.

Better information might improve the quality of the debate. Answers to the following key questions are not available in a form that might satisfy those on both sides of the argument.

- What is the overall incidence of vote fraud?
- How does fraud take place in the various stage of the process: registration, voting at the polls, absentee voting, or ballot counting?
- What contribution can tighter requirements for voter ID make to reducing vote fraud?
- What would be the other consequences of increasingly demanding requirements for voters to identify themselves? This is the question addressed, within the limits of the available data, in the analysis in this report.

Answering these questions would provide the information needed for more informed judgment in the states as they consider the tradeoffs among the competing goals of ballot integrity, ballot access, and administrative efficiency. The Carter-Baker Commission recognized the tradeoffs when it tied recommendation for national ID to an affirmative effort by government to identify unregistered voters and make it easy for them to register.

State Voter Databases and Voter ID

With the implementation of the HAVA Computerized Statewide Voter Registration List, an application for voter registration for an election for Federal office may not be accepted or processed unless the application includes a driver's license number or last four digits of the Social Security number on the voter registration form. This information can be used to verify the identity of the registrant through interfacing with lists maintained by the Motor Vehicle office and Social Security office. If registrants do not have either a driver's license or Social Security number, the State will assign a unique identifier number to that person.

Some states are wrestling now with these unresolved issues. In New Jersey, for example, pending legislation would require that voters must be able to confirm their registration through a secure access to the Statewide Voter Registration List. It also requires voters to present ID at the polls in order to cast a regular ballot if the numbers recorded on the registration have not been verified (or if no verifiable number appears on the registration). It recognizes the HAVA requirement that if the number provided by the voter has not been verified and if the voter does not present ID at the polls, that voter may cast a provisional ballot. The bill does not specify they have to provide ID within 48 hours in order for their vote to count, as is the case with first-time mail-in registrants.

For review by the EAC's Advisory Boards

As some states gain experience in this area, the EAC would perform a useful service by making timely recommendations of best practices for all states to consider.

Conclusions

The analysis of voter ID requirements is complex. It takes into account important values associated with an electoral process, such as ballot access and integrity. The continuing effort to understand how voter ID requirements may affect turnout and the integrity of the ballot could benefit from additional factual information, including statistical analyses. Our research includes a statistical study of this kind. It indicated that the level of voter turnout in a state is correlated with the stringency of the voter ID requirement imposed by that state. Additional empirical research of this nature, with additional data collected by or for the EAC, would further illuminate the relationship between stricter voter ID rules and turnout, perhaps explaining if awareness of a strict ID requirement tends to discourage would-be voters from going to the polls. Or, additional research may shed light on whether, if voters did go to the polls, stricter Voter ID requirements will divert more voters into the line for provisional ballots. The consequence of increased reliance on provisional ballots can be longer lines at the polls and confusion, without necessarily a clear demonstration that the security of the ballot is correspondingly increased.³³

The debate over voter ID in the states would be improved by additional research sponsored by the EAC. That might include longitudinal studies of jurisdictions that have changed voter ID requirements, as well as precinct-level analyses that would allow more finely tuned assessment of the correlation between stricter identification requirements and turnouts. Further research could also identify methods to eliminate the need for voters to bring specific identity documents

³³ In this connection, the Brennan Center's response to the Carter-Baker Commission report observes that, "while it might be true that in a close election "a small amount of fraud could make the margin of difference," it is equally true that the rejection of a much larger number of eligible voters could make a much bigger difference in the outcome." Response to the Report of the 2005 Commission on Federal Election Reform, The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law and Spencer Overton, On Behalf Of The National Network on State Election Reform, September 19, 2005

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Background and Methodology

This report to the United States Election Assistance Commission (EAC) presents recommendations for best practices to improve the process of provisional voting. It is based on research conducted by the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey, and the Moritz College of Law at Ohio State University under contract to the EAC, dated May 24, 2005.

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA, (Public Law 107-252) authorizes the EAC (SEC. 241, 42 USC 15381) to conduct periodic studies of election administration issues. The purpose of these studies is to promote methods for voting and administering elections, including provisional voting, that are convenient, accessible and easy to use; that yield accurate, secure and expeditious voting systems; that afford each registered and eligible voter an equal opportunity to vote and to have that vote counted; and that are efficient. Section 302(a) of HAVA required states to establish provisional balloting procedures by January 2004.¹ The process HAVA outlined left considerable room for variation among the states, arguably including such critical questions as who qualifies as a registered voter eligible to cast a provisional ballot that will be counted and in what jurisdiction (precinct or larger unit) the ballot must be cast in order to be counted.²

The general requirement for provisional voting is that, if a registered voter appears at a polling place to vote in an election for Federal office, but either the potential voter's name does not appear on the official list of eligible voters for the polling place, or an election official asserts that the individual is not eligible to vote, that potential voter must be permitted to cast a provisional ballot. In some states, those who should receive a provisional ballot include, in the words of the EAC's Election Day Survey, "first-time voters who registered by mail without identification and cannot provide identification, as required under HAVA. . ." ³ HAVA also provides that those who vote pursuant to a court order keeping the polls open after the established closing hour shall vote by provisional ballot. Election administrators are required by HAVA to notify individuals of their opportunity to cast a provisional ballot.

¹The Election Center's National Task Force Report on Election Reform in July 2001 had described provisional ballots as providing "voters whose registration status cannot be determined at the polls or verified at the election office the opportunity to vote. The validity of these ballots is determined later, thus ensuring that no eligible voter is turned away and those truly ineligible will not have their ballots counted." It recommended "in the absence of election day registration or other solutions to address registration questions, provisional ballots must be adopted by all jurisdictions." See www.electioncenter.org.

³The definition of who was entitled to a provisional ballot could differ significantly among the states. In California, for example, the Secretary of State directed counties to provide voters with the option of voting on a provisional paper ballot if they felt uncomfortable casting votes on the paperless e-voting machines. "I don't want a voter to not vote on Election Day because the only option before them is a touch-screen voting machine. I want that voter to have the confidence that he or she can vote on paper and have the confidence that their vote was cast as marked," Secretary Shelley said. See <http://wired.com/news/evote/0,2645,63298,00.html>. (Our analysis revealed no differences in the use of provisional ballots in the counties with these paperless e-voting machines.) In Ohio, long lines at some polling places resulted in legal action directing that voters waiting in line be given provisional ballots to enable them to vote before the polls closed. 1/2 report dedicated to best practices recommendations

FINAL DRAFT

For Review by the Standards Board and Board of Advisors

Our research began in late May 2005. It focused on six key questions raised by the EAC.

1. How did the states prepare for the onset of the HAVA provisional ballot requirement? Not effectively answered
2. How did this vary between states that had previously had some form of provisional ballot and those that did not? Hard to determine since no direct prop evidence presented
3. How did litigation affect implementation? Litigation on side 1/3
4. How effective was provisional voting in enfranchising qualified voters? No definitive answer
5. Did state and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots? No - variable
6. Did local election officials have a clear understanding of how to implement provisional voting? No consistent evidence

- wave SK

To answer those questions, we:

1. Surveyed 400 local (mostly county) election officials to learn their views about the administration of provisional voting and to gain insights into their experience in the 2004 election.
2. Reviewed the EAC's Election Day Survey, news and other published reports in all 50 states to understand the local background of provisional voting and develop leads for detailed analysis.⁴
3. Analyzed statistically provisional voting data from the 2004 election to determine associations between the use of provisional voting and such variables as states' experience with provisional voting, use of statewide registration databases, counting out-of-precinct ballots, and use of different approaches to voter identification.
4. Collected and reviewed the provisional voting statutes and regulations in all 50 states.
5. Analyzed litigation affecting provisional voting or growing out of disputes over provisional voting in all states.

Our research is intended to provide EAC with a strategy to engage the states in a continuing effort to strengthen the provisional voting process and increase the consistency with which provisional voting is administered, particularly within a state. As EAC and the states move forward to assess and adopt the recommendations made here, provisional voting merits continuing observation and research. The situation is fluid. As states, particularly those states that did not offer a provisional ballot before 2004, gain greater experience with the process and as statewide voter databases are adopted, the provisional voting process will demand further, research-based refinement.

KEY FINDINGS

Variation among the states

In the 2004 election, nationwide about 1.9 million votes, or 1.6% of turnout, were cast as provisional ballots. More than 1.2 million, or just over 63%, were counted. Provisional ballots accounted for a little more than 1% of the final vote tally. These totals obscure the wide variation in provisional voting among the states.⁵

- Six states accounted for two-thirds of all the provisional ballots cast.⁶
- The percentage of provisional ballots in the total vote varied by a factor of 1,000 -- from a high of 7% in Alaska to Vermont's 0.006%.
- The portion of provisional ballots cast that were counted ranged from 96% in Alaska to 6% in Delaware.
- States with voter registration databases counted, on average, 20% of the provisional ballots cast.
- States without databases counted ballots at more than twice that rate: 44%.⁷
- States that provided more time to evaluate provisional ballots counted a greater proportion of those ballots. Those that provided less than one week counted an average of 35.4% of their ballots, while states that permitted more than 2 weeks, counted 60.8%.

An important source of variation among states was a state's previous experience with provisional voting. ~~The share of provisional ballots in the total vote was six times greater in states that had used provisional ballots before than in states where the provisional ballot was new.~~ In the 25 states that had some experience with provisional voting before HAVA, a higher portion of the total vote was cast as provisional ballots and a greater percentage of the provisional ballots cast were counted than in the 18 new to provisional balloting.⁸

Variation within states

Within states, too, there was little consistency among different jurisdictions. ~~Of the 20 states for which we have county-level provisional ballot data, the rate of counting provisional ballots varied by as much as 90% to 100% among counties in the same state.~~ This suggests that additional factors (including the training of election judges or poll workers) beyond statewide factors, such as experience or the existence of voter registration databases, also influence the use of provisional ballots.

- In Ohio some counties counted provisional ballots not cast in the assigned precinct even though the state's policy was to count only those ballots cast in the correct precinct.
- Some counties in Washington tracked down voters who would otherwise have had their provisional ballots rejected because they had failed to complete part of their registration form, gave them the chance to correct those omissions, and then counted the provisional ballot.

Resources available to administer provisional voting varied considerably among and within states. Differences in demographics and resources result in different experiences with provisional voting. For example, the Election Day Survey found that staffing problems appeared to be particularly acute for jurisdictions in the lowest income and education categories. Small, rural jurisdictions and large, urban jurisdictions tended to report higher rates of an inadequate number of poll workers within polling places or precincts.

- Jurisdictions with lower education and income tend to report more inactive voter registrations, lower turnout, and more provisional ballots cast.

⁸ See the appendix for our classification of "old" and "new" states and explanation of why the total is less than 50.

- Jurisdictions with higher levels of income and education reported higher average numbers of poll workers per polling place or precinct and reported lower rates of staffing problems per precinct.

In precincts located in districts where many voters live in poverty and have low levels of income and education, the voting process, in general, may be managed poorly. Provisional ballots cannot be expected to work much better. In these areas, the focus should be on broader measures to improve the overall functionality of struggling voting districts, although improving the management of provisional balloting may help at the margin.

The lessons of litigation

Successful legal challenges highlight areas where provisional voting procedures were wanting. A flurry of litigation occurred around the country in October 2004 concerning the so-called "wrong precinct issue" – whether provisional ballots cast by voters in a precinct other than their designated one would be counted for statewide races. Most courts, including the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit (the only federal appeals court to rule on the issue), rejected the contention that HAVA requires the counting of these wrong-precinct provisional ballots. This litigation was significant nonetheless.

- First, the Sixth Circuit decision established the precedent that voters have the right to sue in federal court to remedy violations of HAVA.
- Second --and significantly-- the litigation clarified the right of voters to receive provisional ballots, even though the election officials were certain they would not be counted. The decision also defined an ancillary right --the right to be directed to the correct precinct. There voters could cast a regular ballot that would be counted. If they insisted on casting a provisional ballot in the wrong precinct, they would be on notice that it would be a symbolic gesture only.
- Third, these lawsuits prompted election officials to take better care in instructing precinct officials on how to notify voters about the need to go to the correct precinct in order to cast a countable ballot.

States move to improve their processes

Shortly after the 2004 election, several states came to the conclusion that the administration of their provisional voting procedures needed to be improved, and they amended their statutes. The new legislation highlights areas of particular concern to states about their provisional voting process.

- Florida, Indiana, Virginia, and Washington have clarified or extended the timeline to evaluate the ballots.
- Colorado, New Mexico, North Carolina, and Washington have passed legislation focused on improving the efficacy and consistency of the voting and counting process.
- Colorado, Arkansas, and North Dakota took up the issue of counting provisional ballots cast in the wrong precinct.

The wide variation in the implementation of provisional voting among and within states suggests that EAC can help states strengthen their processes. Research-based recommendations for best, or at least better, practices that draw on the experience gained in the 2004 election can be useful in states' efforts to achieve greater consistency in the administration of provisional voting. The important effect of experience on the administration of the provisional ballot process indicates that the states have much they can learn from each other.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS FOR BEST PRACTICES

State efforts to improve the provisional voting process have been underway since the 2004 election. By recommending best practices, the EAC will offer informed advice while respecting diversity among the states.

Take a quality-improvement approach

Defining what constitutes a successful provisional voting system is difficult. Defining quality requires a broad perspective about how well the system works, how open it is to error recognition and correction, and how well provisional voting processes are connected to the registration and voter identification regimes. A first step is for states to recognize that improving quality begins with seeing the provisional voting process as a system and taking a systems approach to regular evaluation through standardized metrics with explicit goals for performance. EAC can facilitate action by the states by recommending as a best practice that:

- Each state collect data systematically on the provisional voting process to permit evaluation of its voting system and assess changes from one election to the next. The data collected should include: provisional votes cast and counted by county; reasons why provisional ballots were not counted, measures of variance among jurisdictions, and time required to evaluate ballots by jurisdiction

Emphasize the importance of clarity

Above all else, the EAC should emphasize the importance of clarity in the rules by which each state governs provisional voting. As state legislators and election officials prepare for the 2006 election, answers to the questions listed in the recommendation section of this report could be helpful. Among those questions are:

- Does the provisional voting system distribute, collect, record, and tally provisional ballots with sufficient accuracy to be seen as procedurally legitimate by both supporters and opponents of the winning candidate?
- Do the procedural requirements of the system permit cost-efficient operation?
- How great is the variation in the use of provisional voting in counties or equivalent levels of voting jurisdiction within the state? Is the variation great enough to cause concern that the system may not be administered uniformly across the state?

Court decisions suggest areas for action

The court decisions following the 2004 election also suggest procedures for states to incorporate into their procedures for provisional voting. EAC should recommend to the states that they:

- Promulgate clear standards for evaluating provisional ballots, and provide training for the officials who will apply those standards.
- Provide effective materials to be used by local jurisdictions in training poll workers on such procedures as how to locate polling places for potential voters who show up at the wrong place.
- Make clear that the only permissible requirement to obtain a provisional ballot is an affirmation that the voter is registered in the jurisdiction and eligible to vote in an election for federal office. Poll workers need appropriate training to understand their duty to give such voters a provisional ballot.

Assess each stage of the provisional voting process

FINAL DRAFT

For Review by the Standards Board and Board of Advisors

Beyond the procedures suggested by court decisions, states should assess each stage of the provisional voting process. They can begin by assessing the utility and clarity of the information for voters on their websites and by considering what information might be added to sample ballots mailed to voters before elections. The better voters understand their rights and obligations, the easier the system will be to manage, and the more legitimate the appearance of the process.

Avoiding error at the polling place will allow more voters to cast a regular ballot and all others who request it to cast a provisional ballot. Our recommendations for best practices to avoid error at the polling place include:

- The layout and staffing of the multi-precinct polling place is important. States should ensure that training materials distributed to every jurisdiction make poll workers familiar with the options available to voters.
- The provisional ballot should be of a design or color sufficiently different from a regular ballot to avoid confusion over counting and include take-away information for the voter on the steps in the ballot evaluation process.
- Because provisional ballots offer a fail-safe, supplies of the ballots at each polling place should be sufficient for all the potential voters likely to need them. Best practice would be for states should provide guidelines (as do Connecticut and Delaware) to estimate the supply of provisional ballots needed at each polling place.

The clarity of criteria for evaluating voter eligibility is critical to a sound process for deciding which of the cast provisional ballots should be counted.

- State statutes or regulations should define a reasonable period for voters who lack the HAVA-specified ID or other information bearing on their eligibility to provide it in order to facilitate the state's ability to verify that the person casting the provisional ballot is the same one who registered. At least 11 states allow voters to provide ID or other information one to 13 days after voting. Kansas allows voters to proffer their ID by electronic means or by mail, as well as in person.
- More provisional voters have their ballots counted in those states that count ballots cast outside the correct precinct. While HAVA arguably leaves this decision up to the states, pointing out the effect of the narrower definition on the portion of ballots counted could be useful to the states in deciding this question. States should be aware, however, of the additional burden placed on the ballot-evaluation process when out-of-precinct ballots are considered. And tradeoffs are involved if out-of-precinct voters are unable to vote for the local offices that might appear on the ballot in their district of residence.
- If a state does require voters to appear at their assigned precinct, where the same polling site serves more than one precinct, a voter's provisional ballot should count so long as the voter cast that ballot at the correct polling site even if at the wrong precinct within that location. While the best practice might be for poll workers to direct the voter to correct precinct poll workers' advice is not always correct, and the voter should be protect against ministerial error.
- Officials should follow a written procedure, and perhaps a checklist, to identify the reason why a provisional ballot is rejected. Colorado's election rules offer particularly clear guidance to the official evaluating a provisional ballot.

In verifying provisional ballots, the time by which election officials must make their eligibility determinations is particularly important in presidential elections because of the need to certify electors to the Electoral College. Our research did not identify an optimum division of the five weeks available.

FINAL DRAFT

For Review by the Standards Board and Board of Advisors

- The best practice here is for states to consider the issue and make a careful decision about how to complete all steps in the evaluation of ballots and challenges to those determinations within the five weeks available.

After the election, timely information to voters about the disposition of their provisional ballot can enable voters to determine if they are registered for future elections and, if not, what they need to do to become registered.

- Best practice for the states is to establish mechanisms to ensure that voters casting provisional ballots are informed whether they are now registered for future elections and, if not, what they need to do to become registered.

Final observation

The detailed examination of each stage in the provisional voting process can lay the foundation each state needs to improve its system. Efforts to improve provisional voting may be most effective as part of a broader effort by state and local election officials to strengthen their systems. Collecting and analyzing data about those systems will enable states to identify which aspects of the registration and electoral system are most important in shunting voters into the provisional ballot process. Responsible officials can then look to their registration system, identification requirements or poll worker training as ways to reduce the need for voters to cast their ballots provisionally.

Provisional Voting in 2004

In the 2004 election, nationwide about 1.9 million votes, or 1.6% of turnout, were cast as provisional ballots. More than 1.2 million or just over 63% were counted. Provisional ballots accounted for a little more than 1% of the final vote tally.

These totals obscure the wide variation in provisional voting among the states.⁹ Six states accounted for two-thirds of all the provisional ballots cast.¹⁰ State by state, the percentage of provisional ballots in the total vote varied by a factor of 1,000 -- from a high of 7% in Alaska to Vermont's 0.006%. The portion of provisional ballots cast that were actually counted also displayed wide variation, ranging from 96% in Alaska to 6% in Delaware. States with voter registration databases counted, on average, 20% of the provisional ballots cast. Those without databases counted provisional ballots at more than twice that rate, 44%.

An important source of variation was a state's previous experience with provisional voting. The share of provisional ballots in the total vote was six times greater in states that had used provisional ballots before than in states where the provisional ballot was new. In the 25 states that had some experience with provisional voting before HAVA, a higher portion of the total vote was cast as provisional ballots and a greater percentage of the provisional ballots cast were counted than in the 18 new to provisional balloting.¹¹

- The percentage of the total vote cast as provisional ballots averaged more than 2% in the 25 experienced states. This was 4 times the rate in states new to provisional voting, which averaged 0.47%.¹²
- The experienced states counted an average of 58% of the provisional ballots cast, nearly double the proportion in the new states, which counted just 33% of cast provisional ballots.
- The combined effect of these two differences was significant. In experienced states 1.53% of the total vote came from counted provisional ballots. In new states, provisional ballots accounted for only 0.23% of the total vote.

Those voting with provisional ballots in experienced states had their ballots counted more frequently than those in the new states. This experience effect is evidence that there is room for improvement in provisional balloting procedures, especially in those states new to the process.¹³ That conclusion gains support from the perspectives of the local election officials revealed in the survey conducted as a part of this research. Local (mostly county level) election officials from "experienced" states were more likely to:

¹³ Managing the provisional voting process can strain the capacity election administrators. For example, Detroit, counted 123 of the 1,350 provisional ballots cast there in 2004. A recent study concluded that Detroit's "6-day time limit to process provisional ballots was very challenging and unrealistic. To overcome this challenge, the entire department's employees were mobilized to process provisional ballots." (emphasis added.) GAO Report-05-997, "Views of Selected Local Officials on Managing Voter Registration and Ensuring Citizens Can Vote," September 2005.

- Be prepared to direct voters to their correct precincts with maps;
- Regard provisional voting as easy to implement;
- Report that provisional voting sped up and improved polling place operations
- Conclude that the provisional voting process helped officials maintain accurate registration databases.

Officials from "new" states, on the other hand, were more likely to agree with the statement that provisional voting created unnecessary problems for election officials and poll workers.

If experience with provisional voting does turn out to be a key variable in performance, that is good news. As states gain experience with provisional ballots their management of the process could become more consistent and more effective over subsequent elections. Further information from the EAC on best practices and the need for more consistent management of the election process could sharpen the lessons learned by experience. The EAC can facilitate the exchange of experience among the states and can offer all states information on more effective administration of provisional voting.

Concluding optimistically that experience will make all the difference, however, may be unwarranted. Only if the performance of the "new" states was the result of administrative problems stemming from inexperience will improvement be automatic as election officials move along the learning curve. Two other possibilities exist. Our current understanding of how provisional voting worked in 2004 is not sufficient to determine unambiguously which view is correct.

1. "New" states may have a political culture different from "old" states. That is, underlying features of the "new" states political system may be the reason they had not adopted some form of provisional voting before HAVA. The "new" states may strike a different balance among the competing objectives of ballot access, ballot security and practical administration. They may ascribe more responsibility to the individual voter to take such actions as registering early, finding out where the right precinct is, or re-registering after changing address. They may value keeping control at the local level, rather than ceding authority to state or federal directives. The training they offer poll workers about provisional ballots may not be as frequent or effective as in other states. If the inconsistent performance in the "new" states arises out of this kind of political culture, improving effectiveness in the use of the provisional ballots -- as measured by intrastate consistency in administration--- will be harder and take longer to achieve.¹⁴
2. "Old" states may devote fewer resources to updating their registration files or databases because they consider provisional ballots as a reasonable fail safe way for voters with registration problems a way to cast a ballot. The adoption of statewide voter registration databases in compliance with HAVA therefore may reduce the variation in the use of provisional ballots among the states.

Other influences decreasing consistency among the states include:

¹⁴ Despite differing political cultures among states and the latitude HAVA provides states, the statute does, indeed impose some degree of uniformity on issues that Congress thought essential. For example, before HAVA, took effect, "no state gave the voter the right to find out the status of their ballot after the election." Now all offer that opportunity. See Bali and Silver, "The Impact of Politics, Race and Fiscal Strains on State Electoral Reforms after Election 2000," manuscript, Department of Political Science, Michigan State University. Resisting HAVA's mandates through foot-dragging lacks any legitimate foundation in law or policy.

- The more rigorous the verification requirements, the smaller the percentage of provisional ballots that were counted. Some states verified provisional ballots by comparing the voter's signature to a sample, some matched such identifying data as address, birth date, or social security number, others required voters who lacked ID at the polling place to return later with the ID to evaluate the provisional ballot, and some required provisional voters to execute an affidavit.¹⁵
 - In the 4 states that simply matched signatures, nearly 3.5% of the total turnout consisted of provisional ballots, and just under three-fourths of those ballots (73%) were counted.
 - In the 14 states that required voters to provide such additional information as address or date of birth just over 1.5% of the total turnout consisted of provisional ballots, and 55% of those ballots were counted.
 - In the 14 states that required an affidavit (attesting, for example, that the voter was legally registered and eligible to vote in the jurisdiction) just over one-half of a percent (0.6%) of turnout came from provisional ballots, and less than one-third of those (30%) were counted. (But note that HAVA requires all voters to certify that they are eligible and registered in order to cast a provisional ballot, which is functionally an affidavit. The 14 states described here used an explicit affidavit form.)
 - In the 10 states that required voters to return later with identifying documents just under 1.5% of the total turnout came from provisional ballots, and more than half (52%) of these were counted. Voters apparently found this requirement less onerous than the affidavit, even though it required a separate trip to a government office
- Voter registration databases provided information that reduced the number of provisional ballots counted.¹⁶ In states using provisional voting for the first time, states with registered-voter databases counted only 20% of the ballots that were cast. States without such databases counted more than double that rate (44%). As HAVA's requirement for adoption of statewide databases spreads across the country, this variation among states is likely to narrow. Real-time access to a continually updated, statewide list of registered voters should reduce the number of provisional ballots used and reduce the percentage counted since most of those who receive them will be less likely to be actually registered in the state.
- States that counted out-of-precinct ballots counted 56% of the provisional ballots cast. States that counted ballots cast only in the proper precinct counted an average of 42% of provisional ballots.¹⁷

¹⁵ See Table 2 in Appendix 2 for information on the verification method used in each state.

¹⁷ The Election Day Survey concluded that : "Jurisdictions with jurisdiction-wide provisional ballot acceptance reported higher rates of provisional ballots cast, 2.09 percent of registration or 4.67 percent of ballots cast in polling places, than those with in-precinct-only acceptance, 0.72 and 1.18 percent, respectively. Predictably, those jurisdictions with more permissive jurisdiction-wide acceptance reported higher rates of counting provisional ballots, 71.50 percent, than other jurisdictions, 52.50 percent."

- In experienced states, the disparity was even more pronounced: 52% of provisional ballots cast were counted in states requiring in-district ballots, while 70% were counted in those allowing out-of-precinct ballots.
- If all states had counted out-of-precinct ballots, perhaps 290,000 more provisional ballots would have been counted across the country.¹⁸

States that provide a longer the time to evaluate provisional ballots counted a higher proportion of those ballots.¹⁹

- Fourteen states permitted less than one week to evaluate provisional ballots, 15 states permitted between one and two weeks, and 14 states permitted greater than two weeks²⁰.
- Those states that permitted less than one week counted an average of 35.4% of their ballots.
- States that permitted between one and two weeks counted 47.1%.
- States that permitted more than 2 weeks, counted 60.8% of the provisional ballots cast²¹.
- The effect of allowing more time for evaluation is felt most strongly in states where more than 1% of the overall turnout was of provisional ballots. In states where provisional ballots were used most heavily, those that permitted less than one week to evaluate ballots counted 58.6% while those that permitted one to two weeks counted 65.0% of ballots, and those states that permitted greater than three weeks verified the highest proportion of provisional ballots, at 73.8%.

Variation Within States

Not only was there little consistency among states in the use of provisional ballots, there was also little consistency within states. This was true in both new and old states. Of the 20 states for which we have county-level provisional ballot data, the rate of counting provisional ballots varied by as much as 90% to 100% among counties in the same state. This suggests that additional factors beyond statewide factors, such as verification requirements or the time provided for ballot evaluation, also influence the provisional voting process. Reacting to the lack of consistency within states, the Carter-Baker Commission recommended that "states, not counties or municipalities, should establish uniform procedures for the verification and counting of provisional ballots, and that procedure should be applied uniformly throughout the state."²²

Election Line reported that:

¹⁸ This estimate is a rough approximation. States that recognize out-of-precinct ballots counted, on average, 56% of the provisional votes cast. Applying that ratio to the 1.9 million provisional ballots cast nationwide would result in 1.1 million provisional ballots that would have been counted if all states accepted out-of-precinct votes. States that did not recognize out-of-precinct ballots counted 42% of the provisional ballots cast, or about 813,000 ballots, for a difference of about 290,000 votes.

²⁰ Many thanks to Ben Shepler, of the Moritz College of Law, for assembling complete data on the time requirements states permitted for the counting of provisional ballots.

²² Recommendation 2.3.2 of the Report of the Commission on Federal Election Reform, "Building Confidence in U.S. Elections," September 2005, p.16. The report also observed that, "...different procedures for counting provisional ballots within and between states led to legal challenges and political protests. Had the margin of victory for the presidential contest been narrower, the lengthy dispute that followed the 2000 election could have been repeated."

- In Ohio some counties counted provisional ballots not cast in the assigned precinct even though the state's policy was to count only those ballots cast in the correct precinct.
- Some counties in Washington tracked down voters who would otherwise have had their provisional ballots rejected because they had failed to complete part of their registration form, gave them the chance to correct those omissions, and then counted the provisional ballot. This would probably not have come to light except for the sharp examination caused by the very close election for governor.

Resources available to administer provisional voting varied considerably among and within states. The result is that differences in demographics and resources result in different experiences with provisional voting. For example, the Election Day Survey found that:

- Jurisdictions with lower education and income tend to report more inactive voter registrations, lower turnout, and more provisional ballots cast.
- Jurisdictions with higher levels of income and education reported higher average numbers of poll workers per polling place or precinct and reported lower rates of staffing problems per precinct.
- Staffing problems appeared to be particularly acute for jurisdictions in the lowest income and education categories. Small, rural jurisdictions and large, urban jurisdictions tended to report higher rates of an inadequate number of poll workers within polling places or precincts.
- Predominantly non-Hispanic, Black jurisdictions reported a greater percentage of polling places or precincts with an inadequate number of poll workers. Predominantly non-Hispanic, Native American jurisdictions reported the second highest percentage of staffing problems.

The conclusions to be drawn from these findings are clear. In voting districts with lower education levels, poverty, and inadequately-staffed polling places, the voting process is unlikely to function well. More people will end up casting provisional ballots. That makes the provisional voting process especially important in such districts. But if jurisdictions struggle with regular voting, how well are they likely to do with the more complicated provisional balloting process? In precincts where the voting process, in general, is managed poorly, provisional ballots cannot be expected to work much better. In these areas, the focus should be on broader measures to improve the overall functionality of struggling voting districts, although improving the management of provisional balloting may help at the margin.

Effectiveness of Provisional Voting

The certainty of our conclusions about the effectiveness of provisional voting is limited because of the complexity of the problem and a lack of important information. An ideal assessment of how well provisional ballots worked in 2004 would require knowing the decisions of local officials in 200,000 precincts on how to inform voters about provisional voting; their performance in providing a provisional ballot to those qualified to receive one, and their decisions whether to count a provisional ballot. Information needed about the eligibility or registration status of provisional voters is also not available.

We see no automatic correlation between the quality of a state's voting system and either the number of provisional ballots cast or counted. Low numbers could reflect accurate statewide voting data and good voter education. Or they could suggest that provisional ballots were not made easily available. High numbers could be seen as signifying an effective provisional voting system or a weak registration process. But we do know that in 2004 provisional ballots allowed 1.2 million citizens to vote, citizens who would otherwise have been turned away from the polls.

Since we do not know the total number of registered voters who might have voted but could not make a precise, quantitative estimate of the effectiveness of provisional voting impossible. The Cal Tech – MIT Voting Technology Project, however, estimated that 4 – 6 million votes were lost in the 2000 presidential election for the reasons shown in Table 1 below. The estimate is an approximation, but it may provide data good enough for a general assessment of the size of the pool of potential voters who might have been helped by the provisional ballot process.

Estimates of Votes Lost In 2000 Presidential Election

Votes Lost (Millions)	Cause
1.5 – 2	Faulty equipment and confusing ballots
1.5 – 3	Registration mix-ups
<1	Polling place operations
?	Absentee ballot administration

Table 1 Cal Tech – MIT Voting Technology Project Estimates

4 – 6 million votes are lost in presidential elections due to the causes shown in the table. Registration mix-ups (e.g., name not on list) and polling place operations (e.g., directed to wrong precinct) are the causes most likely to be remedied by provisional voting.

The table shows that the universe of voters who could be helped by provisional voting might be 2.5 – 3 million voters. In 2004, about 1.2 million provisional voters were counted. A rough estimate, then, of the effectiveness of provisional voting in 2004, then, might be 40% to 50% (ballots counted/votes lost)²³. Whatever the precise figure, it seems reasonable to conclude that there is considerable room for improvement in the administration of provisional voting.

Legislative Response

Indeed, several states²⁴ came to the conclusion that the administration of their provisional voting procedures needed to be improved and amended their statutes after the 2004 election. State legislation adopted since the election points to particular areas of concern.

²³ Another interpretation of the data should be considered. The Census Bureau's Current Population Survey (CPS) developed the category of "registration mix-ups" to assess the states' registration systems. After each election the CPS asks people if they were registered and if they voted. The CPS gives breakdowns of reasons why people did not vote. Survey responders tend to deflect blame when answering questions about voting. In the narrow context of provisional ballots, 'registration problems' would cover only voters who went to the polls where the determination that they were not registered was wrong or they were registered, but in the wrong precinct. If they were in the wrong precinct, provisional voting can help them in only 17 states. In 2004, only 6.8% of those not voting and registered blamed registration problems, while 6.9% reported so in 2000.

²⁴ Twelve states made statutory or regulatory changes: Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Louisiana, Montana, New Mexico, North Carolina, Virginia and Wyoming. See Table 4 in Appendix 2.

Not enough time to examine and count the provisional ballots. Florida, Indiana, Virginia, and Washington all have clarified or extended the timeline to evaluate the ballots. But taking more time can prove a problem, particularly in presidential elections with the looming deadline to certify the vote for the Electoral College.²⁵

Lack of uniform rules for counting ballots and effective training of the election officials in interpreting and applying those rules to determine the validity of ballots. Colorado, New Mexico, North Carolina, and Washington have all passed legislation focused on improving the efficacy and consistency of the voting and counting process.

Litigation

Successful legal challenges to the process highlight areas where provisional voting procedures were wanting. A flurry of litigation occurred around the country in October 2004 concerning the so-called "wrong precinct issue" – whether provisional ballots cast by voters in a precinct other than their designated one would be counted for statewide races. These lawsuits were largely unsuccessful in their stated goal: most courts, including the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit (the only federal appeals court to rule on the issue), rejected the contention that HAVA requires the counting of these wrong-precinct provisional ballots.

This litigation was significant nonetheless.

- First, the Sixth Circuit decision established the precedent that voters have the right to sue in federal court to remedy violations of HAVA.
- Second --and significantly-- the litigation clarified the right of voters to receive provisional ballots, even though the election officials were certain they would not be counted. The decision also defined an ancillary right --the right to be directed to the correct precinct. There voters could cast a regular ballot that would be counted. If they insisted on casting a provisional ballot in the wrong precinct, they would be on notice that it would be a symbolic gesture only.
- Third, these lawsuits prompted election officials to take better care in instructing precinct officials on how to notify voters about the need to go to the correct precinct in order to cast a countable ballot – although the litigation regrettably came too late to be truly effective in this regard. In many states, on Election Day 2004, the procedures in place for notifying voters about where to go were less than ideal, reflecting less-than-ideal procedures for training poll workers on this point.

There was also pre-election litigation over the question whether voters who had requested an absentee ballot were entitled to cast a provisional ballot. In both cases (one in Colorado and one, decided on Election Day, in Ohio), the federal courts ruled that HAVA requires that these voters receive a provisional ballot. Afterwards, it is for state officials under state law to determine whether these provisional ballots will be counted, in part by determining if these provisional voters already had voted an absentee ballot (in which case one ballot should be ruled ineligible, in order to avoid double voting). These decisions confirm the basic premise that provisional ballots should be available whenever voters believe they are entitled to them, so that their preferences can be recorded, with a subsequent determination whether these preferences count as valid votes.

²⁵ The resources available to evaluate and count provisional ballots within a tight schedule may not be easily available. The General Accounting Office reports that Detroit, where 1,350 provisional ballots were cast and 123 counted, found the 6-day time frame for processing provisional ballots "very challenging and unrealistic. To overcome this challenge, the entire department's employees were mobilized to process provisional ballots." The report also found that in Los Angeles County, "staff had to prepare duplicate ballots to remove ineligible or invalid contests when voters cast their ballots at the wrong precinct. To overcome this challenge, staffing was increased to prepare the duplicate ballots." In a close, contested election, "duplicate" ballots would doubtless receive long and careful scrutiny." See Appendix 7, GAO, "Views of Selected Local Election Officials on Managing Voter Registration and Ensuring Eligible Citizens Can Vote," September 2005. (GAO Report-05-997)

RECOMMENDATIONS

Because every provisional ballot counted represents a voter who, if the system had worked perfectly, should have voted by regular ballot, the advent of statewide registration databases is likely to reduce the use of provisional ballots. The one area in which such databases may not make a difference is for those who voted by provisional ballot because they did not bring required identification documents to the polling place. The statewide voter registration database will facilitate verifying that ballot, but the voter will still have to vote provisionally. Beyond that exception, even with statewide registries in every state, provisional voting will remain an important failsafe, and voters should have confidence that the failsafe will operate correctly.

The wide variation in the implementation of provisional voting among and particularly within states suggests that EAC can help states strengthen their processes. Research-based recommendations for best, or at least better, practices based on the experience gained in the 2004 election can be useful in states' efforts to achieve greater consistency in the administration of provisional voting.

Recommendations for Best Practices

Recent legislative activity shows that state efforts to improve the provisional voting process are underway. Those states, as well as others that have not yet begun to correct shortcomings that became apparent in 2004, can benefit from considering the best practices described here. By recommending best practices, the EAC will offer informed advice while respecting diversity among the states. One way to strengthen the recommendations and build a constituency for them would be for EAC to ask its advisory committee members to recommend as best practices procedures that have worked in their states.

Self-evaluation of Provisional Voting –4 Key Questions

The first need to achieve greater consistency within each state is to think about provisional voting systematically. As legislators, election officials, and citizens in the states prepare for the 2006 election, they should ask themselves these questions about their provisional voting systems.

1. Does the provisional voting system distribute, collect, record, and tally provisional ballots with sufficient accuracy to be seen as procedurally legitimate by both supporters and opponents of the winning candidate? Does the tally include all votes cast by properly registered voters who correctly completed the steps required?
2. Is the provisional voting system sufficiently robust to perform well under the pressure of a close election when ballot evaluation will be under scrutiny and litigation looms?
3. Do the procedural requirements of the system permit cost-efficient operation? Are the administrative demands of the system reasonably related to the staff and other resource requirements available?

FINAL DRAFT

For Review by the Standards Board and Board of Advisors

4. How great is the variation in the use of provisional voting in counties or equivalent levels of voting jurisdiction within the state? Is the variation great enough to cause concern that the system may not be administered uniformly across the state?

If the answers to these questions leave room for doubt about the effectiveness of the system or some of its parts, the EAC's recommendation of best practices should provide the starting point for a state's effort to improve its provisional voting system.

Best Practices For Each Step In The Process

We examined each step of the provisional voting process to identify specific areas where the states should focus their attention to reduce the inconsistencies noted in our analysis. We offer recommendations in each area appropriate to the responsibilities that HAVA assigns the EAC for the proper functioning of the provisional voting process.

The Importance of Clarity

The EAC should emphasize above all else the importance of clarity in the rules governing every stage of provisional voting. As the Century Foundation's recent report observed, "Close elections increasingly may be settled in part by the evaluating and counting of provisional ballots. . . To avoid post election disputes over provisional ballots—disputes that will diminish public confidence in the accuracy and legitimacy of the result— well in advance of the election, states should establish, announce, and publicize clear statewide standards for every aspect of the provisional ballot process, from who is entitled to receive a provisional ballot to which ones are counted."²⁶

Litigation surrounding the 2004 election resulted in decisions that, if reflected in state statutes or regulations and disseminated in effective training for poll workers, can increase the clarity of provisional ballot procedures, increase predictability, and bolster confidence in the system. By taking the following steps, states can incorporate those court rulings into their procedures.

- ~~Promulgate, ideally by legislation, clear standards for evaluating provisional ballots, and provide training for the officials who will apply those standards.~~ For example, in Washington State, the court determined that an election official's failure in evaluating ballots to do a complete check against all signature records is an error serious enough to warrant recanvassing.²⁷ Clear direction by regulation or statute on what records to use in evaluating ballots could have saved precious time and effort and increased the reliability of the provisional voting system.
- ~~States should provide poll workers standard information resources for the training of poll workers by local jurisdictions.~~ Training materials might include, for example, maps or databases with instruction on how to locate polling places for potential voters who show up at the wrong place. Usable and useful information in the hands of poll workers can protect voters from being penalized by ministerial errors at the polling place.²⁸

While rejecting the notion that all ballots cast in the wrong precinct should be counted, the court ruled that provisional votes cast in the wrong precinct should be thrown out provided that the voter had been directed to the correct precinct. This meant that provisional votes cast in the wrong precinct (and even the

- State training materials provided to local jurisdictions should make clear that the only permissible requirement to obtain a provisional ballot is an affirmation that the voter is registered in the jurisdiction and eligible to vote in an election for federal office.²⁹ Recent legislation in Arizona indicates that recommendations should emphasize HAVA's requirement that persons appearing at the polling place claiming to be registered voters cannot be denied a ballot because they do not have identification with them. Poll workers may need appropriate training to understand their duty to give such voters a provisional ballot.³⁰

A. Registration and Pre-Election Information for Voters

Providing crisp, clear information to voters before the election is important to the success of the provisional voting process. ~~The better voters understand their rights and obligations, the easier the system will be to manage, and the more legitimate the appearance of the process.~~ States can begin by assessing the utility and clarity of the information for voters on their websites and by considering what information might be added to sample ballots mailed to voters before elections. Best practices in this area would include:

1. If states require identification at the time of registration, the kind of IDs required should be stated precisely and clearly and be publicly and widely available in a form that all voters can understand. For example, "You must bring your driver's license. If you don't have a driver's license, then you must bring an ID card with your photograph on it and this ID card must be issued by a government agency." ³¹
2. The process to re-enfranchise felons should be clear and straightforward. To avoid litigation over the registration status of felons, best practice should be defined as making re-enfranchisement automatic, or no more burdensome than the process required for any new registrant.³²
3. State or county websites for voters should offer full, clear information on boundaries of precincts, location of polling places, requirements for identification, and other necessary guidance that will facilitate registration and the casting of a regular ballot. An 800 number should also be provided. Models are available: the statewide databases in Florida and Michigan provide voters with provisional voting information, registration verification and precinct location information.

B. At the Polling Place

wrong polling place) would count if there were no evidence that the voter had been directed to a different polling place. The court placed a duty upon election officials to make sure the voters were in the correct locations. Note that this question would not arise in a state that counted ballots cast in the wrong polling place but within the correct county.

²⁹ Sandusky County Democratic Party v. Blackwell, 387 F.3d 565, 774 (6th Cir. 2004)

Avoiding error at the polling place will allow more voters to cast a regular ballot and all others who request it to cast a provisional ballot.

1. The layout and staffing of the polling place, particularly the multi-precinct polling place is important. Greeters, maps, and prominently posted voter information about provisional ballots, ID requirements, and related topics can help the potential voters cast their ballot in the right place. States should require poll workers to be familiar with the options and provide the resources needed for them to achieve the knowledge needed to be helpful and effective. Colorado has clear regulations on polling place requirements, including HAVA information and voting demonstration display.³³ Many states require training of poll workers. In some states that requirement is recent: after the 2004 election, New Mexico adopted a requirement for poll workers to attend an "election school."³⁴ A state statutory requirement for training could facilitate uniform instruction of poll workers in those states that do not already provide it.
2. The provisional ballot should be of a design or color sufficiently different from a regular ballot to avoid confusion over counting, as occurred in Washington State. The ballot might include a tear-off leaflet with information for voters such as: "Reasons Why Your Provisional Ballot Might Not Be Counted" on one side and "What to Do if My Provisional Ballot Is Not Counted" on the other.
3. Because provisional ballots offer a fail-safe, supplies of the ballots at each polling place should be sufficient for all the potential voters likely to need them. In 2004, some polling places ran out of ballots, with unknown effects on the opportunity to vote. In Middlesex County, New Jersey, for example, on Election Day the Superior Court ordered the county clerk to assure that sufficient provisional ballots were available at several heavily used polling places, and it authorized the clerk "in the event additional provisional ballots are required . . . to photocopy official provisional ballots."³⁵ At least two states, Connecticut and Delaware, provide guidelines to local election officials on how to estimate the demand for provisional ballots. Connecticut sets the number at 1% of the voters in the district, Delaware at 6%.³⁶ States that do not offer a practical method to guide the supply of provisional ballots at polling places should consider doing so. The guideline should take into account both the number of voters in the district and the number of provisional ballots actually cast in recent elections.
4. To achieve the procedural clarity needed to forestall disputes, states should establish a clear chain of custody for the handling of provisional ballots from production through distribution, collection and, finally, evaluation. A number of states have clear procedures for at least parts of this chain of custody. All states should examine their chain-of-custody requirements for clarity. Illinois includes the potentially beneficial requirement that ballots be transported by bi-partisan teams, which offers the potential to avoid some charges of election fraud.

C. Evaluating Voter Eligibility and Counting Provisional Ballots

The clarity of criteria for evaluating voter eligibility is critical to a sound process for deciding which of the cast provisional ballots should be counted. Public recognition of the validity of those criteria is important to establishing the legitimacy of the system as a whole. The experience in 2004 in North Carolina, Washington, and Ohio underlines the importance of clear criteria. As the Century Foundation report put it, "Whatever procedures the states choose [to determine if a provisional ballot should be counted], the paramount consideration—as with all others concerning provisional voting—is that they be clear and thus not susceptible to post-election manipulation and litigation."³⁷ Nonetheless, the *Panio v. Sutherland*³⁸ decision in New York shows the difficulty of defining the range of administrative errors from which the provisional voters should be held harmless. Even when the standard is "clerical error" judges can differ over what that means exactly. Possibly a state law might be able to clarify a definition by giving examples of clerical errors, but even then the definition is unlikely to be perfect.

1. State statutes or regulations should define a reasonable period for voters who lack the HAVA-specified ID or other information bearing on their eligibility to provide it in order to facilitate the state's ability to verify that the person casting the provisional ballot is the same one who registered. While there may be a concern to ensure that the individual who returns with the ID may not be the same individual who cast the provisional ballot, the spirit of HAVA demands that the opportunity to prove identity be provided after Election Day. A signature match can go far in establishing that the individual who voted and the individual returning later with identification is, in fact, the same person. Encouraging a voter who lacks ID on Election Day to return later to help the verification process by providing proper identification will strengthen the system and increase public confidence in the electoral process. Our data indicate that some voters would prefer to return with ID rather than to sign an affidavit, perhaps because of uncertainty about the legal process involved in the affidavit. At least 11 states allow voters to provide ID or other information one to 13 days after voting. Of particular interest is Kansas, which allows voters to proffer their ID by electronic means or by mail, as well as in person.³⁹
2. More provisional ballots are counted in those states that verify ballots cast outside the correct precinct.⁴⁰ While HAVA arguably leaves this decision up to the states, pointing out the effect of the narrower definition on the portion of ballots counted could be useful to the states in deciding this question. States should be aware, however, of the additional burden placed on the ballot-evaluation process when out-of-precinct ballots are considered. And tradeoffs are involved if out-of-precinct voters are unable to vote for the local offices that might appear on the ballot in their district of residence. One option for states is to involve the voters in the decision by pointing out that voters who cast their provisional ballots in the wrong precinct may not be able to participate in the local election. The voter could then decide to go to the correct precinct or vote provisionally for the higher offices at the top of the ticket only.

3. Alternatively, if a state chooses to require voters to appear at their assigned precinct, where the same polling site serves more than one precinct, a voter's provisional ballot should count so long as the voter cast that ballot at the correct polling site even if at the wrong precinct within that location.⁴¹ Ideally the voter could be directed to the correct machine, but poll worker advice will not always be correct. One way to assess the balance of issues here is to consider that, if a voter in a multi-precinct polling place is sent to the wrong machine, the error is probably the poll worker's, and the voter should not be penalized.
4. Officials should follow a written procedure, and perhaps a checklist, to identify the reason why a provisional ballot is rejected (e.g., check the applicable box "unregistered voter"; "lack of signature match" "wrong precinct," etc.) Those forms should be disclosed publicly when completed. Colorado's election rules offer particularly clear guidance to the official evaluating a provisional ballot.⁴²

D. Verification of Provisional Ballots

1. States that use the information on the provisional ballot to permit voters who have changed their addresses to update their registrations should adopt clear procedures on that process and specify how the new information will be communicated between different Boards of Elections
2. In verifying provisional ballots, the time by which election officials must make their eligibility determinations is particularly important in presidential elections because of the need to certify electors to the Electoral College. States should consider in particular how to divide the time allowed them by the safe-harbor provisions that apply in presidential elections to the certification to the Electoral College. Some part of this five-week period will be consumed by the eligibility evaluation, but states should take care to provide a sufficient period of time as well for challenges. If a state consumes 21 days following the election in the eligibility evaluations, only two weeks will remain for legal challenges to be concluded. Is that sufficient? Or should the state provide the resources needed to complete the eligibility determinations in 10 days or two weeks, leaving three weeks or more for legal challenges in a close election? Our research did not identify an optimum division of the five weeks available. The prudent course here would be to encourage states to consider the issue and then make a careful decision about how to complete all steps in the evaluation of ballots and challenges to those determinations within the five weeks available.

E. Post-election Information for Voters

Timely information to voters about the disposition of their provisional ballot will provide helpful feedback and more important enable voters to determine if they are registered for future elections and, if not, what they need to do to become registered.

1. Establish mechanisms to ensure that voters casting provisional ballots are informed whether they are now registered for future elections and, if not, what they need to do to become registered.

F. State Laws Governing Litigation over Provisional Voting

1. Establish special, streamlined litigation procedures for Election Day complaints that individuals are being denied the right to cast a provisional ballot

Broader Considerations

G. Integrity and the Appearance of Integrity

1. State laws or regulations providing for non-partisan or bi-partisan bodies to make a public determination of the validity of provisional ballots would increase confidence in the system.

2. To improve transparency, state laws or regulations should require the purging process for registration to be public and with an opportunity for voters to correct an erroneous determination that they should be purged.
3. State laws or regulation should require the evaluation process for provisional ballots to be public, while protecting the names of those who voted provisionally.

H. Continuous Assessment of the Provisional Ballot – Process and Performance

Defining what makes for a successful provisional voting system is difficult. The most successful system is probably not the one with the most provisional votes cast (that could indicate problems with the registration system). Nor is the system with the greatest number counted or with the fewest counted necessarily superior because the evaluation process could be flawed.

Defining quality requires a broad perspective about how well the system works, how open it is to error recognition and correction, and how well provisional voting processes are connected to the registration and voter identification regimes. The EAC should consider engaging one of the national quality organizations or processes, such as Six Sigma⁴³ or the Baldrige Quality process⁴⁴ to evaluate the provisional ballot process. Pending such a review, the EAC can recommend that states take the following actions.

1. Recognize that the first step to improving quality is to see the provisional voting process as a system and take a systems approach to regular evaluation through standardized metrics with explicit goals for performance.
2. States should begin by collecting data systematically on the provisional voting process so that they can evaluate their voting system and assess changes from one election to the next. The effort should start in the 2006 election, and the data collected should include:
 - Provisional votes cast and counted by jurisdiction, say counties, with details on why the voter had to vote provisionally (lack of ID, not on list, challenged at polling place, issued absentee ballot, etc) and number of ballots actually counted in each category.
 - Reasons why provisional ballots were not counted, using categories such as those that have been adopted by Colorado, described earlier in this report.
 - Measures of variance among jurisdictions.
 - Number of poll workers trained in administration of provisional voting by polling place
 - Number of jurisdictions posting information on provisional voting in the polling place
 - Time required to evaluate ballots by jurisdiction

⁴⁴ The Baldrige Criteria for Performance Excellence provide a systems perspective for understanding performance management. They reflect validated, leading-edge management practices against which an organization can measure itself. With their acceptance nationally and internationally as the model for performance excellence, the Criteria represent a common language for communication among organizations for sharing best practices. The Criteria are also the basis for the Malcolm Baldrige National Quality Award process.

Improving understanding of the provisional voting process through analysis of detailed information will enable state and local election officials to strengthen their systems. By collecting and analyzing this data states can identify which aspects of the registration and electoral system are most important in shunting voters into the provisional ballot process. Responsible officials can then look to their registration system, identification requirements or poll worker training as a way to reduce the need for voters to cast their ballots provisionally.

Our research on provisional voting divided the various states into several categories to allow an assessment of how different factors may have influenced the process of casting and counting provisional ballots. This analysis was conducted before the release of the Election Day Study, and the categories we used may differ in some respects from its work. The variables used to analyze a state's use of provisional ballots:

1. New vs. Old (states that used a provisional ballot before the 2004 election)
2. Use of a statewide database of registered voters vs. no use of a statewide database
3. Counting out-of-precinct ballots vs. not counting out-of-precinct ballots
4. Voter identification requirements
5. Method used to verify provisional ballots
6. Levels of provisional ballots cast and counted

We first assigned states within these categories based on classifications done by Electionline.org in its studies. The Electionline data was the only published information available at the time of our research. We reviewed the Electionline data carefully, and, in select cases, updated it with new, detailed information that had become available after its publication. The changes we made are explained below.

--Idaho, Maine, Minnesota, New Hampshire, Wisconsin and Wyoming were excluded from our analysis. They have election-day registration systems, and did not need to use HAVA-compliant provisional ballots.

--North Dakota does not register voters, so it also was excluded from HAVA requirements and did not use provisional voting.

--Mississippi has not reported its provisional voting results and could not be included in our analysis, though it was compliant in 2004.

--Pennsylvania did not report its totals for the Election Day Study, but we obtained information on Pennsylvania and included it in our analysis.

New vs. Old States

We classified states as "new" or "old" based on the 2001 Electionline study of provisional voting,⁴⁵ but condensed its classifications into a single dichotomous variable, new/old with all other cases excluded. The Electionline study divided states into five categories of their use of provisional ballots in the 2000 election:

1. Use of provisional ballots (P)
2. Limited use of provisional ballots (LP)
3. Affidavit ballots (A)
4. No system in place (N)
5. Unnecessary/Not Applicable (U/NA)

We included in the list of "Old States" all states listed as using provisional ballots, limited use of provisional ballots or affidavit ballots. States in all three categories would have been familiar with key aspects of provisional voting. States that had no provisional voting system in place for the 2002 election, and were HAVA compliant in 2004, were listed as "new" states, as 2004 would have been the first year in which they would be offering the option of provisional voting. States that were listed as unnecessary or not applicable were excluded from this study, as they were exempt from the HAVA regulations in 2004 because they either allowed same-day registration or did not register voters.

Rhode Island is the only state categorized as an old state by Electionline that we moved into the list of new states. Electionline's map shows Rhode Island as a state that used provisional voting in 2000, but in the state description, it is listed as having no system in place. We learned from the Rhode Island Board of Elections that the state had previously permitted potential voters to sign an affidavit if they did not appear on a precinct's list of registered voters, but felt they were registered to vote. Based on the signed affidavit, the election official would then contact a county official to see if the voter was on a more complete registration list. If the voter's name was on the complete list, that voter was permitted to cast a regular ballot. As this process did not grant the voter a provisional ballot, but served as a different type of administrative failsafe, we concluded that Rhode Island's first use of provisional voting was in 2004 and, therefore, classified the state as "new" to the system of provisional balloting.

Statewide List of Registered Voters

The Electionline preview of the 2004 Election⁴⁶ was the starting point for compiling a list of states that had a statewide database of registered voters. That study listed 34 States that did not have their statewide database systems complete, and 16 that did, including the District of Columbia. North Dakota does not register voters, so does not need to compile such a database. Electionline's criterion for concluding that a state had a statewide list was that the state have participation from all jurisdictions in a statewide system. We added Oklahoma to the list of states with statewide databases because we found it had met the Electionline criteria by the 2004 election, albeit too late for inclusion in the Electionline survey.

Out-of-Precinct Ballots

We based our classification of states that allow the counting of ballots cast outside the correct precinct on the data in the 2004 Electionline preview of the 2004 election². States that evaluated ballots cast in a precinct where the voter was not registered were categorized as "out-of-precinct." States that invalidated such ballots were categorized as "In-precinct only."

Verification Method

We identified four different ways states assessed provisional ballots to determine if they should be counted: signature match, match voter data, signed affidavits, and bringing back identification later. We gathered information about these verification techniques by checking state websites and consulting journalistic accounts. We consulted state legislation to provide further information where needed.

Data Collection

To assemble our data for analysis, we began by using the data on provisional votes cast and counted reported by Electionline. To increase the accuracy of this data, we surveyed each state's election websites for updated data, and for reported numbers on the county level. We then sent emails to 49 (we excluded Alaska, see below) states and the District of Columbia, requesting updated data on the number of provisional votes cast and counted by county. We received information from 25 states by our cut-off date of August 25, 2005.

California	Alabama
District of Columbia	Alaska ⁴⁸
Florida	Arizona

⁴⁸ Alaska was not contacted via email, as the state does not have voting districts comparable to counties in other states and could not be matched with comparable census data.

⁴⁹ Maryland reported provisional ballots that were counted per county, but not number cast.

Dear Mr. Weingart:

During a recent briefing by staff, the EAC discussed and reviewed possible next steps with the provisional voting and voter identification studies as well as the Eagleton contract which is scheduled to conclude on June 30, 2006.

We were in agreement that Eagleton's work on the EAC contract should conclude, as scheduled, by June 30, 2006. In preparation for this conclusion, the EAC requests that the comments and suggestions which were noted during the EAC's recent Board of Advisors and Standards Boards meeting (and were described in Mr. O'Neil's June 8, 2006 letter to Chairman DeGregorio) be included in the final draft report on provisional voting which Eagleton will deliver to the EAC on or about June 30, 2006. The Commissioners have determined that they will take this final draft report and, from it, may develop guidance and best practice recommendations that will be presented to the Board of Advisors and Standards Boards for further review.

The EAC Commissioners have also reviewed and considered next steps with the voter identification draft report which Eagleton has prepared. While the final disposition of the results and findings of this study, on the part of the EAC, are still unclear, the Commissioners have asked that the final draft report of this study also be prepared and submitted to the EAC not later than June 30, 2006.

We look forward to receiving these reports. On behalf of the EAC thank you for the considerable time and energy which the Eagleton/Moritz team has devoted to these critical election issues.

Sincerely,

Dear Chairman DeGregorio:

Karen Lynn-Dyson relayed the Commission's decision in your meeting of June 1 to take more time to consider how to proceed with the delivery of EAC research reports on provisional voting and voter identification.

The Eagleton-Moritz research team, of course, encourages the Commission's thoughtful consideration of the two reports, but we are mindful of the need to deliver revised documents that respond to the Commission's comments by the close of our contract on June 30th. We believe that if we receive the Commission's final comments on the Provisional Voting report by June 19 we will be able to complete any additional work that the Commission might request and incorporate the results in our final reports before the end of the contract period.

Based on suggestions raised at the meetings, we already plan to supplement the Provisional Voting report with some brief, additional information about the influence of the fail-safe ballot provisions of the National Voting Rights Act on the experience with provisional voting in 2004.

We understand that the Commission must submit the final draft Voter ID report to the same review process by your advisory boards as was followed with the Provisional Voting paper. We understand that step is a prerequisite for wider release. We would appreciate your advice on how to handle this review, given the rapidly approaching end of our contract.

We hope the commission will use both reports, as intended from the outset of this project, as the basis for recommendations for better, if not best, practices to the states. If the Commission cannot decide to issue such recommendations to the states, we hope it will promptly release the reports to provide the states and the broader elections community with this information, analysis and perspective on the issues.

We recognize, based on the reactions at the meetings of the Standards Board and, particularly, the Board of Advisors, that some of the findings, conclusions, and recommendations of the reports will be controversial with some of the Commission's constituencies. But we also believe, based on the comments of the Peer Review Group, the advisors assembled by the Commission, and our response to their critiques, that the reports are grounded on solid research by a well-qualified, nonpartisan team and that the reports will provide new information for the policy process. We believe this information will contribute to achieving the EAC mission of providing helpful information that the states may or may not choose to implement.

August 18, 2005

Dear Commissioners:

At the meeting of the Board of Advisors in Portland, Oregon, our notebooks included an EAC Information Research Update, dated July 18, 2005. The Update indicates that the EAC has awarded a contract to the Eagleton Institute / Moritz College of Law ("Moritz") to conduct research into "Provisional Voting / ID Requirements."

Obviously, the duty of the EAC as outlined in Section 241 to conduct research on election issues is a very important one. That is why it is clearly an absolute necessity that the researchers who are awarded contracts to conduct that research be objective and nonpartisan in their work. It would be inappropriate and potentially very damaging and embarrassing to the EAC (and the Board of Advisors) if this research is conducted by entities that have a preconceived opinion or bias on the issue being researched or are, in fact, advocates on the issue. Any findings or recommendations such biased entities put in their final report would be open to question and could cause great harm.

Unfortunately, hiring the faculty at Moritz to conduct research on provisional balloting and voter identification provisions calls into question whether the research can be conducted in an objective manner and reach conclusions that are not pre-determined by the public and pre-existing views of the researchers. This is crystal clear from an easily-conducted review of the Moritz website.

The Associate Director of the Election Law program at Moritz, Daniel Tokaji, is an outspoken opponent of voter identification requirements and commentator on provisional voting. Here is a brief summary of some of his recent comments, taken from the Moritz website:

It's therefore questionable at best whether an ID requirement is really necessary to combat voting fraud. Supporters of the ID requirement have yet to make a convincing case that existing methods of discouraging and punishing fraud are insufficient. While the anti-fraud benefits of stricter ID laws are dubious, there is evidence that an ID requirement would impose a severe burden on many voters, particularly those of low income....In their present form, the ID bills presently on the table are likely unconstitutional.... (ID and the Right to Vote, April 12, 2005)

"Ohio's election reform is a mixed bag. Establishing a clear rule for provisional ballots is a good idea, but I don't think there's a good reason for refusing to count provisional ballots cast out of precinct, given that a statewide registration database (which should allow for easy verification of eligibility) has to be in place by 2006. It would be much better to move to in-precinct early voting than mail-in absentee voting, but it seems that Ohio doesn't want to spend the money." (Reform Comes to Ohio, May 20, 2005).

"Nevertheless, DOJ seems likely to sign off on this [Arizona's proposition 200 implementing rules], given that they've take the position - quite clearly an erroneous one, in my view - that voters need not even be given a provisional ballot if they lack ID." (Arizona Voter ID, July 18, 2005).

"It remains to be seen, of course, whether DOJ will rigorously enforce Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, when it comes to practices - like the Georgia ID law - that threaten to result in the denial of minority votes...." (Preclearance, Preclearance, Preclearance, July 20, 2005).

"...I tend to doubt that the preclearance process will prove to be an effective remedy for measures like the Georgia ID law. Even though this law will have a "retrogressive" effect, by serving as a barrier to minority voters' participation...." (The Voting Rights Act, Then and Now, July 31, 2005)

"We should remember that, at the turn of the 20th Century, allegations of "good government" were used by white Democrats in a remarkably successful strategy to suppress the black vote. The result of those very successful efforts was to impose barriers like the literacy test, which excluded African Americans from voting throughout the South for the better part of the century, until after the Voting Rights Act of 1965. If you go back and read some of the documents from the late 1800's and early 1900's, as I've recently been doing, the similarity to the sort of arguments being advanced now in support of photo ID laws is frightening. It is beyond unfortunate to see the same sort of tactics, albeit dressed up in more respectable garb, being employed at the start of the 21st Century." (Vote Suppression, Fraud and Voter ID, August 3, 2005)

In addition to these postings, Dr. Tokaji is acting as an advocate on voter identification issues, having submitted a comment letter to the Department of Justice dated August 18, 2005, along with a number of other professors, urging an objection to a voter identification provision currently before the Department for review under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. Obviously, this advocacy is occurring after the EAC awarded this contract and during the pendency of the research work.

The issue here is not whether Dr. Tokaji's opinions are correct or incorrect, or the appropriateness of his submitting a comment letter to the Department of Justice. The point is the strongly held, pre-existing notions about both provisional balloting and voter identification espoused by the Associate Director of Moritz's election law program and his advocacy on these issues. This raises serious concerns about the propriety of Moritz being provided with federal tax dollars to conduct non-partisan and impartial research into such a sensitive and high profile area of election law. We cannot be certain that data collected and conclusions reached by this research project will not be predetermined to comport with the views of Moritz's officials.

I would strongly recommend that this contract be reconsidered by the EAC. Under these circumstances, any report issued by Moritz will be open to serious questions as to its validity and objectivity.

Hans:

I'm currently at the Seattle airport awaiting a return flight to D.C., so I apologize if my response below is somewhat incomplete. I think the issue you raise certainly deserves our full consideration, so I will look forward to additional responses and dialogue from others included in this distribution list.

A couple of quick points in response to your concerns (and I am speaking for myself below, and not for the entire commission):

- (1) The RFP that was issued by the EAC pertaining to the research on provisional voting and voter ID requirements was widely advertised (as all our RFP's are). We did so because we wanted to receive a wide range of possible contractors to conduct this important research. This was a competitive RFP process which, if my memory serves me correct, produced a good number of responses from interested entities.
- (2) Carol Paquette assembled a review panel (I'm not sure how many persons were involved in the review panel) to score the responses to this RFP...the submission by the Eagleton Institute included, as a part of their proposal, the Moritz School of Law at Ohio State University as a partner in conducting the legal research required for Eagleton to provide a final report (due in October) to the EAC. The review panel scored the Eagleton submission as best, considering a variety of factors.
- (3) The lead entity in this project is the Eagleton Institute. While the project manager's name from Eagleton escapes me right now, the lead from Moritz is not Dan Tokagi, but Ned Foley, who directs the election law section (or something to that effect) at Moritz. Certainly it is true that Professor Tokagi is contributing to the work product being assemble by Moritz, which consists primarily of reviewing election and administrative codes from all 50 states to ascertain how each state deals with provisional voting and voter ID requirements.
- (4) As is the case with all federal contractors, both Eagleton Institute and Moritz are contractually obligated to produce objective, sound and unbiased research and analysis on this project. While it is certainly prudent to consider the potential bias of any prospective contractor(s), after receiving the recommendation from the review panel and Carol Paquette (at the time, the acting EAC Executive Director), we unanimously agreed among the commissioners that the recommendation was worthy of support. At the time, we were aware, for example, that the Eagleton Institute had been involved last year in some litigation involving provisional ballots. We were also aware, as you point out, of Professor Tokagi's personal views regarding the issue of voter ID and provisional voting. Nevertheless, there was unanimous agreement in supporting the staff (and review panel) recommendation to move forward with the proposal submitted by Eagleton Institute.
- (5) Finally, to ensure that the final workproduct from both Eagleton and Moritz is objective and representative of all view points on these important issues, Eagleton proposed early in the process -- and we enthusiastically agreed -- to the formation of a balanced peer review panel which will review the work, on an on-going basis, of Eagleton and Moritz. All EAC commissioners have had an opportunity to provide names to Eagleton to ensure appropriate political balance on this peer review panel and Eagleton has been responsive to our various suggestions.

By way of summary, let me say that I believe we have an obligation to closely scrutinize the conduct of all of our federal contractors. If things come to light that bring into question the objectivity of any of our contractors, I believe the EAC ought to conduct its due diligence and deal with such matters accordingly, including the possibility of contract termination.

I would be happy to conduct such due diligence with regard to this particular contract. However, I must say, with all due respect, that I do not think any breach has occurred, either by Eagleton or Moritz, which would necessitate termination of this contract. I think appropriate checks and balances have been accounted for in this contract, and I believe these checks and balances will ensure an objective and sound final product from Eagleton.

I welcome your continued feedback, Hans.

Kindest regards,

To Gracia, Ray, Donetta, Tom, Julie, Karen

In his note regarding the Eagleton contract, Hans has raised some of the same concerns I raised from the beginning of any discussions I had regarding this contract with our staff, and at our first formal meeting with Eagleton. In reviewing their work product from time to time, I continue to have concerns about a lack of balanced input and have repeatedly voiced them with staff and with Eagleton. I did this when the initial peer review group was proposed and again during their presentation at our meeting in Pasadena (the outreach slide in their public presentation showed outreach to seven groups, of which only one could be considered conservative-leaning). Now, as I have just had the opportunity to read their July progress report, it appears that Eagleton seems to be going into a larger analysis of the voter fraud issue than was authorized in the contract. My suspicion is that Dan Tokaji is injecting his views into this to dismiss or diminish the concerns some people may have about voter fraud. I could be wrong, but his previous writings lead me to believe otherwise.

I only found one mention of voter fraud in the contract with Eagleton. It is in Section 3.5 regarding provisional voting, where it discusses "minimizing opportunity for voter fraud." Yet, on page 4 of the July progress report from Eagleton, in describing their work plan for the next month it states: "we will expand upon vote fraud research and examine further the relationship between instances of vote fraud and ensuing election reforms." This clearly seems to be going beyond the mandate we gave them as I thought they were going to be looking at voter fraud relating to provisional voting (as the contract calls for), not voter fraud as it relates to election reforms. While voter fraud was never mentioned in the contract regarding the voter ID issue, page 5 of their July report indicates that their narratives "will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud." In addition to this, page 6 describes a look into the "relationship between voter ID regime and vote fraud."

Voter fraud is clearly an issue that is perceived differently from the Right and from the Left. I have struggled with determining what a clear definition of voter fraud is myself, and therefore want to obtain various perspectives and good analysis on this issue before I formulate a solid conclusion in my mind. It has been my understanding all along that the whole voter fraud/voter intimidation issue is going to be studied by the EAC using a balanced group of consultants--not Eagleton and Moritz, who are likely to focus on just on the number of prosecutions of voter fraud, rather than the complaints made or the fact that many election officials are frustrated that some prosecutors don't take their complaints about voter fraud seriously. I am not convinced at this point that we will get a balanced and objective study from Eagleton/Moritz on voter fraud. I am puzzled on why they seem to be expending a significant portion of their time on this and would want to know if we somehow authorized them to do more research into the voter fraud issue.

On page 7 of their July report Eagleton indicates that communications with the EAC on the Peer Review Group "were not clear or timely." I would like to know what this refers to. Also, I may have missed it, but I do not recall seeing the final list of who is serving as the Peer Review group.

The August 15th copy of the July report that I received from Karen did not include the attachment of the financial report of expenses incurred. I would like to see that attachment.

Outside of our NIST work, this contract represents our largest single outside expenditure of our operational funds. Any single expenditure of $500,000+ needs to be closely monitored. I, for one, am not going to sign off on any report that appears to have been written from a biased viewpoint, especially one that doesn't appear to be interested in hearing from conservative organizations or right-leaning researchers, or seems to minimize any input from them. I've already had questions from congressional staff and others on why we picked Eagleton and Moritz, as they are perceived by some as biased against Republicans. I assured the critics that we have insisted all along on an objective study from Eagleton. An unbalanced or biased study from them will not only hurt my credibility, but also that of the EAC. I'm not suggesting that we stop their work, but I do want Tom and Julie to inform them in no uncertain terms that we will not accept a report that does not seriously consider all viewpoints on provisional voting and the voter ID issue, and that any study or interpretations they present to us reflect a diversity of opinions on these subjects. We also need for staff to determine whether their considerable work into the voter fraud area is authorized in the contract. We should not be paying for and receiving work we did not authorize.

The contract clearly calls for "alternative approaches" on voter ID requirements and "alternatives" on provisional voting. I agreed to support this contract to Eagleton because I was assured that we would receive a variety of approaches from their work, and not just those from a liberal perspective.

Paul:

I am directing this email only to the commissioners, because I don't think we should air our disagreements among staff until we have at least had a chance to discuss controversial issues with each other in person. It appears from Gracia's email that we will have a chance do so next week in Denver.

In the meantime, I feel compelled to respond to your email regarding Eagleton.

(1) As I stated last night in my email to Hans, we have an on-going responsibility to monitor the expenditure of all our federal funds, including to government contractors who are contractually obligated to deliver unbiased research. However, I will remind you that we did not contract with Eagleton merely to provide a compilation of state laws and procedures. Rather, we contracted with Eagleton (and indirectly with Moritz through Eagleton) to provide both research AND analysis of provisional voting and voter ID. Invariably, the analysis portion of their final product will be from a professional (and institutional) perspective, and will NOT represent any one researcher's personal point of view. If it does, then Eagleton and Moritz risk damaging their credibility not just with the EAC, but with other federal government agencies which undoubtedly contract with their respective institutions on other projects. I doubt seriously that either institution would risk such damage and allow one team member to inject bias into the work. Moreover, the peer review group that is (or has) been assembled by Eagleton is designed to cure any lingering concerns about potential insitutional or personal bias...Eagleton has been responsive to your feedback on this issue, to the point where they have removed all perspective representatives of the advocacy community on the peer review group (because they felt they could not achieve political "balance" from the advocacy groups). If there is some person (or persons) which you would like to see Eagleton include in the review group, it is my understanding that such inclusion is but a mere phone call away.

(2) You will recall that at our meeting last week, I raised the exact same concern about the Eagleton progress report, and asked for clarification from staff regarding the details of this particular work (i.e., fraud) on the part of Eagleton. I expect staff (or us directly) to ask questions of Eagleton (as we would any contractor) and determine if their work in this area is within the scope of work (and contract) we all agreed to. If it isn't then we re-direct them, just as we have done, for example with Kim Brace and EDS.

(3) Finally, I must express my disappointment, Paul, regarding your comments on Professor Tokagi that you chose to include in your email. While I may disagree with Hans on his particular analysis of the perceived personal bias of this contract, at least his allegations regarding Professor Tokagi's potential bias are grounded in fact (and he recited them as such in his email). You, on the other hand, have chosen to accuse Professor Tokagi of manipulating the work on this project based on your "suspicion." With all due respect, that unfortunate accusation borders, in my view, on a breach of professional decorum and I cannot let it go without response.

We clearly have some political issues that are increasingly being injected into nearly every discussion at the EAC table. I have stated both to you and Gracia individually that I believe this trend in part represents a "maturation" of the EAC and I am not uncomfortable with it. However, if we are going to bring accusations of subjectivity and bias to the table, then I will expect that such a filter will be applied across the board to ALL projects undertaken by the EAC, and that such a filter will be based solidly on fact, and not on innuendo, personal hunches or suspicions.

I send this email, as always, with the highest degree of respect and friendship toward you. And yet, my disappointment is evident in your comments regarding an esteemed and respected member of the legal academic community (and someone whom I regard as a personal friend.)

I look forward to our continued discussion on this matter. And as for the substance of Hans' concern regarding Moritz, I stand by my email which I sent to everyone last night.

RE: October 18, 2006 Letter

Dear Mr. Neas:

Your letter of October 18, 2006 requests the release of EAC's Voter Fraud and Intimidation Report. I would like to take this opportunity to clarify the purpose and status of this study.

In late 2005, EAC hired two consultants for the purpose of assisting EAC with two things: 1) developing a uniform definition of the phrase voter fraud, and 2) making recommendations on how to further study the existence, prosecution, and means of deterring such voter fraud. In May 2006, a status report on this study was given to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors during their public meetings. During the same week, a working group convened to react to and provide comment on the progress and potential conclusions that could be reached from the work of the two consultants.

The conversation at the working group meeting was lively on the very points that we were trying to accomplish as a part of this study, namely what is voter fraud and how do we pursue studying it. Many of the proposed conclusions that were suggested by the consultants were challenged by the working group members. As such, the consultants were tasked with reviewing the concerns expressed at the working group meeting, conducting additional research as necessary, and providing a draft report to EAC that took into account the working group's concerns and issues.

That draft report is currently being vetted by EAC staff. EAC will release a final report from this study after it has conducted a review of the draft provided by the consultants. However, it is important to remember the purpose of this study -- finding a uniform definition of voter fraud and making recommendations on how to study the existence, prosecution and deterrence of voter fraud -- as it will serve as the basis of the EAC report on this study.

Thank you for your letter. You can be assured that as soon as a final report on the fraud and intimidation study is available, a copy will be made available to the public.

Sincerely,

Dear Commissioners,

On October 11th, USA Today published an article describing the report commissioned by the EAC on voter fraud. We write today to urge the EAC to release this report.

As a 25 year old civil rights and civil liberties organization, People For the American Way Foundation (PFAWF) and our sister organization, People For the American Way (PFAW) have long been dedicated to ensuring the integrity of our elections. In particular in the years since the 2000 election, PFAWF and other principle partners such as the NAACP and the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, have carried out a program called Election Protection to ensure that all eligible voters are able to vote and have that vote counted as cast.

We know that voter fraud and intimidation occur— we've seen the long lines, the erroneous purges, the misleading flyers and phone calls. And yet there seems to be little attention to these matters on the state and federal level.

Instead, a disproportionate amount of time and energy are spent on measures that purport to curb voter fraud by requiring voters to produce proof of citizenship and identity to vote. In actuality, these measures do little to secure the elections and much to disenfranchise otherwise eligible voters. Indeed we are weeks away from an election where thousands of eligible voters may be disenfranchised by overly restrictive voter identification laws. That presents a real threat to the integrity of our elections and the health of our democracy.

The report that the EAC commissioned from voting experts would make a vitally important contribution to the national discourse on the reality of voter fraud. In light of the numerous claims regarding the prevalence of voter fraud, this report provides a much needed analysis about the state of our electoral process. While media reports indicate that this tax-payer funded report is final, even if there are outstanding concerns within the EAC, we implore you to move forward with releasing the report as is, and to hold a public hearing to address any potential issues. Again, the importance of the information in this report is paramount and the public deserves such full disclosure. The report should be released immediately so that those who are concerned about ensuring the integrity of elections can benefit from its findings.

Sincerely,

Ralph G. Neas

Subject Fw: Peer Review Group

Commissioners-

Enclosed please find a preliminary list of Peer Review Group members, whom Eagleton is considering for their Peer Review Group. Tom Wilkey will be bringing this item to you for discussion and input at Monday's Commissioner's meeting.

Eagleton envisions this Peer Review Group as the body that will review the draft analysis that it will prepare on provisional voting and on voter identification. The Group would also provide comment on the development of alternative approaches to provisional voting and voter identification which Eagleton will develop for the EAC.

I have included the e-mail from the Eagleton Project Director, Tom O'Neil, so that you could get a feel for his approach/philosophy to assembling the Group.

Subject Peer Review Group

Karen,

As you probably recall, one of the features of our proposal was the creation of a Peer Review Group to look over our findings, conclusions and draft reports before we prepare final drafts for the EAC's review. The EAC asked that before recruiting members of the PRG we submit names for EAC's review. The aim, course, is to assemble a panel that is experienced, informed, and balanced.

Attached is a list of potential PRG members drawn from academia, the law, and non-profit organizations with interests in this area. Please look it over.

We may conclude that the PRG should also include two or three former government officials now in academia or related fields. We have a conference call with our partners at Moritz planned for tomorrow or Friday to decide a) if former officials should be included in the PRG and b) if so, who they should be. I'll keep you informed of our thinking as it develops.

Tom

In July 2002, Timothy G. O'Rourke became the Dean of the Fulton School of Liberal Arts at Salisbury University, a comprehensive public university with nearly 7,000 students located on Maryland's Eastern Shore. The largest of the university's four schools, the Fulton School has about 120 full-time faculty and more than 1,800 undergraduate and graduate majors in ten academic departments and accounts for more than two-fifths of the University's credit hour production.

In the seven years before his arrival at Salisbury, Dr. O'Rourke was at the University of Missouri-St. Louis, where he was the Teresa M. Fischer Professor in Citizenship Education, a position established in 1995 in order to promote the informed participation of youth in community and governmental affairs. The inaugural recipient of this professorship, Dr. O'Rourke held a joint appointment as Professor of Educational Leadership and Professor of Political Science. From 1998 to 2002, he served as Executive Director of Kids Voting Missouri, a program in which nearly 68,000 Missouri elementary and secondary students went to official polling sites and voted alongside their parents in the November 7, 2000 presidential election.

From 1992 to 1995, Dr. O'Rourke was professor and head of Political Science at Clemson University. Prior to that, Dr. O'Rourke was, for 14 years, a faculty member in the University of Virginia's Center for Public Service. From 1985 to 1992, Dr. O'Rourke served as the Executive Director of the Virginia Commission on the Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution. Commission projects included the national opening of Montpelier, Madison's home (1987); the "Constitution Train" to Philadelphia to mark "Virginia Day" (1987); production of Worth Fighting For, an Emmy-Award-winning documentary on the ratification struggle in Virginia (1988); the celebration of the 200th anniversary of the first federal elections (1989); the Virginia visit of Hungarian President Árpád Göncz to mark the "Global Legacy of the Bill of Rights" (1990); and production of What No Just Government Should Refuse, an Emmy-nominated documentary on the writing of the Bill of Rights (1991). From 1983 through 1986, Dr. O'Rourke directed "The Virginia Court Days Forums," a series for Virginia public television featuring town meetings on constitutional issues.

Professor O'Rourke is the co-author of State and Local Government: The Third Century of Federalism (1988) and author of The Impact of Reapportionment (1980), named by CHOICE as one of the Outstanding Academic Books of 1980. His articles on the federal Voting Rights Act have appeared in such journals as the Rutgers Law Journal, the Virginia Law Review and the Journal of Law & Politics. He has testified before both U.S. House and Senate committees on various voting issues and has served as an expert witness in voting rights litigation. In addition, he has staffed electoral reform commissions, including the Virginia Beach Mayor's Committee for Reapportionment (1990) and the Charlottesville Citizens' Committee to Study Council Changes (1980-81). During 1996-97, he served as advisor to the St. Peters Charter Commission, which drafted a home rule charter for that city. Dr. O'Rourke's teaching interests include state politics, school law, and voting rights and representation. He is a Phi Beta Kappa graduate of the University of Pittsburgh (1970) and holds a Ph.D. in Political Science from Duke University (1977). In 2002, Dr. O'Rourke joined four others in the inaugural Class of Distinguished Alumni recognized by the Tyrone Area School District (PA). Dr. O'Rourke and his wife Judy have five grown children and one grandchild and reside in Quantico, Maryland.

Existing Research Analysis

There are many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. There is little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud is the report written by Lori Minnite. The most systematic look at voter intimidation is the report by Laughlin McDonald. Books written about this subject seem to all have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists. It is hoped that this gap will be filled in the "second phase" of this EAC project.

Moreover, reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund's frequently cited book. Again, this is something that it is hoped will be addressed in the "second phase" of this EAC project by doing follow up research on allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate, but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.

EAC Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Preliminary Research

- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

*Peer Review Group
Summary of Comments
To the Eagleton/Moritz Group
Under Contract to Provide Research Assistance to the EAC*

October 15, 2005

The Peer Review Group (PRG) met by telephone conference on September 21. Those participating included: Michael Alvarez, John C. Harrison, Martha Kropf, Dan Lowenstein, Peter Verniero, Brad Smith, and Tim Storey. This summary also includes additional written remarks submitted by Martha Kropf and additional remarks from a follow-up phone call with Timothy O'Rourke. We are now addressing all the comments including, in some cases, returning to members of the group to seek further elaboration or clarification.

We encouraged the members of the PRG to comment about any aspect of the project. We furnished them with these materials before the meeting.

1. Survey of local (mainly county) officials conducted in June 2005.
2. State-by-state narrative of developments in provisional voting
3. Statistical Analysis of state provisional voting
4. Memorandum on Provisional Voting Litigation
5. Memorandum on Provisional Ballot Litigation by State
6. July Memorandum on Provisional Ballot Litigation by Issue

We suggested that PRG members rank our draft responses to each of the six key questions posed by the EAC along these lines:

- 1- Research supports conclusions well.
- 2- Research supports some conclusions. Specific questions are:
- 3- Research does not support conclusions. Major problems are:

On the Alternatives paper, we asked PRG members to list up to three items they found questionable in light of the research and their own knowledge of provisional voting and election administration and to give us their thoughts on alternative policies that we had not included.

General Suggestions

1. Make transparently clear the meaning of 'old' versus 'new' states. It is not enough to categorize the states as such, we need to determine why specific states were considered 'old' or 'new' (i.e. clarify what conditions were met by old states).

2. Be clear in our report about the data that we were unable to obtain and perhaps speculate on why that data was not available. (For example, do we have the documentation the state election boards gave the localities regarding counting practices? If not, why not? Indicate the states for which it was difficult to obtain data.

3. Prescribe less and describe more (tell what voters/administrators have done, not what they should have done or ought to do).

4. Questioned our assumption about public trust – How do we know that decreases in disputes/challenges signify an increase in public trust? We need to explain this assertion.

Specific Review by Area of Analysis/Document

Response to Statistical Review:

- Challenged our emphasis on the number of provisional ballots counted as a percentage of those cast as an indication of success of Provisional Voting. Suggested alternative relationships to consider (PB v. Turnout, PB v. Registered Voters, and PB v. Voting age Population).
- Wanted the inclusion of variation within states among counties (and geographical considerations).
- The report needs to address the quality and validity of the data used in the analysis.
- On Page 8, cautioned using the estimate of 280,000 disenfranchised voters who would have voted if outside precinct voting was permitted.

Response to Question Four:

- Remove the comments in the footnote (p. 1) that offers an alternative way of analyzing the question relating to the possible increase in voter participation as a result of provisional voting because the margin of error in the Census survey does not support a conclusion at this level of significance.
- Address the alternative explanation for why old states may enfranchise more voters than new states (i.e. Kropf 's Failsafe option).
- Include a statistical summary of the relationship between the length of time a state has had PV and the rate at which votes are counted.

Response to Question Five:

- Is it possible to draw any conclusions about the local differences within and among states broken down by county (presumably 20 states worth)?

015644

- Clarify what is meant by “design” and say how many states have/had provisional ballots that are designed differently and look different. Why is design important?
- Page 17 indicates that states with statewide voter databases end up validating fewer PVs. This is important & should be addressed in more detail.

Response to Question Six:

- On the usefulness of instructions, 98% said the instructions were useful. Make it clear that this represents 98% of the officials who got instruction.
- Is the passive voice the best means to communicate this information (for ex. "Second, objectively how well did the process appear to be managed?")

Response to State Narratives:

- When in doubt about whether we have data to support a sentence it is important to be careful about the language we use (say ‘doing XYZ would have revealed’ as opposed to ‘most of what we know about XYZ revealed’...)
- Clarify for the readers what is meant by "provisional vote/total vote". Does that mean provisional votes cast? Counted? Make it clear right at the beginning of every document?
- Footnote states that do not list poll sites or tell people where to vote with the fact that many cities/counties do have a poll finder.

Election Official Survey

- Clarify how we determined who to include in the sample and how we developed the questions in the survey (was a focus group an initial step?) Why were 3,800 election officials deemed eligible to participate (out of how many? 5,000 or so?)
- Clarify old and new states on pg. 2 in National Survey. Comment on how to assess fraud in provisional voting? What is the relationship between PV and turnout?
- Explore more issues about citizenship (18% non-citizen voting in CA)?
- Appendix A says survey was random, but it’s not. How was the data weighted for small, medium and large counties, and for other issues? Clarify this in the report.

- Why doesn't the total of new and old states equal 50 (25 and 18) and why does the National Survey of Election Officials have different numbers? Is FL an 'old' state?
- Are the New England states underrepresented in the survey? If so, why?
- Report should offer more information about the response rate.

Alternatives Document

- The importance of clarity in state processes for both administrators and voters needs to be better articulated.
(Better training of poll workers, clarity whether failure to check boxes disqualifies voters, access to better info. at polling locations)
- Cautions the use of definitive statements (such as A-3, perhaps say "This raises the question of...").
- Have other EAC Guidelines been tested in court yet?
- On page 3: the 'tracking number' in # 6 is not feasible. Also, "the information" in # 12 should be changed to "the website and 800 numbers" for clarification.
- Page 6, there were disagreements about # 1 and # 2 of options in Sec. F regarding the installation of a separate body to rule on PV for the integrity process; a motion was made to get rid of them.
- Page 6, Sec. E option # 1 should be eliminated or clarified
- Add to Sec. F a '# 5' requiring states to provide detailed public info. on PV

INTRODUCTION

This report describes our progress from September 1 through September 30, 2005. It includes brief descriptions of key tasks; progress made; challenges encountered or anticipated; milestones reached; and projections for work to be completed in the coming month.

We focused in September on refining our Provisional Voting research. This refinement was necessary to prepare a strong final analysis paper and develop alternative approaches to Provisional Voting based on the analysis. An important part of this refinement involved reconciling sometimes conflicting data on Provisional Voting from different sources, including the Election Day Study, which finally became available in September. With a clearer understanding of our data, we began the critical work of selecting alternatives to recommend to the EAC as guidance or best practices responsive to both our research and the needs of the Commission.

Three meetings this month helped us accomplish the necessary refinement. We briefed the EAC on our work on September 6, held the first meeting of the Peer Review Group (PRG) on September 21, and gained the benefit of the EAC's reaction to the September 6 briefing in a conference call on September 30.

The completion of our work on Provisional Voting has been delayed by the time needed to absorb and incorporate the findings of the EAC Election Day Study, to recruit and receive the comments of the PRG, and to receive the Commission's comments on the September 6 briefing. The schedule called for the release of the Election Day Study last spring, the submission of the Preliminary Guidance Document to the EAC's advisory boards in mid-September, and a public hearing on the Guidance Document in late October. We now plan to submit to the EAC a final draft of our report, a preliminary guidance document, and draft best practices before the end of October. And we understand that after review of those materials, the EAC will decide whether to issue a guidance document or recommend best practices. Projecting a late November date for those decisions seems reasonable. If the EAC does decide to issue a Guidance Document on Provisional Voting, the time needed for a review by the advisory boards is likely to delay a public hearing until January.

While we have made a good start on the Voter ID sections of our research, most time and resources this month were dedicated to resolving issues involved in Provisional Voting.

This report is divided into 3 sections: Provisional Voting, Voter Identification Requirements, and Project Management. Each section references specific tasks described in paragraph 3 of the contract. The Financial Report will be sent separately by the Rutgers Division of Grant and Contract Accounting.

PROVISIONAL VOTING

Tasks 3.4 – 3.9 in our contract relate to Provisional Voting. Work on the first of these must be complete before proceeding to later tasks. Task 3.4 was completed in August, and Task 3.5 is well underway.

Task 3.5: Analysis and Alternative Approaches. Assess the potential, problems, and challenges of Provisional Voting and develop alternative means to achieve the goals of Provisional Voting.

LEGISLATION, REGULATIONS, AND LITIGATION

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation. This information constitutes the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task. It has provided a base of understanding for the analysis of states' actual experience with Provisional Voting in 2004, for which the Eagleton team has lead responsibility.

Description: The Moritz team has created a 50-state chart to summarize information on Provisional Voting, compiled statutes, case law and administrative procedures regarding Provisional Voting and is near completion with this research.

Progress: We have completed the memorandum outlining Provisional Voting legislative changes since the 2004 election and we are continuing to clarify the laws prior to these changes.

Challenges: The variety in the form and frequency of Provisional Voting legislation from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: The analysis of the information, data, and survey results concerning Provisional Voting was completed in September, on schedule. We are now revising it in response to comments by the Peer Review Group (PRG). We are also revising the alternatives document to reflect the critique of the PRG and the guidance from the EAC in response to the September 6 briefing.

PREPARATION FOR AND EXPERIENCE WITH PROVISIONAL VOTING

The Eagleton team has researched and compiled a narrative of each state's experience with Provisional Voting in 2004. The report findings from the survey of 400 local election officials are now complete. The survey results have proven to be instrumental in shaping our understanding of actual practice in administering Provisional Voting, including the steps local officials took to prepare for the election.

PROVISIONAL VOTING NARRATIVES

Description: To construct the narratives, a researcher examined newspaper accounts, state websites, and reports from third-party organizations to gather information on the experience with Provisional Voting in the 2004 election. To organize the information derived from this examination, we created an information system that catalogues information about the states (i.e. whether a state was new to Provisional Voting, the percentage of provisional votes counted, the method of notifying voters if their vote was counted, etc.) and combined it with Moritz's collection and analysis of statutes, regulations and litigation.

Progress: We completed a state-by-state narrative of developments in Provisional Voting and distributed it to the EAC and the PRG. This work has been helpful in understanding the context of the data collected on provisional voting from the states.

Challenges: The primary obstacle to constructing the narratives was difficulty in communicating and obtaining necessary information from various state officials. As a result, the narratives underwent several revisions to incorporate up-to-date and reliable information. Now that so many other analyses, including the Election Day Survey, have been released, we were challenged by different interpretations of the same basic facts. But the reconciliation of interpretation and data collection has been invaluable in establishing rigor in our report.

Work Plan: We completed revisions of the narratives incorporating comments from the PRG.

PROVISIONAL VOTING STATISTICAL ANALYSIS

Description: Throughout September the Eagleton research team revised and clarified its statistical analysis, and worked to reconcile the classifications of this analysis (such as states counting only those provisional ballots cast within the proper precinct versus states that counted ballots cast within the proper county) with the classification made in other parts of this study or in other studies (such as the Election Day Study or Electionline reports).

Progress: In response to comments from the PRG, we have clarified and sharpened the presentation on the methods used and results achieved in the statistical analysis. We have double checked the classification of variables upon which the study is based and reconciled differences in various areas of the overall study. This effort is nearing completion.

Challenges: The difficulties encountered have been a result of communication delays and time constraints. Overall, these are not problems or hindrances, but simply slow down the process.

Work Plan: In mid-October we aim to complete a final revision of the statistical analysis and a full reconciliation of all data within the study.

SURVEY OF COUNTY ELECTION OFFICIALS

Description: The Eagleton Center for Public Interest Polling (CPIP) conducted a national survey of county election officials to measure several aspects of Provisional Voting.

Progress: The analysis of the survey results and findings report is complete. As a result of the critique by the PRG, the research team is revising and clarifying the descriptions of the survey design and sample selection process to make the research methods more transparent.

Work Plan: We used the information from the survey in drafting the analysis and alternatives document required under Task 3.5. We will include necessary clarifications regarding survey design and sample selection in the final analysis and alternatives document.

Peer Review Group

Most members of the PRG met by telephone conference on September 21 to comment on all the research described above. Participating in the meeting were Michael Alvarez, Martha Kropf, Dan Lowenstein, Peter Verniero, Brad Smith, and Tim Storey. Timothy O'Rourke contributed his comments separately. The group provided a detailed critique of our approach, methods, and conclusions, and we are now revising each document in response to the comments and suggestions. It praised the quality of the work and the rigor of much of the analysis. A summary of the suggestions from the members of the PRG is attached to this report.

Challenges and Work Plan

Making arrangements for review of drafts by the PRG and by the EAC has taken longer than anticipated by the Work Plan. The schedule called for all research and analysis to have been completed and incorporated into a Draft Preliminary Guidance Document by mid September. The review process by the EAC and PRG took longer than contemplated by the Work Plan. And we now understand that the EAC will make a separate decision --that will require additional time-- whether to issue a Guidance Document or recommendations for best practices. It has not, therefore, been possible to schedule a public hearing or arrange for review of our work by the EAC's advisory boards, as called for in the Work Plan. We now aim to complete our reports and recommendations for guidance by the end of October, and to then await a response from the EAC before scheduling submission to the advisory boards or making arrangements for a hearing.

VOTER IDENTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

The contract lists 7 tasks (3.10 – 3.16) related to Voter Identification Requirements. The research on Voter ID requirements is proceeding concurrently with our work on the experience of Provisional Voting, and is becoming the principal focus of our research.

Task 3.10: Legislation, regulations, and litigation

The research team at the Moritz College of Law has the lead responsibility for the collection and analysis of legislation, administrative procedures and litigation with regard to Voter Identification Requirements. This collection of material is nearing completion. It will constitute the compendium of legislation, administrative regulations, and case law called for under this task.

Description: The Moritz team has compiled statutes on Voter Identification, and will provide a summarized analysis of this research to the project team for review.

Progress: The 50 State (plus the District of Columbia) chart has been completed, the voter identification statutes have been collected for all states and D.C., and summaries of the existing voter identification statutes have been written for all states and D.C.

Challenges: Identifying the relevant statutes has been challenging because of the different terminology used from state to state to codify voter identification issues, and because many states have scattered election law provisions throughout their codes. This variety from state to state makes creating a snap-shot view across states a challenge.

Work Plan: Analysis of voter identification data will begin now.

SUPPLEMENTS TO LEGAL ANALYSIS

To supplement the legal analysis, the Eagleton team is undertaking two research efforts: First, compiling information on the debate over voter ID in the states; and second, estimating the effect on turnout of different voter ID regimes. Tracking the continuing political debate over voter identification reveals that the relatively narrow HAVA requirements for voter identification have apparently sparked in many states a broader concern and a sharp political debate over rigorous identification requirements for all voters. The research follows these developments both to monitor possible secondary effects of HAVA on voter ID, and to provide a rich collection of alternative approaches for consideration.

Individual narratives for the states with significant activity in voter ID will provide a resource for understanding the wide range of experience in the 2004 election. The narratives will include an appraisal of the prevalence and nature of vote fraud, a focus of the concern with increasing the rigor of voter ID requirements. We understand that the EAC has issued a research contract that will focus on vote fraud and vote suppression. Our research in this area will be limited to developing an understanding of the tradeoffs between ballot security and access to the ballot. We have completed the basic database on voter identification issues has been completed, and the next key step will be drafting the first narratives.

VOTER ID AND TURNOUT ANALYSIS

The second supplemental analysis will provide objective information on a contentious feature of the debate over voter ID in the states: the effects of more rigorous voter ID regimes on voter turnout and the relationship between the voter ID regime and vote fraud. As part of this effort, Eagleton is undertaking a statistical analysis to gauge the effect of a state's voter ID regime on turnout, especially turnout by minority and elderly voters.

Description: We have created a database and gathered statistics on the effects of state-level voter identification requirements on voter turnout at the county-level in the 2004 election.

Progress: The collection of data for the Voter ID-Turnout analysis is complete. The assembled database contains population demographic data, voter registration data and voter turnout data from all 50 states, 3113 Counties, and the District of Columbia. We have also utilized exit poll data collected on Election Day 2004 as a resource for understanding the demographics of voter turnout.

Challenges: The analysis of these data has been postponed until the data reconciliation of Provisional Voting is complete. The main challenge now is an issue of time management. As a result of the extensive revision and data reconciliation efforts aimed at the Provisional Voting section of our work VID has been temporarily placed on hold.

Work Plan: The analysis of the impact that voter identification requirements have upon voter turnout should be completed by early November.

PROJECT MANAGEMENT

PEER REVIEW GROUP

Description: A feature of our proposal was the creation of a PRG. It reviews our research and methodology and provides valuable feedback and suggestions for the direction of our work.

Progress: The research team held its first conference call with PRG members on September 19, 2005. The research team will hold a workshop meeting on October 19, 2005 to address the PRG's comments.

Challenges: To date we still have not heard back from two PRG Members.

Projections: Revisions and clarifications to our reports on Provisional Voting will be resolved by the end of October. We will need to schedule a second conference call to review our research with regard to Voter Identification Requirements in late November. As noted earlier, a summary of the comments we have received from the PRG is attached to this report.

COORDINATION AND INFORMATION MANAGEMENT

Collecting and merging information and data from myriad sources is a demanding requirement of this research. We have developed two principal mechanisms to facilitate the analysis of the material collected or created in the project: an information system and an internal website for easy access to drafts and reports.

INFORMATION SYSTEM

Description: The statutory data and reports prepared by the Moritz College of Law is being merged with the political and procedural data and analysis prepared by the Eagleton Institute of Politics to provide a cohesive final product to the EAC, which will include a compendium of case law and statutes regarding Provisional Voting and voter identification.

Progress: At this point in the research process, many documents are complete after a lengthy process of circulating drafts among team members. We have reorganized our system by separating final drafts from earlier versions of documents, discarding dated files contained in the Information System, and updating the system as a whole.

Projections: The entire project team continues to use the Information System which contains the above referenced research, in working toward the preparation for our final reports to the EAC.

INTRANET

Description: All project team members have signed on to the Intranet site. The Intranet facilitates the exchange of information and collaboration among project participants.

Progress: Project team members regularly post drafts, completed materials and spreadsheets online for internal review. The intranet has helped team members and serves as an internal website with announcements and important documents readily available to all team members.

FINANCIAL REPORT

The financial reporting for this project is supervised and prepared by the Division of Grant and Contract Accounting (DGCA) at Rutgers. Financial reporting on grant accounts is limited to actual expenses that have been incurred during the reporting period. Our contact at DGCA is: Constance Bornheimer, (732) 932-0165, EXT. 2235.

A detail of expenses incurred from project September 1- September 30, 2005, will be sent under separate cover to: Ms. Dianna Scott, Administrative Officer at the EAC.

R. Michael Alvarez was selected by Scientific American magazine to be on the 2004 "Scientific American 50" for his outstanding scientific and technological contributions to help improve the U.S. voting system. He has taught political science at Caltech since December 1992. He received his B.A. in political science in 1986 from Carleton College; he received his M.A. and Ph.D. from Duke University in 1990 and 1992, respectively. Alvarez was named an Associate Professor in April 1995, received tenure in June 1997, and was promoted to Professor in March 2002. Alvarez has focused most of his research and teaching on the study of electoral politics in the United States. His first book, Information and Elections, was published in the spring of 1997: This project examined the question of how much American voters know about presidential candidates and how they obtain that information. His second book, Hard Choices, Easy Answers (with John Brehm), is a study of American public opinion about divisive social and political issues. His recent book (published January 2004), Point, Click, and Vote: The Future of Internet Voting (with Thad E. Hall), published by Brookings Institution Press, examines the controversies swirling around the Internet voting in the United States. He has also published many articles on electoral behavior and public opinion in the United States and other advanced industrial democratic nations.

Alvarez has received a number of honors and grants for his work. He was named the "Emerging Scholar" by the American Political Science Association's Voting Behavior and Public Opinion Section in 2002. He was a John M. Olin Faculty Fellow (1994-95) as well as a John Randolph Haynes and Dora Haynes Faculty Fellow (1994, 1997, 1999, 2002). Alvarez received the Sprague Award with John Brehm for their work on public opinion, and the Durr Award with Jonathan Nagler for their work on modeling elections. Also, Alvarez has received financial support for his research from the National Science Foundation, The IBM Corporation, the Carnegie Corporation of New York, and the Knight Foundation. Alvarez edits the Analytical Methods for Social Research book series and is on the editorial boards of a number of academic journals: American Journal of Political Science, American Politics Quarterly, Election Law Journal, Political Behavior, The Journal of Politics and Political Research Quarterly. He was the editor of The Political Methodologist, 1993-96.

Professor Alvarez is Co-Director of the Caltech-MIT Voting Technology Project, researching technological solutions to electoral problems, and is the Principal Investigator of the "Secure Electronic Registration and Voting Experiment" Evaluation. He has been an expert witness in a series of recent court cases, including California's defense of the blanket primary (California Democratic Party v. Jones), Bradley v. Compton, and Cano v. Davis. He has testified before a number of organizations, including the U.S. Senate. He was an outside consultant for Knight Ridder on their 2000 Hispanic Voter Poll, and in 2004 is a consultant to Greenberg, Quinlan, Rosner Research Inc. in their research on the Hispanic electorate. Alvarez is a frequent guest on Pasadena's National Public Radio affiliate, KPCC-FM, and writes opinion pieces for local newspapers. He has been interviewed for National Public Radio, Jim Lehrer's NewsHour, CNN, ABC, NBC News, and for many state, national and international newspapers.

Daniel Hays Lowenstein
Professor of Law
Born New York, New York, 1943

A.B. Yale, 1964
LL.B. Harvard, 1967
UCLA Law faculty since 1979
lowenste@law.ucla.edu

Daniel Lowenstein teaches Election Law, Statutory Interpretation & Legislative Process, Political Theory, and Law & Literature. A leading expert on election law, he has represented members of the House of Representatives in litigation regarding reapportionment and the constitutionality of term limits. He is a member of the Board of Directors of the award-winning theatre troupe Interact and regularly brings the company to the School of Law to perform plays with legal themes, such as Sophocles' Antigone, Ibsen's Rosmerholm, and Wouk's The Caine Mutiny Court Martial.

Professor Lowenstein worked as a staff attorney at California Rural Legal Assistance for two and one-half years. While working for California's Secretary of State, Edmund G. Brown Jr. in 1971, he specialized in election law, and was the main drafter of the Political Reform Act, an initiative statute that California voters approved in 1974, thereby creating a new Fair Political Practices Commission. Governor Brown appointed Professor Lowenstein as first chairman of the Commission. He has served on the national governing board of Common Cause and has been a board member and a vice president of Americans for Nonsmokers' Rights.

Professor Lowenstein's textbook, Election Law (1995), appears to be the first text on American election law since 1877. He has written on such topics as campaign finance, redistricting, bribery, initiative elections, political parties, commercial speech, and The Merchant of Venice.

Professor Lowenstein represented certain plaintiffs in California ProLife Council PAC v. Scully, challenging California regulations of slate mail. Bradley A. Smith

Professor of Law

J.D., cum laude, Harvard Law School, 1990

One of the nation's leading authorities on Election Law and Campaign Finance, Professor Smith returns to Capital after five years in Washington, D.C., where he served as Commissioner, Vice Chairman, and Chairman of the Federal Election Commission (FEC). Nominated by President Clinton in February of 2000 to fill a Republican-designated seat on the Commission, Professor Smith was confirmed by the Senate in May of 2000 and took his seat the following month. Prior to his nomination, Smith had become a fixture in the national discussion on campaign finance, and was called "the most sought after witness" when Congress considered campaign finance issues. His writings have appeared in such academic journals as the Yale Law Journal, Georgetown Law Journal, and Pennsylvania Law Review, and in popular publications such as the Wall Street Journal, USA Today, and National Review. In 2001, Princeton University Press published his book, "Unfree Speech: The Folly of Campaign Finance Reform," which was praised by syndicated columnist George Will as "the year's most important book on governance." The Times of London called it "a much needed dose of realism which has relevance far beyond America," and Publishers Weekly described it as "a marvelous contrarian view: moderate in tone, elegant in language, clever in argument." Named FEC Chairman in January 2004, Professor Smith oversaw implementation of the McCain-Feingold campaign finance bill, and successfully fought to increase due process protections for defendants in FEC enforcement actions. Professor Smith has spoken at over 30 of the nation's law schools, including Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Stanford, Chicago, Michigan, and NYU. His many media credits include national appearances on ABC, NBC, PBS, Fox, CNBC, MSNBC, C-Span, and Bloomberg Media, including such programs as Hardball with Chris Matthews, and the O'Reilly Factor. He has also appeared on numerous local and national radio programs, and made television appearances in Great Britain, Japan, and Canada.

Prior to joining Capital's faculty in 1993, he served as United States Vice Consul in Ecuador, and worked as an attorney for the law firm of Vorys, Sater, Seymour and Pease. He has also taught law at George Mason University. Professor Smith was the first Director of Capital's summer study abroad program in Greece, and from 1994 to 2000 served as co-Director of Capital's National Moot Court team with Professor Jeffrey Ferriell, winning six regional championships in the National Appellate Advocacy Competition or National Moot Court Competition. His teaching has included Election Law, Civil Procedure, Law & Economics, Jurisprudence, and Administrative Law.

One of the nation's leading authorities on Election Law and Campaign Finance, Professor Smith returns to Capital after five years in Washington, D.C., where he served as Commissioner, Vice Chairman, and Chairman of the Federal Election Commission (FEC). Nominated by President Clinton in February of 2000 to fill a Republican-designated seat on the Commission, Professor Smith was confirmed by the Senate in May of 2000 and took his seat the following month. Prior to his nomination, Smith had become a fixture in the national discussion on campaign finance, and was called "the most sought after witness" when Congress considered campaign finance issues. His writings have appeared in such academic journals as the Yale Law Journal, Georgetown Law Journal, and Pennsylvania Law Review, and in popular publications such as the Wall Street Journal, USA Today, and National Review. In 2001, Princeton University Press published his book, "Unfree Speech: The Folly of Campaign Finance Reform," which was praised by syndicated columnist George Will as "the year's most important book on governance." The Times of London called it "a much needed dose of realism which has relevance far beyond America," and Publishers Weekly described it as "a marvelous contrarian view: moderate in tone, elegant in language, clever in argument." Named FEC Chairman in January 2004, Professor Smith oversaw implementation of the McCain-Feingold campaign finance bill, and successfully fought to increase due process protections for defendants in FEC enforcement actions. Professor Smith has spoken at over 30 of the nation's law schools, including Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Stanford, Chicago, Michigan, and NYU. His many media credits include national appearances on ABC, NBC, PBS, Fox, CNBC, MSNBC, C-Span, and Bloomberg Media, including such programs as Hardball with Chris Matthews, and the O'Reilly Factor. He has also appeared on numerous local and national radio programs, and made television appearances in Great Britain, Japan, and Canada.

Prior to joining Capital's faculty in 1993, he served as United States Vice Consul in Ecuador, and worked as an attorney for the law firm of Vorys, Sater, Seymour and Pease. He has also taught law at George Mason University. Professor Smith was the first Director of Capital's summer study abroad program in Greece, and from 1994 to 2000 served as co-Director of Capital's National Moot Court team with Professor Jeffrey Ferriell, winning six regional championships in the National Appellate Advocacy Competition or National Moot Court Competition. His teaching has included Election Law, Civil Procedure, Law & Economics, Jurisprudence, and Administrative Law.

Chairman Paul DeGregorio
Commissioner Donetta L. Davidson
Commissioner Gracia M. Hillman
United States Election Assistance Commission
1225 New York Avenue N.W., Suite - 1100
Washington, DC 20005
Fax: (202) 566-3127

Dear Commissioners:

Last month, People For the American Way launched a petition drive asking the Election Assistance Commission to release a report written months ago that reportedly pokes holes in the widespread myth that voter fraud is rampant in America. Allegations of voter fraud have led to restrictive voting requirements that we know disenfranchise eligible voters.

EAC Chairman Paul S. DeGregorio denied our request to make the taxpayer-funded findings available to the public in time for the mid-term elections earlier this month.

Over 12,000 People For the American Way members and activists across the country have signed our petition asking that the report be made available to the public. Any information that can help make our elections fair and open should be made available to the public. We need to solve the problems in our electoral system, not create new and unnecessary barriers to voting.

Sincerely,

Elliot Minberg
Legal Director, People For the American Way

November 27, 2006

Dear EAC Commissioners,

The report commissioned by the EAC and drafted by voting experts must be released to the public - with public hearings to follow.

In light of the disenfranchising legislation that is being passed to fix a problem that the report's researchers apparently found insignificant, it is unconscionable and undemocratic for you to keep these findings from the public.

Subject No Cost Extension Request

Karen - I am attaching a spreadsheet providing the information you have requested (Attachment 1), but I want to highlight a few points which may not be immediately self-evident.

First, the original budget (Attachment 2) we submitted to the EAC, dated March 22nd, did not itemize personnel expenses by each person. In addition, when we actually began work two months after submitting that budget, we decided to reallocate more time to people within Eagleton and hire fewer outside hourlies.

Second, in the figures I sent you in late December we tried to account for all the expenses and projections but overlooked a few things including neglecting to include the honoraria for our peer review team. Hence, the figures we're now sending are different than what I sent in December.

Lastly, we originally discussed a no-cost extension through February, but since we don't yet have the EAC comments on our draft Provisional Voting material nor an estimate of when they are likely to be ready, I think it is prudent to extend the no-cost extension through March 31st. We would still like to conclude by the end of February, but if you can approve the extension for another month we could avoid going through this process again if everything is not complete six weeks from now.

It is my understanding that Rutgers will soon be sending our December invoice. At this time, I would also like to request that we combine January and February an invoice the EAC once for that time period.

As you can see, we are currently projecting an ending balance of approximately $10,000. If additional expenses are incurred beyond what is currently projected, we're confident they will not exceed the original budget of $560,002.

Thanks and I look forward to hearing from you.

U.S. ELECTION ASSISTANCE COMMISSION
1225 New York Ave. NW - Suite 1100
Washington, DC 20005

January 9, 2005

MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD

Background

On May 24, 2005 the U.S. Election Assistance Commission awarded an eight month contract (December 30, 2005) in the amount of $560,002.00 to the Eagleton Institute of Politics (Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey) to provide research assistance to support development of guidelines on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification procedures.

Contractor's Request for a No-Cost Extension

On November 15, 2005, John Weingart, Associate Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics, requested via e-mail, a no-cost extension on this contract (E4014127). Mr. Weingart has requested an extension to complete the work of this contract to February 28, 2006.

In subsequent correspondence, Mr. Weingart notes the following as the reason for the request:

"The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October, voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting, based on Eagleton's research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication..... The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report of that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid-January".

"If EAC does not object, funds originally allocated for the hearings...(that EAC has determined will not take place)....would be available for transfer to support the additional staff and consultant time necessary to complete the work..." "The total project budget is $560,002. As of October 31st, the EAC has been invoiced for $259,081.79; the balance remaining is $300,920.21. We anticipate that the project will be complete and the balance of funds fully expended by February 28, 2006. The final invoice for the contract will be submitted to the EAC within 75 days of the close of the project".

Mr. Weingart further notes:

“We anticipate reallocating funds primarily from the public hearings line items and spending approximately $35,500 more than originally budgeted on personnel, $23,250 more on the subcontract with Ohio State and $20,250 more on consultants”.

Specifics of the Extension

The contractor has provided the following breakdown and explanation of the personnel and consultant costs, associated with this extension.

Original Project Personnel costs- $195,439 (May-December)

Original Project labor hours-xxxxx (May-December)

Projected Project Personnel costs -$253,915 (January-February)

Projected Project labor hours-xxxxx (January-February)

EAC Staff Recommendation

Karen Lynn-Dyson, the EAC's Contracting Officer Representative assigned to this contract has reviewed this request, the rationale and authority for it (FAR 43.103(a)(3)) and finds it to be appropriate. To-date the Eagleton Institute has consistently met its deadlines for major project deliverables and stayed within the project budget. To grant the Eagleton Institute a two month extension on this contract in order to obtain the necessary feedback on major documents it has produced will be within the best interests of the Election Assistance Commission, and thus, the federal government.

EAC's Contracting Officer Representative finds that to grant the Eagleton Institute a no-cost extension for the modification of its contract with the EAC is within the scope of the original agreement and is recommending that this modification to the contract be made.

Signed

Thanks for letting me know. This may well extend all the dates in the proposed revised schedule we sent accordingly. When do you think we will hear about the no-cost extension and budget reallocations? Thanks, John

Subject Re: No Cost Extension Request

Karen - Our request for a no-cost, reallocation of resources is based on (a) the fact that our personnel costs have already been higher than we anticipated and (b) the reality that keeping the project operating for at least nine months, instead of seven as planned, will require the participants to devote more time than anticipated. While we are not producing more product than originally promised, the time involved in our work continues to increase. Both Provisional Voting and Voter ID have proved to be very dynamic topics requiring us to continually monitor developments and update our data, analysis and evolving work products as we learn of new or revised information. As a result, despite the extension of the schedule, the staff and consultants on this project have had no "down" time. We anticipate this research, monitoring and revising to continue for the months added to the project, necessitating significantly more hours by all members of the project team than anticipated.

Our request asks for changes to three line items which I will address below on the assumption that the EAC response to our already-submitted Provisional Voting draft and to-be-submitted Voter ID draft will be sufficiently timely to enable us to complete our work on both topics by the end of February.

1. Eagleton Institute of Politics personnel: We originally budgeted $110,695 ($15,813 average per month) for Eagleton faculty, staff and graduate student assistants for the seven-month project from May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005. Our actual costs have been approximately $14,500 more than that. In addition, we are anticipating needing another $21,000 for personnel costs in January and February, calculated on the basis of 2/3 of the original monthly estimate. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $110,695 to approximately $146,000.

2. Consultant Services: We originally budgeted $79,500 ($11,357 average per month) for consultant services which we have used to engage Tom O'Neill as the project manager. We anticipate no additional cost for the original contract period of May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005, but do anticipate needing his services during January and February at a slightly reduced rate of $10,125 per month or $20,250 total additional. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $79,500 to $99,750.

3. Moritz School of Law: We originally budgeted $84,744 ($12,106 average per month) for staff and overhead for the May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005 period. We anticipate needing an additional $23,171 ($11,585 average per month) to support their time on this project in January and February. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $84,744 to $107,915.

With these revisions, approximately $22,000 of the EAC contract award to Eagleton would remain not yet allocated, primarily because the cost for the public hearings would have incurred Rutgers University overhead whereas the additional expenditures for consultants and the subcontract with Moritz do not.

I hope this provides you the information you need. While Rutgers is shutting down until January 3rd, I will be checking email at least every day or two.

Subject Re: Request for No-Cost Extension-corrected

Karen - At this time, we anticipate reallocating funds primarily from the public hearings line item and spending approximately $35,500 more than originally budgeted on personnel, $23,250 more on the subcontract with Ohio State and $20,250 more on consultants. There are other additional variances but they are not significant (e.g. less on honoraria, less on travel, and more on general operations such as phone expenses). Let me know if you need additional detail or information.

Thanks, John

MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD

Background

On May 24, 2005 the U.S. Election Assistance Commission awarded an eight month contract (December 30, 2005) in the amount of $560,002.00 to the Eagleton Institute of Politics (Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey) to provide research assistance to support development of guidelines on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification procedures.

Contractor's Request for a No-Cost Extension

On November 15, 2005, John Weingart, Associate Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics, requested via e-mail, a no-cost extension on this contract (E4014127). Mr. Weingart had requested an extension to complete the work of this contract to February 28, 2006.

In response to EAC's requests for additional information related to the no-cost extension, in a January 13, 2006 e-mail, Mr. Weingart revised the request for the extension to March 31, 2006. Mr. Weingart did note that he would still like to conclude the project's work by the end of February.

In various correspondences, Mr. Weingart notes the following reasons for the request:

"The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October, voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting, based on Eagleton's research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication..... The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report of that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid-January".

"Our request for a no-cost, reallocation of resources is based on (a) the fact that our personnel costs have already been higher than we anticipated and (b) the reality that keeping the project operating for at least nine months, instead of the seven as planned, will require the participants to devote more time than anticipated. While we are not producing more product than originally promised, the time involved in our work continues to increase... We anticipate this research monitoring and revising to continue for the months added to the project, necessitating significantly more hours by all members of the project team than anticipated”.

The contractor anticipates reallocating funds primarily from the public hearings line item ($81,120) and spending approximately $33,750 more than originally budgeted on personnel, $23,171 more on the subcontract with Ohio State and $20,250 more on consultants. The EAC elected to not hold public hearings on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification.

The contractor has provided the following breakdown and explanation of the personnel and consultant costs, associated with this extension.

2. Consultant Services:

3. Moritz School of Law personnel and overhead:

Revised costs- $107,915 (May-February)

EAC Staff Recommendation

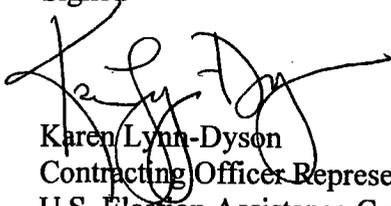

Karen Lynn-Dyson, the EAC's Contracting Officer Representative assigned to this contract has reviewed this request, the rationale and authority for it (FAR 43.103(a)(3)) and finds it to be appropriate. To date the Eagleton Institute has consistently met its deadlines for major project deliverables and stayed within the project's overall budget.

015947

Based upon the work products provided to the EAC, thus far, the additional personnel expenses which the contractor has incurred appear to be reasonable. To grant the Eagleton Institute a three-month extension on this contract in order to obtain the necessary feedback on major documents it has produced will be within the best interests of the Election Assistance Commission, and therefore, the federal government.

EAC's Contracting Officer Representative finds that to grant the Eagleton Institute a no-cost extension for the modification of its contract with the EAC is within the scope of the original agreement and is recommending that this modification to the contract be made.

Signed

MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD

Background

On May 24, 2005 the U.S. Election Assistance Commission awarded an eight month contract (December 30, 2005) in the amount of $560,002.00 to the Eagleton Institute of Politics (Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey) to provide research assistance to support development of guidelines on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification procedures.

Contractor's Request for a No-Cost Extension

On November 15, 2005, John Weingart, Associate Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics, requested via e-mail, a no-cost extension on this contract (E4014127). Mr. Weingart had requested an extension to complete the work of this contract to February 28, 2006.

In response to EAC's requests for additional information related to the no-cost extension, in a January 13, 2006 e-mail Mr Weingart revised the request for the extension to March 31, 2006. Mr. Weingart did note that he would still like to conclude the project's work by the end of February.

In various correspondence, Mr. Weingart notes the following reasons for the request:

"The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October, voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting, based on Eagleton's research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication..... The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report of that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid-January".

"Our request for a no-cost, reallocation of resources is based on (a) the fact that our personnel costs have already been higher than we anticipated and (b) the reality that keeping the project operating for at least nine months, instead of the seven as planned, will require the participants to devote more time than anticipated. While we are not producing more product than originally promised, the time involved in our work continues to increase... We anticipate this research monitoring and revising to continue for the months added to the project, necessitating significantly more hours by all members of the project team than anticipated”.

The contractor anticipates reallocating funds primarily from the public hearings line item ($81,120) and spending approximately $33,750 more than originally budgeted on personnel, $23,171 more on the subcontract with Ohio State and $20,250 more on consultants. The EAC elected to not hold public hearings on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification.

EAC Staff Recommendation

Karen Lynn-Dyson, the EAC's Contracting Officer Representative assigned to this contract has reviewed this request, the rationale and authority for it (FAR 43.103(a)(3)) and finds it to be appropriate. To date the Eagleton Institute has consistently met its deadlines for major project deliverables and stayed within the project's overall budget.

015956

Based upon the work products provided to the EAC, thus far, the additional personnel expenses which the contractor has incurred appear to be reasonable. To grant the Eagleton Institute a three month extension on this contract in order to obtain the necessary feedback on major documents it has produced will be within the best interests of the Election Assistance Commission, and therefore, the federal government.

EAC's Contracting Officer Representative finds that to grant the Eagleton Institute a no-cost extension for the modification of its contract with the EAC is within the scope of the original agreement and is recommending that this modification to the contract be made.

Subject No Cost Extensions (with extensions)

Karen - I am attaching a spreadsheet providing the information you have requested (Attachment 1), but I want to highlight a few points which may not be immediately self-evident.

First, the original budget (Attachment 2) we submitted to the EAC, dated March 22nd, did not itemize personnel expenses by each person. In addition, when we actually began work two months after submitting that budget, we decided to reallocate more time to people within Eagleton and hire fewer outside hourlies.

Second, in the figures I sent you in late December we tried to account for all the expenses and projections but overlooked a few things including neglecting to include the honoraria for our peer review team. Hence, the figures we're now sending are different than what I sent in December.

Lastly, we originally discussed a no-cost extension through February, but since we don't yet have the EAC comments on our draft Provisional Voting material nor an estimate of when they are likely to be ready, I think it is prudent to extend the no-cost extension through March 31st. We would still like to conclude by the end of February, but if you can approve the extension for another month we could avoid going through this process again if everything is not complete six weeks from now.

It is my understanding that Rutgers will soon be sending our December invoice. At this time, I would also like to request that we combine January and February an invoice the EAC once for that time period.

As you can see, we are currently projecting an ending balance of approximately $10,000. If additional expenses are incurred beyond what is currently projected, we're confident they will not exceed the original budget of $560,002.

Thanks and I look forward to hearing from you.

On May 24, 2005 the U.S. Election Assistance Commission awarded an eight month contract (December 30, 2005) in the amount of $560,002.00 to the Eagleton Institute of Politics (Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey) to provide research assistance to support development of guidelines on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification procedures.

Contractor's Request for a No-Cost Extension

On November 15, 2005, John Weingart, Associate Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics, requested via e-mail, a no-cost extension on this contract (E4014127). Mr. Weingart has requested an extension to complete the work of this contract to February 28, 2006.

Subject Re: No Cost Extension Request

Karen - Our request for a no-cost, reallocation of resources is based on (a) the fact that our personnel costs have already been higher than we anticipated and (b) the reality that keeping the project operating for at least nine months, instead of seven as planned, will require the participants to devote more time than anticipated. While we are not producing more product than originally promised, the time involved in our work continues to increase. Both Provisional Voting and Voter ID have proved to be very dynamic topics requiring us to continually monitor developments and update our data, analysis and evolving work products as we learn of new or revised information. As a result, despite the extension of the schedule, the staff and consultants on this project have had no "down" time. We anticipate this research, monitoring and revising to continue for the months added to the project, necessitating significantly more hours by all members of the project team than anticipated.

Our request asks for changes to three line items which I will address below on the assumption that the EAC response to our already-submitted Provisional Voting draft and to-be-submitted Voter ID draft will be sufficiently timely to enable us to complete our work on both topics by the end of February.

1. Eagleton Institute of Politics personnel: We originally budgeted $110,695 ($15,813 average per month) for Eagleton faculty, staff and graduate student assistants for the seven-month project from May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005. Our actual costs have been approximately $14,500 more than that. In addition, we are anticipating needing another $21,000 for personnel costs in January and February, calculated on the basis of 2/3 of the original monthly estimate. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $110,695 to approximately $146,000.

2. Consultant Services: We originally budgeted $79,50 ($11,357 average per month) for consultant services which we have used to engage Tom O'Neill as the project manager. We anticipate no additional cost for the original contract period of May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005, but do anticipate needing his services during January and February at a slightly reduced rate of $10,125 per month or $20,250 total additional. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $79,500 to $99,750.

3. Moritz School of Law: We originally budgeted $84,744 ($12,106 average per month) for staff and overhead for the May 24, 2005-December 31, 2005 period. We anticipate needing an additional $23,171 ($11,585 average per month) to support their time on this project in January and February. Therefore, we are asking to raise this line item from $84,744 to $107,915.

With these revisions, approximately $22,000 of the EAC contract award to Eagleton would remain not yet allocated, primarily because the cost for the public hearings would have incurred Rutgers University overhead whereas the additional expenditures for consultants and the subcontract with Moritz do not.

I hope this provides you the information you need. While Rutgers is Karen - At this time, we anticipate reallocating funds primarily from the public hearings line item and spending approximately $35,500 more than originally budgeted on personnel, $23,250 more on the subcontract with Ohio State and $20,250 more on consultants. There are other additional variances but they are not significant (e.g. less on honoraria, less on travel, and more on general operations such as phone expenses). Let me know if you need additional detail or information.

Hi Karen - Do you think we can get approval of our no-cost extension request this week? We really need it for the Rutgers administrative processes since, from their point of view, the project concluded on December 31st. Thanks, John

Karen,

I have looked into the matter noted below. Bottom line is that you are looking to make a number of changes to this contract:

1. Drop two requirements (public hearings)
2. Add labor hours
3. change date the deliverables are due.

The result is a change which increases the cost of the contract but does not exceed the contractually set ceiling. My review of fiscal law in this area has led me to conclude that this modification may be made using the FY 05 funds originally obligated to the contract. (see 61 Comp. Gen. 609 (1982) & 65 Comp. Gen. 741 (1986)). However, if the labor costs exceed the original contractual ceiling, FY 06 will have to be used as the modification did not constitute an antecedent liability (i.e. once the total value of this time and materials contract was reached neither party had any further obligation or liability and therefore the modification will be a new agreement).

Given the above, your modification memo and the form must reflect the 3 changes noted above. It must contain an analysis of the additional cost specifically justifying the amount and reasons for this modification (this is required by the FAR). See the FAR and form instructions for guidance on the Mod form.

I am somewhat concerned about the limited explanation below. If he wants additional labor hours (and labor dollars) he should be able to provide the labor hours (and frankly, rates) needed to complete the task just like I presume he did for the initial contract. The general numbers he provides below are not specific enough for my taste. We need to make sure we are being charged the same rates as in the original contract and that the number of labor hours the contractor expects to expend are appropriate. Also, I am still not sure from the below why the original estimates were off. You are going to have to justify for the commission the additional payments (ultimately signed by both you and the chair). The bottom line is that you will want enough information so that you are confident in making this call. One tact would be to look at the previous labor expenditures in connection with the work done to get a sense of whether the labor amounts set for the amendment are justifiable. (I assume we have his previous invoices stating expended hours.)

Let me know if you have any questions.

EAGLETON INSTITUTE OF POLITICS

Request to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission for a No-Cost Extension and Reallocation of Funds

November 30, 2005

Why we need a no -cost extension

The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting based on our research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication. The draft was complete in August, but the EAC's schedule did not permit us to brief the commissioners and staff until early September. We did not receive EAC comments until October, making it impossible to complete the work on the original schedule. Taking account of those comments and guidance from EAC required several weeks. The EAC did not receive our final draft report and recommendations for best practices until late November. We are now awaiting the EAC's comments on that final draft, which we have been told to expect in January.

The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report on that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid January.

Because the EAC has decided to issue recommendations for best practices on these topics, rather than voluntary guidance, we will finish the work within two months of the original completion date since the adoption process will be shorter. Note that meeting this schedule is dependent on the time needed by the EAC to review our work.

This extension will entail additional personnel time but, since no public hearings on "best practices" are required, if the EAC does not object, funds originally allocated for the hearings would be available for transfer to support the additional staff and consultant time necessary to complete the work.

When will work be completed and funds fully expended?

As shown on the attached schedule, work on this contract will be completed in three phases. The EAC will receive our final report and recommendations for best practices in provisional voting during the week of January 23, 2006 (assuming that we receive the EAC's comments on the draft report submitted on November 28 by January 9).

We will submit our draft report, alternative approaches, and compendium of statutes, regulations, and litigation on Voter Identification Issues during the week of January 16, 2006. If the EAC is able to return comments to us no later than the week of January 30, we will have submit the final report and recommendations for best practices on Voter Identification to the EAC during the week of February 13.

The total project budget is $560,002. As of October 31st, the EAC has been invoiced for $259,081.79; the balance remaining is $399,920.21. We anticipate that the project will be complete and the balance of funds fully expended by February 28, 2006. The final invoice for the contract will be submitted to the EAC within 75 days of the close of the project.

Re: No-Cost Extension to contract number E4014127 with the Eagleton
Institute of Politics at Rutgers University

Background:

Contract E4014127 with the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University (“contractor”) was originally scheduled to be concluded on March 31, 2006. The contract’s final products include a report on Voter Identification and a report on Provisional Voting. The contractor has vetted the reports with a Peer Review Group, pursuant to the terms of the contract.

Justification for No-Cost Extension:

The EAC wishes to supplement the contractor’s Peer Review of the reports by adding another review process with some of the EAC’s key stakeholders. The EAC proposes to assemble a panel of researchers during the week of May 8th to conduct the second review.

Following the second review, the contractor will revise its draft reports based on the comments it receives. The contractor will present its draft reports on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification to the EAC Advisory Board at its May 25th meeting in Washington, DC. The contractor will revise both draft reports, taking into account the EAC’s Advisory Board’s comments and submit the final reports to the EAC toward the end of June.

Recommendation:

The EAC recommends that contract E4014127 be modified at no cost to allow the contractor to complete their work by June 30, 2006.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD

On May 24, 2005 the U.S. Election Assistance Commission awarded an eight month contract (December 30, 2005) in the amount of $560,002.00 to the Eagleton Institute of Politics (Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey) to provide research assistance to support development of guidelines on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification procedures.

On November 15, 2005, John Weingart, Associate Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics, requested via e-mail, a no-cost extension on this contract (E4014127). Mr. Weingart has requested an extension to complete the work of this contract to February 28, 2006.

In subsequent correspondence, Mr. Weingart notes the following as the reason for the request:

“The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October, voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting, based on Eagleton’s research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication..... The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report of that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid-January”.

He further notes:

“If EAC does not object, funds originally allocated for the hearings would be available for transfer to support the additional staff and consultant time necessary to complete the work...“The total project budget is $560,002. As of October 31st, the EAC has been invoiced for $259,081.79; the balance remaining is $300,920.21. We anticipate that the project will be complete and the balance of funds fully expended by February 28, 2006. The final invoice for the contract will be submitted to the EAC within 75 days of the close of the project”.

Karen Lynn-Dyson, the EAC's Contracting Officer Representative assigned to this contract has reviewed this request, the rationale and authority for it (FAR 43.103(a)(3)) and finds it to be appropriate. To-date the Eagleton Institute has consistently met its deadlines for major project deliverables and stayed within the project budget. To grant the Eagleton Institute a two month extension on this contract in order to obtain the necessary feedback on major documents it has produced will be within the best interests of the Election Assistance Commission, and thus, the federal government.

EAC's Contracting Officer Representative finds that to grant the Eagleton Institute a no-cost extension for the modification of its contract with the EAC is within the scope of the original agreement and is recommending that this modification to the contract be made.

Subject Re: No Cost Extension Request

Karen,

I have looked into the matter noted below. Bottom line is that you are looking to make a number of changes to this contract:

1. Drop two requirements (public hearings)
2. Add labor hours
3. change date the deliverables are due.

The result is a change which increases the cost of the contract but does not exceed the contractually set ceiling. My review of fiscal law in this area has led me to conclude that this modification may be made using the FY 05 funds originally obligated to the contract. (see 61 Comp. Gen. 609 (1982) & 65 Comp. Gen. 741 (1986)). However, if the labor costs exceed the original contractual ceiling, FY 06 will have to be used as the modification did not constitute an antecedent liability (i.e. once the total value of this time and materials contract was reached neither party had any further obligation or liability and therefore the modification will be a new agreement).

Given the above, your modification memo and the form must reflect the 3 changes noted above. It must contain an analysis of the additional cost specifically justifying the amount and reasons for this modification (this is required by the FAR). See the FAR and form instructions for guidance on the Mod form.

I am somewhat concerned about the limited explanation below. If he wants additional labor hours (and labor dollars) he should be able to provide the labor hours (and frankly, rates) needed to complete the task just like I presume he did for the initial contract. The general numbers he provides below are not specific enough for my taste. We need to make sure we are being charged the same rates as in the original contract and that the number of labor hours the contractor expects to expend are appropriate. Also, I am still not sure from the below why the original estimates were off. You are going to have to justify for the commission the additional payments (ultimately signed by both you and the chair). The bottom line is that you will want enough information so that you are confident in making this call. One tact would be to look at the previous labor expenditures in connection with the work done to get a sense of whether the labor amounts set for the amendment are justifiable. (I assume we have his previous invoices stating expended hours.)

Let me know if you have any questions.

To clarify your phone message, do you need us to provide the number of hours for each staff person and consultant going forward from January 1st onward or going back to the start of the project?

MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD

On May 24, 2005 the U.S. Election Assistance Commission awarded an eight month contract (December 30, 2005) in the amount of $560,002.00 to the Eagleton Institute of Politics (Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey) to provide research assistance to support development of guidelines on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification procedures.

On November 15, 2005, John Weingart, Associate Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics, requested via e-mail, a no-cost extension on this contract (E4014127). Mr. Weingart has requested an extension to complete the work of this contract to February 28, 2006.

In subsequent correspondence, Mr. Weingart notes the following as the reason for the request:

“The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October, voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting, based on Eagleton’s research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication..... EAGLETON INSTITUTE OF POLITICS

Request to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission for a No-Cost Extension and Reallocation of Funds

November 30, 2005

Why we need a no -cost extension

The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting based on our research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication. The draft was complete in August, but the EAC's schedule did not permit us to brief the commissioners and staff until early September. We did not receive EAC comments until October, making it impossible to complete the work on the original schedule. Taking account of those comments and guidance from EAC required several weeks. The EAC did not receive our final draft report and recommendations for best practices until late November. We are now awaiting the EAC's comments on that final draft, which we have been told to expect in January.

The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report on that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid January.

Because the EAC has decided to issue recommendations for best practices on these topics, rather than voluntary guidance, we will finish the work within two months of the original completion date since the adoption process will be shorter. Note that meeting this schedule is dependent on the time needed by the EAC to review our work.

This extension will entail additional personnel time but, since no public hearings on "best practices" are required, if the EAC does not object, funds originally allocated for the hearings would be available for transfer to support the additional staff and consultant time necessary to complete the work.

When will work be completed and funds fully expended?

As shown on the attached schedule, work on this contract will be completed in three phases. The EAC will receive our final report and recommendations for best practices in provisional voting during the week of January 23, 2006 (assuming that we receive the EAC's comments on the draft report submitted on November 28 by January 9).

We will submit our draft report, alternative approaches, and compendium of statutes, regulations, and litigation on Voter Identification Issues during the week of January 16, 2006. If the EAC is able to return comments to us no later than the week of January 30, we will have submit the final report and recommendations for best practices on Voter Identification to the EAC during the week of February 13.

The total project budget is $560,002. As of October 31st, the EAC has been invoiced for $259,081.79; the balance remaining is $399,920.21. We anticipate that the project will be complete and the balance of funds fully expended by February 28, 2006. The final invoice for the contract will be submitted to the EAC within 75 days of the close of the project.

Dear Mr. Osterhage:

Enclosed is a signed contract in the amount of $560,002.00 for the provision of research assistance to the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) for the development of voluntary guidance on provisional voting and voter identification procedures. The EAC has accepted the basic proposal submitted by the Eagleton Institute of Politics and has also elected to include the optional survey of local election officials. This proposal was evaluated as providing the best value to the government through a competitive source selection process. The proposal is incorporated by reference into the contract.

The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) was created by the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) and is charged with assisting the States in meeting the election reform requirements mandated by this legislation. One of the EAC's principal tasks is to provide guidance to the States on the interpretation of HAVA and its requirements. The provisional voting and voter identification effort that will be supported by this contract is a major element of EAC's Fiscal Year 2005 research agenda. The objective of this work is to develop guidance on these topics that States can utilize in the 2006 election cycle.

To acknowledge your receipt and acceptance of this contract, please countersign and date below and return one copy of this letter to the attention of Carol A. Paquette, Interim Executive Director.

We look forward to working with Rutgers University and the Eagleton Institute on this very important research effort.

Sincerely,

Gracia Hillman, Chair

MEMORANDUM

April 29, 2005

TO: EAC Commissioners

FROM: Carol A. Paquette, Interim Executive Director CP

SUBJECT: Award of Contract for RFP-05-01, Request for Proposals for Research Assistance for the U.S. Election Assistance Commission to Support the Development of Voluntary Guidance on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification Procedures

Sec. 302 (a) of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires that all states allow the casting of provisional ballots in instances where a voter declares his/her eligibility to vote but his/her names does not appear on the official list of eligible voters, or an election official asserts that a voter is not eligible to vote. In addition, Sec. 303(B) provides for provisional ballot fail-safe voting for first time voters who do not provide appropriate identification at the time of voting. The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) seeks to examine how provisional voting was implemented in the 2004 election cycle and to prepare guidance on this topic for the 2006 election.

HAVA Sec. 303 (b) mandates that first time voters who register by mail are required to show proof of identify before being allowed to cast a ballot. The EAC seeks to examine how these voter identification requirements were implemented in the 2004 election cycle and to prepare guidance on this topic for the 2006 elections.

As noted above, one of the remedies for a voter not having an acceptable proof of identity is to allow the voter to cast a provisional ballot, either at the polling place or by mail. This linkage between the rights and responsibilities of the voter provides a rationale for conducting research on these topics in parallel. However, separate guidance documents on each of these topics will be developed.

The EAC issued a Request for Proposal (RFP -05-01) to obtain research assistance to support the EAC in its development of this guidance. Six proposals were received and reviewed by a Source Selection Board (SSB) comprised of EAC staff and an election administration expert.

Three of the proposals did not conform to the proposal instructions in some significant manner and were eliminated without detailed assessment. One proposal addressed only the provisional voting portion of the work and did not discuss the voter identification portion, except for holding a public hearing. They proposed doing an analysis of only 6-10 States rather than all States as the Statement of Work required. Another proposal was submitted by a company with no prior experience in conducting public policy research, nor did any of the proposed personnel have any experience with election administration, public policy research, or legal research. Their methodology consisted almost entirely of repeating the Statement of Work provisions and asserting they would do this work, but with no explanation of how. The third proposal discussed data collection activities very generically, but did not address how the information collected would be analyzed. There was no mention of doing legislative and litigation analysis, nor did any of the proposed personnel have appropriate qualifications or experience in this area.

The SSB assessed the remaining three proposals using the attached Technical Evaluation Criteria that were defined and assigned possible point values prior to reading any of the proposals. These proposals received average ratings of 44, 45, and 78, out of a possible 100. Cost proposals were reviewed only by the EAC members of the SSB. The associated cost proposals were respectively $708,730; $148,500; and $560,002. Reference checks on the highest rated bidder were consistently favorable regarding the excellent quality of their work and their performance on time and within budget.

RECOMMENDATION:

Approve the award of a contract for RFP-05-01 to the highest rated bidder, Eagleton Institute of Politics, Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey, in the amount of $560,002. Eagleton Institute has formed a consortium with the Moritz College of Law, The Ohio State University, to perform this work in support of the EAC.

CONTRACT TO PROVIDE RESEARCH ASSISTANCE TO THE EAC FOR THE DEVELOPMENT OF VOLUNTARY GUIDANCE ON PROVISIONAL VOTING AND VOTER IDENTIFICATION PROCEDURES

0.0 Background: Sec. 302(a) of HAVA requires that all States allow the casting of provisional ballots in instances where a voter declares their eligibility to vote but their name does not appear on the official list of eligible voters, or an election official asserts that a voter is not eligible to vote. This section describes several requirements for implementation of provisional voting, but the States have considerable latitude in specifying how to carry out these requirements. The EAC seeks to examine how provisional voting was implemented in the 2004 general election and to prepare guidance for the States on this topic for the 2006 Federal elections.

HAVA Sec. 303(b) mandates that first time voters who register by mail are required to show proof of identity before being allowed to cast a ballot. The law prescribes certain requirements concerning this section, but also leaves considerable discretion to the States for its implementation. The EAC seeks to examine how these voter identification requirements were implemented in the 2004 elections and to prepare guidance on this topic for the 2006 elections.

One of the remedies for a voter not having an acceptable proof of identity is to allow the voter to cast a provisional ballot, either at the polling place or by mail. This linkage between these two HAVA sections provides a rationale for conducting research on these topics in parallel. However, it is anticipated that two separate guidance documents will result.

1.0 Objective: The objective of this contract is for EAC to obtain assistance with the collection, analysis and interpretation of information regarding HAVA provisional voting and voter identification requirements for the purpose of drafting guidance on these topics in time for implementation for the 2006 Federal elections. The anticipated outcome of this activity is the generation of concrete policy recommendations to be issued as voluntary guidance for States.

2.0 Scope: In general the Contractor shall be responsible for all research and analysis activities, including the conduct of public hearings for fact finding and public comment purposes. However, in light of the need to get started on this work, the EAC conducted a public hearing on provisional voting on February 23, 2005.

An initial framework for provisional voting policy has been set by the court decisions rendered on the election procedures utilized in the 2004 election. The 6th Circuit decision, in particular, has drawn some boundaries which must be given due regard in the course of considering future policy alternatives for provisional voting.

Notice of public meetings and hearings is required to be published in the Federal Register. The Contractor shall be responsible for preparing the notice documents, and the EAC will submit the notices and cover the cost of publication. In addition, draft guidance documents must be published in the Federal Register to obtain public comment prior to their adoption. Again, the Contractor will work with the EAC to prepare the draft documents for publication, which the EAC will submit and pay for the cost of publication. Comments received will be provided to the Contractor for analysis and incorporation into the final guidance documents, as appropriate.

3.0 Specific Tasks

For ease of reference, following task 3.3 the remaining tasks are listed separately under the headings of Provisional Voting and Voter Identification Requirements. It is anticipated that the work on these two topics will be conducted essentially concurrently.

- 3.1 Update the project work plan, as required. The Contractor shall update and deliver the Project Plan not later than 10 days after contract award. This plan shall describe how the Contractor will accomplish each of the project tasks, including a timeline indicating major milestones. A single document will be prepared to include both provisional voting and voter identification tasks. The updated Project Plan shall be formally briefed to the EAC Project Manager and lead Commissioner.
- 3.2 Submit monthly progress reports. The Contractor shall submit a monthly progress report within 2 weeks of the end of each month. This report shall provide a brief summary of activities performed and indicate progress against the timeline provided in the Project Plan. Any issues that could adversely affect schedule should be identified for resolution. Budget status shall also be provided.
- 3.3 Conduct periodic briefings for the EAC. The Contractor shall periodically meet with the EAC Project Manager and the lead Commissioner for this work to discuss research findings and progress. The Project Plan should make allowance for this activity. The number and frequency of briefings will be determined by the Contractor Project Manager and the EAC Project Manager as the work progresses. The Contractor may also be required to periodically brief the full Commission on their work.

Provisional Voting

- 3.4 Collect and analyze State legislation, administrative procedures, and court cases. An understanding of the disparities and similarities of how provisional voting was implemented around the country will provide a baseline for the consideration of future approaches. Seventeen States never had provisional voting before HAVA was enacted, while many other States did. A State-by-State compendium of the legislation, procedures, and litigation reviewed shall be delivered along with the analysis results.

Topics of particular interest include the following:

- How did States prepare for the onset of the HAVA provisional ballot requirement?
 - How did this vary between States that had previously had some form of provisional ballots and those that did not?
 - How did litigation affect the implementation?
 - How effective was provisional voting in enfranchising qualified voters?
 - Did State and local processes provide for consistent counting of provisional ballots?
 - Did local election officials have a clear understanding of how to implement provisional voting?
- 3.5 Recommend alternative approaches for future implementation of provisional voting. The Contractor shall conduct a literature review to identify other research results and data available on this topic. The EAC Election Day Survey, for example, contained several questions on provisional voting. The EAC will make these survey data available to the Contractor. Based on their analysis of available research and the results of Task 4.5, the Contractor shall diagnose the problems and challenges of provisional voting implementation and hypothesize alternative approaches.

The Contractor shall assess the efficacy of these alternatives in relation to the following inter-related policy objectives: (1) enabling the maximum number of eligible voters to cast ballots that will be counted; (2) providing procedural simplicity for voters, poll workers, and election officials; (3) minimizing opportunity for voter fraud; and (4) maintaining a reasonable workload for election officials and poll workers. Additional policy considerations may be identified in the course of this research effort. The Contractor shall document and brief these alternatives to the Commission.

- 3.6 Prepare preliminary draft guidance document. Based on the feedback received from the Commission, the Contractor shall prepare a draft guidance document for review and comment by the EAC Board of Advisors and Standards Board. EAC will convene a meeting or teleconference of the Boards for the discussion of this document. The Contractor shall provide the document in advance and participate in the meeting to answer questions and record comments.

- 3.7 Revise draft guidance for publication in the Federal Register. The Contractor shall revise the guidance document as appropriate to reflect the comments of the EAC, the Board of Advisors and the Standards Board and prepare the draft guidance for publication in the Federal Register by the EAC.
- 3.8 Arrange one public hearing for receiving public comment on draft guidance. This hearing should be scheduled 30 days after the initial publication date. The Contractor shall select the location in consultation with the EAC. EAC will handle publicity for the meeting.
- 3.9 Prepare final guidance document for EAC adoption. Review all comments received in response to Federal Register publication and at public hearing and revise guidance document as appropriate. Provide final version to EAC for adoption.

Voter Identification Requirements

- 3.10 Collect and analyze State legislation, administrative procedures, and court cases. It is assumed that the collection of information for analysis of voter identification requirements will be performed concurrently with the research for Task 4.5. An understanding of the disparities and similarities of how voter identification requirements were implemented around the country will provide a baseline for the consideration of future approaches. A State-by-State compendium of the legislation, procedures, and litigation reviewed shall be delivered along with the analysis results.
- 3.11 Convene a half day public hearing on the topic of voter identification requirements. This hearing should occur early in the research process as an informational hearing where all points of view on this topic can be aired. The Contractor shall be responsible for all aspects of planning and conducting this hearing in consultation with the EAC. The Contractor shall identify three panels of three to four speakers each. The Contractor shall arrange for speaker attendance to include travel and per diem expenses. The EAC will provide publicity for the hearing. The Contractor shall prepare a document summarizing the proceedings and containing all testimony provided.
- 3.12 Recommend alternative approaches for future implementation of HAVA voter identification requirements. The Contractor shall conduct a literature review to identify other research results and data available on this topic. Based on their analysis of available research and the results of Task 4.11, the Contractor shall diagnose the problems and challenges of voter identification and hypothesize alternative approaches. The Contractor shall coordinate with the EAC to identify appropriate policy objectives by which to assess these alternatives. The Contractor shall document and brief these alternatives to the Commission.

- 3.13 Prepare preliminary draft guidance document. Based on the feedback received from the Commission, the Contractor shall prepare a draft guidance document for review and comment by the EAC Board of Advisors and Standards Board. EAC will convene a meeting or teleconference of the Boards for the discussion of this document. The Contractor shall provide the document in advance and participate in the Board meeting to answer questions and record comments.
 - 3.14 Revise draft guidance for publication in the Federal Register. The Contractor shall revise the guidance document as appropriate to reflect the comments of the EAC, the Board of Advisors and the Standards Board and prepare the draft guidance for publication in the Federal Register by the EAC.
 - 3.15 Arrange a second public hearing for receiving public comment on the draft guidance. This hearing should be scheduled 30 days after the initial publication date. The Contractor shall select the location in consultation with the EAC. EAC will handle publicity for the hearing.
 - 3.16 Prepare final guidance document for EAC adoption. Review all comments received in response to Federal Register publication and at public hearing and revise guidance document as appropriate. Provide final version to EAC for adoption.
- 4.0 Contract Type. The contract type will be Time and Materials in the amount of $560,002.00.
 - 5.0 Place of performance. The principal place of performance will be the Contractor's place of business. Meetings and occasional work efforts may be performed at the EAC offices. Some travel will be required.

Subject No-Cost Extension Request

Karen - We are requesting a no-cost extension on the EAC contract to the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University to have the contract's concluding date move from March 31, 2006 to June 30, 2006. As I indicated earlier, it would be very helpful if we could receive approval of this request no later than April 28th.

This extension is necessary to enable the following activities:

1. The EAC has informed us that it will assemble a panel of researchers the week of May 8th to review the Eagleton/Moritz draft background report on Voter Identification. The EAC wishes to supplement the review of this draft already conducted by the Peer Review Group called for in the contract. The Eagleton/Moritz research team, as well as at least some of the Peer Review Group will participate in the conference call or meeting of the EAC's reviewers;
2. Eagleton/Moritz will revise the draft Voter Identification report based upon comments made by the two sets of reviewers, and distribute the revised report to the EAC and its Advisory Board in mid-May.
3. Eagleton/Moritz will present its draft reports on Provisional Voting and Voter Identification to the EAC Advisory Board at its May 25th meeting in Washington, D.C.;
4. Eagleton/Moritz will revise both draft reports to take into account comments made by the EAC Advisory Board, and submit printed final reports to the EAC before June 23rd. Eagleton/Moritz will also prepare a PowerPoint presentation for both reports.
5. Eagleton/Moritz will present both reports at the EAC public meeting in Washington, D.C. on June 23rd, thus concluding its work under this contract.

Please let me know if you need any additional information.

Thanks,

John

Subject Re:

Glad to help. I don't want to step on toes, but I'd recommend that you think about some sort of single-blind peer review, of the sort that is employed by many research journals and other organizations (like the NSF or National Academies of Science). I think that if you offer them a modest honoraria (perhaps $100) I think you'll find that the folks on that list would be likely to provide quick and thorough feedback to you.

Again, let me know if there is more that I can do to help.

I'm also willing to do a review for you myself. The issue is that I feel somewhat conflicted, given that I'm on their "peer review" panel. But on the other hand that does mean that I'm very well aware of the background of this project. I'd leave it up to you as to whether you think that a review from me would be appropriate or not.

Mike

Unless otherwise specified in this contract, payment shall be made on partial deliveries accepted by the Government if: (a) The amount due on the deliveries warrants it; or (b) The Contractor requests it and the amount due on the deliveries is at least $1,000 or 50 percent of the total contract price.

52.232-8 DISCOUNTS FOR PROMPT PAYMENT (APR 1989)

(a) Discounts for prompt payment will not be considered in the evaluation of offers. As an alternative to offering a prompt payment discount in conjunction with the offer, offerors awarded contracts may include prompt payment discounts on individual invoices.

(b) In connection with any discount offered for prompt payment, time shall be computed from the date of the invoice. For the purpose of computing the discount earned, payment shall be considered to have been made on the date which appears on the payment check or the date on which an electronic funds transfer was made.

U.S. ELECTION ASSISTANCE COMMISSION
1225 New York Ave. NW - Suite 1100
Washington, DC 20005

January 24, 2005

MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD

Background

On May 24, 2005 the U.S. Election Assistance Commission awarded an eight month contract (December 30, 2005) in the amount of $560,002.00 to the Eagleton Institute of Politics (Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey) to provide research assistance to support development of guidelines on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification procedures.

Contractor's Request for a No-Cost Extension

On November 15, 2005, John Weingart, Associate Director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics, requested via e-mail, a no-cost extension on this contract (E4014127). Mr. Weingart had requested an extension to complete the work of this contract to February 28, 2006.

In response to EAC's requests for additional information related to the no-cost extension, in a January 13, 2006 e-mail, Mr. Weingart revised the request for the extension to March 31, 2006. Mr. Weingart did note that he would still like to conclude the project's work by the end of February.

In various correspondences, Mr. Weingart notes the following reasons for the request:

"The original work schedule called for EAC to publish in mid-October, voluntary guidance and/or recommended best practices for provisional voting, based on Eagleton's research. In making that time estimate, we did not provide sufficient time for the EAC to review and consider the draft reports that would form the basis for that publication..... The additional time required to complete the work on provisional voting has delayed the completion of our analysis of Voter Identification issues. The draft report of that topic will be submitted to the EAC in mid-January".

"Our request for a no-cost, reallocation of resources is based on (a) the fact that our personnel costs have already been higher than we anticipated and (b) the reality that keeping the project operating for at least nine months, instead of the seven as planned, will require the participants to devote more time than anticipated. While we are not producing more product than originally promised, the time involved in our work continues to increase... We anticipate this research monitoring and revising to continue for the months added to the project, necessitating significantly more hours by all members of the project team than anticipated”.

The contractor anticipates reallocating funds primarily from the public hearings line item ($81,120) and spending approximately $33,750 more than originally budgeted on personnel, $23,171 more on the subcontract with Ohio State and $20,250 more on consultants. The EAC elected to not hold public hearings on the topics of provisional voting and voter identification.

Specifics of the Extension

EAC Staff Recommendation

Karen Lynn-Dyson, the EAC's Contracting Officer Representative assigned to this contract has reviewed this request, the rationale and authority for it (FAR 43.103(a)(3)) and finds it to be appropriate. To date the Eagleton Institute has consistently met its deadlines for major project deliverables and stayed within the project's overall budget.

Based upon the work products provided to the EAC, thus far, the additional personnel expenses which the contractor has incurred appear to be reasonable. To grant the Eagleton Institute a three-month extension on this contract in order to obtain the necessary feedback on major documents it has produced will be within the best interests of the Election Assistance Commission, and therefore, the federal government.

EAC's Contracting Officer Representative finds that to grant the Eagleton Institute a no-cost extension for the modification of its contract with the EAC is within the scope of the original agreement and is recommending that this modification to the contract be made.

Signed

Karen Lynn-Dyson
Contracting Officer Representative

Tova-

The contracts are completed, although not formally signed by the Chair of the Commission (a formality)

As discussed, the contract will be for six months-September 26- February 28 for a fixed contract fee of $50,000 plus and additional $5,000 for expenses.

$10,000 has been set aside in the FY 05 EAC budget to cover working group costs.

Gavin Gilmour will be the EAC staff project manager, to whom you and Job will be reporting.

Gavin should be in touch in the next day or so, with more details and specifics related to getting the project started.

Thanks

Hi Karen and Nicole,

I know you guys have been swamped, but I wanted to check in because I haven't heard from you and I am getting all sorts of information from Job, second hand. I would rather not operate that way. Is it the case that the contracts have been finalized? Can you give me a hint about the terms? When might I be seeing a copy? Thanks so much.

Subject Voter Fraud Project Team Update

Steve, Tova and Job,

We at the EAC are sorry to hear that Steve will need to withdraw from the Voter Fraud project but understand that he is doing what he feels is in the best interest of himself and his colleague.

Karen has asked me to let you know that she and Tom will meet at some juncture today to discuss further strategy of this project. They have asked me to ensure both Tova and Job that this change in the team will in no way change the EAC's commitment to this project or to the two of you. We will be back in touch with you in the next two days with further information on contracting and pay as well as other aspects of the project.

Thanks so much.

Carol,

There is a mechanism in place which could have obligated the $10,000. Since the end of August, I have been sending out to all personnel those "End of Fiscal Year 05" reminder emails which spell out that folks should advise me of any "expected expenditures" to be paid from FY05 funds. It cannot be obligated if I am not advise of it.

Karen, Peg -

This is to confirm that the $10,000 for the meeting was not obligated because there was no mechanism to do so (e.g., no contract vehicle). However, it is my understanding from Julie and Tom that OMB said we could go ahead with contracting that needs to get underway before final budget is passed, so I would assume we could devote some funding to this. We will have to look at the dollar level that we're receiving inder the CR and see how that has to be allocated to on-going expenses versus new items.

Subject The $10,000 for the Voting Fraud/Intimidation Working Group

Peg and Diana-

It's very likely that the $10,000 that was to be set aside for the Voting Fraud and Intimidation Working Group's expenses did not get obligated, and that only funds to pay the consultants were obligated.

The amount to be obligated for this project was to be $120,000. $55,000 was to be given to Tova Wang and $55,000 to Job Sereborv.

It's likely that Tova and Job will have to wait until 2006 funds are available, to hold their working group meeting. Alternatively, Peg, perhaps you'll want to have a series of conference calls with their working group until there is money for them to meet in-person?

I understand this is an issue. This is the reason we include the task to revise the project plan, so deliverable dates can get adjusted, if needed, based on when the work was actually begun.

Carol:

This updated version is helpful to me but may be problematic for our contractors, who do not have a final contract and (I think) are unaware of the deliverable dates listed in this version. Of course, I did not inform them of these deadlines because I did not have them until today.

Unfortunately, the delay in getting the signed contracts out to our selected contractors has already adversely impacted deliverable dates for the contracts to which I have been assigned. Most contractors cannot hire researchers or commit funds without having a contract in hand, so they have had to delay their work.

A few answers to your questions:

They have not received contracts but did receive a Statement of Work about a month ago.

That Statement of Work does not reference use of Westlaw or a law clerk. I have no recollection of offering such services. I have, however, had many conversations with Tova and Job. At some point I may have said that because the EAC has Westlaw and legal interns, there may or may not be a way from Job and Tova to avail them of these services.

The Statements of Work developed (see draft attached) were used in place of an RFP. Tova and Job are to serve as consultants on a project that may or may not result in their developing an RFP on voting fraud and intimidation for the EAC.

Subject Voter Fraud Contract

Karen/Tom,

Peggy held a meeting with voting fraud/intimidation contractors. In this meeting they noted that despite the fact that the contract requires them to perform legal research, they do not have the means to do so (no access to Westlaw, etc.). They noted that in discussions with the two of you, they were told that the EAC would provide them access to West Law and, possibly, a law clerk with office space. None of this is noted in the contract. They claim to have never seen the contract? Do we have their response to our RFP? We will all need to meet to clarify this.

Summary of Election Activities of Job Serebrov

Background to Election Problems in Arkansas

Ever since Reconstruction, Arkansas has had a history of election problems. The election fraud that gave rise to the Brooks-Baxter War in Arkansas in the 1870s involved people from both sides of the aisle voting more than once, the dead rising to cast a ballot or two, destroying ballots, creating ballots and making ballot boxes disappear. A strong one-party system perpetuated this tradition into modern times.

In 1995, I met with Arkansas Supreme Court Justice Tom Glaze to discuss voting issues and my efforts to clean up the electoral process. Although supportive, Justice Glaze encouraged me to proceed with caution. Before being elected to the Supreme Court, Justice Glaze had been employed in the 1960s by Gov. Win Rockefeller to clean up ballot fraud throughout Arkansas. He was nearly disbarred in the process by those involved in ballot fraud in a small, rural county.

Shortly after my discussion with Justice Glaze, I discovered how pervasive the election problems were in the state. For instance, ballot boxes were stuffed or disappeared into the night only to return altered. Contrary to state law, county sheriffs running in contested elections maintained custody of the ballot boxes. In one instance, 20 voted ballot boxes were found in the attic of a sheriff's deputy after he died.

Attorney (1991-2004)

In my private practice as an attorney, I represented numerous clients in county election contests throughout Arkansas. I also represented clients in matters before the Federal Election Commission. I have never lost an election case. Finally, I was hired as a consultant to a major nonprofit legal organization to review and summarize the 2002 amendments to federal election laws and apply the new law to 10 scenarios.

016104

Member, Washington County Board of Election
Commissioners, Fayetteville, Arkansas (1990-1996)

This board consisted of three commissioners; I was the lone Republican. We were charged with supervising the training of poll workers, evaluating voting systems and then purchasing an optical scan system to be used countywide, preparing and justifying our annual budget before the Washington County Quorum Court, hiring and supervising staff and sitting as an administrative tribunal.

When I first came on the board, Washington County was primarily a one-party county and the Democrats were used to running elections according to tradition rather than the law. I had to battle with the two Democrats on the board to enforce election laws within the county. As I started to force the issue in the courts, the Republican Party gained strength. Four years later and after outlasting eight Democrat commissioners, I was able to work with new Democrat commissioners who recognized the need to enforce the law. At this point, the commission requested that I draft administrative regulations for the board. These remain in place today.

Founder, President, General Counsel; Arkansans for Fair Elections (1994-1999)

In 1994, Gov. Mike Huckabee (R), then a candidate for lieutenant governor, asked me to serve as his general counsel for ballot fraud protection. Thinking it best to act independently of any candidate, I formed Arkansans for Fair Elections. I served as the organization's president and, later, general counsel. This group launched a statewide educational campaign to train poll watchers to recognize irregular or fraudulent electoral procedures; this included the creation of literature and a video. Our extensive public relations campaign brought media attention to the issue. We also organized a statewide team of citizen poll watchers and attorneys to ensure that the election laws were fairly enforced. We were so successful in the lieutenant governor's race that Arkansans for Fair Elections was asked to continue the effort until 1999 when I moved to Louisiana.

General Counsel - Ballot Fraud Protection Committee, Republican Party of Arkansas (1995-1999)

In late 1995, Asa Hutchinson, chairman of the Republican Party of Arkansas, appointed me as general counsel for the newly formed Ballot Fraud Protection Committee of the state party. I retained this position until 1999. I was responsible for coordinating statewide enforcement efforts and directing a legal team to respond to problematic situations prior to and on election day.

(Through my role with Arkansans for Fair Elections and the Ballot Fraud Protection Committee, I successfully sued or negotiated a settlement in more than two-thirds of the 75 counties in Arkansas over electoral irregularities.)

Legal Consultant to Republican Members of the Arkansas General Assembly (1994-1996)

Republicans in the General Assembly requested that I review and draft suggested changes to Arkansas election law. Based on my personal experience as an election commissioner and as an election attorney, I identified a number of areas of concern and drafted new statutes modeled on the best examples that I could find from other states. My proposal was not passed by the Democrat-controlled General Assembly as a package, however, several of its components were passed into law.

Consultant to the Arkansas Court of Appeals Redistricting Commission (1996-1999)

I drafted five redistricting bills and maps for the constitutionally required redistricting of the Arkansas Court of Appeals. These bills were based on current U.S. Supreme Court precedent regarding gerrymandering. I had to present each bill and give supporting testimony to the commission.

Director of International Development - Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, Louisiana (2000-2003)

Part of my duties as director was to develop international cooperative projects. The theme of several of these proposals was democratization. In each case, I required review of the national election code of the country involved.

My activities in Namibia led to a request by the director of the Namibian Election Commission, Joram Rukambe and the Speaker of the Namibian National Assembly, Dr. Mose Tjitendero to review and suggest changes to the Namibian election code. This review took three months and resulted in proposed alterations a number of code sections. These suggestions were considered by the Namibian National Assembly and a number were incorporated into the code revisions. Additionally, I drafted legislation for the Speaker to guarantee voting rights to agricultural workers that were being denied by the owners of the farms. This legislation also was passed into law.

During this time, I was qualified as an election expert and placed on an election consultant list by the United Nations, IFES and the Electoral Institute of Southern Africa.

Karen and Dan:

The reporter got it wrong. The Academy applied on its own for a Help America Vote College Program grant in 2004 and did not get one. The reporter found evidence of EAC's decision to reconsider the Academy's application and interpreted that to mean that EAC changed its mind about giving the program a grant. We didn't. Jeannie Layson set the reporter straight, confirming that the organization had received no grant from EAC. Furthermore, we have received nothing either from the Academy or the University to indicate that these two entities are jointly participating in any activities funded under the Help America Vote College program.

At that time I will, of course,bring you up to speed on the project. The overriding concern Tom Wilkey and the Commissioners have is that this project really needs close management and supervision. It really should be overseen by a lawyer and by an EAC staff person with an understanding of the political sensitivities and issues that will surround the topic.

Hopefully this management/oversight issue can be successfully resolved.

Also, use of the term salary concerns me... These are contractors, correct? As such that term is most likely inappropriate.

Subject REVISED LABOR COSTS

I'm afraid my haste and the happy juice they gave me at yesterday morning's session caused me to double the labor costs expected for the Serebrov and Wang personal services contracts. The costs should be as follows:

Labor Cost (FY06):

If the consultants are paid $111 per hour and each is expected to work 230 more hours, then we will need to set aside $25,530 each for Tova Wang and Job Serebrov (or a total of $51,060 for both).

(Please note that Gavin suggested that I put in a four month period (top of page 2), although we have budgeted only for 230 hours for each consultant. He thought that would take care of us if we need a few more days out of them and don't want to have to modify the contract.)

I had estimated that we would need $50,000 in FY06 Research Funds (in addition to the $5,000 per consultant in FY06 Research funds to cover travel) to bring this project to a logical stopping point. (I had also requested $250,000 in research funds for any follow up RFP stage, but I know that Tom had to postpone any such RFP until FY07.)

As we would like the new contract period to begin this Sunday, February 26, I need to know what you need from me to help expedite this matter.

Subject Tova Wang/Job Serebrov/Improving Election Data Collection
Project--FY06 Budget

History: This message has been forwarded.

All,

Per our meeting this afternoon, the consensus was that Peggy needed a total of $60,000 to fund the contracts for Tova Wang and Job Serebrov ($50,000 for labor and $10,000 for travel expenses). Since only $25,000 was budgeted for both these 2 contractors, an additional $35,000 is needed. Tom directed that the additional required funds be taken from the $150,000 budgeted for the Improving Election Data Collection project. According to Tom, this project will be now be done in-house and so the budgeted funds far exceeds projected expenditures. Therefore, revised budgeted (maximun) amounts are as follows:

Improving Election Data Collection	$115,000
Tova Wang	$ 30,000
Job Serebrov	$ 30,000

The money was on the list of items that I submitted to you in hard copy earlier this year (estimated at $50,000 each), because we knew in December 2005 that we would need to pay for approximately three more months of personal services for these folks in order to get to a logical stopping point. Is it just that we do not have confirmation that the request for the additional amount for personal services was approved and included in the Research Budget? --- Peggy

Subject Contracts for Continuing Personal Services-Wang and Serebrov

Diana:

Attached are the new contracts for the continuation of personal services from Tova Wang and Job Serebrov on the Voting Fraud/Voter Intimidation research project.. They each need an ACT #. (Julie gave me the EAC Contract #s.)

As we would like the new contract period to begin this Sunday, February 26, I need to know what you need from me to help expedite this matter.

Labor Cost (FY06):

If the consultants are paid $111 per hour and each is expected to work 230 more hours, then we will need to set aside $51,060 each for Tova Wang and Job Serebrov.

(Please note that Gavin suggested that I put in a four month period (top of page 2), although we have budgeted only for a three month period. He thought that would take care of us if we need a few more days out of them and don't want to have to modify the contract.)

Travel Cost (FY06):

Tova Wang has used/obligated all but about $1,962.91 of the $5,000 allocated from the FY06 budget. Job Serebrov still should have all of the $5,000 allocated to him from the FY06 budget.

Subject Working Group for Voter Fraud/Intimidation Project

History:

This message has been forwarded.

Peg:

Following is the guidance that the commissioners are providing with respect to the composition of the working group for the Voter Fraud/Voter Intimidation project and the selection process.

8 Member Working Group

Participants to be chosen by the two consultants in consultation with you. There are two slots that will require consensus. If consensus can't be reached, then you should make the decision. If there is real disagreement among the three of you, then the commissioners will make the selection.

The participation process prescribed below provides for political balance. As always, we ask that the group be diverse with respect to participation of men, women and minorities.

4 people from the Academic, Legal and Advocacy sectors - 2 to be chosen by Tova and 2 to be chosen by Job. We support your recommendation that there be at least one academic in the working group to help advise and comment on the construct of the database and you should provide that guidance to Tova and Job.

2 State Level Election Officials - 1 selected by Tova and 1 selected by Job

1 Nonpartisan local election official (selected by you or by consensus among the 3 of you)

1 Representative from DOJ - you had recommended a man who was retired from the Voting Section or perhaps someone else with similar credentials to be selected by you or by consensus among the three of you. We assume that Craig Dosantos (?sp) will participate in this project as an "advisor" and therefore would not take up a slot on the working group.

I will be on travel on Friday (tomorrow), however please feel free to call me on my cell should you have questions or need additional clarification.

Many thanks for your terrific work.

Subject Extension Needed for Voting Fraud/Voter Intimidation Project Consultants

The estimated additional hours needed to bring the Voting Fraud/Voter Intimidation Project to a logical stopping point (without requiring a draft statement of work for any future RFPs on the topic) are:

Expert Interviews:

3 hours of scheduling

17 hours conducting the interviews

15 hours summarizing and analyzing the interviews

Subtotal: 35 hours

Nexis research, organization of research, summary of research (Tova): 180 hours

Lexis research, organization of research, summary of research (Job): 180 hours

Subtotal: 360 hours

Working Group preparation and meeting time: 20 hours

Final Report: 45 hours

Grand Total: 460

Subject EAC Statement

Hello everyone,

I'm sure you have read the article in today's NYT about the voter fraud report this agency issued. Today, Congressmen Hinchey and Serrano have issued the following statement. Very shortly, EAC will post and distribute the attached statement to articulate our role and approach to conducting research and the steps we will take to improve our process. Please let me know if you have any questions about this, as I am sure we will all receive phone calls today about this issue. You may also direct people with questions to the statement that will be on the website. I will keep everyone informed as this situation evolves.

Hinchey, Serrano Urge Non-Partisanship, Greater Transparency at Election Assistance Commission

Washington, DC - Today, Congressmen Maurice Hinchey (NY-22) and José E Serrano (NY-16) urged the Election Assistance Commission (EAC) to act with greater transparency and without partisanship. The comments from the congressmen came as the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Financial Services and General Government released a draft version of an EAC report on voter fraud and intimidation that shows significant changes were made to the findings of outside experts before the final report was released.

"The EAC has an obligation to be forthright with the American people and operate transparently and in a non-partisan manner," said Congressman Hinchey, who requested the draft report from EAC Commissioner Donetta L. Davidson during subcommittee hearing last month. "The draft report was commissioned with taxpayer dollars upon a mandate from Congress so that we could learn more about voter fraud and intimidation. The need for this report is even more clear when we see the way in which the Bush administration is carrying out the electoral process and how this system is sliding towards corruption. In hiding a draft report from the public that is significantly different from the final version, the EAC has created a lot more questions than it has answered while stunting debate on the issue. In order for our democracy to function properly it is essential that our elections are free of any corruption and that includes ensuring that the EAC does not work to benefit one political party over the other. To achieve that goal we must have all the facts and opinions on the table, not just some of them. The EAC must never limit discussion and debate."

"The EAC is charged with helping to ensure our elections are trustworthy and administered fairly," said Congressman Serrano, who is Chair of the Appropriations Subcommittee that oversees the EAC budget. "I'm concerned if changes were made to the report on voter fraud because of partisan bias rather than impartial analysis. When you read the draft report side-by-side with the final version, it is clear that important conclusions of the experts who wrote the draft report were excluded from the final product. Among the excluded information is an analysis that undermines the notion that voter fraud is rampant.

"I am concerned that the EAC did not publicly release the taxpayer-funded draft report, and I worry that political considerations may have played a role. We cannot have a politicized EAC, or one that yields to outside pressure. Our democracy, and the American people's faith in it, is far more important than a short-term political advantage."

The draft report was written by outside experts under contract with the EAC. The final report was entitled "Election Crimes: An Initial Review and Recommendations for Future Study" and was issued on December 7, 2006.

The EAC is an independent bipartisan commission created by the 2002 Help America Vote Act in order to disburse funds to the states for the purchase of voting systems, certify voting technologies, develop guidelines and serve as an information resource for election administration.

Subject Voting Fraud

In an article in USA Today (10/10/2006), is this quote: "Advocates of registration and photo identification laws say they are needed to prevent fraud."

Another quote in the same article is: "Paul DeGregorio, chairman of the Election Assistance Commission, says the laws should not discourage citizens from voting. Far worse, he says, would be for states to ignore problems that cause Americans to distrust the process."

In my opinion as an American citizen who carries all the required papers, DeGregorio is right.

It doesn't matter who votes, since our votes don't count anyway. Politicians do as they please no matter what the people want. As we have seen in the past eight years, the past four years in particular, politicians will do or say anything that will further their personal agendas.

I don't believe enough voting fraud happens to make any kind of difference. And since what the voters want doesn't count anyway, it doesn't actually matter. But what a convenient thing it is on which to focus attention and argument for the very people who don't want their own fraud and dishonesty to be remembered come voting day.

I am an example of exactly what DeGregorio spoke of: a citizen who carries all the now-required paperwork, and has finally realized that the system is completely bogus.

Peggy:

I was just processing your email properly - light bulb moment! The 2 trips of Wang is not coming out of this contract because the 2 trips were processed like any regular travel and they were assigned new/different Act numbers. For Wang's travel to come out of this contract, her travel cannot be processed as a regular travel. If memory serves me correctly, I believe this was the reason why Diana was asking you where these funds was coming out from and I believe she was told - Research.

To date, Wang's travel has been expensed or charged against Research (Survey/Surveys - Contractual services). For Wang's travel to come out of the allocated $5,000, she will have to provide an invoice with all her travel expense. She could either submit this separately or she can add her travel expense with her monthly invoice.

The same applies to Serebrov. So long as they get a different Act number for their travel, their travel expense will not be coming out of the allocated travel fund.

I will be more than happy to answer any questions.

Subject Working Group Travel

Diana:

The following members of the Working Group for our Voting Fraud/Voter Intimidation research project will need to make travel arrangements in order to attend an afternoon meeting of the group on May 18 in Washington, DC:

Mark "Thor" Hearne - St Louis, MO
J.R. Perez - Seguin, TX
The Honorable Todd Rokita - Indianapolis, IN Kathy Rogers - Atlanta, GA

I may have one additional member from Albuquerque, NM confirmed early next week.

May these people use Adventure Travel to make these arrangements in the same manner as the Asian Language Working Group? I understand the members of that group made hotel and flight arrangements through Adventure Travel and that these costs were billed directly to EAC. We did plan for EAC to pay for the travel of the Voting Fraud/Voter Intimidation Working Group (budgeted under Research). Devon will prepare their travel authorizations.

That entire week is good for me. However, I really need to know as far in advance as possible as I am deciding whether to fly or drive.

Subject Meeting in DC

Karen:

I wanted to toss in my vote for the week of our first working meeting. The week of Sept 12 works best for me as far as scheduling things. I don't image that right before or right after Labor Day will really be good for everyone as that is the final vacation time of the summer.

What are your thoughts? I have been writing down various ideas, problems, and possible solutions that I thought of regarding vote fraud potentially for discussion at this meeting. It would be good if the three of us who were hired had a short backgrounder on the other two.

Job

Hi Steve and Job,

Steve, below is the bulk of our exchange of emails from the weekend.

With respect to setting up a time to talk in the next day or two, let me throw out two possibilities and see if they work for you: tomorrow, Wednesday at 4 or Thursday at 10:30. Do either of you have conference call capability? Let me know. If necessary, I can do it. And if you have any thoughts in between feel free to email. Thanks.

Subject: Re: Topics

Hi Job,

These are all good ideas and I would just sort of add to and expand upon them.

First, at the outset, I think we need to be clear about how we are defining fraud. I actually was pleased that the project was called fraud and intimidation because I believe that acts of intimidation -- as well as deceptive practices, eg willfully and knowingly providing false information to voters about the voting process -- are also election fraud. Illegally keeping certain voters from voting has the same distorting impact on election outcomes as ineligible voters casting ballots or some form of modern ballot box stuffing.

Second, we need to research and to the extent possible quantify (here is where Steve may be helpful) what kinds of fraud are -- and are not -- really being committed before we assess the legal system's handling of such cases or make recommendations for how the states and the justice system can better address the problem. In other words we need to break down specifically how much fraud is actually taking place by type of activity, such as:

- absentee/mail ballot fraud
- ex-felons knowingly casting illegal ballots
- voting more than once
- noncitizen voting
- false registration
- intimidating practices (perhaps including legal grey areas like inappropriate challenges at the polls)
- deceptive practices
- fraud by election administrators in the handling or counting of ballots
- machine tampering

This is obviously a tall order, but to me it is only then that we will be in a position to evaluate whether states are treating and remedying the fraud issue appropriately and effectively. We could then, perhaps simultaneously or subsequently, undertake your excellent idea of analyzing the performance of all 50 states and their legal systems in this regard. In addition to nexis or westlaw searches, I suggest it might also be necessary to interview attorneys general, prosecutors, and attorneys to get the information we will require. My concern is that not every case will show up in these databases.

I also strongly recommend we also analyze how the federal system, ie the Department of Justice, both the criminal and civil rights divisions, is handling these issues. It is unclear to me that DOJ is effectively pursuing fraud cases as I defined the term above.

With respect to the working group, I don't know what Karen and Tom have in mind, but I would just add that I think we should have at least one academic, a couple of members of third party organizations, and at a couple of local election officials.

That's all I can think of for now. Let me know what you think. Hope you are enjoying the weekend.

Tova

Subject work plan

History: This message has been forwarded.

Hi Karen and Tom,

As we discussed yesterday, attached is a preliminary work plan/division of labor for your review. Please let us know if this is sufficient for the present and if you have any comments or questions.

In terms of hours dedicated to the project, Job and Tova are able to commit to 15-20 hours per week assuming that includes reimbursed periodic travel. Steve can do approximately 2 hours per week. We have tentatively scheduled to meet at your offices in DC, if that is convenient for you, on September 20. We will be able to confirm that within the next day or so.

All of us are very eager to get started on this important work as soon as possible. However, because we also have other work related responsibilities, we are a bit reluctant to do so before having an opportunity to review our contracts. We look forward to receiving them so we can get going right away.

Thanks so much. Speak to you soon.

Tova, Job and Steve

All-

In anticipation of our 45-minute conference call scheduled for Tuesday, September 6 at 4:00 PM, I would ask the three consultants (Steve, Job and Tova) to come prepared to talk about the following:

The major topics and issues which you see as needing immediate attention, definition, delineation, etc.

Rough timelines and timeframes for addressing these major issues and topics

Your major roles and responsibilities and the timelines you envision for meeting your major deliverables

We all realize that this conversation is just a start; I look forward to this beginning and to framing the tasks that lie ahead of us between now and September 30.

Have a wonderful holiday!!

Tova, Job and Steve,

Tom and Karen would like to schedule a conference call with the three of you on Monday, September 12 at 9:30 a.m. for about 20 minutes to discuss the following:

- Finalize contracts
- Finalize consulting hours
- Define Individual roles and responsibilities
- Begin review of Working Group members

Please let me know by COB today if you can do this. Feel free to call if you don't have time to e-mail.
Many thanks.

Hi Karen,

I haven't heard back from you about consulting fees and contracts for the fraud project.

Things seem to be moving ahead. Does that mean that the EAC has approved hiring me at my consulting rate of $250/hour, $2500/day?

The national anthem was great. She described it as "an out of body experience."

I won't be able to make the conference call. I teach M and W 9 to 11 and W 1 to 4. I'll catch up with you after the call.

Thanks,

9:30 is bad for me. It would have to be after 9:45.

Tova and Steve--I just talked with Karen and she does not see a reason why our first meeting has to be in DC. As long as the travel payment is worked out, how do you two feel about coming to Little Rock? Tova, I know you were looking for a reason to come here. I think I could arrange for a meeting room for us, perhaps in the Clinton School of Public Service.

The Monday telephone meeting is essential to contract completion.

Tom and Karen have my resume. I don't know if Diana has it but it would be easier for me if Tom or Karen could make a copy for Diana. This is because I sent Karen, who made Tom a copy of both my resume and a separate document called Election Activities. Can you look into this?

The number of hours we will work on this depends on the funds available for a potential law clerk and most of all travel. Both Tova and I agreed that we will have to interview others, not to mention travel for a potential working group. Tova and I envisioned working 15-20 hours per week with Steve working 2 hours per week. The reason we gave for 15 instead of 20 is to leave room for a law clerk and travel in the budget.

I don't know if you will have much success staying within the budget Karen is talking about ($60,000-$75,000) with hourly consulting rates either. For instance, before serving as a federal judicial law clerk my consulting fees were $175 per hour and now I would charge $200. If you figure that at 20 hours for 4 months you get $64,000 or $48,000 at 15 hours for 4 months. While I do believe that $75,000 may be too low for this project, hourly rates may never get you where you want to go.

What do you think?

Karen, what happened to you???

In any case, my resume and bio are attached. I do not have a set rate, but my understanding is that project will be $500 per 8 hour day. I anticipate working an average of 15 - 20 hours per week.

Either of those times on Tuesday work for me. FYI, Steve is unable to do a meeting on the 20th, and since he teaches Tuesday and Thursday, I'm not sure he'll be around for a call Tuesday.

Let me know if you need anything else. Have a great weekend.

Hi everyone,

This is disappointing because Steve is so qualified and respected. For what its worth, I would strongly support his suggestion of Mike Alvarez. I have actually spoken to Mike about doing a similar study in the past, and he already has ideas about some possible methodologies. Also, he knows everyone in the academic community and is similarly widely respected in the field. His being in LA is an obstacle, but I think not an insurmountable one by any means.

Let us know if we will be speaking tomorrow.

Thanks.

Karen, Tova, and Job,

I'm going to have to withdraw from the Fraud study. I found out this past week that one of my colleagues is very ill and I have agreed with my department head to take over some of his teaching and administrative responsibilities. This will effectively squeeze out any of my remaining free time over the remainder of the Fall semester.

I am disappointed to not be able to continue, but I feel that this is a time when I need to pitch in a little extra at home.

Let me recommend several alternative academic voices whom you might bring in.

Michael Alvarez at Caltech (my counterpart on the Caltech/MIT project) Thad Hall at University of Utah (he was one of the administrative/research assistants on the Ford-Carter commission and has been very active on this subject)

Richard Niemi at Rochester University

Paul Herrnson at Maryland

Thanks ever so much for following up. Indeed, the Commissioners have reviewed the issue and have agreed in principle, to an approach that would entail hiring a consultant or consultants to help the EAC study and frame the issues of voter fraud and intimidation.

The idea would be that after a period of time, the consultants, and, perhaps, a working group of the EAC, would make a series of recommendations on next steps for the agency to take regarding voter fraud and intimidation.

Thanks for your patience; I hope to have a definitive answer for you by mid-July at the latest.

Ray,

Before I read Rick's message, Steve Ansolabehere was the first name that came to my mind. This assumes you are looking for part-time, not full-time consultants. I would categorize Steve as very moderate left. I am not certain he is Democrat but would be very surprised to learn he is not. But the main thing about him is that he calls things as he sees them. So if you found a Republican with the same characteristics, that would be ideal. Charles Bullock of the University of Georgia would be a possibility. (Actually, I'm not sure of his party either, but I think he may be a Republican.)

016187

I would also suggest you talk to Bruce Cain in the Institute of Governmental Studies at Berkeley. He is very savvy and knows more political scientists than Rick and I do. When I have questions about the political science profession, he's usually the person I go to. His phone number is 510-642-1739. He is also going to be running a UC office in Washington, so he will be more or less living there for the indefinite future. He is someone you ought to get to know.

We are now editing articles for our next issue, which is due out in October. We need to get everything to the printer for this issue in mid-July. So we'd need something from you by early July if it were to make it into that issue. Our deadlines after that are about three months later for each issue.

As far as researchers, I give my highest recommendation to Steve Ansolabehere of MIT, who has already done a bit of research on this issue. He is truly one of the top political scientists in the country working in this field, and he is careful and very fair (I don't know whether I'd count him as "left" or "right").

Dan may have other ideas.

Thanks for the follow-up. As I mentioned to Dan in La Jolla, I do want to commit to doing a paper for ELJ. Aside from my own interest in election law and election administration, I think it is important for your readers to gain a better understanding of the role of the EAC and all that we are doing, particularly in the area of voting system standards and certification. Please tell me what the new deadline is and I will make sure to get you an outline of my intended submission, and of course, a timely draft for your consideration. Thanks again to both of you for the continued opportunity.

On a related note, in Section 241 of HAVA, Congress gives the EAC a laundry list of possible research topics related to improving the process of election administration. Among the suggested topics are the following:

"(6) Nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office;

(7) Identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation."

In order to get this research project started, the EAC would like to engage two research consultants who could bring some level of knowledge and expertise to the table and help the commissioners to come to an agreement on the framework and/or scope of such a research project. Rather than sending something out on the listserve, I thought I would directly solicit your opinions about any names in the academic field that you think we ought to consider. The reason we are looking to employ two consultants is because we would like to achieve a political balance -- one from the left, and one from the right, so to speak. Any thoughts you have on this would be greatly appreciated.

Julie:

It was good talking with you today. Congrats on the wedding. Please give me your address so I can send a card.

My resume is attached. I would be eternally grateful if you could talk the new director into hiring another attorney. I would really enjoy working with you and getting back into Election law. It would not bother me if the job lasted from September 2005 for one or two years. Once I was in DC I would be able to make a lateral move.

Best Regards,

Getting to DC before the second week in August is not possible. First, there is no way that I could get a ticket in any acceptable price range that quick. More importantly, I am in the last month of my judicial clerkship and committed to the judge that I would be here until August 15th to finish all of my cases and anything else for this court term. My official last day is August 19th.

I think it may be a good idea for us to talk about this.

In the absence of being able to touch base via telephone-

The EAC is currently seeking several consultants who could work parttime for a six month period (Sept-Feb) to help the agency development a work plan and statement of work around a project the agency might do related to voter fraud and voter intimidation

For a number of reasons the EAC is interested in involving several consultants in this initial look at the topic This initial exploration will help the Agency determine how, if at all, it would want to put together a larger project that would be given to an institution or organization to conduct.

I am putting the finishing touches on a consultant statement of work and will send it out to you in the next week to ten days.

It is important for the EAC to contract with these consultants by early September so that they can begin work on this initial work plan before the end of the Federal fiscal year, which is September 30.

Do let me know a particular time and date when we might be able to speak to one another.

This morning the Commissioners approved the Statement of Work for the Voter Fraud/Voter Intimidation project consultants, with the caveat that some additional language would be added and the SOW polished up.

Tom, Peg and I are scheduled to interview the first candidate tomorrow morning at 10:00 am and will need your edits to this SOW by COB today.

I am attaching the item again, just in case you don't have a copy. Since I have an appointment out of the office and will be leaving at 4:00 today, I ask that you get your changes and edits to Nicole so that she may enter them and get the revised copy to the candidate first thing in the morning.

Thanks for your input on this.

Karen,

I have purposely not directed this response to Nicole. The GSA contact is out of the office until tomorrow, 8, 17. Based on how Dan's compensation was derived at, he receives $52.083/hour. Perhaps it would be comparable for this individual to get $50/hour. If that is the case, then the total contract amount would be $10,000. Since we haven't spoken, how does that compare to what you had in mind?

Fraud/Intimidation consultants

All-

This morning the Commissioners approved the Statement of Work for the Voter Fraud/Voter Intimidation project consultants, with the caveat that some additional language would be added and the SOW polished up.

Tom, Peg and I are scheduled to interview the first candidate tomorrow morning at 10:00 am and will need your edits to this SOW by COB today.

I am attaching the item again, just in case you don't have a copy. Since I have an appointment out of the office and will be leaving at 4:00 today, I ask that you get your changes and edits to Nicole so that she may enter them and get the revised copy to the candidate first thing in the morning.

Thanks for your input on this.

I enjoyed the discussion too. I really think that this project will be of national importance and can positively affect elections administration while providing an answer to the handling of the vote fraud problem for the future.

On another note, why don't you leave an evening free while I am there for dinner. I am trying to bring my wife along. If you can bring your husband it could make for an interesting evening.

Summary of Election Activities of Job Serebrov

Background to Election Problems in Arkansas

Ever since Reconstruction, Arkansas has had a history of election problems. The election fraud that gave rise to the Brooks-Baxter War in Arkansas in the 1870s involved people from both sides of the aisle voting more than once, the dead rising to cast a ballot or two, destroying ballots, creating ballots and making ballot boxes disappear. A strong one-party system perpetuated this tradition into modern times.

In 1995, I met with Arkansas Supreme Court Justice Tom Glaze to discuss voting issues and my efforts to clean up the electoral process. Although supportive, Justice Glaze encouraged me to proceed with caution. Before being elected to the Supreme Court, Justice Glaze had been employed in the 1960s by Gov. Win Rockefeller to clean up ballot fraud throughout Arkansas. He was nearly disbarred in the process by those involved in ballot fraud in a small, rural county.

Shortly after my discussion with Justice Glaze, I discovered how pervasive the election problems were in the state. For instance, ballot boxes were stuffed or disappeared into the night only to return altered. Contrary to state law, county sheriffs running in contested elections maintained custody of the ballot boxes. In one instance, 20 voted ballot boxes were found in the attic of a sheriff's deputy after he died.

Attorney (1991-2004)

In my private practice as an attorney, I represented numerous clients in county election contests throughout Arkansas. I also represented clients in matters before the Federal Election Commission. I have never lost an election case. Finally, I was hired as a consultant to a major nonprofit legal organization to review and summarize the 2002 amendments to federal election laws and apply the new law to 10 scenarios.

Member, Washington County Board of Election Commissioners, Fayetteville, Arkansas (1990-1996)

This board consisted of three commissioners; I was the lone Republican. We were charged with supervising the training of poll workers, evaluating voting systems and then purchasing an optical scan system to be used countywide, preparing and justifying our annual budget before the Washington County Quorum Court, hiring and supervising staff and sitting as an administrative tribunal.

When I first came on the board, Washington County was primarily a one-party county and the Democrats were used to running elections according to tradition rather than the law. I had to battle with the two Democrats on the board to enforce election laws within the county. As I started to force the issue in the courts, the Republican Party gained strength. Four years later and after outlasting eight Democrat commissioners, I was able to work with new Democrat commissioners who recognized the need to enforce the law. At this point, the commission requested that I draft administrative regulations for the board. These remain in place today.

Founder, President, General Counsel; Arkansans for Fair Elections (1994-1999)

In 1994, Gov. Mike Huckabee (R), then a candidate for lieutenant governor, asked me to serve as his general counsel for ballot fraud protection. Thinking it best to act independently of any candidate, I formed Arkansans for Fair Elections. I served as the organization's president and, later, general counsel. This group launched a statewide educational campaign to train poll watchers to recognize irregular or fraudulent electoral procedures; this included the creation of literature and a video. Our extensive public relations campaign brought media attention to the issue. We also organized a statewide team of citizen poll watchers and attorneys to ensure that the election laws were fairly enforced. We were so successful in the lieutenant governor's race that Arkansans for Fair Elections was asked to continue the effort until 1999 when I moved to Louisiana.

General Counsel - Ballot Fraud Protection Committee,
Republican Party of Arkansas (1995-1999)

In late 1995, Asa Hutchinson, chairman of the Republican Party of Arkansas, appointed me as general counsel for the newly formed Ballot Fraud Protection Committee of the state party. I retained this position until 1999. I was responsible for coordinating statewide enforcement efforts and directing a legal team to respond to problematic situations prior to and on election day.

(Through my role with Arkansans for Fair Elections and the Ballot Fraud Protection Committee, I successfully sued or negotiated a settlement in more than two-thirds of the 75 counties in Arkansas over electoral irregularities.)

Legal Consultant to Republican Members of the Arkansas General Assembly (1994-1996)

Republicans in the General Assembly requested that I review and draft suggested changes to Arkansas election law. Based on my personal experience as an election commissioner and as an election attorney, I identified a number of areas of concern and drafted new statutes modeled on the best examples that I could find from other states. My proposal was not passed by the Democrat-controlled General Assembly as a package, however, several of its components were passed into law.

Consultant to the Arkansas Court of Appeals Redistricting Commission (1996-1999)

I drafted five redistricting bills and maps for the constitutionally required redistricting of the Arkansas Court of Appeals. These bills were based on current U.S. Supreme Court precedent regarding gerrymandering. I had to present each bill and give supporting testimony to the commission.

Director of International Development - Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, Louisiana (2000-2003)

Part of my duties as director was to develop international cooperative projects. The theme of several of these proposals was democratization. In each case, I required review of the national election code of the country involved.

My activities in Namibia led to a request by the director of the Namibian Election Commission, Joram Rukambe and the Speaker of the Namibian National Assembly, Dr. Mose Tjitendero to review and suggest changes to the Namibian election code. This review took three months and resulted in proposed alterations a number of code sections. These suggestions were considered by the Namibian National Assembly and a number were incorporated into the code revisions. Additionally, I drafted legislation for the Speaker to guarantee voting rights to agricultural workers that were being denied by the owners of the farms. This legislation also was passed into law.

During this time, I was qualified as an election expert and placed on an election consultant list by the United Nations, IFES and the Electoral Institute of Southern Africa.

The EAC is currently seeking several consultants who could work parttime for a six month period (Sept-Feb) to help the agency development a work plan and statement of work around a project the agency might do related to voter fraud and voter intimidation

For a number of reasons the EAC is interested in involving several consultants in this initial look at the topic This initial exploration will help the Agency determine how, if at all, it would want to put together a larger project that would be given to an institution or organization to conduct.

I am putting the finishing touches on a consultant statement of work and will send it out to you in the next week to ten days.

It is important for the EAC to contract with these consultants by early September so that they can begin work on this initial work plan before the end of the Federal fiscal year, which is September 30.

Subject Finalizing a Statement of Work for consultants working on a voter fraud and intimidation project

Greetings-

Tom Wilkey and I are working to schedule a series of conference calls with three consultants we have identified to work with us to help us develop the voter fraud and voter intimidation project.

We have tentatively scheduled a series of telephone interviews with these three consultants (all of whom would be hired to work on this project) for August 17, 18 and 19.

Attached you will find a draft of a Statement of Work that has been developed for these consultants. Dan Murphy's contract was used as a template for this.

I've sent this document to you all because I need your edits and corrections to this document, based on your expertise either in contracting, human resources or the subject area.

Since Tom and I will be interviewing the candidates in two weeks, I'm hoping you can react to the document and get to Tom and Nicole your changes by mid-week next week.

I will then ask Nicole to send the draft statement of work to the three candidates, so they might refer to it, prior to our interviews.

Thanks for your input and assistance.

Subject Conference call to "interview" potential voter

Hi All-

Well, I have the unhappy task of trying to identify a date and time when we might schedule a series of conference calls with the consultants we've identified as possible candidates to work on the voter fraud/intimidation project.

Since August is impossible and horrible in terms of everyone being in the same place, I thought it might be easier to try and schedule three calls--one hour each in duration-- in which the Commissioners could talk to these candidates.

I'd like to "start the bidding" for the week of August 15.

Actually, I happen to know that all of the candidates could be available August 22 or 23 at some point in the day.

Let me know if your folks could be available by phone at any of these days and times.

Subject Scheduling voter fraud/voter intimidation interviews for August 1

I've placed another call to Dr. Steve and still have not touched base with him.

I'd like to propose that, should I not hear from him by Wednesday of this week, we go ahead with the idea of a Job Sebarov/ Tova Wang consulting team to develop a project scope of work for the EAC around voter fraud and intimidation.

I'd like to further suggest that we bring them in for interviews with Ray, Paul and other key EAC staff on Monday August 1.

If we are able to line up Dr. Steve as a consultant on this project, I would suggest he also be brought in for an interview on this day.

Thoughts?

Thanks

Dr. Steve is out until the later part of this week. I think we should go ahead and schedule interviews for Job S. and Tova W. for August 1 in the afternoon.

Tom-

Could you contact Tova about this project, verify her interest and availability to serve as a 6 month part-time consultant on the project?

Tom and Carol-

Who should do the interviewing? Paul, Ray, Tom, Julie, others? Is this a panel interview or interviews with individual EAC staff? Shall we have them interview separately or together?

I will then check the schedules of the EAC interviewers to determine if August 1, say 2:00-4:00, works for them.

Karen:

Per our discussion, I should have some names later today of possible academic researchers for the voter fraud/voter intimidation study. I assume you are collecting names from the other commissioners as well. Additionally, I ran across the article below in today's Seattle Times...

Wednesday, June 22, 2005, 12:00 A.M. Pacific

6 accused of casting multiple votes

By Keith Ervin
Seattle Times staff reporter

Criminal charges have been filed against six more King County voters for allegedly casting more than one ballot under a variety of circumstances in last November's election, prosecutors said yesterday.

Two defendants, William A. Davis of Federal Way and Grace E. Martin of Enumclaw, were accused of casting absentee ballots in the names of their recently deceased spouses, Sonoko Davis and Lawrence Martin, respectively.

A mother and daughter were also charged with casting a ballot in the name of the mother's dead husband. The mother, Harline H.L. Ng, and her daughter, Winnie W.Y. Ng, both of Seattle, signed their names as witnesses to the "X" marked on the ballot of Jacob Ng, who had died in February 2004.

Jared R. Hoadley of Seattle was accused of casting a ballot in the name of Hans Pitzen, who had lived at the same Seattle address as Hoadley and who died last May.

Dustin S. Collings, identified as a homeless Seattle resident, was charged with casting two ballots, both using the alias of Dustin Ocoilain, a name that was listed twice on the voter-registration rolls.

The defendants are charged with repeat voting, a gross misdemeanor that carries possible jail time of up to one year and a fine of up to $5,000.

Election officials asked prosecutors to investigate the voters after news reporters and a blogger reported that they may have voted twice. The voters will be arraigned July 5 in King County District Court.

Two other voters previously received deferred sentences — and avoided jail time — after they pleaded guilty to charges of repeat voting.

The King County Sheriff's Office is investigating several other cases, prosecutors reported yesterday. The investigations resulted from the intense scrutiny surrounding the governor's election in which Democrat Christine Gregoire defeated Republican Dino Rossi by 129 votes after he narrowly won two earlier vote counts.

After the November election, prosecutors also successfully challenged the voter registrations of 648 felons whose right to vote had not been restored.

Vote Buying a Way of Life in W.Va. County

By LAWRENCE MESSINA
The Associated Press
Monday, June 20, 2005; 5:09 PM

HAMLIN, W.Va. -- According to political lore, just before John F. Kennedy's momentous win in the 1960 West Virginia primary, the Democratic boss of Logan County asked the Kennedy campaign for "35" _ meaning $3,500 _ to buy votes for the presidential candidate. In an apparent misunderstanding, Kennedy's people delivered $35,000 in cash in two briefcases.

West Virginia's coal country has a long and rich history of vote-buying_ which explains why many folks in Lincoln County all but shrugged over the indictment last month of five people on federal charges they secured votes for liquor or a $20 bill or two.

Sharrell Lovejoy, 83, said he has heard rumors of vote-buying since he opened his Bobcat Restaurant on Hamlin's main drag, in 1948.

"It's gone on for ages," said Lovejoy, behind his diner's hand-cranked register. "I'm sure they're still doing it. They're just more careful about it."

As with past election fraud probes, the latest case targets solely Democrats, who dominate the voter rolls and local governments through the region. In Lincoln County, population 22,100, Democrats outnumber Republicans 4-to-1; the indictment focuses largely on the party's primary elections, going back to 1990.

Not that the GOP has clean hands. Republican former Gov. Arch Moore pleaded guilty to five corruption-related charges in 1990, including one that alleged he spent $100,000 in unreported campaign cash during his successful 1984 campaign.

"This seems to be something that is just in the blood of people in southern West Virginia. They're always looking for ways to get away with this," said Ken Hechler, who fielded election fraud complaints as West Virginia's secretary of state from 1985 to 2000.

convictions in Mingo County in the 1980s. Ensnared officials included a former sheriff, a county commissioner, a school board president and a Democratic Party chairman.

In the 1990s, politicians in neighboring Logan County found themselves on the defensive. Two state legislators, the county assessor and a Circuit Court judge, among others, went to jail on corruption charges that included vote-buying.

Federal investigators revisited Logan County last year. The sheriff and a city police chief resigned and pleaded guilty to exchanging money for votes. Three other people were convicted on related charges.

The current case targets Circuit Court clerk Greg Stowers, 48, the son of Lincoln County's longtime Democratic Party chairman; his deputy, Clifford Odell "Groundhog" Vance, 49; Jackie David Adkins, 36, a state highway worker; Wandell "Rocky" Adkins, 49, no relation; and Toney "Zeke" Dingess, 34.

All five have pleaded not guilty. The defense alleges that two convicted felons used by the government as informants lied to investigators to avoid stiff sentences on weapons charges.

The defense also says the government used illegal tactics during its investigation, intimidating voters by filming at polling places and trailing voters home. Prosecutors countered that the U.S. Justice Department's Public Integrity Section approved the investigators' techniques.

Prosecutors allege the defendants enlisted precinct captains to pay off voters and hand out slates listing the preferred candidates. Most votes were bought for $20 apiece, prosecutors said. The indictment also said Stowers drove to Kentucky and filled his pickup truck with booze for distribution to voters during the 1994 primary.

The indictment cites 16 voters who were allegedly paid off. Prosecutors have not said just how many voters, all told, were supposedly bought or how much was spent, but said the conspirators assembled $25,000 for one election alone to bribe voters.

The evidence includes footage from a hidden camera and microphone that informant Wayne Watts wore during the 2004 primary as he tried to get people to talk about buying votes.

"Man," Watts is heard muttering as he walks away from one group of locals who professed to know nothing about money and candidate lists changing hands, "this ain't no way to run an election."

MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD

From: Karen Lynn Dyson

Re: Communication of Award of Contracts EAC 05-66 and EAC 05-67, Personal Services Contracts with Tova Wang and Job Serebrov

In late August and early September 2005 a series of emails and phone calls were exchanged with Job Serebrov and Tova Wang in order to communicate the details of personal services contracts that were awarded to them. The substance of these e-mails and phone calls related to Mr. Serebrov and Ms. Wang's contracts, described the various services they would perform for EAC related to researching and possibly developing a future project that would study and analyze voting fraud and intimidation. These emails included transmitting a statement of work that would govern their work as well as emails and phone calls to establish a kick-off meeting that would provide information to them so that Mr. Serebrov and Ms. Wang could begin work.

Since that time, Ms. Wang and Mr. Serebrov have engaged in substantial work on this project. This has included developing, outlining and providing to EAC staff, a work plan for the project, meeting and conversing with one another to discuss the focus and work of the project, interviewing prospective persons who would serve on the project's review panel and presenting this initial list of persons to the EAC to be considered as members of this project review panel who would assess and review the project's work.

Deliberative Process

Statement of Work

Assistance with developing an Election Assistance Commission (EAC) Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Project

(Job Serebrov)

Background

Section 241 of HAVA enumerates a number of periodic studies of election administration issues in which the U.S. Election Assistance Commission may elect to engage. In general "On such periodic basis as the Commission may determine, the Commission shall conduct and make available to the public studies regarding the election administration issues described in subsection (b)"

Sections 241(b) (6) and (7) list the following election administration issues:

(6) Nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring and investigating voting fraud in election for Federal offices.

(7) Identifying, deterring and investigating methods of voter intimidation.

Building on this HAVA reference to studies of voting fraud and voter intimidation, the EAC Board of Advisors has indicated that further study of these issues to determine how the EAC might respond to them is a high priority.

The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) seeks to identify one or more senior-level project consultants to develop various project activities and studies related to voting fraud and voter intimidation affecting Federal elections.

The consultant(s) must of have knowledge of voting fraud and voter intimidation along with an understanding of the complexities, nuances and challenges which surround the topics. The EAC is particularly interested in candidates with experience in elections, with public policy and with the law. The consultant (s) must be able to demonstrate an ability to approach the issues of voting fraud and voter intimidation in a balanced, nonpartisan fashion.

Duties

1. Identifying what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation affecting Federal elections.
2. Performing background research, including Federal and state-by state administrative and case law review related to voting fraud and voter intimidation, and a review of current voting fraud and voter intimidation activities taking place with key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations. A written summary of this research, and a copy of any source documentation used, will be presented to EAC.
3. Identifying, in consultation with EAC, and convening a working group of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation. The working group's goals and objectives and meeting agendas will be vetted with key EAC staff.
4. Developing a project scope of work and a project work plan related to voting fraud and voter intimidation. The consultants (s) will develop a draft scope of work and project work plan for EAC's consideration based on research into the topics, the deliberations and findings of the working group, and the consultants' understanding of EAC's mission and agency objectives.
5. Authoring a report summarizing the key findings of this preliminary study of voting fraud and voter intimidation. The report will also include suggestions for specific activities that EAC may undertake to address these topics.

From this initial research and exploration of these topics the consultant (s) may be retained to help oversee follow-on research projects and contracts EAC may pursue on the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation.

Special Considerations

Work for Hire. The services performed under the terms of this agreement are considered "work for hire," and any intellectual property or deliverables, including but not limited to, research, policies, procedures, manuals, and other works submitted; or which are specified to be delivered; or which are developed or produced and paid for by EAC, shall be owned exclusively by EAC, including copyright. EAC or its assignees have the exclusive right to reproduce all work products from this agreement without further payment to the Contractor.

Terms and Conditions

The period of performance for this consulting contract is six months, with a fixed price ceiling of $XXXXXX for labor. The consultant (s) is expected to work at least 200 hours in performing this work. The EAC estimates that the most efficient distribution of these hours would be as follows: XXXXX. The period of performance and level of effort can be revised in writing by mutual agreement of the EAC and the consultant, as required.

The Consultant is required to travel to the EAC Washington, D.C. offices on a periodic, as needed basis, throughout the duration of the contract. The Consultant will be reimbursed, at the Federal government rates, for hotel and ground transportation costs, other approved incidental expenses, and per diem costs while working on-site at the EAC offices. An estimated $XXXXXX has been allocated for reimbursement for travel and other allowable expenses.

Invoicing

Invoices may be submitted monthly in equal payments for labor. Expenses claimed for reimbursement shall be itemized with appropriate receipts provided. Invoices shall be delivered to Ms. Diana Scott, Administrative Officer, U.S. Election Assistance Commission, 1225 New York Avenue, N.W., Suite 1100, Washington DC 20005.

The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) seeks to identify one or more senior-level project consultants to develop various project activities and studies related to voting fraud and voter intimidation affecting Federal elections.

The consultant(s) must of have knowledge of voting fraud and voter intimidation along with an understanding of the complexities, nuances and challenges which surround the topics. The EAC is particularly interested in candidates with experience in elections, with public policy and with the law. The consultant (s) must be able to demonstrate an ability to approach the issues of voting fraud and voter intimidation in a balanced, nonpartisan fashion.

All-

This morning the Commissioners approved the Statement of Work for the Voter Fraud/Voter Intimidation project consultants, with the caveat that some additional language would be added and the SOW polished up.

Tom, Peg and I are scheduled to interview the first candidate tomorrow morning at 10:00 am and will need your edits to this SOW by COB today.

I am attaching the item again, just in case you don't have a copy. Since I have an appointment out of the office and will be leaving at 4:00 today, I ask that you get your changes and edits to Nicole so that she may enter them and get the revised copy to the candidate first thing in the morning.

Thanks for your input on this.

7. Identifying, deterring and investigation methods of voter intimidation.

Building on this HAVA reference to studies of voter fraud and voter intimidation, the EAC Board of Advisors has indicated a priority interest in further study of these issues to determine how the EAC might respond to them.

The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) seeks to identify senior-level project consultants to develop various project activities and studies related to U.S. election voter fraud and voter intimidation.

The consultant(s) must of have knowledge of voter fraud and intimidation along with an understanding of the complexities, nuances and challenges which surround the topics. The EAC is particularly interested in candidates with experience in elections, with public policy and the law. The consultant (s) must be able to demonstrate an ability to approach the issues of voter fraud and intimidation in a balanced, nonpartisan fashion.

Duties

The consultant (s), whose contract would run for the period September-February, 2005, would be responsible for the following.

1. Performing background research, including a state-by state administrative and case law review related to voter fraud and intimidation, and a review of current voter fraud and intimidation activities taking place with key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations. This review will be summarized and presented to the EAC.
2. Identifying and convening a working group of key individuals and organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voter fraud and intimidation. The list of working group members and the methods used to identify the groups members will be shared with EAC staff prior to the confirmation of the working group. The working group's goals and objectives and meeting agendas will be vetted with key EAC staff.
3. Developing a project scope of work and a project work plan related to voter fraud and intimidation. Based on research into the topics, the deliberations and findings of the working group, and the consultants' understanding of the EAC's mission and agency objectives, the consultants will develop a draft scope of work and project work plan for the EAC's consideration.
4. Authoring a report summarizing the key findings of this preliminary study of voter fraud and intimidation. The report will also include suggestions for specific activities the EAC may undertake around these topics.

From this initial research and exploration of these topics the consultant (s) may be retained to help oversee follow-on research projects and contracts EAC may develop on the topics of voter fraud and intimidation.

Special Considerations

Work for Hire Agreement (insert language)

Terms and Conditions

The period of performance for this consulting contract is six months, with a fixed price ceiling of $XXXXXX for labor. The consultant (s) is expected to work at least 200 hours in performing this work. The EAC estimates that the most efficient distribution of these hours would be as follows: XXXXX. The period of performance and level of effort can be revised in writing by mutual agreement of the EAC and the consultant, as required.

Job-

Thanks ever so much for following up. Indeed, the Commissioners have reviewed the issue and have agreed in principle, to an approach that would entail hiring a consultant or consultants to help the EAC study and frame the issues of voter fraud and intimidation.

The idea would be that after a period of time, the consultants, and, perhaps, a working group of the EAC, would make a series of recommendations on next steps for the agency to take regarding voter fraud and intimidation.

Thanks for your patience; I hope to have a definitive answer for you by mid-July at the latest.

Subject Employing Tova Wang and others to start writing " Trends in Election Administration"

Tom and Jeannie-

At yesterday's research briefing, the Commissioners approved the concept of a series of scholarly articles that would cover various "Trends in Election Administration"

There was general agreement that the EAC would produce, by the end of this year, two of these articles that might be on topics such as early voting, restoration of felon rights, vote centers, etc.

I'd like to have a brief meeting the end of this week or the beginning of next with you, Jeannie and myself to go over some of the finer points of this idea and to put in place a process to get this project moving.

Shall we meet Friday morning at 11:00?

I'd like for us to identify the writers we want to use and the process we will use to determine the selection of topics for articles. As the Chair suggested, we should also discuss in some detail, the editorial guidelines we will use that will guide the work that our writers will do for us.

Thanks

Subject Draft EAC report on Voter Identification

Chair Davidson and Tom-

You may recall that during your last Commissioner's meeting you requested that a draft of the EAC Voter ID report be ready by January 5. Attached please find the first draft of such a report that I have prepared, based on the Eagleton Voter ID report and study.

There are several points in the document where I raise questions about the data or Eagleton's findings from their analysis. Certainly, before we would publish this report, we would need Eagleton to review it and to verify that we have accurately represented their findings and conclusions.

Hopefully, this is a first good step towards publishing something on voter identification. I look forward to your suggestions for next steps.

EAC Report on Voter Identification

Executive Summary

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) authorizes the United States Election Assistance Commission (EAC) to conduct periodic studies of election administration issues. HAVA Section 303 (b) mandates that first time voters who register by mail are required to show proof of identity before being allowed to cast a ballot. The law prescribes certain requirements concerning this section, but also leaves considerable discretion to the States for its implementation. The EAC sought to examine how these voter identification requirements were implemented in the 2004 general elections and to prepare guidance for the states on this topic.

In May 2005 EAC entered into a contract with the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey and the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University to perform a review and legal analysis of state legislation, administrative procedures and court cases, and to perform a literature review on other research and data available on the topic of voter identification requirements. Further, the contractor was to analyze the problems and challenges of voter identification, to hypothesize alternative approaches and recommend various policies that could be applied to these approaches.

The contractor also performed a statistical analysis of the relationship of various requirements for voter identification to voter turnout in the 2004 election. Using two sets of data, aggregate turnout data at the county level for each state, and reports of individual voters collected in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau, the contractor found the overall relationship between the stringency of ID requirements and turnout to be fairly small, but statistically significant.

Based on The Eagleton Institute year-long inquiry into voter identification requirements EAC will implement one or more of the following recommendations:

- Further research into the connection between voter ID requirements and the number of ballots cast and counted;
- A state-by-state review of the impact that voter ID requirements are having on voter's participation;
- A state-by-state review of the relationship between ballot access and ballot security and the number of voters whose ballot is counted;
- A state-by-state review of time periods between voters casting of provisional ballots and the time allowed to return with an ID as well as a review of acceptable forms of identification other than photo ID.

Introduction

This study was conducted at a time in which considerable attention is being paid to the issue of voter identification. Proponents of stricter identification requirements base their case on improving the security of the ballot by reducing opportunities for multiple voting or voting by those who are not eligible. The goal is to ensure that only those legally entitled to vote do so, and do so only once at each election. Opponents of stricter ID requirements seek to ensure broad access to a regular ballot. There is a fear that some voters -- racial and ethnic minorities, young and elderly voters-- lack convenient access to required ID documents, or that these voters may be fearful of submitting their ID documents for official scrutiny.

This report considers policy issues associated with the voter ID debate. It examines the relationships between voter ID requirements and voter turnout along with the various policy implications of the issue.

Methodology of the Study

In May 2005, under contract with the EAC, the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey, and the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University undertook a review and legal analysis of state statutes, regulations and litigation concerning voter identification and provisional voting as well as a statistical analysis of the relationship of various requirements for voter identification to turnout in the 2004 election. The contract also included research and study related to provisional voting requirements. These research findings were submitted and reviewed by the EAC as a separate study.

The Eagleton Institute of Politics gathered information on the voter identification requirements in 50 states and the District of Columbia for 2004. Based on interpretations of state statutes and supplemental information provided through conversations with state election officials, state ID requirements were divided into five categories, with each category of identification more rigorous than the one preceding: stating name, signing name, signature match, presenting an ID, and the most rigorous, presenting a government photo ID. The Eagleton Institute also categorized and identified each state according to maximum and minimum identification requirements. Maximum requirements refer to the most that voters may be asked to do or show at the polling place. Minimum requirements refer to the most that voters can be required to do or show in order to cast a regular ballot. These definitions and the subsequent state-by-state analysis of voter identification requirements omitted those cases in which a particular voter's eligibility might be questioned using a state's voter ballot challenge process.

Two data sets were used to apply the criteria (variables) that were developed above: aggregate voter turnout data at the county level which was gathered from the EAC's 2004 Election Day Survey and; reports of individual voters collected through the November 2004 Current Population Survey administered by the U.S. Census Bureau. Use of EAC survey data and Census Bureau CPS data provided a way to cross-check the validity of the analysis and conclusions that would be drawn regarding the effect of voter ID requirements on voter turnout.

Study Oversight and Methodological Review

A draft of the Eagleton Institute report and findings on voter identification requirements was critiqued by a peer review group convened by the Eagleton Institute. A second review of the study's research and statistical methodologies was conducted using a group of research and statistical experts independently convened by the EAC. Comments and insights of the peer review group members were taken into account in the drafting of a study report although there was not unanimous agreement among the individual reviewers regarding the study findings and recommendations.

Summary of the Research

Maximum and Minimum Voter Identification Requirements

In order to analyze what, if any, correlation may exist between a State's voter identification requirements and voter turnout, the Eagleton Institute first coded a state according to how demanding its voter ID requirement was. The voter ID requirement, ranked from lowest to highest was as follows: stating one's name, signing one's name, matching one's signature to a signature on file, providing a form of identification and, providing a form of photo identification. Several possible caveats to this ranking system were noted. For all states which had photo identification requirements in 2004, voters without a photo ID were permitted to cast a regular ballot after signing an affidavit regarding his or her identity and eligibility. These voters were also allowed to provide other forms of ID. The researchers also noted that while each state may be assigned to a category, that categorization may not reflect the actual practice related to voter identification that may or may not have taken place at many polling places.

Research performed for this study by the Moritz College of Law found that states had five different types of maximum identification requirements in place on Election Day 2004. For the purposes of this study a requirement that called for a signed affidavit or the provision of other forms of ID was considered the most rigorous or the “maximum” requirement. At the polling place voters were asked to:

- State his or her name (10 states)
- Sign his or her name (13 states and the District of Columbia)
- Sign his or her name, which would be matched to a signature on file (seven states)
- Provide a form of identification that did not necessarily include a photo (15 states)
- Provide a photo identification (five states)

Using the same criteria, but applying them as minimum rather than maximum criteria for voting the research showed: (check this section- it doesn't really make sense)

- State his or her name (12 states)
- Sign his or her name (14 states and the District of Columbia)
- Matching the voter's signature to the signature on file (6 states)
- Provide a non-photo identification (14 states)
- Swear by an affidavit (4 states)

The results of the research are summarized in Table 1.

Election laws in several states offer exceptions to these ID requirements if potential voters lack the necessary form of identification. Laws in these states set a minimum requirement that a voter may be required to satisfy in order to vote using a regular ballot. In 2004 none of the states required photo identification as a minimum standard for voting with a regular ballot. That is, voters who lacked photo ID were allowed to vote in all states, if he or she was able to meet another ID requirement.

The Relationship of Voter Identification Requirements to Voter Turnout

A statistical analysis examining the variation in turnout rates based on the type of voter ID required by each state in the 2004 election was conducted using two sets of data: 1) aggregate turnout data at the county level for each state (compiled by the Eagleton Institute of Politics-footnote about how they collected the data) and 2) individual level survey data included in the November 2004 Current Population Survey (CPS), conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau.

The analysis looked at the voter identification requirements as a continuous variable and as a series of discrete variables. As a continuous variable the maximum voter identification requirements were ranked according to how demanding they were judged to be, with photo identification considered to be the most demanding requirement (what about affidavit????). Used as discrete variable, the statistical analysis considered stating the name as the least demanding ID requirement; the other ID requirements were then compared to that requirement.

Aggregate-level statistical analysis

The statistical analysis performed by the Eagleton Institute of Politics found that when averaging across counties in each state, statewide turnout is negatively correlated to maximum voter identification requirements ($r = -.30$, p less than .05). When a statistical analysis is performed on the other minimum voter ID requirements (with affidavit being the most demanding requirement), the correlation between voter identification and turnout is negative, but not statistically significant ($r = -.20$, $p = .16$). These findings would suggest that the relationship between turnout rates and minimum requirements may not be linear.

The aggregate data show that 60.9 percent of the estimated citizen voting age population voted in 2004. Taking into account the maximum requirements, an average of 64.6 percent of the voting age population turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 58.1 percent in states that required photo identification. A similar trend was found when analyzing minimum ID requirements. Sixty-three percent of the voting age population turned out in states requiring voters to state their name, compared to 60.1 percent in states that required an affidavit from voters. This analysis showed there was not a clear, consistent linear relationship between turnout and minimum identification requirements.

(insert table 2- Variation in 2004 State Turnout Based on Voter Identification Requirements)

Multivariate models of analysis using aggregate-level data

The Eagleton Institute of Politics performed an additional analysis that would estimate the effects of voter identification requirements, that took into account the electoral context in 2004 and, the demographic characteristics of the population in each county. The model also considers such variables as whether or not the county was 1) in a presidential battleground state, 2) if the county was in a state with a competitive race for government and/or the U.S. Senate, 3) the percentage of voting-age population in each county that was Hispanic or African-American 4) the percentage of county residents age 65 and older, 5) the percent of county residents below the poverty line, and 6) the number of days between each state's registration deadline and the election.

The results of this statistical modeling and subsequent analysis indicated that the stricter voter ID requirements of matching a voter's signature to a signature on file or with presenting a non-photo identification are associated with lower voter turnout when compared to voter turnout in states that required voters to simply state his or her name. These conclusions were reached when variables 1-5 listed above were held constant.

Other results from the Eagleton Institute analysis of stricter voter identification requirements showed that:

- Increased voter turnout was associated with whether the county was in a battleground state or whether that state have a competitive race for governor and/or U.S.Senate.
- A slight negative effect on turnout was correlated with those state's with a longer time between the closing date for registration and the election.
- Voter turnout declined as the percentage of Hispanics in a county's population increased.
- Higher turnout (and a positive correlation) was associated with a higher percentage of senior citizens and household median income.
- The percentage of African-Americans in the county did not have a significant effect on turnout.

The Eagleton Institute analysis of minimum voter identification requirements showed that:

- A relationship between minimum voter ID requirements and turnout was not demonstrated.
- Battleground states and those with competitive state races had a significant and positive correlation to turnout.
- A higher percentage of senior citizens in the county and higher household median income were associated with higher turnout and showed a positive correlation to turnout.
- The percentage of Hispanics in the county was associated with reduced turnout.
- The increased number of days between the closing date for registration was associated with reduced turnout.

The analysis of these aggregate, county-level data showed a significant correlation, between maximum voter identification requirements (a signature match and non-photo identification, but not a photo identification) and lower turnout in the 2004 election. This correlation was also significant when compared to the minimum voter ID requirement of the voter simply having to state his or her name.

Multivariate analysis using individual level turnout data

This analysis which used November 2004 Current Population Survey data conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau is based on reports from self-described registered voters. Not included in the analysis are persons who said they are not registered to vote, those who said they cast absentee ballots and those who said they were not U.S. citizens. The CPS' Voting and Registration Supplement consisted of interviews, either by telephone or in person, with 96,452 respondents. (why is the N is Table 3 54,973?)

In addition to the five maximum voter identification requirements (enumerated on page XX) the analysis performed included other socioeconomic, demographic and political factors that could have influenced turnout in the 2004 election. These independent variables were analyzed against the dependent variable of whether or not the respondent said he or she voted in the November 2004 election.

In this analysis three of the voter identification requirements were shown to have a statistically significant correlation with whether or not the survey respondents said they have voted in 2004. Lower voter turnout was associated with:

- those states with maximum voter requirements to sign one's name,
- those states with maximum voter requirements to provide a non-photo ID or photo ID, or
- those states with the minimum voter requirement to swear by an affidavit in order to cast a ballot without the state-required identification

Increased voter turnout showed:

- A significant correlation with the competitiveness of the Presidential race (explain).
- African-American voters were more likely than white or other voters to say they have voted.
- Income and marital status were positive predictors of voting (high income or low income, single, married?),
- Women were more likely to say they voted than men.
- Those ages 45 to 64 and 65 and older were more likely to say they voted than those ages 18 to 24.
- Those who earned a high school diploma, attended some college, graduated from college or attended graduate school were more likely to say they have voted than those who had not finished high school.

Analysis of the predicted probability of voter turnout using the individual data

Using this Census Bureau Current Population Survey data the Eagleton Institute of Politics performed an additional statistical analysis in which they calculated the effect of various independent variables on the probability that a respondent said he or she voted. This analysis, involving 54,973 voters cross-tabulated the maximum and minimum voter identification requirements in each state with the five levels of voting requirements: stating name, signing name, matching the signature, a non-photo ID, photo-ID signing an affidavit. The results of these Predicted Probability of Voter Turnout for all Voter tabulations are summarized in Table 3 below:

From this analysis, the Eagleton Institute of Politics found that three of the voter identification requirements (which ones?) exerted a statistically significant, negative effect on whether or not the CPS survey respondents said they had voted in 2004. That is, compared to states that require voters to only state their name, those states which require the voter to sign his or her name, to provide a non-photo ID, or to provide a photo ID as a maximum requirement, were shown to have a negative influence on turnout. Also, a negative influence on turnout was found when comparing those states that require voters to only state their name, as compared to those states which have as a minimum requirement for verifying voter ID, signing an affidavit.

This probability analysis also found that the competitiveness of the presidential race had a significant effect on turnout as well as some significant demographic and educational effects. For the entire voting population signature, non-photo identification and photo identification requirements were all associated with lower turnout rates compared to the requirements that voter simply state their names. The analysis further found that:

- The predicted probability that Hispanics would vote in states that required non-photo identification was about 10 percentage points lower than in states where Hispanic voters gave their names and that Hispanic voters were less likely to vote in states that required non-photo identification as opposed to only having to state one's name.
- Hispanic voters were 10 percent less likely to vote in non-photo identification states compared to states where voters only had to give their name. African American and Asian-American voters were about 6 percent less likely, while white voters were about 2 percent less likely.
- Asian-American voters were 8.5 percent less likely to vote in states that required non-photo identification compared to states that require voters to state their names under the maximum requirements, while they were 6.1 percent less likely to vote where non-photo identification was the minimum requirement.

- For those with less than a high school diploma, the probability of voting was 5.1 percent lower in states that required photo identification as the maximum requirement and 7 percent lower in those states that required an affidavit as the minimum requirement. These percentages were arrived at when comparing these states to ones that use as a minimum or maximum requirement, the voter to merely state his or her name.

Conclusions from the statistical analysis

The statistical analysis found that as voter identification requirements vary, so do voter turnout rates. These findings were borne out through analyses conducted on aggregate data and individual-level data. There were, however, some distinctions found depending upon whether or not the state's particular voter identification requirements were set as minimums or maximums.

- The overall relationship between voter identification requirements and turnout for all registered voters was found to be small but statistically significant.
- Using the aggregate data the signature match and the non-photo identification requirement correlated with lower turnout. The photo identification requirement did not have a statistically significant effect.
- In the individual-level data the signature, no-photo identification and photo identification requirement were all correlated with lower turnout when compared to the requirements that voter simply state their names.
- Across various demographic groups (African-Americans, Asian-Americans and Hispanics) a statistically significant relationship was found between the non-photo identification requirement and voter turnout

Caveats to the Analysis

The Eagleton Institute for Politics and the EAC make note that while this analysis is a good beginning, significant questions remain regarding the relationship between voter identification requirements and turnout. These analyses are unable, for example, to capture how or why identification requirements might lower turnout. That is, is it because voters are aware of the identification requirements and stay away from the polls because of them? Alternatively, do the requirements result in some voters being turned away when they cannot provide the identification, or must cast a provisional ballot?

Knowing more about the “on the ground” experience of voters regarding various identification requirements will guide state and local level policy makers in their efforts to educate voters about the requirements. These experiences could also help instruct election judges on how to handle questions and possible disputes over voter identification requirements.

Public Policy and Administrative Considerations

Voter Identification, often described as the critical step in protecting the integrity of the ballot, is a process which can ensure that the potential voter is eligible and, if eligible, is permitted to cast one ballot. A voting system that requires voters to produce an identification document or documents may prevent the ineligible from voting, but also may prevent the eligible from casting a ballot.

Evaluating the effect of different voter identification regimes can be most effective when based on clear legal, equitable and practical standards. The questions outlined below might point policymakers to standards that can be created around voter identification requirements.

1. Is the voter ID system designed on the basis of valid and reliable empirical studies the will address concerns regarding certain types of voting fraud?
2. Does the voter ID requirement comply with the letter and spirit of the Voting Rights Act?
3. How effective is the voter ID requirement on increasing the security of the ballot and can it be coordinated with the statewide voter registration database?
4. How feasible is the voter identification requirement? That is, are there administrative or budgetary considerations or concerns? How easy or difficult will it be for pollworkers who must administer the requirement?
5. How cost effective is the voter ID system? That is, what are the monetary and non-monetary costs to the voter and to the state for implementing the ID system?
6. If voter ID requirements are shown to reduce voter turnout (generally, or with some particular groups), what possible steps should be taken to ameliorate this problem?

Recommendations and Next Steps

As the Federal agency charged with informing election officials and the public about various issues related to the administration of elections EAC believes it should, in its capacity as a supporter of elections research, undertake additional study into the topic of voter identification requirements and the implementation of them in the following ways:

- Longitudinal studies of jurisdictions that have changed voter identification requirements.

016311

- State-by-state and precinct-level analyses that will examine the correlations between various voter identification requirements and voter registration and turnout
- Alternative forms and methods for verifying a voter's identity.
- Continuing research into the connection between various voter identification requirements and the number of ballots cast and counted
- A continuing state-by-state update on changes to voter identification requirements.
- Continued collection of state-by-state data which will help examine the impact that voter identification requirements are having on the number of voters who are casting provisional ballots because of voter identification verification issues.

Subject Questions for Eagleton

Commissioners,

Commissioner Davidson asked that I forward to each of you the following questions that I drafted at her request last week. She also asked that I let you know that she is interested in asking questions 3, 5, and 7.

1. What is meant by "statistically significant"? Please explain in plain language when a result is considered statistically significant. Also, please provide an academic definition of that term. How did you calculate the mean and standard deviations from the mean?
2. What data was used to derive these research findings?
3. Did you attempt to find information or data related to elections prior to 2004 in states that have voter identification requirements?
4. What other variables other than voter identification were tested? Contested race? Historical voter turnout? Weather? Media attention to the area? Candidate activities/campaign?
5. What was the impact (positive or negative) of these other factors on voter turnout?
6. How did you control these variables/factors when measuring the impact of voter ID on voter turnout or on prospective voter turnout? For example, did you only apply the factor to like circumstances – similar historical turnout, same level of contention in the races of the ballot, etc.
7. Would the study and your conclusions have been more reliable if additional data had been analyzed? Data such as voter turn out in states that have had voter ID in past Federal elections?
8. What data did you use to identify voter turnout?
9. What data did you use to identify whether people or groups of people were more or less likely to vote when identification is required?
10. Why did you use census data as opposed to data on registered voters? Doesn't census data also include information from people who are not registered voters and people who are not even eligible to be registered voters?

In addition to the questions above, I provided the following feedback to Commissioner Davidson concerning the draft report provided by Eagleton:

- I am troubled by the concept that Eagleton compared states as if they were equal. They assume that, all factors being equal, that the voter turn out in each state would be equal. I am not at all certain that this is the case. Further, there is no evidence that the statistician actually compared previous years' turnout in the same state to determine whether 2004 was some sort of anomaly for that state (high or low). Long story short, I am very skeptical of the data that they used to draw conclusions. We should ask questions about what data they used, how they parsed it, why they used the data, what other data could have been used to provide better, more reliable results.

(i.e. state name, photo i.d., etc) and a maximum requirement (i.e., state name, photo i.d., etc.). It makes no sense to me how they could possibly arrive at a different percentage for these requirement levels.

- My third issue is the persistent use of the phrases "ballot access" and "ballot integrity" without some definition or some explanation of what those concepts are.

Commissioner Davidson also asked that I ask some questions related to the first bullet, above, specifically relating to the comparison of states without validation that the state's turn out for 2004 was "normal" for that state as opposed to an anomaly.

Last, Commissioner Davidson asked that you all coordinate your selected questions to avoid having two commissioners wanting to ask the same question.

Please let me know if you have any questions or concerns about these questions or if I can explain my reasoning behind the questions.

Subject: Questions for Eagleton

Commissioners,

Commissioner Davidson asked that I forward to each of you the following questions that I drafted at her request last week. She also asked that I let you know that she is interested in asking questions 3, 5, and 7.

1. What is meant by "statistically significant"? Please explain in plain language when a result is considered statistically significant. Also, please provide an academic definition of that term. How did you calculate the mean and standard deviations from the mean?
2. What data was used to derive these research findings?
3. Did you attempt to find information or data related to elections prior to 2004 in states that have voter identification requirements?
4. What other variables other than voter identification were tested? Contested race? Historical voter turnout? Weather? Media attention to the area? Candidate activities/campaign?
5. What was the impact (positive or negative) of these other factors on voter turnout?
6. How did you control these variables/factors when measuring the impact of voter ID on voter turnout or on prospective voter turnout? For example, did you only apply the factor to like circumstances – similar historical turnout, same level of contention in the races of the ballot, etc.
7. Would the study and your conclusions have been more reliable if additional data had been analyzed? Data such as voter turn out in states that have had voter ID in past Federal elections?
8. What data did you use to identify voter turnout?
9. What data did you use to identify whether people or groups of people were more or less likely to vote when identification is required?
10. Why did you use census data as opposed to data on registered voters? Doesn't census data also include information from people who are not registered voters and people who are not even eligible to be registered voters?

In addition to the questions above, I provided the following feedback to Commissioner Davidson concerning the draft report provided by Eagleton:

- I am troubled by the concept that Eagleton compared states as if they were equal. They assume that, all factors being equal, that the voter turn out in each state would be equal. I am not at all certain that this is the case. Further, there is no evidence that the statistician actually compared previous years' turnout in the same state to determine whether 2004 was some sort of anomaly for that state (high or low). Long story short, I am very skeptical of the data that they used to draw conclusions. We should ask questions about what data they used, how they parsed it, why they used the data, what other data could have been used to provide better, more reliable results.
- My second concern is how they (statistically speaking) differentiate between a minimum requirement

Subject Preparation for Vote Fraud Conference in Utah

History:

 This message has been replied to.

Matt (and Amy) are working on a speech for the Chairman to deliver at the Vote Fraud conference in Utah at the end of the week. Matt has asked for the consultants' definition of vote fraud/voter intimidation and the draft recommendations. As neither have been through full Commission review, I would like to speak with one or both of you before I drop this information in any one Commissioner's lap. Matt is looking for this information today. FYI, attached are copies of the consultants' definition and the draft recommendations from the consultants and others from the working group. Also attached is a summary of concerns expressed by the working group. --- Peggy

Jeannie

We suspect that someone from the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Project Working Group has been talking to reporters, tipping them off about what we are finding in our preliminary study, and referring them to our consultants (although the information could have come from anyone on the EAC boards, too). Apparently, the U.S. News & World Report reporter who contacted me also contacted both consultants working on the project.

Based on my recommendation, Tova Wang and, possibly, Job Serebrov, who are on EAC personal services contracts for our voting fraud and voter intimidation research, will seek further clarification from you about what they can and cannot say to reporters and in public fora about vote fraud and voter intimidation and about EAC's research. I have previously advised Tova and Job not to discuss the work they are doing for us as this is EAC research, the Commissioners have not yet received and accepted the final report, and the Commission has not approved their speaking about the EAC research.

Tova plans to call you tomorrow (Tuesday, June 27) about the issue. In addition to the reporter's inquiry, she has been invited to speak on the subject at the summer conference of the National Association of State Legislatures. She has plenty of knowledge of the subject in her own right (apart from our study), but is having trouble differentiating between her own work and the work she is doing for us. Please, just let me know what you advise her to do.

I have two questions about the 2005 Annual Report that you gave me.

(1) Who are, currently, the nine members of the Executive Board of the Standards Board?

(2) On p. 27 of the 2005 Annual Report, it states that EAC contracted with two consultants to conduct preliminary research on the issues of voting fraud and voter intimidation. Can you tell me who these organizations or individuals are, and when their reports might be available? If they are available now, how can I obtain them?

Subject: Call from Paul Vinovich

I took a telephone call this morning from Paul Vinovich. He had attempted to reach Gracia, but since she was not here, he asked Sheila if I was in the office so he spoke to me.

Paul was very upset with comments that Tova Wang had made at yesterday's AEI's meeting in which she basically indicated that voter fraud did not exist in the USA. He asked how a person who believes that voter fraud does not exist--or not seem at least willing to listen to both sides--can be hired by the EAC to do a study on voter fraud/voter intimidation. I explained to Paul (as I have now had to explain to many others) that Tova was "balanced" on the study with Job Severbrov. He did not know Job but was well-aware of Tova's positions and was concerned that her public comments indicate that she will not be fair in looking at this issue. I explained to Paul that we were monitoring the work of our consultants on this study and no report would be issued publicly without the support of at least three commissioners. I sent him some background information on Job. I think this study will need close monitoring.

Subject reference materials for vote count/recount RFP

Gaylin -

There are 3 files of reference materials for this RFP: the spreadsheet of vote definitions and two summaries of statutory provisions on recounts (which are not consistent in information provided, e.g., one provides statutory language without commentary - the other provides summarized commentary without statutory language). We need a brief paragraph to accompany each to explain what the Offeror can glean from it. For example, the spreadsheet on vote definitions has references in it such as "See pdf of Arkansas statutes in file.", "There is a pdf of the manual in the document folder", "See .doc in file." "I was not able to find copies of these manuals." So this is clearly an internal working draft, not really a final product. How would the Offeror use this in preparing their proposal? Similarly, the two disparate summaries of statutes on recounts - we need to explain that this is a preliminary collection of information and that the two files are different in terms of content. Again, how would the Offeror use this information in preparing their proposal? Also, the title that printed out on first file citing statutory language is not correct and needs to be changed. It currently reads "Voting System Certification by State as of April 22, 2005." There is no heading on the second file.

This is a voluminous amount of information. We need to think about whether it is needed for the preparation of proposals. I will be considering this point this evening when I review the SOW and proposal instructions. Would appreciate your thoughts on this tomorrow.

U.S. Department of Justice
Bond Building
1400 New York Avenue, NW, 12th Floor
Washington, DC 20005

Dear Mr. Donsanto:

The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) has undertaken a short term project to research voting fraud and voter intimidation. As an expert in the prosecution of election crimes, your expertise and unique experience would be a valuable resource as we move forward. I am writing to ask if you will be available to advise and inform our efforts.

As you know, EAC is a federal agency established in accordance with section 201 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA), Public Law 107-252. HAVA requires EAC to conduct research regarding election administration issues. The election administration issues itemized in the statute include:

- Collecting nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for federal office [section 241(b)(6)]
- Identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)]

The EAC Board of Advisors, established in accordance with HAVA section 211, recommended that EAC place a high priority on these topics when initiating our research projects. Subsequently, EAC obtained the services of two consultants (Tova Wang and Job Serebrov) to:

- Define Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation - develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of federal elections;
- Research Available Resources - perform background research (including federal and state administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, and civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and summarize this research and all source documentation;

- Establish a Project Working Group - in consultation with EAC, establish a working group composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about voting fraud and voter intimidation, provide a description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the background research to the group, and convene the group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic;
- Produce a Report - Provide a report to EAC summarizing the preliminary research and working group deliberations, including recommendations for future EAC research, if any;
- Assist EAC in Initiating Future Research - if EAC decides to pursue one or more recommendations for future research, draft the project scope and statement of work for the request for proposals.

The EAC manager for this project is Peggy Sims. It would be most helpful if you could offer your expertise to Ms. Sims and our team of consultants. Ms. Sims will contact you to follow up on this request. If you are able to assist us, she will set up an initial interview, which will focus on the identification and prosecution of offenses involving voting fraud and voter intimidation, as well as possible resources on these subjects for our consultants' review. Our consultants and project manager may have follow up questions as the research proceeds. It also would be helpful if you would be able to attend the working group meeting to contribute to its discussion. This meeting will likely be held in February 2006.

If you have any questions about the research or this request, please contact Peggy Sims by email at psims@eac.gov or by phone at 202-566-3120.

Thank you so much for your consideration of this request.
